NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SUNNY | HIGH 82, LOW 58 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM BACK TO SCHOOL, FALL 2009

UMass servers hacked by unknown attacker

By Matt Rocheleau
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts computer server containing thousands of alumni names, social security numbers and "very limited amounts" of credit card information was hacked into last September, University officials announced on August 5; however, there is no evidence, and the University believes it is unlikely that the personal information was stolen.

The server – which is used by the Career Services department and contains data from students attending UMass between 1982 and 2002, and a few others who attended before 1982 – was illegally accessed through a malware program installed by an unknown individual, or individuals, over a 42-day period from September 15 through October 27, 2008. According a University statement, the system was most vulnerable during the intrusion's first two days.

A sole police report of the incident was filed on May 7 with the UMass Police Department by two University employees who suspected Chinese nationals were responsible for the intrusion.

The police report states that Jeffrey Silver, director of Career Services, and Duane Stinchfield, the department's assistant director and systems administrator, "were sent to the police department by their supervisor to report the matter ... They added that the report of the computer hacking was old, and that they suspected Chinese nationals of conducting the attack."

Both Silver and Stinchfield directed questions to the University's media relations office.

"That was a really early theory and, to some degree, speculation," said campus spokesman Ed Blaguszewski. "No one really knows [who was responsible for the intrusion]. We may never know."

The officer who filed the report was not able to be reached for comment in time for publication, and UMPD Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald said he did not know enough about the incident to expand on UMass' suspicion that Chinese nationals may have been responsible.

The University did not announce the intrusion had occurred until last month when state law required the school to do so; however, the Office of Information Technology (OIT) had learned of it last fall and reviewed the case until May, before turning over a more detailed analysis to Stroz Friedberg, LLC, an independent computer forensics company.

Campus spokesman Patrick Callahan said the illegal intrusion was not made public at any point in the 10 months prior to August 5 because of security concerns. Also, officials had not confirmed whether or not the server contained any sensitive data required to send a legal notification until the forensics company's analysis, which cost UMass around $49,000, was complete in mid-July.

"It takes a while to understand the breadth of the something like this," Blaguszewski said. "I think the people involved in reviewing the case realized the seriousness of the matter in a progressive fashion."

OIT had found the intrusion to be "potentially broad in scope"

See ATTACK on page 5

Students returning to UMass may be surprised by the new fountains that now decorate the campus pond. Resident geese could not be reached for comment.

PVTA paints the valley green with fleet of eco-friendly buses

By Danielle Kahn
Collegian Staff

The Pioneer Valley Transit Authority received six new 40-foot buses this July, which have all been updated to make them greener.

The new buses come with Americans with Disabilities Act accessibility, large access doors, LED lighting and security cameras.

In addition to these updates, all buses running for the PVTA use Diesel Particulate Filters (DPF's) and Ultra-Low Sulfur Diesel Fuel (ULSD). According to the Environmental Protection Agency, DPF's reduce emissions of carbon monoxide and hydrocarbons, which contribute to air pollution, by 60 to 90 percent. These filters require the use of ULSD, which is a cleaner-burning diesel fuel that allows advanced pollution control technology in trucks and buses.

The new buses, each of which have a 12 year life-span, were brought in to replace six from the older fleet

"After 12 years, if the buses have life left we reuse the parts, if not we scrap them," said Jill Holliday, Director of Marketing at the PVTA and a 1983 UMass graduate.

The PVTA also employs other environmentally friendly techniques.

"We recycle waste oil parts, use energy efficient lighting and have solar panels at some of the bus stops," said Holliday.

She added, "We are very environmentally conscious as an authority. Some of the supervisors' vehicles are hybrids."

Certain students expressed their appreciation of the PVTA's effort to go green.

"I think it's really great because multiple buses are driving all day throughout campus. The fact that they're trying to reduce their emissions is a good start, and it helps other people be aware of the environment," said UMass senior Catherine Berkman.

Other students are looking forward to the greater efficiency provided by the new buses

"Sometimes the buses don't run on time... they have problems because they're a bit old," said UMass junior Alicia LaRosa. "It'll be nice to see everything run better and last longer."

Three of these buses will operate from the Northampton garage, and three will operate from the UMass garage. They are currently running routes. For additional information visit www.pvta.com or call toll free 1-877-779-7882.

Danielle Kahn can be reached at dkahn@student umass.edu.

UMass Dining Services cook up two new national awards

By Vincent Capone
Collegian Staff

In recognition of its achievements, the University of Massachusetts Dining Services received two second place awards over the past summer from the National Association of College and University Food Services' national conference held in Milwaukee, Wis.

The NACUFS conference is an annual gathering of directors and managers of university dining services from around the country. With over one thousand attendees, the conference features educational seminars and numerous prestigious award presentations.

UMass Dining entered two categories in the Loyal E. Horton Dining Award competition. The award, which is named for a NACUFS founder, gives recognition to the most successful ideas in menus, presentations, special events planning and new dining concepts. UMass Dining was awarded second place in the Residence Hall Dining and Catering Special Event categories, which are two of the most competitive categories, with over one hundred entries among them.

UMass Dining attributes its Residence Hall Dining award to its innovative Stealth Health program. Stealth Health features a menu of flavorful, healthy options for students without specifically labeling them as being healthy. The menu offers increased options of proteins and fish, healthy carbohydrates, fresh locally grown produce and uses less salt in food preparation.

The Catering Special Event award was based on the Renaissance Banquet at Memorial Hall, which is a themed event featuring actual renaissance recipes and creative food displays. The event, featuring costumed staff and decor, encouraged the guests to eat with their hands. Ken Toong, executive director of dining and retail services at UMass, said the biggest challenge was conducting the event off site in Memorial Hall, a building with no kitchen facilities.

Toong is very proud of UMass Dining's recent achievements.

"They were highly competitive categories, and we lost by less than one point each," he said. "Placing second twice in one of the most competitive categories is no small task, and our dining programs have been in the top three for the past five consecutive years, which speaks highly of our commitment to outstanding quality and service.

"We were pleased with the results, but disappointed in not receiving first place gold medals in both categories. On the other hand, UMass Dining has been a perennial winner for the Loyal E. Horton Awards," Toong added.

Since 2000, UMass Dining has received 13 awards and has achieved a reputation for being one of the most renowned university dining services in the country. In 2007, UMass Dining was awarded the grand prize and the gold medal for the Residence Hall Dining Multi-Concepts category. In 2008, Toong's team won a silver medal in the category of Residence Hall Dining.

"We believe in continuous improvement and success is never final. I think we strive to be the most innovative university in the country," he said.

Under Toong's leadership, UMass Dining promotes sustainability and is a leader

See AWARD on page 5

Courtesy UMass-ESS

A UMass chef serves students at the Berkshire Dining Commons. The University's dining services took home two awards at the National Association of College and University Food Services' summer conference.

James V. Staros appointed provost and vice chancellor

By Jessica Sacco
Collegian Staff

Even though the majority of UMass students have spent the summer removed, both physically and mentally, from campus affairs, Whitmore has been the scene of quite a bit of administrative activity; the summer break has seen the appointment of Michael F. Malone as vice chancellor for Research and Engagement, and Mark A. Fuller's appointment as dean of Isenberg School of Management. Also part of this crop of new faces is James V. Staros, former dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at Stony Brook University in New York, who was named provost and senior vice chancellor for Academic Affairs at the University of Massachusetts Amherst.

The appointment was announced by Chancellor Robert Holub, and became effective Aug. 2.

The position will involve collaborating with the chancellor while working to advance the academic programs of UMass by focusing on important aspects such as budget cuts, summer programs and enrollment management.

Staros said that while the nation is in an economic crisis, he hopes to maintain the same high level of education even with the decrease in state funding.

His main goals for the budget will focus on preparing for the 2010-2011 academic year, which is when UMass will lose access to the one year federal replacement funds given by the sate this year to replace funds the university has lost.. This means students and faculty are likely to feel the effects of the budget crunch.

However, Staros hopes that by planning ahead he can help create a smoother transition from one year to the next.

"I'm trying to do it in a way that protects the institution and students and still allows us to move forward," he said.

Staros' previous work at Stony Brook leaves many, including the chancellor, confident that his background experience will help UMass become a better university.

As Staros explained, the budget crisis hit New York first and he feels what he learned there can be brought to UMass.

As dean at Stony Brook, he contributed to improvements in the college's undergraduate retention and graduation rates, as well as the rise in their ranking for undergraduate programs in the U.S. and World report, which has improved 21 places in the past five years.

"Staros is a distinguished scholar, teacher, and administrator whose broad range of experience will greatly benefit UMass Amherst," Holub said in a statement.

Staros also hopes to expand summer programs to offer a broader array of courses for students taking classes in the summer, as well as providing courses for students who have an interest in graduating early.

By aligning UMass admissions with the aspirations of the university, Staros plans to attract a different group of prospective students. Instead of welcoming students who chose the school as a safety choice, he hopes to have people look at UMass as a more attractive first choice.

"[UMass] is a wonderful place, a fabulous institution," he said. "I want to work on ways of getting that message out."

Overall, Staros wishes to raise the stature of UMass on both a national and an international scale.

"It will be more challenging in tough budget times but we're always working on it," he said.

Jessica Sacco can be reached at jsacco@student.umass.edu

ARTS & LIVING

Beer traveler

Take a tour of Europe's best beers with Collegian staff writer, Andrew Sheridan.

SEE PAGE 8

SPORTS

Rudy steps down

Massachusetts women's soccer coach Jim Rudy retires after 21 years with the Minutewomen.

SEE PAGE 18

EDITORAL & OPINION

Ed Op editor Nick O'Malley has some advice for the bacon generation: Eat up.

SEE PAGE 6

DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Log on to the revamped DailyCollegian.com for all new features, including exclusive video from Matisyahu's surprise concert in Northampton.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIX
BACK TO SCHOOL ISSUE

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF William McGuinness
MANAGING EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
BUSINESS MANAGER Daniel Jette
PRODUCTION MANAGER Michael Sarkes
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Kirsten Swenson
ADVERTISING MANAGER Michael Tortorici
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Max Detmer
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Shawna Murphy
COMICS EDITOR Annie Keithline
EDITORIAL EDITOR Nick O'Malley
NEWS EDITOR Nick Bush
SPORTS EDITOR Jeffrey R. Lamard
WEB EDITOR Brian Wood
PHOTO EDITOR Matthew Harrison
IT MANAGER Victor Jacek
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Matt Zolnierz
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Jacinto
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Norman Provost
CLASSIFIED MANAGER Katelyn Tamilio
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Justin Gagnon
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Elyse Horowitz
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Cal Scannell
ASSISTANT COMICS Andrew Witts
ASSISTANT NEWS Samuel Butterfield
ASSISTANT NEWS Alyssa Creamer
ASSISTANT NEWS Jenn Heshion
ASSISTANT SPORTS David Brinch
ASSISTANT SPORTS Mike Gillmeister
ASSISTANT SPORTS Adam Miller
ASSISTANT PHOTO Maxwell Sparr
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA Chris Shores

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS COLLEGIATE SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALUMNI LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE MASSACHUSETTS COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BY PHONE, 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Kirsten Swenson

COPY EDITOR
S.P. Sullivan, Will McGuinness

PRODUCTION TEAM
Michael Sarkes

UMASS AMHERST STUDENT AFFAIRS AND CAMPUS LIFE

Popcorn Social

Meet the New Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life
Dr. Jean Kim

319 Whitmore
Monday - Thursday
4 pm - 5 pm
Popcorn available starting September 14

Share your thoughts, Ask questions.

Alumni offer aid to future educators

BY JENNIFER HESHION
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When the University of Massachusetts reunited the Class of 1959 in the courtyard of Skinner Hall last June, an announcement was made, endowing $90,000 in scholarships for students in the University's nursing doctoral program.

The 50th class reunion gift from the UMass alumni will be distributed amongst the nursing Ph.D. students who qualify for financial assistance, in addition to being used for enticing new recruits to campus.

In May 2006, UMass became the first school in the state to offer the advanced degree in nursing upon approval from the school's Board of Trustees. The Class of 1959 Nursing Scholarship Endowment will pay for the students' books, health insurance and their cost of living.

"Every 50th reunion class creates a class gift," said Sarah Sligo, senior associate director of Annual Giving and recruitment specialist for the UMass Alumni Association. "They are always thinking of something to give back and encourage students to give back in the future."

Sligo was instrumental in developing the reunion committee for the class of 1959. She recollected how one of the committee members was particularly interested in the study of aging and how it reflects in the current state of the healthcare system.

"One of the biggest problems for healthcare is that there is such a severe nursing shortage," Sligo said. "We do not have enough professors to teach the students."

She added that, due to the current economic crisis, the staggering costs of higher education have often prompted students to enter the work force immediately after receiving an undergraduate degree rather than pursuing graduate studies.

Without a Ph.D., most nursing graduates will find tough times ahead because they lack the necessary credentials to pursue a career in the field or in healthcare education. For example, members of the UMass faculty must have a Ph.D. in nursing in order to teach at the university. For nursing students hoping to receive their Ph.D. from UMass, the program's length is four years with a total cost of $80,000.

With the announcement of the gift from the Class of 1959, Sligo said the school is working towards endowing students with the special skills they will need to obtain the careers best suited for them through continued education in graduate programs.

According to Andrew Clendinneng, director of development for the School of Nursing, only 47 percent of nursing professors actually have doctoral degrees. One of the reasons behind this limited number of highly trained nurses is the lack of adequate financial aid for students.

"This is a really important time for nursing," he said. "We need more nurses in the field to care for our grandparents, our parents and eventually us."

For Clendinneng, who works with alumni to cultivate gifts for the school, attending the first information session for the reunion committee was an opportunity to present his case for support on behalf of the nursing school.

Hoping for others to follow the class of 1959's example, Clendinneng optimistically concluded his sentiments on the gift as a beginning for some much-needed changes in the healthcare system and in education.

"It was transforming because the nursing shortage is so critical, so this type of step forward in making change is really exciting," he said.

"When the gift was announced it was really exciting because instead of dedicating a bench or a tree this class gift is quite different," he added. "They recognized a nursing shortage and wanted to help create educators of tomorrow."

Jennifer Heshion can be reached at jheshion@student.umass.edu

Not Ready For Bedtime Players conceive training manual

Members of UMass' Not Ready for Bedtime Players perform a skit from their popular and long-running show. The theater troupe recently released a manual to help other sexuality education performing groups.

BY SAM BUTTERFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Those tense, awkward moments where someone says something offensive and no one knows how to react. That guy at the party who keeps hitting on an entire group of friends. The kid on your floor who has been drinking for two weeks straight.

All of these situations happen in college, and they are all tackled by the University of Massachusetts' Not Ready for Bedtime Players peer sexuality education troupe.

The Players, who have performed at UMass since 1988, have recently put out a guide for schools and other programs with advice, background information, and entertaining skits on healthy sexuality, gender, relationships, violence prevention, drugs and alcohol, and other, sometimes hazy, difficult subjects. The manual has been in existence for some time, according to group director and University Health Services educator, Amanda Collings Vann, and has been updated periodically by the directors of the group.

"The manual has been around since the Bedtime Players started in 1988," she said, explaining that the group was created in response to the HIV and AIDS crisis of the late 1980s.

"The manual has been through a bunch of different revisions over the years," she added.

Collings Vann explained that the Players decided to market the manual, because they have received questions from other similar groups on how they operate.

"We've recently been getting a number of inquiries from people at other universities asking how the Bedtime Players work, how do we recruit people, how do we develop our material," said Collings Vann. "So we decided we should put it out there because we have this fantastic resource for informing people about sexual health in a different way."

The manual includes information on the group's audition and recruitment process, how it trains its educators, and a collection of skits the troupe has performed over the years.

The newest material, according to Collings Vann, is on bystander intervention regarding homophobia. That is, the new material will inform people in the crowd how to mediate a situation where homophobic remarks are being made.

The Not Ready for Bedtime Players, the longest running sexuality theatre troupe in the country, will perform at a variety of venues this semester. In addition to playing at Cance, James and Emerson residential halls, the troupe will play at Elms and Hampshire Colleges, and their schedule will continue to fill until September, when Collings Vann anticipates they will be booked.

The group promotes what it calls healthy sexuality. It aims not to force people to do anything, but to encourage people to look at how they incorporate sexuality into their lives and how they can do so healthily.

"We want people to have healthy and fulfilling lives, a component of that is a healthy sexuality, and sometimes people hear sexuality and think sex, just about safer sex or orgasms, but healthy sexuality is really your womb to your tomb, it's your person," said Collings Vann.

On the manual, Collings Vann said they had recently sold one of the $170 guides to a group at the University of Buffalo, and they expect sales to increase as they begin to advertise for it.

Sam Butterfield can be reached at sbutterfield@dailycollegian.com

GET A 5% REBATE
On Textbooks

It's easy to get your 5% rebate on textbook purchases from the
UMASS Textbook Annex

Here's how it works:

Step 1: Purchase your books from the UMASS Textbook Annex

Step 2: Bring your receipt and UMASS I.D to the UMASS University Store in the Campus Center between the fourth week and last day of classes

Step 3. Get a 5% rebate credit to use on anything at the UMASS University Store

Rebate offer is good only on textbook purchases. Valid I.D. required. Returned books not eligible for rebate. Textbook receipts must be presented during the semester purchases where made. Store rebate credits expire at the end of the semester they where received. Rebate not to exceed $50.00 per semester. See store for details

UMASS AMHERST University of Massachusetts
University Store and Textbook Annex
Amherst Campus Center • 413-545-2619

Day one and you're in control

You have plans. Places you want to go. At Ernst & Young, we get that. That's why we give you room to explore. Hands-on experience in assurance, tax, transaction or advisory services. Exciting new industries. And global opportunities. You're in charge of your career and where it's headed. And we can't wait to be part of it.

What's next for your future?
To learn more, visit ey.com/us/dayone and find us on Facebook.

ERNST & YOUNG
Quality In Everything We Do

Welcome to Award Winning UMass Dining
We've been expecting you!

Going Green GOING TRAYLESS!

DINING COMMONS
WORCESTER, FRANKLIN, HAMPSHIRE, HAMPDEN AND BERKSHIRE

- Continuous dining from 7am to midnight*
- Fifteen World Cuisine options
- Grab-n-Go and Breakfast-on-the-Run
- Create your own stir fry and noodle bowl stations
- Stealth Health Program
- Weekly theme specials including Guest Chef Series, Restaurant Night, and Lobster Night
- Sustainable Seafood
- Sushi Bar and Dim Sum Brunch
- Kosher Dining at Franklin DC · Halal Dining at Worcester DC
- Five College Meal Exchange Program
- Free nutritional consultation with our registered licensed dietitian

*Berkshire DC Monday through Thursday

CAMPUS CENTER STUDENT UNION COMPLEX & CONCESSIONS

- Bluewall Eatery
- Bluewall Café
- Marketplace Café
- Starbuck's Cart
- Hatch Food Court
- Mullins Center and Outdoor Concessions
- Café Talesi Thai Cuisine
- Pita Pit serving pita sandwiches at 4 locations
- Star Ginger by Lemon Grass Restaurant
- Famous Famiglia Pizza at 2 locations
- French Meadow
- Recreational Center Café

CAFES AND CONVENIENCE STORES

- Southwest Café
- Whitmore Café
- Herter Hall Café
- Thompson Hall Café
- The Procrastination Station at the W.E.B. Du Bois Library
- Mullins Café
- Worcester C-Store with groceries
- Franklin C-Store
- Hampden C-Store
- Mini Store at the Student Union
- UMass Concessions

UMASS DINING UMassAmherst
umassdining.com
LOCAL HERO
Food Management's BEST CONCEPTS
IVY
RESIDENTIAL
YCMP

Yellow Ribbon Program set to help U.S. veterans pay tuition

By Alyssa Creamer
Collegian Staff

Out-of-state students with full-eligibility to receive the veterans' benefits of the Post-9/11 GI Bill will find college costs more manageable this fall. This is the result of University of Massachusetts' decision to join the Veterans Administration's Yellow Ribbon Program.

The formal title of the Yellow Ribbon Program is the Yellow Ribbon GI Education Enhancement Program, and it is a new provision of the Post-9/11 GI Bill that offers educational and financial assistance to qualifying veterans.

According to the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs, the Yellow Ribbon Program will grant veterans money to pay tuition expenses that exceed the highest public in-state undergraduate tuition rate.

Like all other universities participating in this program, UMass will be responsible for paying up to 50 percent of the excess expenses described above, and then to defray the cost further, the Veterans Administration will match the amount the university covers.

The program is an extension of Chapter 33 in the Post-9/11 GI Bill, which promises to cover the highest in-state rate for in-state veterans.

"I think the Yellow Ribbon Program is a great benefit for out-of-state students," said Eileen Stewart, associate dean of students and head of veterans' affairs at UMass.

Admittance to this program is on a first-come, first-serve basis, and there is a cap on the number of students that can participate annually.

"It'll be slow at first," said Stewart. "I'm guessing there will be under 20 students in the program this first semester."

Nationwide, the Yellow Ribbon Program can only begin paying for veterans' tuitions on or after Aug. 1, 2009.

The Veterans' Affairs website lists that a veteran is only eligible for benefits if he or she meets certain requirements.

An individual interested in participating in the program must have served as an active duty member after Sept. 11, 2001 for at least 36 months total. That is to say, the service did not have to be in constant, consecutive months, but could be split up between months or years.

Also, the individual will qualify for the bill's benefits if the applicant was "honorably discharged from active duty for a service-connected disability and served 30 continuous days after Sept. 10, 2001."

UMass students who qualify may begin applying for the program's benefits. However, they must first apply for the Post-9/11 GI Bill. Applications are online and located at http://www.gibill.va.gov/GI_Bill_Info/How_to_Apply.htm.

A complete list of schools offering the Yellow Ribbon Program, along with frequently asked questions and detailed lists about eligibility to transfer benefits onto dependents can be found at www.gibill.va.gov/GI_Bill_Info/CH33/Yellow_ribbon.htm.

Alyssa Creamer can be reached at acreamer@student.umass.edu

This fall, American veterans planning to attend UMass will have the option of participating in the Yellow Ribbon Program, a extension of the Post-9/11 GI Bill that allows them to enroll in the University at a reduced cost.

MESSAGES FROM THE BURSAR'S OFFICE

Payment Information

QuikPAY for Students

The Umass Amherst campus no longer sends paper bills. QuikPAY is our system for all students to view and/or pay their bills online and it is the preferred method of payment. To access QuikPAY students should go to their Student Center in SPIRE and then click on "View/Pay Bill" in the Finances section, located below the classes that the student is currently enrolled in.

QuikPAY for Parents and Guardians

Students can set up parents and other individuals as QuikPAY Authorized Payers through SPIRE. Students will input the payer's email and assign a temporary password. Authorized Payers will receive an email with their login name and after signing in with the password provided by the student they can select a new password for future use. Each billing cycle the payers will receive an email notifying them that the bill is available through a link in the text of the message. Go to www.umass.edu/bursar for details. Please be advised that QuikPAY and FERPA have their own separate authorizations/access codes.

FERPA

The Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act is a federal law protecting the confidentiality of your student records. In compliance with FERPA, UMass Amherst must have the student's written permission to release information from your records. You can provide permission by filling out a FERPA privacy waiver online. Completing the waiver will allow whomever you designate to communicate with the university about your bill, financial aid, and housing. You may edit your FERPA waiver at any time to change or eliminate your designees. The FERPA privacy waiver is limited to two categories of information: finances and housing. It does not allow your designees access to your academic information (such as your grades). Fill out the FERPA Privacy Waiver through SPIRE; navigate to the Student Home ⇨ Holds & To Do's⇨ FERPA Privacy Waiver.

Excess Express

Why wait in line to pick up your refund check? Sign up for Excess Express and have your refund automatically deposited into the U.S. bank account of your choice. To enroll, log on to SPIRE, navigate to the Student Menu->Finances->Excess Express. There you will follow the instructions and enter your banking information.

Mass PIRG/Child Care Waivers

Why wait in line to pick up your refund check? Sign up for Excess Express and have your refund automatically deposited into the U.S. bank account of your choice. To enroll, log on to SPIRE, navigate to the Student Menu->Finances->Excess Express. There you will follow the instructions and enter your banking information.

Waiving Student Health Insurance

If you did not waive the student health insurance for fall 2009 you may not waive it for spring 2010 semester unless spring 2010 is your first semester. The student mandatory health fee cannot be waived. If you are eligible to waive the Student Health Insurance Plan, visit http://spire.umass.edu for a link to the online waiver process. The Student Health Insurance waiver deadline is 10/24/09.

Eligible Graduate Student Employees (Those in the GEO bargaining unit who qualify for SHIP Fee Exemptions) who do not waive SHIP are entitled to a 95% reduction of the SHIP Health Fee for an individual. Send the Bursar's Office an email at bursar @admin.umass.edu. to inform them that you will be enrolled in SHIP and qualify for the 95% reduction of this fee.

How to Contact Us

The Bursar Teller hours are Monday through Friday from 9:00am-4:00pm and the Customer Service hours are 9:00am-5:00pm. The Bursar telephone number is (413) 545-2368 or you can contact us by email at bursar@admin.umass.edu

Alumni data threatened by mysterious security breach

ATTACK from page 1

when its evaluation was complete, which caused the University to hire the computer forensics company.

Between mid-July and the recent announcement, the University was in contact with the state Attorney General Martha Coakley's office to determine how to appropriately broadcast the incident.

"All of this is done in compliance with the law, [Massachusetts General Law, Chapter 93H]," Callahan said. "There has been back and forth [with the attorney general's office] on the appropriate and legal way to inform the public."

Callahan said the breach affected both undergraduate and graduate student data, but both spokesmen declined to disclose the number of students whose data might have been compromised. Between 1982 and 2002 Callahan said it was a "large number" of students whose name and social security numbers were on the server, and prior to 1982, a "small number."

However, a copy of a more-detailed legal notice sent from UMass to the state director of Consumer Affairs and Business Regulations said "thousands" of students are believed to have been at risk, but UMass was unable to determine "with any certainty" the exact number affected.

Though University officials declined to disclose which department used the breached server and how many computers were connected to the server, the more-detailed notice forwarded by state consumer affairs spokesman Alex Faust specified the server belonged to the Career Services office. Career Services is located in 511 Goodell Hall; however, that location was not specified in the notice.

Blaguszewski declined to confirm or comment on the notification sent from UMass to the state consumer affairs office. He said under state law the University is restricted in disclosing or commenting on certain information about such a security breach.

Archbald said UMass police are, "not doing anything further to investigate," the incident because such an investigation would require computer forensics staff and resources that are not available to UMPD.

Based on their analysis, the computer forensics company, "concluded that the intruders' attack was not specifically designed to look for personally identifiable information," said OIT's chief information officer John T. Dubach, in a University statement announcing the intrusion.

"Records do not show large amounts of data being extracted from the server, but that the potential for a loss of data did exist for a short period of time," continued the statement.

When contacted for further details on the incident, Dubach referred questions to the University's media relations office.

Stroz Friedberg's spokesman John Genova said he could not comment on the matter because the company's policy states that client information is confidential.

Amie Breton, a spokeswoman from Martha Coakley's office, said the attorney general had received notification of the University's compliance with state law, but said the office had no further comment and declined to answer additional questions. Breton declined to give a reason why the office would to speak further on the matter.

According to Massachusetts law, the State Treasurer's office is also notified of such an electronic intrusion since credit card data was involved. Media relations contacts there were reached but declined to commented on the incident at UMass.

According to the statements on the intrusion, the computer forensics company's recommended improvements include better security training for system administrators, automated software to detect malicious activity, increasing efforts to identify all computers that contain personal information, reconfiguring the University's firewall and retaining network data for longer periods to better assess incidents.

A number of these steps have already been taken, said Callahan, though he did not know which ones or how many.

"Obviously all of them will be taken at some point," he said.

Blaguszewski added that the University is "drawing lessons" from the hacking.

The most recent police report was not the first time the University has informed UMPD of a computer intrusion, said Archbald; however, he did not know of any such reports filed with UMass police since the one submitted in May.

In April 2008, University Health Services' (UHS) computers were also hacked causing the campus to shut down the 120 of the department's 150 computers. About 40 workstations across campus were affected in the viral attack, which OIT said may have been caused by a hacker or hackers wanting to use the computers to illegally download movies or music.

"This sort of thing is an ongoing battle between the hackers and the IT people," said Callahan.

However, there is no belief the intrusions in April and September 2008 were related, he said, and the motivation of the attacks in last fall is unknown.

"Protecting the privacy of our students, alumni and all members of the campus community is one of our fundamental responsibilities," said Dubach. "We regret that this incident occurred, and we are taking steps to reduce the University's vulnerability to future attacks."

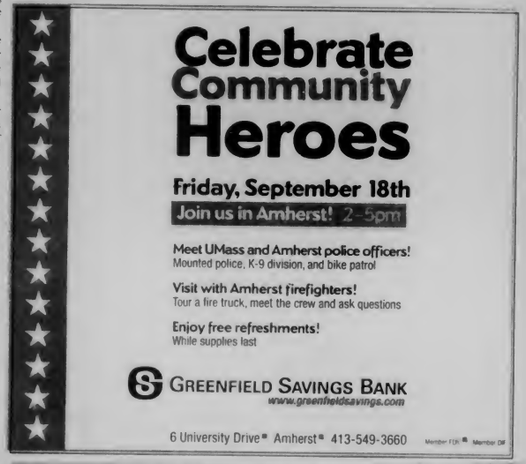
As required by law, a copy of a legal ad was placed in newspapers in Springfield, Worcester and Boston to announce the intrusion.

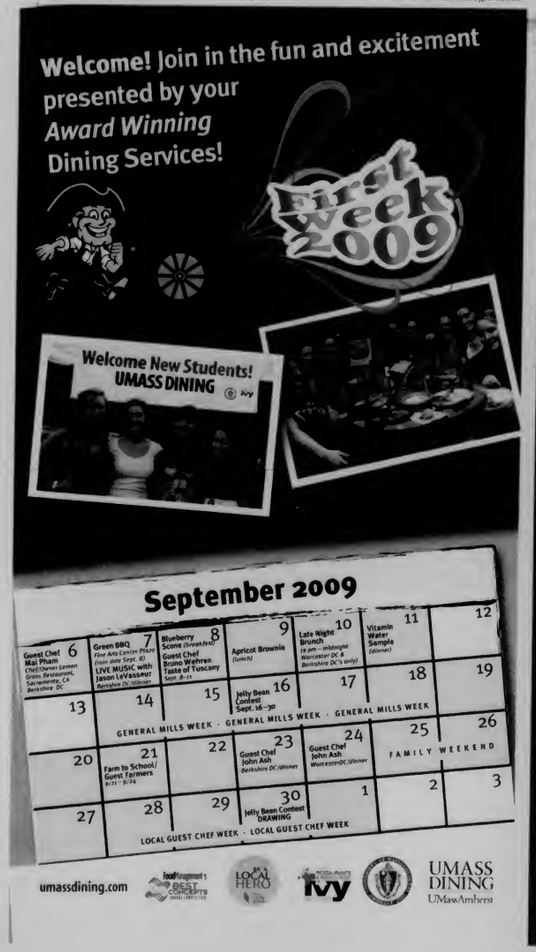
The University also set up a Web page, www.umass.edu/computerintrusion, for anyone with further questions about the matter, as well as setting up a special telephone help line, (413) 545-8376 which can be called from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Questions can also be e-mailed to computerintrusion@umass.edu.

Matt Rocheleau can be reached at mrocheleau@dailycollegian.com

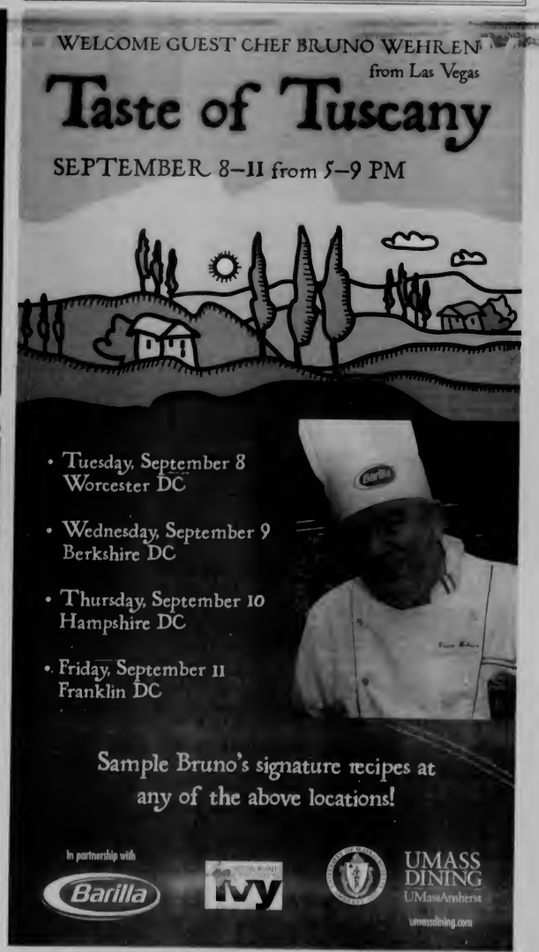
UMass DCs continue success

AWARD from page 1





Ken Toong, executive director of dining and retail services at UMass, led the University to two second-place awards over the summer.



in buying local with over 25 percent of its produce purchased locally in 2009. Toong and his staff also promote global eating with menus featuring dishes from around the world.

Toong and his team have big ambitions for the 2009-2010 academic year, which will begin throughout the campus with the elimination of food trays in all the Dining Commons and in retail dining areas. Additionally students on the meal plan will receive a free stainless steel water bottle for use to take with them in order to reduce the amount of throw-away paper cups used at the DCs. Free Friday night dinners at the DC and enhancing the breakfast menu with breakfast pizzas, burritos and hot cereals are but a few of the changes students can expect to see this fall.

Vincent Capone can be reached at vcapone@student.umass.edu.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

BACK TO SCHOOL, FALL 2009

"FREEDOM OF SPEECH IS OF NO USE TO A MAN WHO HAS NOTHING TO SAY..." – FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Generation Bacon

Nick O'Malley

About a midlife crisis ago, many of our parents gave their generation an identity through music and drug culture to separate themselves as youths (we especially know now because they won't shut up about Woodstock).

This largely happened because, like any young generation, they thought the past one sucked. The problem with the misguided youths of today is that they have nowhere to go. We have the misfortune of following up a generation that introduced the world to the ganja, invented acid, created that damn rock and roll music and made sexually transmitted diseases relevant.

How are we supposed to follow that up? Food.

Back in the day, every parent worried about her little boy/girl going out and listening to that devil's music and joining in student protests. In turn, these same parents worry about us being lazy and gaining 15 pounds.

How can our generation make its mark? By stuffing it in their faces by stuffing our faces.

Think about it. We're at the point where social deviance from the previous generation can only be achieved by descending into absolute moral decay or physical decay. Fortunately, one of those choices involves ordering one of those new Domino's bread bowls with the chocolate lava cake and playing violent video games for nine hours. Yeah, I thought you'd pick that one.

It's simply easier to deep-fry a quadruple cheeseburger than to start a band and write a song that trashes the establishment. Our predecessors changed the world by standing strong and working for peace. We can change the world by sitting still and working through a large cheese pizza.

If you've ever wondered why your parents worry so much about your health, take a look at the staples of a typical college student's diet: Mountain Dew, 99 cent double cheesy beef burritos and anything including bacon.

Sweet, sweet, bacon.

How can our generation make its mark? By stuffing it in their faces by stuffing our faces.

We love delicious, unhealthy food and the Internet. So it should come to no surprise that kids of our ilk have found a way to combine the two.

With websites like Thisiswhyyourefat.com leading the way, making atrociously unhealthy foods has become part – albeit a small part – of Internet lore. In short, food has gone viral. But in reality, it's much more than that.

Bacon chocolate peanut butter cup, a third-pounder with cheese and bacon between two Krispy Kreme donuts, bacon pizza on a crust made of bacon weave (yes, bacon woven into a sheet) and bacon chocolate Oreo's. Google the recipes.

The common denominator? Bacon.

Bacon, the once-friendly staple of an awesome breakfast has gone the way of illiterate cats, Heath Ledger's Joker and Rick Astley as part of everyday culture through the Internet.

The effects of the bacon craze have now even infiltrated into the mainstream. On a summer episode of The Tonight Show with Conan O'Brien, sidekick Andy Richter tried out the newly-marketed bacon-flavored vodka in front of a national TV audience. It apparently tasted awful, yet it was still awesome.

It's really a tribute to bacon and its significance. Apple pie may be the stereotypical American food. But, when you think about it, there's nothing more American than bacon. It's hearty, heart-destroying and can be put in anything. Plus, you can hear and smell it being cooked from any room in the house, as if you're saying, "That's right, I'm bacon."

"Bacon is our national meat," wrote Sarah Hepola in her 2008 Salon magazine article, "Bacon Mania." "The pig is not an elegant animal, but it is smart and resourceful and fated to wallow in mud. A scavenger. A real scrapper."

This concept of idolizing bacon is not lost on college-aged students, who, largely, will utilize their young, bullet-proof metabolisms to eat everything that would make their parents' arteries explode from both the fat and jealousy.

Only through bacon can any single food immediately become unhealthy like with bacon bits on salad. Where the true power of bacon lies, though, is in its ability to turn already unhealthy foods into complete abominations (like if you wrapped bacon around a drumstick and melted cheese on it).

Like the pot leaf was to the 60's, the bacon strip is a symbol of independence for our generation. It is a decree that we will not submit ourselves to the will of the oppressors by doing what is delicious.

Be warned, the Powers That Be will attempt to tell you that deep-frying candy bars is "detrimental to your health." And that is true. You really should limit these things to like, once. Ever.

There only had to be one Woodstock, one time smokin' the dope, to push parents over the edge back in the day. Today, all it takes is blowing a 0.09 on the BMDC (blood Mountain Dew content) to make your parents think you're heart's going to stop beating (which it might do, that's a lot of Dew).

The point is that this generation of college students has the easiest task of creating an identity for itself by flaunting bacon rather than weed. It's cheaper, funnier and marijuana's getting close to legalization anyway.

So take up your bacon-weave flag, deep-fry something that already exceeds your daily limit for calories. Go to the gym and eat a salad later.

Nick O'Malley is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu.

10 'don't's to start the year

Lauren Rockoff

How do you achieve mental preparedness for a new semester? It is the eternal question.

How do you get yourself excited about the long readings and lectures after less-than-adequate sleep that characterizes back-to-school? I couldn't tell you. The right course of action probably differs for us all. However, there are some practices that are good to avoid at the start of a fresh semester.

Perhaps a workable theory can be gleaned from this list of don'ts. Or at the very least, they may be able to ease a little of the back-to-school stress.

Number one: Don't wait until the second week of school to buy your books from the textbook annex.

As lucky as we are to have at our disposal such a place, the used books run out quickly. Don't be the poor sap that ends up with an armful of horrendously expensive books free from highlights and underlines and with all of its pages intact. As if we need something that perfect to occasionally peruse. The purchasing of textbooks is excruciating enough without the searing pain that comes upon seeing an empty shelf where the used copies used to be.

Number two: Don't expect to fall asleep at 11:00 p.m. on the first night of school if you've been tucking yourself in at 2:00 a.m. all summer.

It takes a while for the body to adjust to a new sleep schedule. No one can just hop right into a completely new system. No sense feeling bad about it. Chances are good you'll be tired for the first couple days of class. But luckily, if you tend to get anxious when starting new classes, the added adrenaline should be enough to get you through the day. Or there's coffee.

Number three: Don't throw aside syllabi and handouts from the first few days.

You're sure to be found scrambling for those babies a few weeks into school and wishing you'd thrown them into a folder or binder from the start. And don't neglect to transfer exam dates from syllabi to your planner or calendar.

Number four: Don't underestimate yourself.

You made it to college. Depending on your class year, you may even have made it through several years of college at this point. Sometimes professors like to scare you with an overwhelming overview of the work ahead. Maybe they're just being honest, and of course you shouldn't ignore their warnings.

The right course of action probably differs for us all. However, there are some practices that are good to avoid at the start of a fresh semester.

Still, don't drop a class in fear or run around for the next few months wishing you'd had the foresight to get out when you could. Lightning quick decisions tend to backfire. Take into account everything you've got going this semester, rather than overloading just to get it all done, or setting yourself up for boredom.

Number five: Don't put yourself through the hassle of flash drives and emailing documents to yourself when UDrive and Dropbox allow you to access your files from any computer on campus or with Internet.

Number six: Don't forget that school is fun.

And although all the work associated can be a hassle, it has the potential to make us smarter and better prepared for our future careers. Not to mention, work helps us build character, the universal benefit said to result from most everything unpleasant but necessary.

Number seven: Don't underestimate the time-saving power of laying out your clothes the night before.

It's much easier to match and identify both a top and a bottom when an alarm clock hasn't just rudely awakened you. It saves time and helps eliminate the stress of the morning rush.

Number eight: Don't fall into the trap of doing the same things you did all summer after work – watching TV, just hanging out with friends.

Being back at school means endless chances to try new things. Reap the rewards of Registered Student Organizations (RSO's), social and cultural events, and the multitude of creative ways to fraternize with the thousands of youth that surround you.

Number nine: Don't forget the ones who love you.

If you've just spent the last three months at home with your family, it may be difficult for them to see you leave. Calling or e-mailing to check in with family or home friends in the first weeks of school can be easy to forget and difficult to find time for, but is definitely worth it.

Number 10: Don't sit around only working out the muscle encased by your skull. Regular exercise is essential for your heart, bones, and peace of mind.

Final Note: As we wrench ourselves away from summer's many delights, it may be comforting to remember how much like dessert summer vacation is. Sure, most of us like dessert, but in order to truly enjoy it, we must first have eaten something substantial. Without the necessary fullness provided by the main meal, dessert falls short.

School is the main course of student life. Without the mental strenuousness of eight months of learning, would the intellectual freedom afforded by summer quite hit the spot? Though it's been fun, summer's provided enough toothaches and sugar comas to last a while. Now who's ready for some real food?

Lauren Rockoff is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at lrockoff@student.umass.edu.

Deep Springs caters to shallow wallets

Hannah Nelson

I would have bet money on seeing pigs fly before ever hearing about a free college existing in the United States. Founded in 1917, Deep Springs College lies 28 miles into the California desert. Every student receives a full scholarship, and there is no application fee.

The all-male, two-year college runs on the basis of self-governance, which includes student input in the hiring of their professors. With a four-to-one student faculty ratio – compared to the 18-to-one here – and a population of fewer than 30 students, it gives new meaning to small class size.

The undergraduate population of the University is in the realm of 20,500, a number just shy of being equivalent to 790 times that of Deep Springs. One floor in a UMass residence hall holds more students than the ultra-small liberal arts college.

The only hitch, if it can even be called that, is that all students participate in a minimum of Boardinghouse Crew work. Essentially, this measures up to doing chores like washing dishes and mopping floors. The work it takes to run the school doesn't end there, with students working as cooks, ranchers, farmers and more.

It's been nicknamed "the Cowboy College" for a reason. It sounds positively transcendental, and I think it's safe to say Massachusetts natives Emerson and Thoreau would have approved.

It's not everyone's cup of tea. But, many college students carry part or even full- time jobs through college as it is, so it seems more than a fair trade. Sweetening the deal is that many graduates transfer to Ivy League schools.

It sounds terribly ironic to go from free to the sphere of some of the country's priciest, but two years of an Ivy is equivalent in price to four years in a public college. According to the Deep Springs website, the two years are valued at a cumulative $100,000.

One of the first thoughts about Deep Springs is, "what kind of internet scam is this?" But it is no scam. It is an honest to goodness free college.

To be fair, by reading the anecdotes from the student life/downtime section of the website it is hard to get the impression that Deep Springs is all work and no play. According to the school's website, a student named Marc "once attempted to build a fertility goddess using 97 condoms and plaster of Paris but was foiled by mitigating circumstances." Sounds like average college life to me.

One of the first thoughts about Deep Springs is, "what kind of internet scam is this?" But it is no scam. It is an honest to goodness free college. Then why isn't its existence better known? The answer: it doesn't have to.

Deep Springs has received some high profile attention in the past, including features by the New Yorker, NPR, and Vanity Fair. After all, who needs publicity when 'free' is in the description? The college has no problem filling enrollment, turning away seventy percent of applicants every year.

More importantly, there is a question that begs to be asked. Why aren't there more schools like Deep Springs?

For one, it would knock some relevancy out of the student loans business. Debt-free college students? It's blasphemous.

That is, of course, if all colleges were free, which is a wild hope born of an even wilder stretch of the imagination. Given the successes of the graduates, why aren't there more colleges like this? No demand? A lack of funding?

None of the answers seem to measure up as decent excuses. However, college is becoming increasingly more about the degree than the education. I couldn't count how many times I've heard someone else, or said myself, in fits of frustration, I just want to get my degree and get out. How much truth is really in these statements? If many a truth is said in jest, then many truths are said at the brink of over-caffeinated exhaustion?

Is the lost love of learning in this country all to be blamed on the need to succeed? Are degrees and grade point averages more valued than the hard work, or not-so-hard work, it took to get them?

It is even present in the education debates that happen on the national level and in the proposals to make education more accessible. Too often are the reasons given in favor not for the sake of the education. Instead, it has become for the sake of where the education will get students in the monetary scheme of becoming productive members of society.

What then is the place of the free college in the U.S.? Is it valued for more for the price tag or the quality of education? There is no reason why the two can't coexist, and I would be willing to bet that Deep Springs graduates would agree.

Hannah Nelson is a Collegian columnist and can be reached at hnelson@student.umass.edu.

'Liberal Lion' laid to rest after almost half century in Senate

Matt Kushi

On August 25, 2009, the United States of America lost a true icon.

When the "Lion of the Senate," Senator Edward Moore Kennedy, departed from this world at the age of 77 after heroically fighting brain cancer for more than a year, he left behind much.

Our most significant souvenir, however, is his legacy. It goes much beyond what he gave to his country. He also taught the lessons that made his unlikely legacy possible – the value of a second chance and the will to endure.

Kennedy, a beloved son of Massachusetts, not only changed the lives of those in his state and country, but he also changed the life of the United States itself. In this fact, Kennedy lives.

In 1968, after his brother Robert Kennedy was assassinated while campaigning for the presidency, Kennedy delivered a powerful eulogy in which he quoted excerpts of a 1966 speech his brother had given on South Africa's Day of Affirmation. Among the lines read that day were, "Few will have the greatness to bend history itself, but each of us can work to change a small portion of events, and in the total of all those acts will be written the history of this generation."

Through his 47 years of service in the United States Congress, and the many pieces of legislation he helped to enact, Kennedy helped to shape the history of this nation. Though he did not know it at the time, Kennedy was on the course of bending the course of history and becoming what President Barack Obama called "the greatest senator of our time."

However, that is only half of Senator Kennedy's legacy. He left us with two things: the fruit of 47 years' public service and sentiments that we can glean from his personal experiences just as one might from Aesop's fables. Anyone who can see more to Ted Kennedy than the Chappaquiddick incident will see the man who made his life's work from trying to make other people's lives better.

If Kennedy had wanted to give up and let his personal problems destroy him, it wouldn't have been surprising. Kennedy may have led a privileged life, but it was by no means an easy one. He was the youngest of the nine Kennedy children born in his generation, a generation that would produce one president, two senators and the founder of the Special Olympics among other professions.

Kennedy may have led a privileged life, but it was by no means an easy one.

Kennedy had to endure the premature deaths of many of his siblings including the assassination of brother and President John F. Kennedy in 1963 and the assassination of his brother Robert in 1968 as he campaigned for the presidency. Kennedy, himself, survived a plane crash in 1964 that left him with lifelong back pain. That is not to mention Kennedy's sometimes reckless personal habits, which contributed to his terrible misjudgment at Chappaquiddick in 1969, when Kennedy recklessly drove his car off of a bridge, which killed the passenger. He failed to report it to the police.

Though it was not until he acknowledged his own shortcomings and failures in 1991 that he became the true icon that he is today, Kennedy persevered and flourished after many of his tragedies. He relentlessly tackled issues, starting from his first day in office in 1962 to the very end. His work for universal health care, a hot topic at this very moment, was a lifelong interest that became his "personal cause." He made a reluctant bid for president in 1980 but lost to incumbent Jimmy Carter during the primary elections.

Kennedy's losing the presidency in 1980 was a blessing for the United States. It allowed him to stay in the Senate and fight for the causes for which he was passionate and in which he had a solid voice. Kennedy always stood up for the underdog – the poor and disadvantaged. Many of the progressive pieces of legislation passed in recent memory, such as the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990, among others, can be traced to Kennedy. He was a man of the people.

Was Kennedy perfect? No, but he is living proof of second chances. He was a man who never gave up on the behalf of others and didn't fall to the tragedies of his family. Instead, he carried on and was a stronger man for it.

I am proud to have called Ted Kennedy my senator in the state of Massachusetts.

Through it all, he may have the marking "Democrat" next to his name, but in the end he was an American politician. While the Democratic and Republican parties may have different ways of getting there, they are all Americans sharing the same American dream, to make American better.

Just like Kennedy picked up the torch from his brothers, it is now time for a new birth of men and women to come forward and ensure that the dream shall never die and continue making America a better place.

Matt Kushi is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mkushi@student.umass.edu.

PERSPECTIVES

Leigh Greaney: South Africa

Mike Fox: Argentina

Eli Gottlieb: Israel

Michael Phillis: England

Cultural electricity

Leigh Greaney

South Africa is an anomaly.

To Americans, it's this foreign land with lions, great white sharks, elephants and harsh segregation between the other beasts (humans) who are put in township shacks or guarded mansions. To Africans, it's not Africa. It's the result of years of European oppression, a land stripped of its roots and replaced with branches of a different heritage.

According to locals, the result for international students living in Cape Town is almost always the same. The common denominator for any person who stays longer than a month is culture shock.

Orientation week at the University of Cape Town was an attempt at preparing international students for what was ahead. The first day we saw the beauty that is Cape Town on air-conditioned coach buses with juice and quiche. The second day we were stuffed into a lecture hall – juice-less and quiche-less – and were met face to face with the realities behind the decorated mask of beauty.

The first speech was about culture shock – and was considered the most important to faculty and orientation leaders as we were shushed with threatening looks.

This older man, Quinton Redcliffe, with a plaster permanent smile trailed up to the front of the room holding three numbered apples. After asking how many Americans were in the room and seeing a sea of raised hands, he laughed and said, "See, last year when I asked that same question – everyone told me they were Canadian! I'm glad the new presidency has granted you your citizenship back."

Then, he dived into "culture shock" and told us there would be three stages – like the three apples.

Taking a bite of the first apple, he got this look of euphoria and made the most impressive "hmmmmmmm" sound I've heard to date. He jumped in the air exclaiming that it was the most delicious thing he'd ever eaten. This excitement was phase one.

It's the phone call to mom saying, "I'm sorry, but this is where I want to live. Forever. I'm in the Motherland, and I'm not leaving, and I met a really cute orientation leader. His accent makes my heart beat faster."

I don't think "culture shock" is a jolt. It's an electrical current that's always running through you when you're in a new place.

The next apple of phases was more of a bitter bite as the man spit apple all over the front row. "Where's the other half of the worm?" he spat. He explained this is the less agreeable stage where we might decide that we miss home. He made a point to emphasize the fact that this will never be "home." It's different than home. Comparing them is only useless.

He said this is the phase when we're so desperate that we're calling our ex-boyfriend to complain about irritating accents and heart-crushing poverty and then asking to speak to his new girlfriend to continue venting.

The third apple was acceptance. It's volunteering in the townships; it's joining a club and it's realizing home is at home. It's taking Cape Town as a whole and removing the blindfold of ignorance.

I've been for over a month now. By now, I've made apple pie. I've baked the excitement with the aggravation with the understanding – and it's sweet. I don't think "culture shock" is a jolt. It's an electrical current that's always running through you when you're in a new place.

What I expected to "shock" me didn't. I wasn't in shock when my phone got stolen when I was riding the bus. I wasn't in shock when someone stole the battery out of my doorbell. I wasn't in shock when my friend had her laptop stolen out of her barred window at 6 a.m. when she was sleeping in her bed just a few feet away.

I wasn't in shock when I saw children covered in city soil begging for loose change or when I saw a pregnant woman who told me she hadn't eaten in days and was living in an alley. I wasn't in shock when a vendor who I told I'd think about buying something and that I'd come back chased me out on the street when I left the craft market, asking why I chose not to support him.

I saw all of those things coming. I've heard about them. I knew not to walk around alone ever, to carry pepper spray with me and to keep my guard up.

What I wasn't ready for was the strength people have here.

I've been teaching journalism in the township of Sophumelela. The school is located in the heart of a waste dump. Mangy dogs whose bellies are as thin as my arm scour school grounds for food. Small children play with wire toys they've made themselves while taking care of other children not much younger than they. When it rains, women rid their tin shacks of water with a bucket to keep what little they have dry.

All the while, people wear smiles of hope. They have nothing, but they have everything. My students call our class a family. They call their group of friends a family. Anyone in their life who actively contributes to their life is their brother or sister. It's more foreign to me than anything else.

The lack of greed, the will to learn for no other reason than acquiring knowledge and the pureness of heart is a cultural current – not a shock – and it's an energy as delicious as apple pie.

Leigh Greaney is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at lgreaney@student.umass.edu

Smile like you mean it

Mike Fox

La Rural is pretty much an Argentine national version of a State Fair. We walk in and we're instantly thrown into a crowd (expectedly, considering today was the last day of it).

On each side are faux-pampas (the plains wilderness where the mythical Argentine cowboys, the Gauchos, come from) stands selling assorted dulce de leche (really creamy caramel, imagine the best roasted marshmallow you've ever had) pastries along with cured meats and cheeses.

After this, we found ourselves in a valley, surrounded by glistening tractors on each side. Scattered around were different vendors representing clothes, tourism and other crap.

The food stands overlooked a giant vacant hole which was lined with 50-story condo and apartment buildings. The image for some reason struck me as so distinctly South American. But this fair was showing me how much we do stereotype this continent.

But here, here where people stayed on, stayed before they left and the fair was gone for another year, here was something authentic.

Argentina is distinctly Italian influenced. The most Spanish thing about their culture is the language. Everything else – pizza and other cuisine sold on every corner, the cafe culture straight out of continental Europe, the people's heritage, the music, the dancing, so much of it – is Italian.

Yet, the Gaucho culture on display at the fair showed a deep similarity with the American fascination with its Wild West.

The exhibition halls held either farm animals and horses or giant corporate displays. Coca-Cola smiled down at me comfortingly from almost everywhere. Outside of the U.S., you really see how little market share Pepsi actually has. Ford was another major sponsor of the event. But just as visible were Galicia bank and La Nacion newspaper, two distinctly Argentine corporations.

We grabbed dulce de leche strudels, a perfect combination of flaky baklava and savory dulce, and made our way to the exit and stumbled upon an ongoing concert.

The lead singer, attired in distinctly pampas but not gaudy Gaucho clothing, lead his band in what seemed like folk music, but had a bit of a bad-ass tinge to it.

Then, the crowd started opening up as two young people went into the middle, produced handkerchiefs from their pocket and started passionately dancing in a manner that seemed stereotypically "Latin Hot-Blooded."

Then I looked to my right and saw a new circle formed, this one around two older people, dressed in gaudy Gaucho, dancing their own loving rhythm. Their moves matched the young people in the other circles perfectly, even with their bodies being 50 years older.

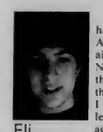
Then the other circle had a father leading his kids in a similar dance. Then another couple joined the other circle, again, somehow also producing elaborate handkerchiefs that were used as tools of seduction in their acting out of the courses of love through their footsteps and the way they teased each other with the rest of their body.

And so it continued as the band swung into tunes that explored deeper and deeper into the pantomimes being put on by the dancers.

They came in and out of the crowd, which forced me to chuckle at the idea that seemingly everyone, of all ages and body types down here, knows the art of seduction through passionate acts of dance and at any moment people could whip handkerchiefs out and start dancing through the streets.

It got darker and the crowd got larger. Someone jumped onto the stage with a harmonica and joined in with the band. The singer took a break and opened the mic for people to share jokes. A little girl came up and said something that made everyone burst out laughing and someone who looked like her mother look flustered. I think it was a dirty joke.

The band was playing near the exit and attracted more and more city folk who wanted to continue their fantasy trip to the pampas. Past where we were, which also happened to be the entrance, corporations smiled down from every wall and stall. There were no independent leather artisans come in from their villages to sell hand made goods, only several kiosks run by a company that an employee proudly told me has 136 locations across the country.



While the food was native to the country, it was served with a Coca (as they call it down here).

John Deere sold a vicious looking thing with hundreds of spinning blades that looked like they could make short work of a Nebraska corn field.

But here, here where people stayed on, stayed before they left and the fair was gone for another year, here was something authentic. Here they danced, they sang, they stomped, they joked, and here was where the culture of the Gaucho was most prevalent. Where people were smiling the most.

Mike Fox is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mgfox@student.umass.edu

Live from Israel

Eli Gottlieb

I'm sitting and panting in a hard-won seat on a British Airways jet in London's Heathrow airport. My flight from Newark, N.J. got delayed an hour by thunderstorms, so I had to race through terminal five as soon as I got through security, which I learned you have to pass through again in Britain despite my trying simply to catch a connecting flight. I'm bound for Tel-Aviv, Israel and barely made the gate before it closed completely.

Now I've got some space and time in which to sit and think or perhaps even sleep and make up for my jet lag. I've lost a whole day, leaving at 6:30 p.m. from Newark and arriving at 3:30 p.m. in Tel-Aviv. Why the hell am I doing this? Well...

I signed up to spend five months – starting in August and ending in time for me to come back to the University of Massachusetts in January – performing volunteer community service in Ashdod, Israel. I like the country. I am a Zionist, and I feel an obligation to walk the walk on things I believe.

Today's Israel was not merely born, but built in a mere century. It has a culture far more similar to the rest of the Middle East or Mediterranean region than to Europe or America.

To really explain why I've done such a crazy thing as to take time off from UMass, I need to explain Zionism. Hell, I ought to since it gets bandied about so much in UMass' thriving public-policy debates, despite the fact that neither the people in favor of it nor the people against it ever really give a thorough definition or justification for it.

So I begin simply: Zionism is the belief that a Jewish state ought to exist in the historical land of Israel, also sometimes known as the Levant, Palestine or Judea.

Diving further into the subject, why should a Jewish state exist? Why not just draw a polity on whatever boundaries look geographically nice and tell everyone in there to get along?

To answer this, we have to go back to the aged idea of self-determination. Self-determination is the principle that every people should have a place in which they subject themselves to nobody else's will and can make every decision of their own governance for themselves.

Notably, all the most stable and peaceful countries on Earth were founded on this principle. When we apply this principle to Jews, we arrive at Theodor Herzl's early political Zionism. From there, the Zionist movement required a land in which to create its state, and to sum up decades of history in a single blithe sentence, the Zionists decided that modern Jews felt the greatest emotional connection to and the greatest moral right to the historic Land of Israel of everywhere on Earth.

From there, history took its course. I think that rather than lecture on the history of Israel here, I'll leave it to my readers to remember their high-school history of the 20th century or to take a course at UMass. I personally want to focus on the present rather than the past.

Today's Israel was not merely born, but it was instead built in a mere century. It has a culture far more similar to the rest of the Middle East or Mediterranean region than to Europe or America.

People in Israel drink wine instead of beer, eroved and shove instead of queuing, negotiate over everything, consider hard-and-fast rules anathema, spoil their children absolutely rotten, send them to the Israel Defense Force as soldiers, send them to university afterwards and then finally hope they get jobs.

People in Israel have no manners whatsoever but live up to their usage of "my brother" and "my sister" as second-person pronouns. Even my flight-mate, who says all Israelis are crazy, has picked up their attitude. When there's no kosher brunch for him, he's fine because nobody was killed or wounded.

Israelis also value contribution, a value I share with them. Despite rising rates of draft-dodging among young Israelis, people there still consider it a basic duty to serve one's community and country, to contribute to the common good. I have to get my assignment figured out once I land, but serving a community is exactly what I signed up to do. Crazy or not, I'm spending the next five months in this new country, so I want to make it a little better in whatever way I can.

And of course, I'll be reporting as much as I can back to my readers at The Collegian. You guys deserve to know what's really going on in this place that everyone spends so much time arguing about.

Eli Gottlieb is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at egottlie@student.umass.edu

My London celebration

Michael Phillis

Sometimes you just need to gloat a little. For me, time came this past summer when I was in London. I had wanted to go abroad, and for various reasons, I had to wait till this past summer to make it happen.

I was looking for a way to celebrate my arrival in London this past July. About a week into my trip, I saw my chance: a shop that sold fine Cuban cigars. It was the perfect opportunity.

My friend Tom and I periodically go out to find cigars at the University of Massachusetts. There is a place in Hadley that sells some. But in the United States, the quintessential Cuban cigar is illegal.

I hurried into the store and bought two Cubans for myself with the intent to enjoy my first one that evening before everyone went out. My housemates and I were greatly anticipating the upcoming night; London was still new and exciting to all of us. We were ready to take full advantage of the city.

My plan was to sit in the park and enjoy my first Cuban, relaxing on a bench watching the sunset, just thinking of how lucky I was to be in another country and how much Tom would be jealous.

Before I left for the park, I sent Tom a note shamelessly gloating of my success. I had every intention of throwing this in his face.

"I now own Cuban cigars," I wrote to him. "Thought you might be curious, and yes, a little jealous. So think of me, young sir, when you light up your next mediocre stogy. While you do, I will be sitting here in London smoking a Cuban, hand-rolled, perfectly crafted cigar."

I was on cloud nine. With an obnoxiously wide smile on my face, I sat down, lit up and began to enjoy. One thing was true: Cubans live up to their hype. With full flavor and the seeming inability to die out, this was everything I expected and more. I sat there, looking forward to my upcoming night out, completely calm, celebrating life. The nicotine began hitting me, lifting my head even further into the heavens.

I was on cloud nine. With an obnoxiously wide smile on my face, I sat down, lit up and began to enjoy. One thing was true: Cubans live up to their hype.

The cigar lasted for at least the hour that the store clerk had promised, and toward the end, I became a little lazy. I began inhaling too much smoke, too deep, not paying much attention to basic mechanics that, if not followed, could lead to bad results. The possibility of a bad ending did not cross my mind.

It was almost dark out when I began heading back. My head was swimming in nicotine. I had to concentrate to walk a straight line back to my nearby flat.

To my surprise, the light-headedness kept getting worse, my steps became a concentrated affair and I began to think something just might be wrong after all. When I finally arrived at my place, I knew my situation was dire. My stomach was now turning over as if I was at an amusement park, and I knew I was not going to make it much longer.

I poked my head into the common room to quickly say hi, attempting to mask my health. My housemate Sean remarked that I "had some color." I headed up to the fourth floor, into the bathroom – two floors away from everyone else – and leaned over the toilet.

Have you ever tried to puke quietly? I had just met these people, and we were becoming friends. I didn't want them to hear that I was now becoming violently ill.

God it hurt. I was experiencing the horrors of full-on nicotine poisoning. After an especially gruesome sixth round, I stumbled across the hall to my bedroom and tried to fall asleep.

Unlike drinking too much where throwing up can remove some of the alcohol from your system and make you feel better, nicotine poisoning does not offer relief even after spending a solid chunk of an hour over the toilet. The poison is in your blood. Only time will heal what I think is a far worse feeling than what can be handed down from alcohol.

I woke up an hour later, still feeling slightly off. I promised myself I was never going to give Tom the satisfaction of knowing how my evening went. My head still hurt; I still felt like I had a hangover, and I knew I was going to have to act like nothing was wrong that night.

Luckily I learned my lesson, I only had one bad night like this my entire time in London. A few important points about this story:

Firstly to Tom, now you know. Congratulations. My gloating doesn't quite hurt so badly now huh? I doubt I'll live this down.

More importantly however, to everyone who is now a college freshman looking to celebrate their freedom from parental guidance with a bang: be careful.

Get some good stories out of college. But often times, when you don't really know what you are getting yourself into – as I didn't with my hour-long cigar – you can get yourself into trouble.

Michael Phillis is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mphillis@student.umass.edu.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

BACK TO SCHOOL, FALL 2009 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Breaking away from boyfriends

On campus and single

Jessica Starling Jones

My name is Jessica, and I'm a recovering addict. It's not what you think – I don't crave hard drugs or gamble excessively. I do drink, but I'm far from wanting to curb my quietly raging alcoholism. No, my real addiction (now fortunately in remission) is far more insidious, more emotionally damaging and yet more socially acceptable. The thing I can't live without is a boyfriend.

I'm not trying to say that I'm madly in love with one man. Any boy will do, really. It's the relationship itself I crave. I seem to have been born a serial monogamist. Neither of my parents display such a tendency; it must be a recessive trait. It's also not something I picked up by hanging around with the wrong crowd. None of my friends seem to share my irrepressible need to be attached to someone else.

It's only quite recently that I've begun to recognize and actively fight my addiction. It started innocently enough. My first romance was with a friend-turned-high-school-sweetheart-turned-best-friend that ended up lasting an epic three years. By the time I hit campus, this was the only guy I had ever been with, physically and emotionally. Our breakup sophomore year was tough, but it was a long time coming. I was young, restless and totally stoked to be a single co-ed.

A mere three weeks later, I started seeing a guy I met at work. Two weeks flickered by at breakneck speed and before I knew it, we were serious. For 18 dreary, protracted, sex-filled months, I was convinced that he was "the One." It took several attempts before I managed to finally wrest myself out of that relationship. Each time we broke up, I was astonished to find that I was even more wretched without him than I was when he was there. Call it love. So a couple of weeks would pass and we would get back together, only to breakup again, thus ensnaring ourselves in a truly moronic and incomprehensible cycle of misery.

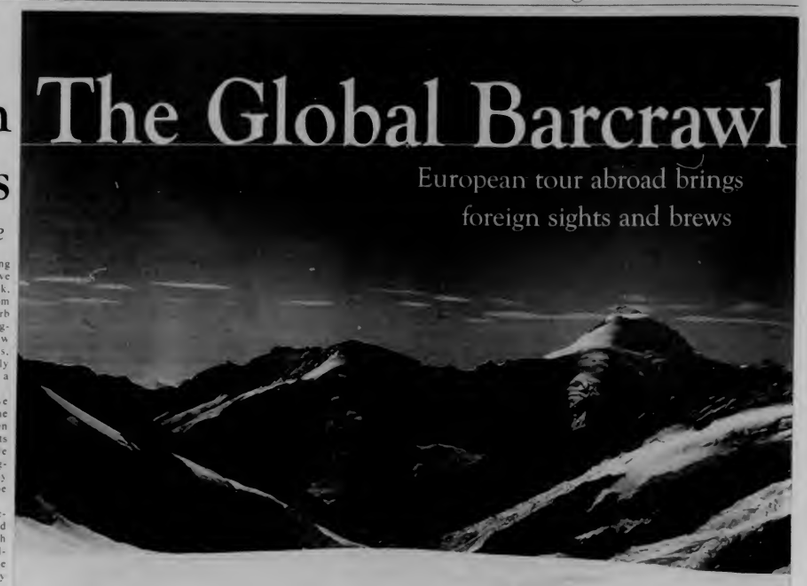
It was easy to claim that we were star-crossed lovers, always fighting, never in the same place in life, but unable to live without each other. Really though, I just couldn't bear being alone. Disregard the fact that I've never actually been alone in life, or that I have plenty of marvelous friends to occupy my time and to serve as the recipients of my adoration and affection. There's just something about being in a couple, being part of an exclusive pair, without which I have been unable to function.

With painful tardiness, I eventually wised up to this unpleasant fact about myself. Shortly thereafter, I gave my woefully mismatched companion the boot once and for all and set about the task of becoming a single girl in earnest.

Overcoming my unfortunate urges has not been easy. Step one was admitting I had a problem. Check that off the list. What comes next? Per my stoic, Appalachian-style upbringing, step two would be to suck it up and stop having that problem, starting immediately. This two-step program is not particularly helpful for the weak-willed, but it is a lot faster than the exhaustive modern 12-step approach, which involves searching moral inventories, acknowledging higher powers, issuing uncomfortable apologies and things of that ilk.

Thus, I set about quitting love cold turkey. It turned out to be a lot more difficult than giving up smoking. At first, I just couldn't help becoming hopelessly enamored with whatever guy happened to saunter past. This simply would not do. Of course, I didn't want to miss out on all the hedonistic pleasures life has to offer the modern young adult. But at the same time, I had to somehow avoid developing excessive emotional attachments to my partner in the pursuit of debauchery.

It has been a tricky predicament, but not an impossible one to overcome. For example, I have discovered (inadvertently, of course) that an easy way to become physically intimate with someone without becoming emotionally involved is to do the former deed with someone you've only just met. This is particularly helpful if you've somehow skipped the whole name-exchanging, introduction part of meeting, which I can cop to doing.



However, this porridge has grown cold.

I therefore devoted the summer to finding a balance between being an emotional slut and a regular slut, with wavering degrees of success. I left campus and returned to my parents' abode, leaving behind a couple of false-starts from my last weeks at UMass. Going out every weekend afforded me plenty of opportunity to meet eligible bachelors, and meet them I did. A whole range of men, none of whom particularly struck my fancy until I met a certain film student at a party. He turned out to be my first real fling, and while I have a feeling I'm going to be listening to a lot of Don Henley in the coming weeks, I somehow managed to keep things reasonably casual. Does this mean I'm healed? Probably not – only time will tell. With a brand new semester on the horizon and my first baby steps towards normalcy a success, only one thing is certain: this story is far from over.

Jessica Starling-Jones is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at jewsstarlingjones@gmail.com.

The Global Barcrawl

European tour abroad brings foreign sights and brews

BY ANDREW SHERIDAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Mankind's love affair with beer goes back a long way. In fact, the origins of the best-selling beverage can be traced back to the beginnings of society itself, as experts believe that it was primarily beer-making that drove early man to first cultivate grains and abandon the hunter-gatherer lifestyle. Since those early days of alcoholic bread-water, the art of the brew has come a long way, and this summer, while gathering research for my thesis on the European Union brewing industry, I took a six-week trip across the E.U., sampling the wares as I went. What I found was an amazing passion for beer and a tradition as widespread and as varied as the continent itself.

My trip began in Copenhagen, capital of Denmark and home of the Carlsberg Group. As the fourth-largest beer maker in the world, Carlsberg produces over 250 different varieties of suds and has been doing so since the early 1800s. Their unique pan-European business strategy made them a perfect candidate for my research, so as soon as the spring semester ended, I hid the United States goodbye and boarded a plane for Scandinavia.

It might be because their winters are so long and dark, but Danes make the most of the sunny summer party season. The sun rises early and the bars close late, and whenever possible, the times in between are filled with beer. Through carnivals, festivals and public soccer games, the Danes put down quite a bit of brew, and most of it is pretty damn good.

The flagship beer of its namesake corporation, Carlsberg is available in 140 countries worldwide. The pilsner's iconic green logo can be seen everywhere you look in Denmark, so I made sure that it was the first thing I picked up after leaving the airport. It was hoppier than most pilsners found in the U.S., a trend I noticed throughout the country which gave it a refreshing bite and a lingering finish. Although it's the runner-up of Danish beers in terms of sales, Tuborg nonetheless boasts an impressive history. Their standard pilsner falls short of their rival in terms of taste, but still edges out Budweiser and Miller. The equally successful Tuborg Gold is a much smoother beer, popular among the after-work crowd.

See CRAWL on page 9

COURTESY WALLPAPERS247.COM

Escape summer lulls with books

BY CAL SCANNELL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Whether killing time on a commuter train twice a day or relaxing at the beach, the endless hours of summer provides students with the opportunity to read for the pure joy of it ... what a novel idea (no pun intended)! The following list includes tried and true good reads to sustain readers through the hot and empty summer hours.

"Under the Banner of Heaven: A Story of Violent Faith" Jon Krakauer's latest journalistic undertaking explores the bizarre world of fundamental Mormonism. Krakauer, whose previous works include "Into the Wild" and "Into Thin Air," traces the steps of two brothers who develop their own twisted offshoot of an increasingly mainstream American religion. Their search for God and truth culminates in the murder of a young mother and her infant daughter. Along the way, Krakauer introduces readers to a cast of extremist characters whose stories shed some light on issues of polygamy, pedophilia and a frightening frame of mind unique to religious fanatics, which holds the potential of wreaking profound damage on society. Clear your schedule – you won't leave the house until you've turned the very last page of this book.

"The God of Small Things" Arundhati Roy's 1997 Man Booker Prize-winning novel occurs around the tragedy of a visiting cousin's death during the narrator's childhood. Through the voice of her 20-something character, Rahel, Roy reflects on growing up in a prominent family in the communist state of Kerala, India. Navigating the turmoil that follows her young cousin's death, her mother's personal tragedy and the upheaval in the greater class system, Rahel tells the story of historical injustice and her family's fall from grace with stunning beauty. Her deliberate and thoughtful use of language contributes to the haunting and disturbingly evocative nature of her prose. Simply brilliant.

"Kitchen Confidential: Adventures in the Culinary Underbelly" reveals nasty tricks of the trade and dirty little secrets about the restaurant business. In Anthony Bourdain's (host of Travel Channel's "No Reservations") 2001 bestseller, he describes his circuitous passage into what he refers to as the "culinary underbelly," a life marked by hard rock, drug addiction, third-degree burns and mind-blowing cuisine. In the process, he discloses things you likely wouldn't care to know about the food on your plate and shares with readers the reasons he avoids breakfast buffets and never orders fish on a Monday. You'd be well advised to follow suit.

"All the Pretty Horses," the first installment in Cormac McCarthy's "Border Trilogy," follows young John Grady Cole, a teenage vagabond who leaves his home in Texas heading southbound on horseback with a friend. Upon his arrival in Mexico, he has the misfortune of falling into the bad company of another young Texas runaway and subsequently falls in love with a ranch owner's daughter, triggering a very unlucky chain of events. McCarthy's understated style makes this adventuresome, gun-slinging Western novel fabulously engaging. His sensitive and economical use of words astonishes readers in this award-winning book, which was later adapted into a Hollywood film starring Matt Damon and Penelope Cruz.

Anthony Bourdain reveals sordid details about the culinary world in his controversial book, "Kitchen Confidential: Adventures in the Culinary Underbelly."

"A Good Man is Hard to Find and Other Stories" presents 10 of Flannery O'Connor's best-known short stories. Titled after perhaps her most widely-read piece, "A Good Man is Hard to Find," the collection also includes the hard-hitting and wryly comic story "Good Country People." Each of the 10 works draws out O'Connor's incredible knack for satire and her often humorous consideration of religion, morality and the human condition. Though she often writes in a grim tone, her graceful turns of phrase and keen ability to capture personality crafts realistic dialogue, which overall compensates for what may otherwise profoundly disturb readers.

"Kafka on the Shore" contains a dual plot following a 15-year-old runaway named Kafka, and a misfit named Nakata, who has the mysterious ability to speak to cats. Their lives intertwine in this surreal work punctuated with Radiohead, Prince, Madonna and Beethoven. Author Haruki Murakami ventures into the deepest recesses of the subconscious, in what John Updike refers to as "an insistently metaphysical mindbender" where dreams and reality blur. Readers will certainly find this hip, obscure book hard to put down, especially as it never stops moving.

See BOOKS on page 10

Tarter beers provide vacation from norm

CRAWL from page 8

Every nation on the planet seems to have a favorite dirt-cheap beer, and when the budget is laid out, they're a college student's best friend. Denmark is no different. The bottom of the shelf in Denmark is Ol, a surprisingly drinkable lager-style beer that filled many of my balmy nights in the Land of the Midnight Sun. On the other end of the price spectrum, Jacobsen's is Carlsberg's ultra-premium line of beers. Named after the company's founder, the collection spans the frothy rainbow from the Saaz Blonde to the Dark Lager, and was lovingly detailed to me at the company's well-stocked central bar. My personal favorites were the clean-finishing Forarsbyrg spring beer and the deep-amber Abbey Beer, but the collection also included the legendary Jacobsen Vintage. (http://www.jacobsenbeer.com/#) At nearly $400 per bottle, the aged Vintage is the most expensive beer ever sold on planet Earth. Whether or not such a price tag can be justified on such a populist beverage is up for debate, but it truly goes to show how far the art of brewing has come.

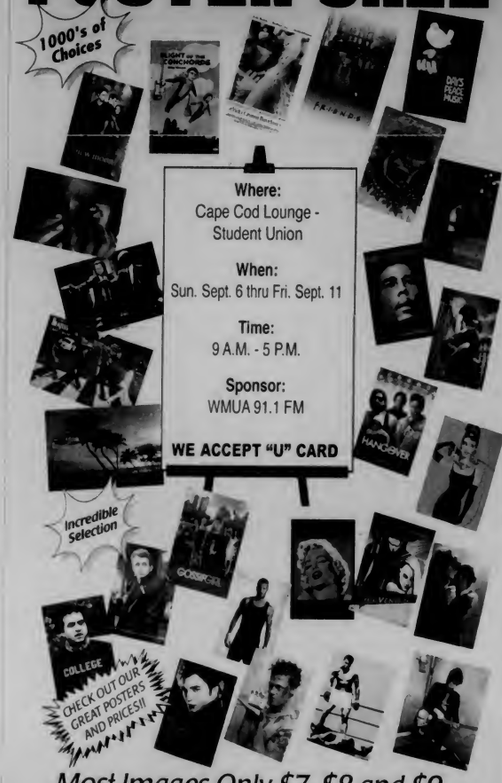
My next destination was Belgium, known far and wide as the home of the European Union central government. Belgium is also known as the land of beer and chocolate, and for a young epicurean, it is the place where dreams come true. Brussels, the capital of the country, is home to some of the world's best bars, filled with some of the absolute finest beer around. My personal favorite had over 2,000 varieties on the menu, with some distinctly Belgian styles.

A refreshing drink, Lindemans Kriek Cherry is part the ancient tradition of Lambic beer. These are brewed in the tradition of the French monks and have a bitter, fruity taste. With only 3.5 percent alcohol, Kriek was a definite lunch time drink more akin to cherry soda than what most Americans think of as a traditional "beer." Meanwhile, the light but rich Gouden Carolus – often pegged as a Christmas beer – hit the spot quite nicely in June. Like most Belgians, it goes down smooth despite a hefty 8 percent alcohol content.

While in Belgium, I was sure not to forget Delirium Tremens. Voted in the 1998 World Beer Festival as the best beer on Earth, Tremens is the signature blond beer of the famous Delirium Bar, and it deserves its reputation. At 8.5 percent alcohol by volume (ABV), Tremens is rich, golden, perfectly balanced and features a slight honey aftertaste. Translated roughly as "the white of snow," Blanche des Neiges is a craft beer that serves as a good example of the classic Belgian White. As a wheat beer, it manages to be flavorful without the strong hops taste that most pure-barley beers possess. For those who are interested in the style, Hoegaarden is a popular import and also a good example of the White.

After tagging along on a few late-night bar crawls – as well as for one very hungover visit to the European Parliament – it was time once again to head south. This time, my destination was the Tuscan region of Italy, where fate placed me in the comfortable home of a wealthy Swedish businessman on vacation. When I reached this unlikely perch in the mountains, it was high time to relax and enjoy the best food and alcohol the country had to offer.

Although Italy is renowned for its wine, which varies from region to region, it also produces quite a bit of liqueur and a few good beers. Perhaps the most popular Italian beer, Nastro Azzurro is crisp and refreshing, perhaps too tart for a climate like Ireland or Denmark, but perfect for the sweltering Italian summer. Not quite as satisfying as the Nastro is Birra Moretti – a darker, lager-style beer. It is perhaps the oldest mainstream beer in Italy, with a long history of being the working man's brew.



From Italy I ventured north, visiting by car some of the places that I had missed by plane. Although I didn't stay long in any one place as time was growing short on my trip, I made the effort at every stop to pick up the occasional cold one. For example, the small Swiss city of Lugano offered the nigh-unpronounceable Feldschlösschen, a smooth wheat beer only found deep in the Alps. German beers tend to be intensely regional, making them impossible to really judge from a few quick tastings, but what I did try would have made the Beerfest brewers proud. Along the Rhine, the Konig Pilsner proved to be everything that a beer drinker could ask for, and the Erdinger Weissbrau was a perfect complement to a good schnitzel.

From Germany, I only had time to stop for a dark and woody Bohemian Beer from the Czech Republic before arriving at my final destination in southern Sweden. Although Sweden may not be a beer Mecca, their native brew Sofiero Original, a pale lager weighing in at 5.2 percent ABV, did take home the coveted silver medal at the 2004 World Beer Cup. The brew lives up to its accolades too, as it boasts a well-balanced flavor that is hard to beat anywhere else.

While my arrival in Sweden brought friends, ocean views and beautiful blonds, it also brought sadness as it marked the end of my journey. The long flight home left me with plenty of time to reflect, and many questions still to ponder. Where will I go now? What is the next great destination? Such problems, however, are always outweighed by opportunities. For if you are a real beer traveler, the possibilities are endless. The next great brew is waiting just beyond the horizon, and the world is your foamy, delicious oyster.

Andrew Sheridan can be reached at asheri1@student.umass.edu

THE BIGGEST & NEWEST BACK TO SCHOOL POSTER SALE

Most Images Only $7, $8 and $9

Wormtown Trading Presents
Wormtown Music Festival 2009
September 18-20, 2009 | Camp KeeWanee | Greenfield, MA
THE NEW RIDERS OF THE PURPLE SAGE · RYAN MONTBLEAU BAND · ZACH DEPUTY REV TOR BAND FEAT MARK MERCIER OF MAX CREEK · THE ALCHEMYSTICS · U-MELT
ROOTS OF CREATION · FUNGUS AMUNGUS · PETER PRINCE & MOON BOOT LOVER · RUBBLEBUCKET
ORCHESTRA · INDOBOX · GORDON STONE BAND · ENTRAIN · OTHERWISE · HOT DAY AT THE ZOO · JEFF BUJAK
FOXTROT ZULU · GARY BACKSTROM BAND · TONY LEE THOMAS BAND · TOUSSAINT THE LIBERATOR
STRADDLEDADDY · DOMINO THEORY · BASSHOUND · GOOSEPIMP ORCHESTRA · NORTH SHIRE STRING BAND
WEIGHT OF GRAVITY · HUMBLEBEE · PLAYIN' DEAD · BROTHERS MCCANN · BUD & BUDD · THE MUVE
CHRIS MERENDA BAND W/ BRUCE MANDARO · DOG STAR BLUE · TURTLE SOUP · RUMOUR HAS IT W/ KLYPH FROM THE MIGHTY LOONS · FENNARIO · FOOLS OF PERCEPTION · THE KINGS · MUTLU · DPR · THE LAW
GILMOUR'S BREAKFAST · HOLLIS BROWN · THE GRASS GYPSIES · JIMKATA · THE HIPPOCAMPUS
HOT DAMN SCANDAL · LOVE WHIP · THE EFFECTIVE DOSE · LEROY WHITE · THE CHANGE UP
MASS ELITE · OL' BROWN SHOE · THE PROBLEMADDICTS · THE AFROMOTIVE · SKULLFUNKED
RATBOY JR. · SHAKEDOWN · STEAL YOUR FACE · MASS PRODUCTION · SUN JONES
MICHAEL MORROW & THE 21ST CENTURIANS & KIDS' SET FEAT MIKE TURK
TICKET PRICES
ADVANCE WORM NOW-9/13 : $85 · WEEK OF WORM SEPT 13-17 : $95 · KIDS 16 & UNDER : FREE
SUNDAY ONLY : $30 · RV SPACE IS FULL
NBO · ROCK ON CONCERTS · JAMBASE TICKETS · FLYNNTIX
FESTIVAL FEATURES
2 NIGHTS OF WOODED CAMPING · FAMILY CAMPING & KIDS' CABIN · ARTIST DEMOS
VERNVILLE EARTHSTAGE · RIVER WORM CAFE · COMMUNITY PROJECTS · FOOD & CRAFT VENDORS
COMMUNITY BONFIRE · RIVER ROCK ART · ROAMING ENTERTAINMENT · SHS FOOD DRIVE
TICKET OUTLETS
TRADING POST : CANTON, CT 860.693.4397
BRIGHTER DAZE : GT BARRINGTON, MA 413.528.5888
FLYNN THEATRE BOX OFFICE : BURLINGTON, VT 800.594.8499
NOHO BOX OFFICE : NORTHAMPTON, MA 800.THE TICK
WINE RACK : GREENFIELD, MA 413.773.9988
WORMTOWN TRADING CO. : 508.753.8882
GATES OPEN @ 9AM ON 9/18
No Dogs · No Open Fires · No Glass Bottles
Get wormformation at: www.WORMTOWN.com p:508.753.8882

Better
It's what we do...

Helping you feel better...

- routine, same-day and walk-in medical care
- mental health care
- eye care and optical services
- physical therapy
- acupuncture
- mind/body medicine
- specialty care
- allergy clinic
- full-service pharmacy
- faculty/staff assistance program
- onsite laboratory and radiology services
- and more

Helping you live better...

- health education
- substance abuse prevention programs
- tobacco cessation
- nutrition and eating disorders services
- athletic health services
- travel medicine clinic
- support and therapy groups
- volunteer, outreach and academic opportunities
- online health information, resources
- big discounts on eyewear, pharmacy products and more

Taking better care of you...

- college health specialists
- convenient campus location
- Walk-in care 8 a.m. – midnight
- Health advice by phone 24/7

University Health Services
577-5000 • www.umass.edu/uhs
UMASS AMHERST

Nobel Prize–winning author Gabriel Garcia Marquez tells the tale of an elderly man reflecting on his past courtships in the short work, "Memories of My Melancholy Whores."

Sexy tomes spice up dreary August nights

BOOKS from page 8

"The Book of Longing" A collection of poetry from renowned singer-songwriter Leonard Cohen (who brought listeners the original version of "Hallelujah," later covered by Jeff Buckley and others), "The Book of Longing" provides readers with short, sweet poetic sound bites that were drafted during Cohen's extended stay at a Zen monastery. Cohen's music makes it clear he has an incredible talent for crafting artful lyrics while his sense of meter and rhythm lend beautifully to his exceptional poetry. In addition to his thoughtful contemplation of love, loss and yes, longing, he supplements his poems with playful sketches in this volume. It seems there is little Cohen cannot do well, his talents spanning across the visual, musical and literary landscape. He is a true Renaissance man.

"Memories of My Melancholy Whores," from Nobel Prize-winning author Gabriel Garcia Marquez, is a little-known and very short work by the eminent Columbian writer. The book centers on an aging journalist's reflection on a lifetime of loveless philandering until his 90th birthday, when he falls for a young virgin offered to him by a madam with whom he's done business with all his life. Smitten with the 14-year-old child, the old man astonishes himself as he grapples with the perks and pitfalls of first love. Though this short work cannot compare to Marquez's better-known classics, it offers readers a small taste of the captivating writing for which he has been celebrated.

"Their Eyes Were Watching God's" sexy, steamy overtones make this tragic love story the perfect read for a sticky August afternoon. With the ferocity and passion of Janie and Tea Cake's love, this is the perfect book to carry you through thunderstorm season. If you have not yet read it for a class – be it women's studies, African-American studies or straight-up English – take a look, as it offers a wealth of material for a broad range of analyses. Zora Neale Hurston's easy folk dialect helps provide readers with a look at a time in American history we will never see first hand. But readers, take warning and be prepared with ample supplies of Kleenex, as you will likely bawl your eyes out by the time "Their Eyes" grinds to a halt.

Cal Scannell can be reached at cscannell@student.umass.edu

Because you always remember your first time....

Your first time to Israel!
Travel for free with other UMass students for 10 days during Winter Break.

Jewish?
18-26 years old?
Never been on a peer-tour of Israel?
Sign up!!

REGISTER ONLINE
ONE DAY ONLY!
SEPTEMBER 9, 12 NOON
www.israelwithisraelis.com/boston-community-trip

For more info:
Michal at michalb@admin.umass.edu
413-549-1710 x210 or 413-330-6164
www.umasshillel.org

This trip is a gift of Taglit-Birthright Israel.
cjpc SHOSHASHIM TAGLIT BIRTHRIGHT ISRAEL

TRAVEL TO ISRAEL for FREE!!

Nirvana by a 'Riverfront'

Music festival captivates fans

By Jeffrey Larnard
Collegian Staff

It doesn't get much better than this for a music fan. The 2009 Newburyport Riverfront Music Festival had the perfect summertime festival vibe, taking place under warm, sunny skies with blankets, coolers and red cups. Journalism types from The Daily Collegian could have sung that day, and the euphoric crowd might have enjoyed them too. The actual performers of the day – Katie Herzig, the Sam Roberts Band, Eric Hutchinson and Fastball – only enhanced the festival.

The concert started at 2 p.m. with singer/songwriter Katie Herzig playing to a packed lawn. It was clear that most of the crowd had never heard of Katie Herzig, but her music has been featured on "One Tree Hill" and "My Sister's Keeper," among other movies and TV shows. Despite this, Herzig managed a set that was pleasant and fit the laid-back vibe of the festival. At this point the concert still felt like a picnic, and the crowd had less energy than a La-Z-Boy convention.

Fortunately, the Sam Roberts Band was able to change that. A popular band in Canada, the Sam Roberts Band was next to take the stage. The band just looked like a rock band. From the energetic lead singer clad in tight clothes to the enigmatic guitarist, the Sam Roberts Band gave the audience a favorable first impression. Their set did not disappoint either, and a passion-drenched performance of "Them Kids" was particularly memorable. A throwback to an earlier era, the Sam Roberts Band is lesser-known but deserves recognition in an age when modern rock bands unfortunately sound very similar.

Even with the great performance by the Sam Roberts Band, it was obvious who most of the crowd had showed up for. When Eric Hutchinson took the stage, he looked more like the captain of Amherst College's chess team than a performer. But he quickly erased any doubts, playing through his CD, "Sounds Like This." Combining humor, musical talent and the ability to get the crowd to participate in his songs, Mr. Hutchinson is clearly a gifted performer. If you have not heard of him, he is an artist that you need to check out immediately. As he left the stage, a middle-aged couple whispered excitedly to each other, "He is the next John Mayer!"

Though Fastball had to follow Eric Hutchinson's monster set, they took it in stride as they launched into their extensive catalog, including mega hits like "You're an Ocean," "The Way," and "Out of my Head." The crowd was eager to participate in these bits of nostalgia, but much less so with Fastball's new material. People who liked Fastball in the 90s may find something to like on their new album, but they are not likely to make any new fans with it. Regardless, Fastball was able to close out a very successful day that seemed to have everything go right. Simply put, the festival was a small piece of musical nirvana.

Jeffrey Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@student.umass.edu

Despite his unassuming demeanor, Eric Hutchinson enthralled audiences in July at the Riverfront Music Festival.

Vita Nova Church
...life from the ashes...
naked church
a sermon series beginning september 13th.
Downtown above Stackers
10:30am and 6pm
www.lifefromtheashes.org

TO ALL STUDENTS OF THE STOCKBRIDGE SCHOOL OF AGRICULTURE

Alpha Tau Gamma,
the Stockbridge academic, service & social fraternity announces the fall rush opening for male Pledges to become a member of the oldest, strongest, most active and most enjoyable part of an SSA/UMass college education with the best life long network founded in 1919.

Tuesday, September 8 at 5:45 p.m.
ATG Brothers will speak at the SSA convocation in room 20 Goessman Hall.
ATG orientation booklets will be distributed.
Sign-up sheets for new ATG Pledges will be available.

Tuesday, September 8 at 7:00 p.m.
ATG Brothers welcome all SSA students for pizza and sodas at our home at 118 Sunset Avenue, 100 yards south of the South-West dorms.
Bring your SSA student ID.
ATG will give away FREE T-shirts to the earliest arrivals.
ATG Orientation booklets will be distributed.
Sign-up sheets for new ATG Pledges will be available.

September 9 through 14
Visit our 118 Sunset Avenue home.
ATG orientations booklets will be available.
Sign-up sheets for new ATG Pledges will be available.

Monday, September 14 at 7:00 p.m.
ATG Brothers will welcome all SSA male students to our weekly meeting at 118 Sunset Avenue.
Bring your $100.00 check to ATG for your 2009/2010 Pledge and social fee.
ATG orientations booklets will be available.
Sign-up sheets for new ATG Pledges will be available.

The rush ends on Saturday, September 12.
The Pledge period beings on Monday, September 14.
The 6 week Pledge period ends on October 24.

STOCKBRIDGE FOREVER!

HERE'S THE DEAL

Our used books must pass a 10-point, three-pronged, infrared, x-ray, cover-to-cover inspection.

HALF BACK GUARANTEE
Look for books with this sticker

UMass Amherst University of Massachusetts
University Store and Textbook Annex
Amherst Campus Center • 413-545-2619
www.umass.bkstr.com
Powered by efollett.com

UM aims for 3rd NCAA bid

Koch expects leadership from veterans Arikian, DeSantis

By ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's easy to forget that making the NCAA tournament is never a given when a team has done just that in recent history.

That's why Massachusetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch won't put those expectations on his players even though making the tournament for a third straight year still remains a goal for 2009.

"I think if you expect to do it, you're foolish because you've got to earn it," Koch said. "I think this team has high expectations, but it's extremely difficult."

Last season, the Minutemen (10-5-3, 7-2-1 Atlantic 10) followed up their 2007 College Cup appearance with another NCAA tournament appearance after winning the A-10 regular season title.

UMass struggled early on in the non-conference schedule, finishing 5-5-2. But ever since the double-overtime tie with Duquesne on Oct. 19, 2008, the Minutemen were undefeated against the A-10 and showed that it was still one of the nation's best teams.

The Maroon and White won a decisive 2-0 victory against Saint Louis in the A-10 semi-finals before a 1-0 championship loss to Dayton.

In the first round of the NCAA Tournament, UMass gave Harvard a strong defensive showing for 103 minutes before Crimson forward Andre Akpan kicked a golden goal just after gaining possession from sophomore Chris Roswess and got the ball past former goalkeeper Zack Simmons for the victory.

Koch would like nothing more than to pick up where his team left off and make the tournament for a third straight year, but this year will be more of a challenge than in others.

One reason why making the tournament might be more difficult this season is because of the departed Minutemen who were key to their success these past two years. The most notable is Simmons.

As a four-year starter, Simmons finished with 386 saves and a 0.97 goals against average. His best game last season came against Boston University on August 31 when he finished with 11 saves.

For the past two years, junior Shane Curran-Hays has become an apprentice to Simmons, helping him warm up and learning from the A-10's top goalkeeper despite having the opportunity to start in numerous Division I programs.

But now, his long-awaited time as the starter is in jeopardy, at least in the beginning because of a knee injury he suffered during the summer. That set-back will make the job a toss-up between him and junior Chris Piekos.

The competition will also open up to freshman Bryan Frame, but Koch believes he still needs a year before he's ready to start.

The Minutemen's other major losses are Mike DeSantis and Prince Ofosu. Both were very important to the offense last year with Ofosu providing a spark off the bench (five goals) while DeSantis provided UMass with a speedy midfielder who could play on both sides of the ball.

As if those three changes aren't substantial enough, the Minutemen will be looking at a new defense as well that was known for helping the Minutemen stay in games. But from what little Koch has seen out of his defense thus far, he is encouraged based on its performance during the spring season.

UMass tied Maryland, the No. 1 team according to the Preseason NSCAA/adidas Division I Rankings, 0-0, and defeated No. 5 St. John's, 1-0.

Koch believes that this defense could live up to its reputation from previous years, but proof of that might not be evident until later on in the season.

The one area that remains solid from last year is the midfield, led by Ben Arikian. The junior already has high expectations as the only UMass player ever to make the Hermann Watch List.

He finished the 2008 season with 15 points (four goals, seven assists) and should play an even more significant role with the Maroon and White this season.

"Obviously he's a leader whether he wants to be or not," Koch said. "If you don't follow his work ethic or ability to go to all ends to win, then I question your character."

Some of the leadership will also have to come from forward Mark DeSantis, the team's only returning senior. Koch believes that despite having a young team, having DeSantis around to play wherever he's needed will be a key factor in determining if the Minutemen can still play at the same level they have the past two seasons.

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill0@student.umass.edu.

Junior Ben Arikian was named to the Hermann Award List as well as the Preseason Atlantic 10 First-Team in 2009.

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT
REGISTRATION FOR Fall 2009

The Writing Program Placement Test
will be offered on:

Wednesday, Sept. 9, at 6:00 pm in Bartlett 202

You must take this exam to qualify for enrollment in EnglWrit112 (College Writing).

This test may be taken only once.

Students do not need to register for the test.

Start of new era under Morris

Havens replaces loss of Coen, senior class strength of team

By JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The 2009 version of the Massachusetts football team bears a striking resemblance to the team that took the field a year ago.

It returns 15 starters (eight on offense, six on defense, one on special teams) starting the season ranked in the Preseason Sports Network Media Poll Top 25 with returning staples on both sides of the ball in running back Tony Nelson and safety Jeremy Miles.

But for every similarity between the 2008 Minutemen and this year's squad, there are also major differences.

The most obvious difference is the one calling all the shots. Don Brown, who coached UMass to four-straight winning seasons and an appearance in the 2006 Football Championship Subdivision National Championship game, has moved on to become the defensive coordinator at Maryland. Kevin Morris, last year's offensive coordinator, steps in with hopes of filling Brown's shoes.

While Morris was in charge of one of the most prolific offenses in UMass history, it may not be the same case this season. Instead of having Liam Coen, the owner of nearly every passing record in the Minutemen's book, Morris had two quarterbacks vying to fill the large void left by Coen's graduation.

Senior Scott Woodward, who served as Coen's backup his entire career at UMass battled with junior college transfer Kyle Havens for the starting position under center. Havens came out on top and now has the task of trying to be Coen, something that is no easy job. But Havens will have the luxury of a number of veterans around him. With 20 seniors on the team and as many as 14 of them starters —seven on each side of the ball — UMass will have plenty of experience to help ease in Havens.

On offense, the loss of Coen will be lessened by the play of Nelson, a Preseason First-Team All-Colonial Athletic Association selection and the duo of All-American Victor Cruz and All-Conference Jeremy Horne at wideout.

"Those are guys who have handled the load. They got the ball a lot last year, so they know what it is like to get the ball in clutch situations and big games, and that can definitely take some heat off the quarterback," Morris said at the team's Media Day in Amherst. "The quarterback can come in and get use to being the leader so it doesn't have to be all on the quarterback."

Senior All-American Victor Cruz and the Minutemen hope to improve on last season's 7–5 record. They will be led by new coach Kevin Morris.

Despite falling out of the Top 25 for the first time since 2005 last year, the veteran experience of this year's squad has brought UMass back into the polls. In the Preseason Sports Network Media Poll, the Minutemen came in at No. 17, 13 spots back from where they began last year.

But UMass is not alone in the polls when it comes to the CAA. Six other teams rank in the Top 25, with Richmond, the defending National Champions, coming in at No. 2. Villanova follows at No. 5 with James Madison (No. 6), New Hampshire (No. 8) and William and Mary (No. 14) all ahead of the Minutemen. Maine rounds out the CAA teams in the Top 25 at No. 19.

"The league is again going to be just a juggernaut of a league. From the top to bottom you can't take a day off," Morris said. "Based on record, we can play the best team in the league against the worst and that game is going down to the wire and this year is no different."

If the rankings hold true, the Minutemen will have a tough, month-long stretch starting in the middle of October and extending to the end of the season. In the team's sixth game of the year, UMass will play host to New Hampshire – which is the team picked to win ahead of UMass in the CAA North, followed by back-to-back games on the road against Richmond and Maine, respectively. The Minutemen lost to all three teams last season.

UMass then returns home to face Northeastern followed by defending CAA-South Champion James Madison. The Minutemen will finish the season with an away game at Hofstra.

The toughest game on the schedule for UMass came this past weekend when the team traveled to Kansas to take on Kansas State of the Football Bowl Subdivision. Following the matchup with Kansas State, the Minutemen play three straight at home against Albany, Rhode Island and lastly Stony Brook. UMass then travels to Delaware before its contest with New Hampshire.

Jeffrey R. Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@student.umass.edu.

ATTENTION STUDENTS:
Come see what you've been missing out on!

ATKINS FARMS
Country Market

While grabbing your weekly groceries, stop by our...

- Sushi Bar
- Deli Bar
- Extensive Salad Bar
- Bakery
- Full Service Florist

COME CHECK OUT OUR SPECIALTY FALL PRODUCTS...
Homemade Caramel Apples
Apple Cider
Homemade Fudge
Cider Donuts

ALSO AVAILABLE:
Take - Out Food
Student Care Packages

Corner of Route 116 & Bay Road
South Amherst, MA 01002
(413) 253-9528 * WWW.ATKINSFARMS.COM
JUST A SHORT DRIVE FROM UMASS

MERCYhouse
it's a church!
knowmercy.org
385 North Pleasant :: 1/2 block from Umass

THE BOLTWOOD
PROJECT™
Serving others since 1969 -- and STILL making a difference!
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)
REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Fall Semester 2009 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Campus Center Room 101 • Sept. 14 (Mon) • Sept. 15 (Tues) • Sept. 16 (Wed)
*Assignment notification ONLY Thurs. Sept. 17 @ Boltwood table CC Concourse
No telephone inquiries. YOU (or a friend) must pickup the notification letter!!!*
Volunteer, while earning credit!

Morris takes reigns

MORRIS from page 18

familiar with their coaches, and also returns 20 seniors that he can rely on.

These are both things that have helped him take on his new responsibilities. The coaching staff is one that Morris has been with for a number of years, as they have all worked together under Brown, giving Morris a team of coaches he can trust.

"With Brian Picucci on offense, we've been together for nine years so it has been real easy for me to let him do his job and that allows me to do my job as being the head coach," Morris said. "I'm fortunate enough to have a guy that I can entrust the offense like I do with Keith Dudzinski on defense and Steve Tirrell with special teams so I can just be a quality control guy in all of those areas and I don't have to run anyone in particular so I can run the overall program at this point."

Some of those new responsibilities for Morris as he runs the overall program vary from being the director of player personnel to coaching every aspect of the team to dealing with financial issues and scholarships. While his duties have increased significantly from when he was the offensive coordinator, his ability to trust his coaches and having senior leadership in the locker room have been vital.

With such a large senior class coming back who have been around Morris their entire tenure at UMass, Morris knows his players and knows he can trust them just as he does with his coaches. He can rely on them to do the things they are expected to do and to set an example for the incoming freshman.

"I'm definitely leaning on that senior class to make things right in the locker room, off the field and on the field, in how we practice and how we go about our business everyday," Morris said of his seniors. "They have been a great part of our transition, making it so smooth and successful."

Morris' players have also reacted positively about the transition.

"The [players] have been great and they have really responded well," Morris said. "They are working hard and that is all I can ask for if they give us their best everyday in everything that they do and represent UMass on a daily basis."

But for Morris, the transition hasn't been without bumps. Morris had to deal with the loss of Liam Coen, arguably the greatest quarterback in UMass history and the holder of nearly every passing record in the UMass record book, and had to choose between two battling quarterbacks. Coen's backup for the past three years, Scott Woodward, eventually was passed over for junior college transfer Kyle Havens, but it was no easy decision for Morris. It took him up until a week before the Kansas State game to pick the starter.

Morris also has his previous experiences to help guide him through the transition.

"All that experience and all those jobs that were great for me were learning experiences as well as on-the-job training," said Morris. "I've taken bits and pieces from all of those things that were successful in terms of running a program and in terms of dealing with kids in situations, which in all my days in coaching, you have to get through a lot so I'm taking from all of those coaching experiences and trying to make the best of UMass with those."

Jeffrey R. Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com.

After five seasons as the Minutemen's offensive coordinator, Kevin Morris takes over as head coach for Don Brown.

Rudy has lasting legacy at UM

RUDY from page 18

hard as I did the men and I don't think I could've gotten away with anything less than that. I don't think the women would've tolerated that. The way I look at it, I got twice the experience in eight years than anyone in the country."

This experience translated into a trip to the NCAA National Championship game by his second year as women's head coach. UCF reached the NCAA National Semi-Finals in 1987 as well, led by Michelle Akers, who won the Hermann Trophy — the women's soccer equivalent of the Heisman Trophy — in 1988. However, Rudy already left the Golden Knights for the program that gave him his final loss at UCF: Massachusetts.

During his tenure at UMass, Rudy led the Minutewomen into the postseason nine times, including a Final Four appearance in 1993. While guiding UMass to the NCAA tournament, he became the only coach in the history of Division I collegiate women's soccer to lead teams from two different schools to Final Four appearances.

While coaching in Amherst, Rudy compiled a 239-137-22 record, but his impact on the sport goes far beyond wins and losses.

In 1990, Rudy coached another Hermann winner – April Kater. Rudy had another impact player that season in freshman goalkeeper Briana Scurry, who eventually led the United States women's team to gold medals in the 1996 and 2004 Summer Olympic Games, and helped the U.S. win the World Cup in 1999.

Scurry, Amy Allmann and Kim Wyant were all goalkeepers for U.S. national teams, and originally played for Rudy.

He coached 37 players who earned All-America honors and many of his players now use the knowledge that they learned while playing for Rudy as they coach their own collegiate teams.

Rudy is a three-time A-10 Coach of the Year award winner and in 1993, Rollins College honored him with the Rollins Athletic Achievement Award, given annually to the person who has distinguished themselves in the world of athletics.

"It's time," he said of his decision to retire. "I think with the A-10, in its present [postseason team selection] format, I've done what I think I'm able to do here. I don't think I'm personally able to take this [program] much higher."

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

DO YOU WANT TO WRITE
FOR SPORTS?
COME TO THE ALL-STAFF MEETING
THURSDAY, SEPT. 10 @ 5 P.M.
IN THE CAMPUS CENTER BASEMENT

BEACH CLUB TANNING STUDIOS
BUY A BOTTLE OF LOTION & GET 5 FREE TANS IN ANY BED!!!!!!!!
ALL NEW MEMBERS BUY 5 TANS GET 5 FREE
*BRONZE LEVEL ONLY
WWW.BEACHCLUBTANNINGSTUDIOS.net

Attention: Students
Hospice Shop of the Fisher Home
has got a sale for you...
Come in anytime during September and October and show your student ID to buy one item and get a free item of equal or lesser value!
The place for gently worn name brand & vintage clothing, shoes & accessories as well as housewares, art and books.
55 University Drive, right next to the Hanger
Monday 10-7, Tuesday through Saturday 10-4
(413) 549-8800

UMass alumnus takes over for retired Rudy

NAPOLI from page 18

the staff at UMass, Napoli was also the assistant coach at Albany for the 2004 season.

Though Napoli has been at UMass for four years, she knows the transition from being assistant coach to replacing a former three-time Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year winner will take work.

"Just like any transition, there will be some difficulty, but I think with me being here and knowing the [players], it's going to be easier," Napoli said. "There is no one really like Jim Rudy. He's great with tactics; he's very charismatic and he has one of the largest vocabularies of anyone I've ever met."

Serving under Rudy, however, has made Napoli prepared to take on her first head-coaching job.

"I learned a lot from him, so I think his knowledge is going to help me, but it's just going to be coming from a different personality."

Personality won't be the only difference between the two as Napoli looks to implement a different strategy. Last season, the Minutewomen struggled offensively, often going scoreless in games. So this season, instead of the offense always trying to keep possession of the ball, Napoli wants to be more direct by looking for the first option forward instead of the easy square ball.

She will look for the midfielders to be thinkers out on the field and move the ball forward with a quick connection.

Napoli won't be making many drastic changes, though, since she likes the current team has a good chance to succeed this season.

"My goal is to go on [whatever] more difficult [to the opposing] trails as hard as I can and to build off of [what] we have."

Jon Lane can be reached at [illegible]

Taking over for her former head coach, Angela Napoli looks to build on the [illegible] Rudy. Napoli was a standout goalkeeper for UMass until her graduation in 2003.

Eating Disorder Treatment
Treatment of Adults Suffering from Anorexia and Bulimia Nervosa
Informed clinicians refer their clients to Laurel Hill Inn. LHI provides New England's most effective treatment and highest staff to client ratio. We provide extensive programming in a highly structured and supervised non-institutional therapeutic setting. Evening, day, and residential treatment as well as weekly support groups in West Medford and West Somerville.
Call Linda at (781) 396 1116 or visit us at www.laurelhillinn.com.

Exercise more than your intellect.
College Students
Get 15% OFF full-price items.
Must show valid college ID. Restrictions apply, visit store for details.
Hadley
Mountain Farms Mall
413-584-3554

Productive freshmen midfield key in '09

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The No.17 Massachusetts field hockey team lost nearly half of its scoring power from the 2008 season to graduation. The question isn't if the offense will have scorers in 2009, but who those scorers will be.

Forwards

Forward Katelyn Orlando, along with midfielders Erin Parker and Mary Shea, accounted for 24 goals last season – roughly 43 percent of UMass' goals scored total. With the three captains lost to graduation, UMass coach Justine Sowry still has goal scorers on the roster, including junior forward Katie Kelly.

Kelly comes into this season after a breakout year in 2008. With 11 goals last season, Kelly was the only other Minutewoman besides Orlando (15) to score double-digit goals. Despite suffering a hand injury early in the season, Kelly was one of Sowry's most durable players. She played in 21 games, starting 18 of them. While Kelly is a powerful player that slashes her way to the striking circle, she only represents one type of player on the versatile UMass forward line.

Senior transfer Jill Powers was told via text message that her playing days at Rhode Island were over. She nearly quit field hockey entirely because she was asked to play for the women's basketball team at URI until she got a call from Sowry asking her to become a Minutewoman. Powers uses her quickness and agility to finesse her way around larger defenders. Her speed makes her a sparkplug off the bench for Sowry and she enables UMass to maintain an up-tempo offense throughout the game.

"I see her getting more significant playing time this year," Sowry said of Powers. "Certainly with her leadership on the forward line, she can really help the freshmen move forward. She's fiery, she's a competitor and I hope she brings more of that this season."

To balance out the two speedier forwards on the starting line, senior forward Cher King brings international experience and a tactical style of international play to UMass. A native of Christ Church, Barbados, King captained the Barbadian team in the 2008 Junior Pan-Am Games, scoring two of her team's five goals in the tournament. King has three international tournaments in the past five years to her credit, and her knowledge of the game is an invaluable asset to UMass, who lost all three captains to graduation.

King is one of the best stick-handlers on the team, a skill that is widely emphasized overseas. For a forward, she is a stout defender. Her two defensive saves tied fellow international player, midfielder Makaela Potts, for the team-high last season.

King finished last season with four goals, four assists while playing in — and starting — 19 games.

Midfield

Potts, like Sowry, brings her international knowledge from Australia. The junior is the eldest of a midfield previously led by Parker and Shea. Along with the three captains and defender Jaime Bourazeris, Potts started all 22 games for the Minutewomen last season, scoring four goals with three assists.

Potts' value goes far beyond goals and assists, however. At the midfield position, she has the knowledge to recognize opposing offensive schemes and the tenacity to pick apart opposing defenses, with her physical play, on offense. Only Kelly's 36 shots on goal last season surpassed Potts' 29. However Potts took 69 shots to Kelly's 49. Potts' experience and leadership is crucial to the progression of a midfield line that receives two freshmen in Kate Heineman and Elizabeth Karns – barring a position change from a more experienced player, one of the rookies will likely see significant time on the midfield line.

The only other midfielder with at least one season of play to their credit is Nikki Panciocco. The sophomore started 18 of her 22 games for UMass last season without recording a point, but did record a defensive save. She played the final 18 games of the season on defense.

Backs

Bourazeris leads a defense that consists of three sophomores and fellow junior Courtney Mayerick who sat out all of last season. Bourazeris sees the field well and has the athleticism to stop the opposition and transition the ball up-field. Last season, her intelligent and unselfish play led to six assists to offset her three goals. She's a good situation player as well. On Oct. 4 against Siena, Bourazeris scored two goals off of corners in the 5-1 UMass victory.

Of the three sophomores, Amanda Dietz, Christine Cutry and Callie Sweigart, none played more than five games in 2008 and none of them recorded a goal or assist. According to Sowry, the back position is an open competition to fill the void left by junior transfer Jackie Tait, who now plays for Division III Mary Washington.

Tait finished her 2008 campaign with one goal scored while teaming up with Bourazeris in a UMass backfield that allowed a conference-low 1.09 goals per game.

"This year there will be a 'new look' backfield," Sowry said of her defense. "We're looking potentially at giving Makaela Potts some time in the backfield as well. You have to have athletic and smart players in the backfield and Makaela fits that perfectly. [Potts] could potentially tear the opponent's press apart."

"I'm sure it will change," Sowry said of the lineup. "This is just a preliminary look at a potential lineup."

Goalkeeper

While the back position is questionable going into this season, the Minutewomen have the luxury of having one of the best goalkeepers in the country, All-American sophomore Alesha Widdall. The reigning Co-Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year led the conference with seven shutouts in 2008, including two in the A-10 Conference Tournament, en route to a second-straight conference championship. Widdall extended that consecutive shutout streak to three when she blanked the Golden Flashes to earn a spot for the Minutewomen in the NCAA Tournament.

Few would doubt that Widdall played a large part in UMass' No. 17 ranking last season, its first top-20 ranking since 2000.

Widdall compiled a 1.06 goals-against average that ranked fourth in the nation. Widdall's dominance in the postseason was due in part to the fact that she competed in the Junior Pan-American Games, earning the victory in the championship game against Chile to give the United States the gold medal.

Widdall returned to the Minutewomen to record five of her seven shutouts with a 0.66 goals-against average.

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

Youth vital in win over Iowa

F. HOCK from page 18

the game better," Heineman said. "There were times where we sped the game up when we shouldn't have and we need to control the game more."

When UMass tries too hard to rush the goal, it gives the opposition opportunities to take the game over – like the Terriers' Nikki Lloyd did on Friday. The Minutewomen had to rely on scores from Bourazeris and defender Makaela Potts and with the UMass defense acting primarily on offense, Lloyd found multiple holes in the scoring circle and registered a hat trick on the day.

The loss was particularly devastating because when the two teams played in 7-on-7 overtime rules, Potts tried to chase down Lloyd on a breakaway and inadvertently tripped her, sending Lloyd hard to the turf. Potts subsequently received a yellow card and exited the game. While UMass played short-handed, Lloyd regrouped from the fall and returned to the game to score the golden goal.

After the loss, Sowry told her players in practice that preparation meets opportunity. The Minutewomen put her words into action and capitalized on the few opportunities given to them by the Hawkeyes to earn the win, and will continue to use these words when UMass goes on the road to take on Albany and James Madison next weekend.

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

Jill Powers notched four points on a goal and two assists through three games this season.

Napoli put in charge

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

With a new head coach and new team strategy already in place, the Massachusetts women's soccer team is hoping new results will also come this season.

Former UMass head coach Jim Rudy announced his retirement in late-May. Two months later, former UMass standout goalkeeper and assistant coach, Angela Napoli received an offer to replace the 21-year coach.

Napoli said she will look to change the type of style the team plays this season to a more direct, upfield approach.

"Last year, I think our team got stuck where we were trying to 'possess, possess, possess' no matter where we were on the field," Napoli said. "I would rather have us get a quick connection and everybody heading forward."

After having a decent first half of the season last year, which included a stretch of three consecutive victories, the Minutewomen lost their last five games in scoreless fashion.

To make matters worse, the graduation of Vanessa Patry leaves the Maroon and White without its captain and top offensive threat from last season. Patry led the team in a number of categories, including goals, assists, points and shots on goal.

Nevertheless, Napoli feels confident with the team heading into the start of the season. Her only concern: injuries.

"Everyone tells me I shouldn't talk about injuries. It's only going to be bad luck," Napoli said. "After being here for four years, I know that no matter what, things are going to happen."

The Minutewomen (0-3) might have already lost two players for this season in Meghan Collins and Amanda Carvalho. Both will be recovering from ACL surgeries from the spring, so Napoli isn't counting on seeing either on the field anytime soon. Alyssa Visconti was also diagnosed with mono in early August, but the time she will miss is still uncertain.

"It could be a problem for as short as a couple weeks, or it could be as long as six months," Napoli said. "I'd rather be ready for the worst and be prepared, but if not then great."

UMass suffered from significant injuries last year as well when redshirt junior Sydney Stoll suffered a knee injury during a spring game, which caused her to miss the entire season. Meghan Gould sat out the year with a concussion in addition to a previous ankle surgery. Both will be back this season, which will give a big boost to the offense and will bolster the strength of the team, the midfielders.

The weakness of the team will most likely be the youth. The back line will be fairly new and inexperienced. Napoli also feels the lack of height on the team could cause problems in the air game.

"We have some [players] who can head the ball very well, but they will be going up against taller competition."

Napoli also mentioned that her team needs to play better against A-10 opponents. Throughout the first half of the conference schedule, UMass stayed in the hunt for a post-season berth. But after being outscored, 9-0, in the last five games of the season, it lost any chance it had of advancing.

"I feel like in the last couple years, we've done very well in non-conference play but then dipped in the A-10," Napoli said. "I want to approach our non-conference play as building blocks for the games in the A-10."

The A-10 is top-heavy this season with teams like Charlotte, Dayton and Fordham. The 49ers were No. 25 in the nation last year and went undefeated with 11 wins in conference. After the top tier, there is a large group of teams in the middle of the pack that are going to be competitive. Napoli feels that the Minutewomen are poised to make a run for the A-10 Tournament for the first time since 1997.

"It will be a battle, and we'll have to stay healthy. But with how the conference is set up, everyone has a shot every year."

Despite low expectations, Napoli expects this team to surprise the conference.

"I think our kids have a lot of desire to prove themselves this year," Napoli said. "People are going to underestimate us, and our kids are fine with that because they want to show we're better than people think."

Jay Asser can be reached at jasser@student.umass.edu.

Junior Kelsey Anderson tries to escape past a defender in a game last season. The Minutewomen finished 6-9-3 in 2008.

THE SHACK
DID THE HOMEWORK SO YOU DON'T HAVE TO.

boost mobile
$129.99
Boost Motorola Clutch™ i465
$50/mo. unlimited nationwide talk, text, Web and walkie-talkie.▼
17-4429

SanDisk
$20.99
8GB USB Flash Drive
25-1110

PLANTRONICS Bluetooth
SAVE $10
$29.99
Plantronics E230 Bluetooth® Headset
17-3662 Reg. 39.99

ALIVIO
$34.99
ALIVIO™ In-Ear Headset with Microphone
33-267

sansa
$79.99
Expandable 4GB Sansa® Fuze
• FM tuner
• Slot for microSD card
42-399

Offers good through 9/12/09. Availability may vary by store. See store for details.
▼Monthly Unlimited Plan. Includes domestic voice calling, wireless take-out services, Web, text messages, picture and MMS/audio messages. Additional charges apply for international services/messages. Other restrictions apply. See in-store materials or boostmobile.com for details. ©2009 Boost Worldwide, Inc. All rights reserved. Boost, Boost Mobile and the i logo are trademarks of Boost. MOTOROLA and the Stylized M are registered trademarks of Motorola, Inc. All other marks are the property of their respective owners.

RadioShack
RadioShack.com

VISIT A RADIOSHACK STORE NEAR YOUR CAMPUS.
Campus Plaza, 458 Russell Street, Hadley, Ph: 413-256-8142
Hampshire Mall, 341 Russell Street, Hadley, Ph: 413-286-7418

Bucci comes to the CAMPUS CENTER!
haircuts $12 413-549-0522

Get 'em while they last!
Giant Furniture Sale
2 days only!
A huge collection of gently used couches, tables, chairs, desks & bureaus

Comfy, Experienced, Affordable
Friday, September 11 & Saturday, September 12
2pm-5pm 9am-1pm
Amherst Town Common
Home delivery available for a small fee. Donations accepted on-site on day of event
Call (413) 549-3568 x252 or furniture@amherstsurvival.org for more information.
Principal Sponsors
Amherst Survival Center | UMassFIVE College Federal Credit Union | Hart & Patterson
All proceeds benefit The Amherst Survival Center
Providing food, health, clothing and community in Hampshire & Franklin Counties since 1975

UMass hopes to fill holes from graduation

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

Every collegiate sports team has that beginning part of the season in which it has to reconcile for its losses through graduation, transfer or otherwise. The Massachusetts men's soccer team is no exception.

On paper, the Minutemen don't look much different from last year (seven returning starters), but looking at the few UMass lost tells a different story. Former goalkeeper Zack Simmons, midfielder Mike DeSantis and top goal-scorer Prince Ofosu highlight some of the production missing from the 2009 team.

However, UMass coach Sam Koch can only focus on what he has – a much faster team and several players who he believes are flexible at playing different positions on the field.

So far, he has already seen proof of his team's ability to make up for its losses.

"We had some tough losses to graduation that we worked on during the spring, and we had a good spring season," Koch said.

After tying Maryland and defeating Saint John's this past spring, the Minutemen still face high expectations, finishing third in a pre-season Atlantic 10 coaches' poll.

Forwards

The way UMass fared against the A-10 in 2008, it would seem like not much had changed between its College Cup run and last year. The numbers on offense told a different story.

The Minutemen finished seventh in the A-10 during the 2008 season (24 goals) compared to 2007 where they finished third (35). This year certainly isn't going to get any easier after losing Ofosu, especially with the forwards being the least experienced for the Minutemen (two returning players, two newcomers).

To make up for that, Chris Roswess and Mark DeSantis will need to have break-out seasons if UMass hopes to restore itself as an offensive threat. The younger of the DeSantis brothers finished the season with four goals, but really didn't get going until conference play began.

As a left-sided player, he not only creates mismatches, but he has the hardest shot on the team. One of the things Koch likes about his returning senior is his ability to play anywhere on the field. While DeSantis's main responsibilities will be to score goals, he may be moved around to either midfield or defense.

"The problem is that he does so many things so well," Koch said of DeSantis's versatility.

His leadership qualities and versatility made him a clear choice as one of the Minutemen's captains during the 2009 season.

Chris Roswess, however, will go from simply playing a role in 2008 to being a full-time starter this season. And with that comes more pressure to score. The sophomore finished the previous season with more goals than any of the other newcomers (two) and should only continue to improve as the season progresses due to his explosiveness on the field.

It took time for Roswess to get comfortable, but he became a regular starter once the conference schedule got underway. In his second start, the sophomore showed a lot more aggressiveness, finishing with a season-high of four shots on goal against St. Bonaventure.

With that kind of play, he picked up his first goal two games later against Richmond in UMass' 2-1 win.

The Minutemen's newest forward, Matt Johnson, should receive his opportunities early as well. The freshman ran track in high school, which Koch believes should make for a fast front-line.

Midfielders

Aside from losing Mike DeSantis, the midfield remains mostly the same from last year.

With junior Ben Arikian as the Minutemen's top returning player, opposing teams will certainly focus more on stopping the midfield than in previous seasons. Arikian led UMass as the team's top distributor with seven assists, which also allowed him to lead his team in points (15).

Even with his unselfish play, the midfielder shares the honor with DeSantis as the team's top returning scorer. This season, Koch will ask for Arikian to take on even more of the scoring load without Ofosu up front.

He considers Arikian to be the leader for the Maroon and White, simply because of his ability to lead by example.

The bigger question is not what Arikian's role on the team is, since that is already well-defined, but who is going to play behind him. The two veterans who Koch favors most are Matthew Hess and Billy Collins primarily because of their experience.

But one of the things that Koch mentioned that he likes about his squad is its versatility. Not only does he feel that someone from his defense can move up, but that some of his additions could end up in the back.

The Minutemen feature Dominic Skrajewski and Tyler Brown as the two incoming midfielders. Koch believes that both are good enough to adapt to any position. Their depth at midfield leaves Chicago native Patrick Holmes with a chance to mature into the type of player Koch would like him to be before relying on him too much.

Alongside Arikian will be Bryant Craft. The sophomore played midfield and forward last season, starting almost right away after leaving a strong impression on Koch.

He finished the season with a goal and an assist to go along with 13 shots. Craft should see his opportunities on the offensive end go up because of the consistency he displayed freshman year and his ability to serve.

The other midfielders will be Stuart Amick and Chris Vaccaro. On the left side, Amick will have an increase in scoring responsibilities. Although sophomore year was slow (zero goals), the junior showed as a freshman (five) that he's capable of scoring when given the opportunity.

That opportunity should come once again as his speed should help him get into scoring position.

Defense

For the last two seasons, the Minutemen's defense consistently gave teams trouble. Simmons led the defense to two NCAA Tournament appearances including a trip to the College Cup in 2007.

As one of the top goalkeepers in the country, he finished with 386 saves and a 0.97 goals against average. His performance earned him several post-season accolades and a spot with the New England Revolution (which he eventually gave up to pursue academics).

This season, the man in goal will be someone other than Simmons for the first time in four years. Juniors Shane Curran-Hays and Chris Piekos will compete for the starting job. Originally, Curran-Hays had the job locked up because of his natural ability (he was highly recruited by several Division I schools).

Instead, a summer knee injury subdued Koch's expectations, for now. Piekos will have the opportunity to win over the spot if Curran-Hays shows signs that he's still hampered by the injury early on.

Although Curran-Hays might not bring the same dominance as Simmons did, the team expects a lot out of him even though he has yet to play a single minute for UMass.

Curran-Hays has better footwork than Simmons to make up for what he lacks in strength. He also learned much while playing behind the former Minuteman.

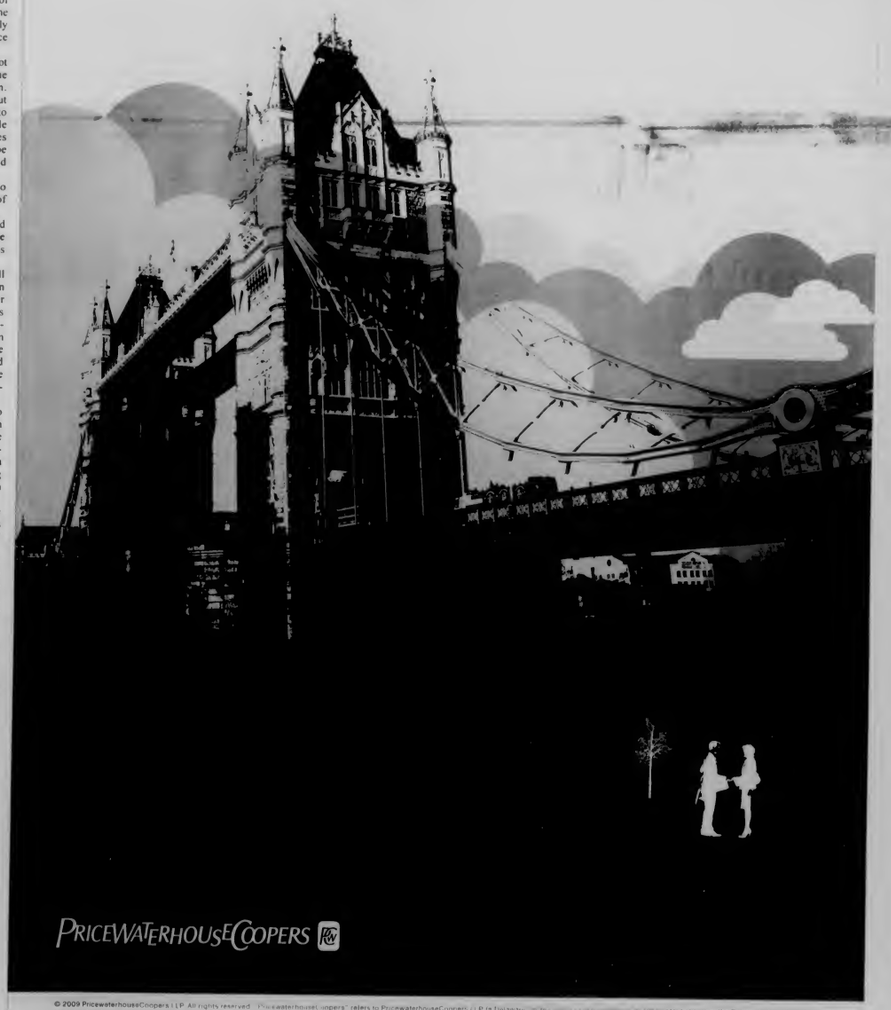
In the exhibition game against Adelphi and season opener against Boston University, Koch started Piekos in goal, but had Curran-Hays start on Saturday against Hartford. If he feels that their ability levels are close, Koch will rotate between Piekos and Curran-Hays for a week or two before deciding on an official starter.

The defensive changes aren't just in net. UMass lost three of its top four defenders in Daniel Lepone, Chris Brown and Stuart Thomson. The only regular on defense is sophomore Andrew Henshaw, who started 15 games.

The four remaining defenders (Sam DeNormandie, Billy Collins, David Key and Chris Gilbert) have 12 games of playing experience between them and one start.

Gilbert had the most experience as a freshman last season, playing 128 minutes, about four times as much as the other three had combined (36).

Koch will once again welcome several new freshmen to the defense, with Brody Steigerwald expected to standout because of his versatility. It's likely that he and Skrajewski will play wherever the other is not, since they are both comfortable on defense or at midfield.



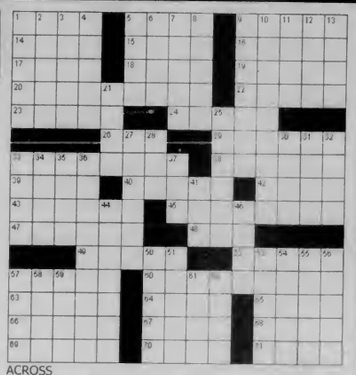
With several new faces on defense, Koch knows that it might not immediately look like one of the A-10's top defenses as it has in years past, but he feels that by the end of the season, it will be just as good.

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill@student.umass.edu.

Feed your future

Tune in and learn why we're one of the best places to start your career.

Begin at www.pwc.tv



PRICEWATERHOUSECOOPERS

© 2009 PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP. All rights reserved. "PricewaterhouseCoopers" refers to PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP (a Delaware limited liability partnership) or, as the context requires, the PricewaterhouseCoopers global network or other member firms of the network, each of which is a separate and independent legal entity. We are proud to be an Affirmative Action/Equal Opportunity employer.

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!
Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

CROSS-WORD

DOWN
1. Extra
2. Even
3. Came up
4. 1/60th of a fluid dram
5. British Thermal Unit
6. Operatic solo
7. Calms
8. The smallest amount
9. A meeting
10. Pertaining to modern science or equipment
11. Wild African sheep
12. Streamlet
13. Impart information
21. Founder of Carthage (Roman mythology)
25. Sacred text of Zoroastrianism
27. Express agreement
28. Tibetan ox
30. A type of cabbage
31. Historical periods
32. Dried hemp leaves
33. Dummy
34. Object of worship
35. Bottom of one's shoe
36. Special advantage
37. Light Emitting Diode
41. A chaw
44. Important or inner
46. Ancient war goddess
50. Horned animal
51. Lubricated
53. Delete
54. Afflicted
55. Behaved violently
56. Serpentine
57. Collections
58. An earlier time
59. Shivering fit
61. The founder of a family
62. City in New Mexico

ACROSS
1. Shut forcefully
5. Spheroid
9. Begin
14. A beautiful and graceful girl
15. Not false
16. Strange or spooky
17. Door-to-door cosmetic company
18. Anagram of "Hail"
19. A racing row boat
20. Repeat payments to performers
22. Decoy
23. A resin used in incense
24. Mar
26. 24 hours
29. People talking
33. A domestic garbage crusher
38. Once again
39. Smell
40. Slants or swerves
42. "Oh my!"
43. Law enforcement dept.
45. Unaltered
47. One more than ten
48. A tribe of Israel
49. Introduction (abbrev.)
52. 10 in a decade
57. Split or cleave off (archaic)
60. One who studies the past
63. Keen
64. An ancient city in Asia Minor
65. Seaweed
66. Genus of hemlock spruce
67. Roman emperor
68. Search
69. Metal
70. Lyric poems
71. Current

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
It's go time! Don't listen to those who say you won't make it.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You're energetic – in your own way. Coffee makes it official.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
http://bubububble.tumblr.com/.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Remember how it used to be? Forget that shit. Future's where it's at.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
"Just because" is a good enough reason for pretty much everything today.

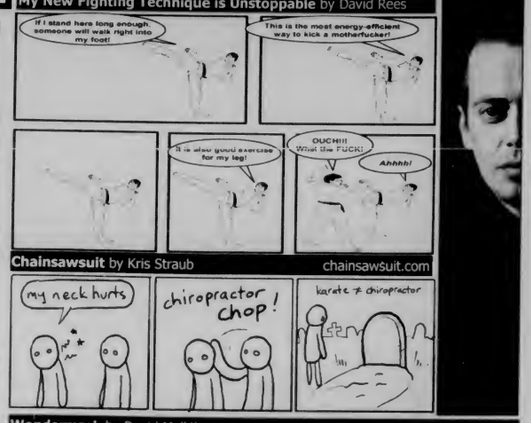
cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
An unexpected opportunity for happiness this afternoon. Take it.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Your tough situation is about to get more complicated. Keep a cool head.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
http://beetx.tumblr.com/.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Is it true emotion, or just PMS? Either way, approach with caution.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Someone's going to offend you today. Don't get mad, even though you're right.



sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You're fighting a craving. Some days it's best to give in – but not today.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
http://fashionofthechrist.tumblr.com/.

COLLEGE IS HARD... YOU NEED KUNG FU Get in Shape
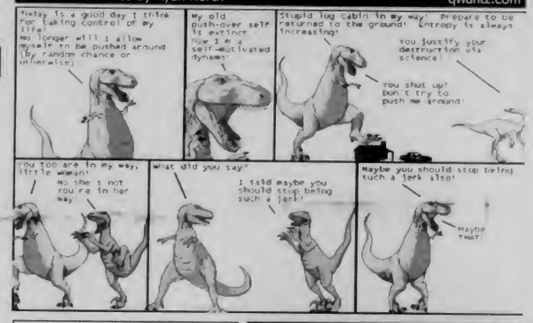
Defend yourself
Relieve stress
Shaolin Kung Fu Of Amherst
Student Discount!
Conveniently located on PVTA #30
Shaolinkungfuofamherst.com
413-364-7734

COMICS

My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees



Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub chainsawsuit.com

Wondermark by David Malki! wondermark.com

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North qwantz.com

For all your campus classifieds Checkout... oncampuslist.com
College classifieds

- Buy & Sell Textbooks
- Find Apartment
- Find Roommates
- Find a Tutor
- Buy/Sell Futons, notes etc
- Find Study Partners
- Search for Jobs
- Post Resume
- Request Missed Lecture Notes
- And many more...

SUDOKU

	3		2			4	8
						7		6
5	6		4				3
		1		3	4
4								8
			6	1		2
	1				2		9	4
2		8
	4	7			8		5

IT'S A NEW SEMESTER. SO WE GOT A NEW WEBSITE.
Collegian Blogs | Online Sudoku & Crosswords
More Photos | Video/Audio Event Coverage
AND A NUMBER OF ALL-NEW FEATURES – INCLUDING AN ALL-NEW CAMPUS DIRECTORY AND A FREE CAMPUS EVENTS CALENDAR – THAT WE WANT YOU TO CONTRIBUTE TO. LOG ON AND TELL US WHERE YOU ARE AND WHAT YOU'RE DOING. LET'S DISCUSS AT
DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Big Y World Class Market
Only The Best..:
SCORE BIG!
University Drive, Amherst, MA • 253-0416
We Accept OCMP! Visit Us At www.bigy.com
Blue Plate special
From Our Kitchen
$4.95
Available 11:30am - 1:30pm and 4:30pm - 6:30pm Daily
Not Available In All Stores. For A Limited Time Only.
Monday Only Salisbury Steak With Gravy
Tuesday Only 3 Piece Fried Chicken Dark Meat
Wednesday Only Tender Roast Turkey With Gravy
Thursday Only Roast Beef With Gravy
Friday Only Homestyle Meatloaf With Gravy
Available All Week Chicken Tenders* With Fries *Does Not Include Two Sides
Served with your choice of TWO of the following sides:
Buttered Corn
Macaroni & Cheese
Mashed Potatoes
Appetite Stimulus Plan
From Our Kitchen
Bigger Bird Rotisserie Chicken
All Natural, Cooked Weight, 2.5 lb
Serves 3 to 4
6.98
Large Grinder
12 Inch, Assorted Varieties
On a White or Wheat Roll
Made To Order
4.85
Large Pizza
Cheese or Pepperoni, 18 Inch
Made To Order
7.95
8 Piece Fried Chicken
2 Drumsticks, 2 Breast Pcs., 2 Thighs & 2 Wings
7.95
For A Limited Time Only
FEED THE WHOLE TEAM!
FRIDAYS ONLY!
FAMILY SIZE CHEESE PIZZA
40 Pieces
$12
SATURDAYS & SUNDAYS ONLY!
30" GRINDER
YOUR CHOICE OF HAM, TURKEY OR ROAST BEEF
$9
Cannot Be Combined With Any Other Offer.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS

BACK TO SCHOOL, FALL 2009 — SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Change in the heir at UMass

Morris moves to the sidelines

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

When the Massachusetts football team took the field against Kansas State on Saturday night, new head coach Kevin Morris saw the Minutemen playing from a new perspective.

"The biggest difference is I've been in the box for the last I-don't-know-how-many years as an offensive coordinator, seeing the game from up top," Morris said. "I'll be back on the field and I haven't been back on the field in a while."

Morris last stood on the sidelines in 1998, his final year as the head coach at Worcester Polytechnic Institute, and has since been up in the box as the offensive coordinator at Northeastern and most recently at UMass. After taking over for Don Brown as the head of the Minutemen football program, Morris has undergone many changes as he transitions from offensive coordinator to head coach.

To Morris, the transition has gone pretty smoothly. He was able to keep much of the same staff, allowing the players to still be

See MORRIS on page 13

Kevin Morris and Angela Napoli were both hired in 2009 to take over their respective programs. Morris replaced Don Brown who left to become the defensive coordinator at Maryland, and Napoli took over for the retired Jim Rudy.

Napoli inherits team after 4 years assisting

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

For the first time in 21 years, the Massachusetts women's soccer team will head into the season with a new face as head coach.

Two months after Jim Rudy announced his retirement from coaching collegiate women's soccer, former UMass standout goalkeeper Angela Napoli was appointed head coach for the 2009 season.

"I'm so excited and honored. I honestly never thought I would be in this situation. Of course I dreamed about it, but I never thought it would come true," Napoli said.

Director of Athletics John McCutcheon announced on July 21 that the replacement for Rudy would come internally – Napoli spent the past four seasons as an assistant coach after joining the staff in 2005.

"We are very pleased to hire Angela Napoli as our head coach for the 2009 season," McCutcheon told UMass Athletics at the end of July. "As the pre-season is just three weeks away, we feel that it is in the best interests of our program to move forward and give this leadership opportunity to Angela. We are fortunate to have an individual of Angela's experience and skills to provide direction to the program at this challenging time."

The experience that McCutcheon refers to is Napoli's coaching tenure at various schools. After earning a degree in Sport Management from UMass, she became an assistant coach at Colorado for the 2001 season. In 2002 and 2003, she served as assistant coach at William & Mary.

In her two seasons there, the Tribe made two appearances in the NCAA tournament as well as winning the Colonial Athletic Association title in 2003. Prior to joining

See NAPOLI on page 13

Rudy steps down after 21 yrs.

After coaching for 28 years, the last 21 of which were at UMass, Jim Rudy compiled a 313–160–28 career record.

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

In his 28 years of coaching collegiate women's soccer – 21 at the helm of the Massachusetts women's soccer team – Jim Rudy has compiled a 313-160-28 record. That record will remain as is, since Rudy announced his retirement earlier this summer.

Citing the need to be with family, Rudy leaves the place where he coached four Minutewomen squads to Atlantic 10 Conference titles.

"I still love the sport and I'm going to continue doing it more now as a player than as a coach," Rudy said of the beginning of his life after coaching.

Looking back on his many team and personal accolades, he never entered coaching situations in which he had all of the parts to a winning team already at his disposal.

Rudy started his coaching career shortly after graduating from Rollins College in 1972. Three years into his graduate work at Rollins, he received the call to lead the men's soccer program at the University of Central Florida. The program was trapped at club status, but Rudy didn't treat it like one. He still instituted years of eligibility and other guidelines used by varsity programs.

Rudy noted that when he came to coach the Golden Knights, many of the players were older than he was. There was even a 37-year-old ex-Austrian international player on the team. Nevertheless, Rudy got to work right away building an entirely new team from scratch. He hit the recruiting trail and filled the program with entirely new players and tested them by scheduling matches against varsity teams.

After two years, Rudy coached UCF at the varsity level. In 1981, he coached the first women's team in Golden Knight history, leading them to four postseason appearances in seven years.

Both teams had similar success under nearly-identical training regimens.

"I coached [the women] in pretty much the same way I coached the men," he said. "I trained them as

See RUDY on page 13

UM falls short of upset vs. K-State

Nelson starts season strong, Havens poised in first start

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

For three quarters, it was clear which team was better.

In quarters one, three and four, the Massachusetts football team shutout Kansas State while piling up 17 points of its own, but a lackluster second quarter did the Minutemen in, as they fell short of their first upset over a Football Bowl Subdivision team since 1984, with a 21-17 loss at Kansas State.

KSU	21
UMass	17

"I thought our [players] played extremely hard, we stood up to the test, that is no question, but we didn't win," UMass coach Kevin Morris said after the game. "We didn't make enough plays to win and they made those critical plays that put them over the top tonight."

After gaining a 3-0 lead in the first quarter when UMass (0-1) forced a fumble and made an interception on consecutive Kansas State drives, the Minutemen gave up 21 unanswered points in the second quarter.

The first Wildcat (1-0) touchdown came early in the quarter on a 1-yard run by quarterback Carson Coffman and the final two came in the last 5 minutes, 34 seconds to put UMass in an 18-point hole going into the locker room.

The Minutemen were strong in the second half, especially on defense and special teams, as they chipped away at the Kansas State lead, cutting it to four with 14 minutes remaining in the game. The defense forced numerous three-and-outs while holding the Wildcats scoreless for the final two quarters and the special teams came up with a fumble recovery and a blocked punt, both of which resulted in scores for UMass.

The Minutemen were forced to punt late in the third quarter, but Kansas State's Brandon Banks muffed the return and Ke'Mon Bailey jumped on the loose ball at the Wildcats 18-yard line. After three rushes left UMass four yards away from the goal-line, new starting quarterback Kyle Havens found tight end Andrew Krevis in the end-zone for the score. The touchdown was the first of Havens and Krevis' careers.

On the following Wildcat drive, the defense forced a three-and-out and the special teams came up big again. Jeromy Miles – who was called for roughing the kicker penalty In the first quarter – made sure to not make the same mistake twice as he got to Kansas State punter, Ryan Doerr, to block the punt. D.J. Adeoba grabbed the ball at the Wildcat's 26-yard line and returned it for a touchdown, cutting the lead to four.

"It just shows that we can play with the best and if we can compete at this level, then we can definitely compete at our level and we got a good solid team here," Havens said after his first career start at UMass.

After the game, Morris – also in his first game at the helm of the Minutemen – didn't credit his team's improvements in the second half on adjustments, just more on his team getting focused.

"It comes down to just making sure your guys are doing the right things," Morris said. "We had a couple of missed assignments in that first half, nothing that couldn't be corrected with just a little bit more focus. With regards to the second half, we got focused and we got unbelievable effort which we expect at UMass."

On offense, the play didn't seem as focused. Havens went 10-for-34 for 102 yards with a touchdown and two interceptions. But his numbers do him no justice. On at least double-digit occasions, UMass wide-outs dropped passes, and tailback Tony Nelson had the ball fall through his hands on four separate screen plays.

But Nelson made up for his drops on the ground as he rushed for 107 yards on 19 carries. Anytime the offense found a rhythm, it came with the ball in the senior's hands, as he found holes in the Kansas State's defensive line, a line that has been hurt by injuries.

Numerous penalties also hurt the Minutemen in the first half, including a pass interference call on Julian Talley that cost them a touchdown.

On one of the few long drives that the UMass offense put together on the night, Nelson and Havens engineered a drive that began at their own 20-yard line and reached the Wildcat 11-yard line. On 3rd-and-1, Havens floated a pass to the corner of the end zone where he found Victor Cruz, only to have the play called back because of the Talley penalty.

Jeffrey R. Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com.

Minutewomen upset Iowa, fall to BU

Widdall and defense strong against aggressive Hawkeye's

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

Members of the Massachusetts field hockey team hugged at midfield, relishing in the team's 4-3 upset of No. 9 Iowa on Friday, and forgetting about its 3-2 overtime loss to Boston University in Game 1 of the UMass Invitational just a day earlier.

The No.17 Minutewomen (2-1) used a suffocating offensive press to overwhelm Hawkeye goalie Kathleen McGraw from all sides of the cage with freshman Kara Charochak scoring her first career goal and defender Jaime Bourazeris scoring her team-leading second goal of the season.

UMass	4
Iowa	3
BU	3
UMass	2

"With that many freshmen on the field, I think it was a quality game," UMass coach Justine Sowry said of her rookies. "Certainly those freshmen who are starting right now have earned that spot. As long as they continue to bring that effort on a day-to-day basis, they'll continue to play."

Sowry's younger players played an integral role in the win, starting with Charochak, who struck first for the Minutewomen with a rebound off of the Minutewomen's first penalty corner of the game.

The goal against such a quality opponent energized UMass and allowed midfielder Kim Young to feed off that energy to disrupt Iowa's first penalty corner and push the ball out of the Minutewomen's striking circle. The Hawkeyes (0-3) utilized 11 penalty corners and 18 shots to pepper goalkeeper Alesha Widdall, who made a season-high eight saves on the day.

Iowa notched 38 scores in the second half of its games in 2008, and Saturday was no different. Widdall made seven saves off 12 Hawkeye shots in the second half alone. She noted that Iowa used many different strategies on its penalty corners and that she directed her defense to hold the middle of the net and push the opposition to the outside of the field.

"They were a very aggressive team," Widdall said of the Hawkeyes. "They were hard-pressing and in their backfield, they didn't give our forwards room to do much of anything."

Senior midfielder Cher King aided the encumbered forward line late in the first half with a breakaway at midfield deep into the Iowa scoring circle. She then banked it off the left side of the backboard for her first goal of the season, tying the game at two going into halftime.

Bourazeris padded the lead on UMass' first penalty corner of the half when freshman midfielder Kate Heineman bounced a shot off the pad of McGraw and Bourazeris sent in the rebound to take a 3-2 lead that the Minutewomen never relinquished.

Heineman looks to be a consistent starter for Sowry and her advanced perspective on the game can only help her.

"We need to control the tempo of

See F. HOCK on page 14

Senior Cher King handles the ball during UMass' NCAA play-in game against Kent State last fall. Against Iowa, King had one goal on two shots.

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY

COLLEGIAN

HIGH: 72 LOW: 49 — WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM — WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 2009

ACLU defends Vassell, connects case to Gates

By Hannah McGoldrick
Collegian Staff

In a July 22 Boston Globe Op-Ed, Executive Director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts, Carol Rose, suggested that "we're a long way from being a 'post-racial' society in Massachusetts." This was said in response to the July 16, 2009 arrest of Harvard professor Henry Louis Gates Jr. in his Cambridge, Mass., home.

According to the incident report printed by the Cambridge Police Department, Gates was "exhibiting loud and tumultuous behavior, in a public place." Rose said, "the arrest of [Gates] ... while trying to open the front door to his home is the latest reminder that racism is alive and well even in the most progressive enclaves of Massachusetts."

Members from the Committee for Justice for Jason believe they have found distinct connections between Gates' arrest and former UMass student Jason Vassell's ongoing trial. In an interview with the Valley Post, Committee member Kate Traub said, "I'm angry, but I can't say it surprises me. It does surprise me that it happened in this area with its history of community justice programs."

"Maybe the Cambridge police officer was instead following the example set in the case of Jason Vassell," said Rose.

Over the past 17 months, Vassell's lawyers have attempted to make the case that Vassell was prosecuted on the basis of his race. His lawyers cited the past incidences of alleged racial violence of his attackers and the alleged racial bias of the UMass Police during their investigation process.

"I think that circumstance had a significant effect on the way that Jason acted the night of the incident," stated committee member Joe Mirkin. "When white people are calling you a nigger and they enter the space where you live, given the history of racism in this country, you have to err on the side of caution assuming that your life is in danger." Defend himself he did, according to the motion to dismiss Vassell's charges, when he indicated that, "he was terrified and realized that 'if I don't do something, I'm going to die.'"

In an interview with Christopher Ott, communications director of the ACLU of Massachusetts, he told The Massachusetts Daily Collegian that, "both [cases] raise serious questions about unequal treatment of people of color by police and our legal system."

The ACLU recently joined Vassell's defense team in an effort to dismiss all charges against Vassell on the grounds that it has been a discriminatory prosecution. Ott said, "Why does the African-American victim face more serious charges than the intoxicated white assailants who invaded his dormitory and assaulted him?" Ott also drew parallels to Gates' arrest by saying, "Would a white person have ever ended up being arrested for 'disorderly conduct' under similar circumstances, or have been suspected of committing a crime in the first place?"

A July 26 press release sent out by the Committee for Justice for Jason claims racial profiling has led to phrases such as "driving while black," but in the wake of Vassell's case and Gates' arrest, they suggest that "perhaps a new phrase might soon take on a cultural meaning 'being home while black.'"

Derek Khanna, president of the UMass Republican Club, commented on the matter by stating, "I am repulsed by the idea that disagreeing with an officer inside of one's home could be considered disorderly conduct." He went on to say, "Americans should have the right to be disorderly within their own homes provided that they do not threaten others."

While Vassell has stated that he no longer wishes to return to UMass, due in part to the administration's reaction to his arrest, no efforts have been made by the administration to re-enroll Vassell as a student. Although Chancellor Holub was not at UMass when Vassell was arrested, he and his administration have said there is nothing they can do to reinstate Vassell at the University.

Mirkin says, "This is nothing more than an insincere act of avoiding responsibility and misrepresenting the situation facing Jason when he was attacked and wrongfully charged."

Meanwhile, Khanna said, "I think the Dean's Office system is ridiculous in how it handles these cases to begin with, and I think the entire system needs serious overhaul, but I don't think the Dean of Students Office's actions are nearly as unethical as the SGA's actions regarding paying for Jason Vassell's defense."

Khanna was referring to allegations surrounding the use of SGA funds to purchase T-shirts that were sold to support Vassell's legal defense fund.

See JUSTICE on page 2

'Green' new course

By Lucas Correia
Collegian Staff

In response to the global environmental issues of the 21st century, the University Without Walls (UWW) at the University of Massachusetts is offering a new concentration in the field of sustainable entrepreneurship.

The main principle of the certificate program is based on the idea of the "triple bottom line," which accounts for people, the planet and profit. This program focuses on teaching basic business skills, the impact humans can have on the environment and the relationship between a business and its consumers.

"Sustainable entrepreneurship is something the faculty and staff [at UWW] have all sort of lived by for years," said UWW marketing strategist, Heather Miller. "But now, I think the rest of the business community is looking for the same thing."

The certificate is open to both full and part-time students. Class times are geared towards working adults pursuing the certificate and undergraduates looking to add it to their diploma.

Courses are offered covering many rising green trends, such as holistic health, sustainable food systems, small business development, sustainable agriculture and green building.

Professor Gary Bernhard of UWW, the certificate's most influential developer, said that with environmental issues on the rise in the 21st century such as global warming, pollution and a shrinking oil supply, it is imperative that businesses focus on a triple bottom line.

"That's the larger context; we just can't sustain this way of life," Bernhard said. "If we don't start doing something about these things, the quality of life is going to diminish profoundly because the planet can't handle it."

Bernhard also mentioned that a business and environmental education is an important skill picked up through the program. He said this understanding can sometimes be the most effective tool for a sustainable business. Entrepreneurs in this field must learn to educate the public about environmental issues regarding what their business is doing and how effective they are in comparison to bottom line competitors who are only concerned about making a profit, according to Bernhard.

"Part of the education is foreseeing these issues, understanding what it means to be in competition with companies, farms and health centers that don't care about these things and aren't trying to integrate sustainability concerns into their business," he said. "Those concerns can put a lot of pressure on an entrepreneur in realizing he or she can really be undersold by a company that isn't thinking about these things."

Bernhard said this idea of the triple bottom line can be applied to many different industries, from agriculture to architecture, even to modern medicine.

In the field of agriculture, he mentioned the idea of community supported agriculture (CSA) programs, which are a rising trend in the Pioneer Valley. In this business model, local farms grow organic produce and sell shares of their crops to consumers. This practice helps the earth by not using chemicals that can harm the environment, and greatly reduces the amount of traveling

See SUSTAINABLE on page 3

Award-winning rap artist Jay-Z is scheduled to perform at the Mullins Center on Oct. 25. Tickets are available at the Mullins Center box office or at Livenation.com. Presale tickets went on sale Tuesday, Sept. 8 and will continue until Thursday, Sept. 10 at 10 p.m. Look for more information in tomorrow's paper.

Scientists test bacterial cells

By Robert S. Boyd
McClatchy Newspapers

WASHINGTON — Scientists are beginning a large-scale effort to identify and analyze the vast majority of cells in or on your body that aren't of human origin.

Only about 10 percent of the trillions of cells that make up a person are truly human, researchers say. The other 90 percent are bacteria, viruses and other microbes swarming in your gut and on your skin.

"We really are a superorganism," Brett Finlay, a microbiologist at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver, said in an e-mail. "From the moment we are born until we die, we live in a symbiotic relationship with our microbes."

"At birth, babies emerge from a sterile environment into one that is laden with microbes," said Laurie Comstock, a microbiologist at Harvard Medical School in Boston, Mass. "The infant's intestines then rapidly become home to one of the densest populations of bacteria on Earth."

Most of these microbes are harmless, researchers say. Many are necessary to life and health. A troublesome minority, however, can cause everything from teenage acne and obesity to autism and cancer.

The National Institutes of Health has launched a $115 million, five-year project to identify, analyze and catalog hundreds of microbial species resident in or on the human body.

Called the Human Microbiome Project, it's modeled after the Human Genome Project, which decoded most of the human genes in the 1990s. The first 35 microbiome

See MICROBES on page 5

Military seeks canines for soldiers

By Alan Bavley
McClatchy Newspapers

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Can a canine companion soothe the volatile emotions of a soldier haunted by post-traumatic stress disorder?

It may sound far-fetched, but the Department of Defense wants to find out.

It's spending millions of dollars on medical research projects like this that may yield groundbreaking results but are too speculative for other government agencies to consider.

So the Defense Department is financing a $300,000 study that will pair soldiers returning from Iraq and Afghanistan with dogs trained to sense when their masters are about to have a panic attack and give them a calming nudge or nuzzle.

These psychiatric service dogs have been assisting people with a variety of mental illnesses since the late 1990s. About 10,000 such dogs are now in use.

News, but preliminary, research suggests that the dogs may be particularly helpful for persons with PTSD.

And that has the military interested.

"It's a powerful intervention. We expect a very large effect," said research psychologist Craig Love.

Love will be conducting the study at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center with Joan Esnayra, founder of the Psychiatric Service Dog Society.

The two researchers presented their work last week during a military health research conference in Kansas City. The meeting featured the findings of more than 300 researchers sponsored by the Defense Department.

Love and Esnayra brought two service dogs with them, stunning Rhodesian Ridgebacks that drew the attention of many people at the conference.

"Absolutely beautiful animals. Very well-behaved," said Chris Kornkven, a Gulf War veteran from Helenville, Wis., who stopped to pet the dogs.

"They seemed like they would be really helpful, particularly for individuals living alone," said Kornkven, who has PTSD. "I think (a service dog) would give them some independence."

People who use psychiatric service dogs have the same legal rights as those with seeing Eye dogs to take their dogs into restaurants, buses or other places where animals usually aren't allowed.

The dogs can serve their owners in several ways. For example, they can sense when someone with bipolar disorder is becoming manic and give an alert by barking or nuzzling. The dogs also can provide a reality check to people experiencing hallucinations; if the dog doesn't react to voices, it's assurance that no one else is in the room.

Love and Esnayra surveyed 39 people with PTSD who were teamed with psychiatric service dogs.

Eighty-two percent reported having fewer PTSD symptoms since they've had the dogs, and 40 percent said they were using fewer medications.

"The longer the team had been together, the more likely they were reducing symptoms and medications," Esnayra said.

But the researchers said they'd often faced skepticism from the scientific community about the value of the dogs.

"It's too touchy-feely," Esnayra said.

That didn't deter the Defense Department.

"Sometimes the scientific community is conservative," said Capt. E. Melissa Kaime, director of the Defense Department's Congressionally Directed Medical Research Programs.

"Where there's a good idea but not much data, we're willing to take a risk."

When the department sends applications for research grants to its review panels, it deliberately leaves out the names of the scientists and their institutions so decisions are based on the merits of their proposals and not their reputations.

Ten soldiers with PTSD will receive a psychiatric service dog and profes-

See CANINE on page 5

ARTS & LIVING

Bonnaroo Brightens

A host of students enjoyed activities at this year's Bonnaroo Festival.

SEE PAGE 7

SPORTS

Fumble-free roster

UMass lost Liam Coen to graduation, but there are plenty of seniors on the 2009 roster to help fill the void.

SEE PAGE 12

EDITORIAL & OPINION

According to Mathew M. Robare, the conditions of the bathroom are terrible, and he wants the rest of campus to know that there is no need to leave toilets looking like the swamp monster used them last.

SEE PAGE 6

DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Log on to the revamped DailyCollegian.com for all new features, including exclusive video from Matisyahu's surprise concert in Northampton.

SEE PAGE

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIX
ISSUE 2

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF William McGuinness
MANAGING EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
BUSINESS MANAGER Daniel Jette
PRODUCTION MANAGER Michael Sarkis
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Kirsten Swenson
ADVERTISING MANAGER Michael Tortorici
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Matt Dettmer
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Shivna Murphy
COMICS EDITOR Annie Kauthline
EDITORIAL EDITOR Nick O'Malley
NEWS EDITOR Nick Bush
SPORTS EDITOR Jeffries R. Larnard
WEB EDITOR Brian Wood
PHOTO EDITOR Matthew Harrison
IT MANAGER Victor Jacek
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Matt Zolnierz
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Jacinto
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Norman Provost
CLASSIFIED MANAGER Katelyn Tamilio
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Justin Gagnon
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Elese Horowitz
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Cal Scannell
ASSISTANT COMICS Andrew Wirtz
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Michael Phillis
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Hannah Nelson
ASSISTANT NEWS Samuel Butterfield
ASSISTANT NEWS Alissa Creamer
ASSISTANT NEWS Jenn Heshion
ASSISTANT SPORTS David Brusch
ASSISTANT SPORTS Mike Gillmeister
ASSISTANT SPORTS Adam Miller
ASSISTANT PHOTO Maxwell Sparr
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA Chris Shores

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS FALL AND SPRING SEMESTERS. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALADY LIFE, BECAME THE HATCHET SOON AFTER, THE MASSACHUSETTS COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL ATTENDANTS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Kirsten Swenson

COPY EDITOR
Elizabeth Tran

PRODUCTION TEAM
Michelle Abbasciano

your week ahead on DAILY COLLEGIAN

MONDAY
NEWS
News Editor William McGuinness sits down with Chancellor Robert Holub and talks about the University's future in economic crisis.

MONDAY
EDITOR
News Editor William McGuinness sits down with Chancellor Robert Holub and talks about the University's future in economic crisis.

MONDAY
ARTS
News Editor William McGuinness sits down with Chancellor Robert Holub and talks about the University's future in economic crisis.

MONDAY
NEWS
News Editor William McGuinness sits down with Chancellor Robert Holub and talks about the University's future in economic crisis.

Students get help despite drug abuse

By Mason Watson
MANAGING NEWS EDITOR

The College of William and Mary has joined a growing number of universities offering medical amnesty for both drugs and alcohol.

At the start of the school year, students seeking help for medical emergencies caused by illegal drug use no longer face disciplinary consequences from the Dean of Students Office for violating the College's alcoholic beverage or drug policies.

While students at the College will not face disciplinary action if they invoke medical amnesty, they may still suffer consequences including required counseling and drug and alcohol education. Similar to the College's alcohol amnesty policy, students must invoke amnesty "proactively," according to the language of the policy. Students cannot ask for amnesty after having been caught. The policy does not apply to the William and Mary and Williamsburg Police Departments.

Medical amnesty policies for drugs and alcohol have been implemented on college campuses throughout the United States. Other universities offering full drug and alcohol amnesty include the University of Ohio, Brown University, Vanderbilt University and the California Institute of Technology.

The University of Virginia and Duke University provide medical amnesty solely for cases involving alcohol use.

Achieving full drug amnesty has been a long-term goal of student government at the College, according to Student Assembly Vice President Ryan Ruzic, J.D. '10.

"It's something that the Student Assembly's been pushing for a long time," Ruzic said. "It's a really great idea because otherwise students wouldn't get the medical help they need for fear of being punished by the university."

Ruzic believes that drug amnesty makes sense for the same reason as alcohol amnesty: student safety.

"It's a very common sense expansion of the alcohol amnesty," he said.

According to Ruzic, there was little opposition to full drug amnesty in the SA, though some senators asked if full medical amnesty might send the wrong message. "There were some in the SA who were reluctant to extend amnesty because they viewed it as condoning that sort of behavior," Ruzic said. Nevertheless, the SA legislation urging the administration to adopt full medical amnesty passed unanimously this April.

This most recent, successful initiative was passed after discussions between SA members and the

See WILLIAM on page 4

The College of William and Mary is located in Williamsburg, Va. The college's administration recently decided to

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT
REGISTRATION FOR Fall 2009

The Writing Program Placement Test
will be offered on:

Wednesday, Sept. 9, at 6:00 pm in Bartlett 202

You must take this exam to qualify for enrollment in EnglWrit112 (College Writing).

This test may be taken only once.

Students do not need to register for the test.

'Racism alive and well' in Mass., according to Vassell supporters

Protestors in Northampton demand the dropping of Jason Vassell's charges during his hearing at the Hampshire County courts on Aug. 6.

Hannah McGoldrick can be reached at hmcgoldr@student.umass.edu

JUSTICE from page 1

In the ACLU newsletter Rose said, "This case raises serious questions about racial bias. It's bad enough that Jason Vassell had to endure racial slurs and a violent attack from intruders in his dormitory, and it's very hard to understand why he now faces far more serious charges than the two white assailants he defended himself against."

The Committee for Justice for Jason discussed how they would like to see the UMass community and American society at large change in the wake of Vassell's case and Gates' arrest. "[We] would like for everyone's peace and worth as humans to be valued the same, be they black, white, brown, male, female, queer, trans, gay, straight, young, middle-aged, elderly, rich, middle-class, poor, homeless, differently abled, and regardless of occupation, religious or political background. Hate crimes take place against people of all stripes, and they are equally reprehensible in every form and manifestation."

Budget simulation tool made in Colorado

By Aaron Montoya
MANAGING NEWS EDITOR

Think you've got what it takes to play governor? Ever wanted to balance the state budget yourself?

Now anyone can, online, with a simulation tool called the Colorado Backseat Budgeter, developed by Colorado State University's Bighorn Leadership Program.

The program allows users to try their own hand at balancing Colorado's estimated $750,000 deficit by increasing or decreasing state funding and taxes as they see fit. Once complete, user data is actually forwarded to the Colorado Gov. Bill Ritter's office so he can get an idea of what Coloradans' budget priorities might be.

"It could be a very useful tool for the public to provide input to the Governor's office as we continue to keep the budget balanced," Ritter spokesman Evan Dreyer said.

Describing the budget-balancing simulation as a "significant challenge," the tool's website states, "The point of the simulation is to understand the budget better and to communicate the priorities (of users) to policymakers."

Those who aren't well versed in the state funding issues can read the brief background information provided by the website and get up to speed to make some fake tough decisions, and those who feel they do understand Colorado's fiscal situation can jump right in.

"This web tool will really bring home the challenge that government officials face right now," Dreyer said.

He cited Ritter's decision to cut $1.8 billion and 300 positions from the budget since last fall as examples of the tough choices the governor's office has to make.

The simulation purportedly puts the user in the driver's seat of Colorado's budget decisions, but it doesn't actually confront users with the entire budget.

"This version of the Budgeter focuses on Colorado's General Fund – which is the major pool of money that the governor and legislators control. Other funds include cash and federal funds," the site states.

But, users are faced with working within several legal restrictions that make balancing the budget more complex.

Those provisions include the Taxpayer's Bill of Rights, or TABOR, which requires legislators to bring any tax or revenue increase before the people for a vote, Amendment 23, which requires a certain percentage increase in spending on K-12 education each year and the Gallagher Amendment, which restricts revenue on property taxes.

The Backseat Budgeter was originally commissioned by the BLDP as a tool to engage its participants and alumni with the hope of empowering them by allowing them to make the same decisions as actual policymakers, said Brenda Morrison, the director of the BLDP.

And though the site was not created with the intent to produce empathy for the governor and lawmakers, the obstacles and restrictions users must contend with might do just that, Morrison said.

"I think it's good for the public to understand the challenge of public servants at this time," Morrison said.

Morrison said the site launched sometime last winter or early this spring, but she said she suspects there "may be more interest in it now during the current budget position."

"It's probably a good idea. I don't know if it'll have a huge impact," political science professor John Strayer said.

He predicted that the tool might only be of interest to those who are already knowledgeable about the budget issues.

"Mostly what the site does is remind us that there are few options thanks to the complete mess we've made of our fiscal policies in Colorado," Strayer said. "It's a train wreck."

Seth Walter, the former director of legislative affairs for CSU student government, had some feedback for the Associated Students of CSU after testing out with the simulation.

"I think it'd be healthy and extremely useful for ASCSU members to get an idea of what they're facing at the state capitol," Walter said.

As for his opinion of the tool, Walter called it like he saw it.

"[It's] a healthy exercise in how bad [Colorado's budget situation] actually is," he said.

Binge drinking tied to smoking relapses in college students

By Zach Quiñones
MANAGING NEWS EDITOR

Researchers are looking into the effects of binge drinking to see if any of the effects might potentially cause college students to revert back to smoking or enjoy smoking more while intoxicated.

The Texas Tech University Department of Psychology is researching the effects of binge drinking to identify reasons why college students relapse back into smoking and whether it impacts a person's urge to smoke.

The originator of the study is Joseph VanderVeen, a Ph.D student in clinical psychology.

The motivation behind the study stemmed from VanderVeen's master's degree project, which focused on impulsivity influencing relapse.

Researchers are looking for participants to take part in the study.

Associate professor and Director of Clinical Training Lee Cohen considered the study appropriately timed and necessary.

The research involves an area that's been understudied, he said, because most impulsivity studies focus primarily on alcohol and not necessarily with smoking.

Tully Brown, a senior history major from Rule, Texas, also considered the study valuable.

"People always say, 'I only smoke when I drink.'" he said. "So it sounds like a good study."

In order to qualify, participants must meet certain requirements: He or she must be a daily smoker who smokes more than 12 cigarettes every day, has had five or more drinks in less than two hours, three or more in the last month or has not done this in the last year. And he or she must be between the ages of 18 and 25.

Selected participants will be asked to come to an initial screening session and asked questions about personality, substance use history including current use and mood. Following the questions, there will be two one-hour experimental sessions to measure emotional responses to photographic pictures.

Participants will receive up to $10 after completing the study.

"The goal is to come up with a smoking prevention program to help smokers quit or not further their behavior," VanderVeen said.

He said this is the time when college students between the ages of 18 and 24, who have the highest prevalence rates, either pick up smoking or become binge drinkers.

New course to discuss environmental issues

SUSTAINABLE from page 1

the product does, thus reducing pollution through vehicle exhaust.

In architecture, he said more builders are now seeking green building certification. Many contractors are now choosing building locations based on how easily solar energy can be utilized as part of a home's resources. Architects are also looking into more local forms of energy, such as geothermal energy, which can play a role in sustaining one house or an entire neighborhood.

He also mentioned that in the medical field, nurse practitioners are also being certified in more natural, or holistic health practices, such as massage therapy and Reiki, a form of spiritual alternative medicine.

Bernhard said that with programs like this starting all over the country, he is optimistic that in the long run, the practices of sustainable entrepreneurship can help maintain a healthy global environment.

"I think that ultimately, programs like this, whether they're academically oriented or not, are really going to have a profound effect on preserving the environment," said Bernhard. "I foresee some real changes in the way we think about food, health, building and energy use over the next five to 10 years."

Lucas Correia can be reached at ljcorrei@student.umass.edu.

Adage "sex sells" may not apply within the current economy

By Greg Burns
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

CHICAGO — Whoever invented the marketing maxim "Sex sells" must not have been thinking literally.

After more than a year of recession, sex isn't selling any better than anything else.

From Internet pornography to strip-club lap dances to Playboy magazines, business is hurting. The notion that sex would flourish in hard times has met its match in the anything-but-titillating details of gross domestic product and a 9.7 percent unemployment rate.

"Sex is equally susceptible to hard times as any other business," said Vladas Griskevicius, a marketing professor at the University of Minnesota's Carlson School of Management. "If you have only $20 and need it to pay for electricity, you'll pay for electricity."

The utility bills evidently have been coming due for potential customers of Playboy Enterprises Inc., which offers everything from hard-core sex videos to high-end apparel with the famous rabbit-head logo.

"In the past we've been pretty impervious," explained Martha Lindeman, Playboy senior vice president. "This time, consumers are watching every single dollar they spend."

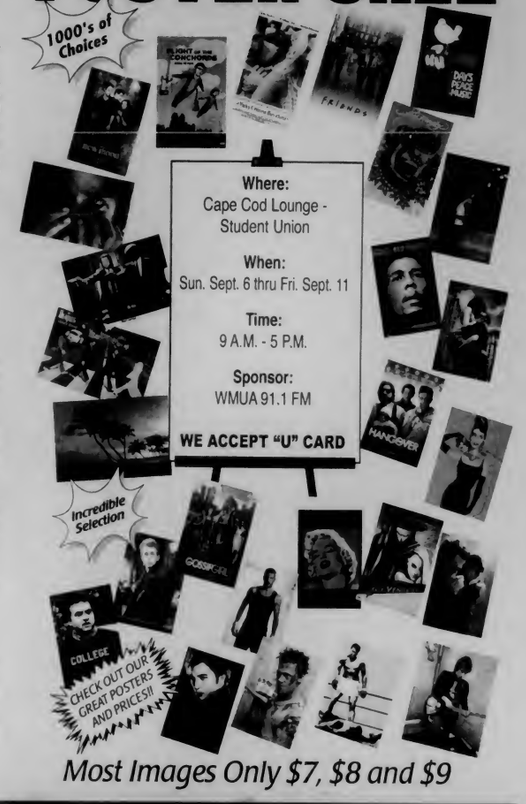
Even its best business — licensing the Playboy brand for clothes, fragrances, clubs and the like — has felt the heat lately, putting additional pressure on new Chief Executive Scott Flanders to stem the Chicago company's seven consecutive quarters of financial losses.

"There is a market for sexy, fun entertainment for adults, and I believe we can grow and compete successfully in that market," he told Wall Street analysts last week.

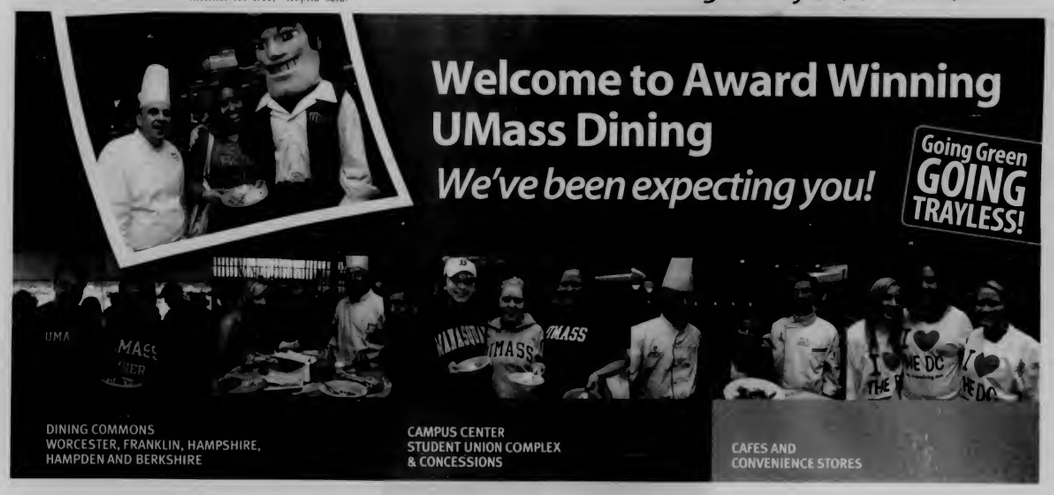
But it's tougher when even sex is losing steam.

At the recent Cybernet Expo show for the online porn trade, attendance was up, but sponsorships, parties and dinners were all cut back from prior years, in keeping with an industry under stress, noted Jay Kopita, its director of operations.

A gasping economy has aggravated the biggest problem in the Internet sex biz: the piracy of copyrighted content from pay sites.



"People are looking to get whatever they can on the Internet for free," Kopita said. "They aren't spending money like they used to."



News reports in recent months have highlighted the financial troubles of legal brothels in Nevada and strip clubs in Florida, where dancers accustomed to making $350 to $400 a night are collecting less than half that.

Under the headline "Sex doesn't sell in Whittier," California's San Gabriel Valley Tribune editorialized about an adult-themed shop that had prompted local protests when it opened a year ago. It recently shut down for lack of business, proving that "the laws of economics" are working to enforce community standards, the paper said.

The same laws apply to condoms too. Chicago data service Information Resources Inc. reports that since July 2008, dollar sales of male contraceptives have fallen about half of 1 percent in supermarkets, drugstores and mass merchants, though the smaller categories of over-the-counter female contraceptives and sexual enhancement devices have seen an uptick.

See SALES on page 4

Continuous dining from 7am to midnight*
Fifteen World Cuisine options
Grab-n-Go and Breakfast-on-the-Run
Create your own stir fry and noodle bowl stations
Stealth Health Program
Weekly theme specials including Guest Chef Series, Restaurant Night, and Lobster Night
Sustainable Seafood
Sushi Bar and Dim Sum Brunch
Kosher Dining at Franklin DC · Halal Dining at Worcester DC
Five College Meal Exchange Program
Free nutritional consultation with our registered licensed dietitian
*Berkshire DC Monday through Thursday

Bluewall Eatery
Bluewall Café
Marketplace Café
Starbuck's Cart
Hatch Food Court
Mullins Center and Outdoor Concessions
Café Talesi Thai Cuisine
Pita Pit serving pita sandwiches at 4 locations
Star Ginger by Lemon Grass Restaurant
Famous Famiglia Pizza at 2 locations
French Meadow
Recreational Center Café

Southwest Café
Whitmore Café
Herter Hall Café
Thompson Hall Café
The Procrastination Station at the W.E.B. Du Bois Library
Mulllins Café
Worcester C-Store with groceries
Franklin C-Store
Hampden C-Store
Mini Store at the Student Union
UMass Concessions

UMASS DINING
UMassAmherst
umassdining.com
LOCAL HERO
FoodManagement's BEST CONCEPTS
IVY
RESIDENTIAL
YCMP

Colleges promise medical amnesty

WILLIAM from page 2

...College's medical amnesty policy.

"I don't think [full medical amnesty] would have been enacted this year on its coming years without the SA," Brown said. "[Dean Gilbert] hasn't been working ahead it until we came to him."

The new policy is something of a triumph for the SA. According to Brown, the SA is often hindered by its lack of influence in the administration.

"It's really frustrating not having any authority to change things at the school," he said. "Most of the bills like that don't actually change the policy because we don't have authority over student conduct." Neither Ruzic nor Brown foresee the policy having an immediate effect.

According to Ruzic, a student at the College has not died of a drug overdose in at least the past two years. The policy is nonetheless a significant achievement.

"We've done all we can in the policy because it's extended to where it covers pretty much everything," Ruzic said. "Going to full amnesty from limited amnesty certainly puts William and Mary on the forefront of drug policy."

Dean Gilbert could not be reached for comment.

Economic downturn keeps industry at bay

SALES from page 3

Of course selling sex and sex-related products differs from using sex to sell as the hamburger industry can attest.

Burger King, Carl's Jr. and Hardee's all have turned to suggestive advertising lately. A risque TV spot about inappropriate nicknames for Hardee's new sugar-coated biscuit holes led to an angry complaint from one of its largest franchisees.

Minnesota's Griskevicius considers such marketing efforts misguided, no matter how desperate the competition for sales.

Research shows that men respond to sexual appeals in advertising, but only for flashy products that help them show off for the opposite sex, "like a peacock's tail," Griskevicius said. Trying to use those cues to sell burgers and biscuits is "doomed to fail," he said. "Who buys fast food to show off? Nobody."

Hardee's said in a statement that it has no plans to shelve the ads, which air only after 9 p.m. and target a core audience for the quick-service chain: "Young, hungry guys."

Hugh Hefner, founder of Playboy magazine, made a fortune on selling his magazines. Today, sales for sex-related products are seeing the effects of the economic crisis.

Students at risk for H1N1

By Tony Pugh

WASHINGTON — Hoping to stop swine flu in its tracks this fall, U.S. health officials on Thursday advised university students, faculty and staff to "self-isolate" themselves in their dorm rooms or off-campus homes if they develop flulike symptoms.

College students are a high-risk group for the 2009 H1N1 virus, which has spread to at least 168 countries after emerging in Mexico this spring. The latest data from the World Health Organization reports at least 182,166 confirmed cases and 1,799 deaths worldwide.

The new guidelines for colleges and universities issued by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention recommend that students and school employees not attend classes or come to work. During this time, they should also limit contact with other people, except to seek medical attention.

"They should ask a friend or a roommate to care for them by bringing them meals" and medication, said Education Secretary Arne Duncan.

These precautions should continue for at least 24 hours after the patient's temperature returns to normal or their fever breaks without the use of medication.

Duncan said students also should be vigilant about keeping commonly used items in their dorms and apartments clean, including doorknobs, keyboards and remote controls. University maintenance staff should likewise make sure that sinks, elevator buttons and classroom desks are kept clean," Duncan said.

Health officials also are encouraging colleges to keep sick workers at home until their symptoms have disappeared.

These precautions are similar to advisories issued earlier this month to employers and schools from kindergarten through grade 12.

Unlike the seasonal flu, which falters in the heat and humidity of summer, the swine flu has continued to spread, particularly among children. Day care centers and some summer camps have closed as a result.

The disease is expected to gain strength this fall, and college students are particularly vulnerable because they don't see doctors on a regular basis, Health and Human Services Secretary Kathleen Sebelius said.

Students feel the gravity of hard times

By Claudia Buck

When Paul McGinnis heads back to college in Spokane, Wash., he'll be packing more than his CDs, laptop and favorite sports posters. He's also carrying some newfound financial awareness.

Money's tight this year in the McGinnis family, and it's made the 19-year-old college sophomore think twice before whipping out his debit card for every little purchase. Earlier this year, his dad, Greg, was laid off from a 20-year job in the building materials industry, and his mom, Nancy, took a pay cut from her administrative job at Kaiser.

Everyone's watching the wallet, including Paul, who will be living in a dorm at Whitworth University.

"I'm going to be cutting back on the little things, like eating out when I can eat in the cafeteria for free, or going to the mall to buy clothes I don't really need," said Paul, wearing a T-shirt from the campus radio station where he is a disc jockey.

He's seen the financial impact at home and among his college buddies. Six of his freshman-year friends – from Montana to California – aren't returning because of financial setbacks in their families, he said.

To help out with the $38,000 tab for tuition, room and board at Whitworth, the Elk Grove, Calif., teen is contributing $5,000 of his own money, including savings from his summer job at California Public Employees' Retirement System.

As millions of students head back to colleges, they're facing one of the tightest financial worlds in recent years. College costs have soared, while job prospects dimmed this summer. And for many, their parents are confronting tough economic realities. The Bank of Mom and Dad may be running low this year.

It's hit home. Seventy-five percent of teen boys and 85 percent of teen girls are stressed about the economy, particularly paying for college, according to a recent survey by Bank of America and Seventeen magazine.

And no wonder. Total costs for tuition, room and board at four-year public colleges was $14,333 in 2008-09, the College Board said, up 5.7 percent from a year earlier. College costs have consistently exceeded inflation for the last few decades, the board noted.

With that in mind, here are some money-saving tips.

Financial experts – and experienced parents – say it's best to be clear about who pays for what. Don't wait till that first sky-high cell-phone bill to discuss spending limits.

Talk about money – what parents will pay for (tuition, rent, etc.) and what the student will pay for (social life, Starbucks, etc.). Also talk about what happens, and who pays, when mistakes occur, like overdrafts, bounced checks or late payment fees.

Bill Hardekopf, CEO of Lowcards.com and a father of three college-age children, recommends that parents use their credit card bill to explain the perils of paying bills late and incurring penalties. They should explain when it's a good time to use a credit card (textbooks, emergencies, plane tickets home) and when it's not (clothes, entertainment and burgers).

El Dorado Hills, Calif., resident Natalie Ebinger, who has two kids in college, said she didn't want them to struggle financially in college as she did. Ebinger and her husband started socking away $100 a month when their University of Arizona son and UC Santa Barbara daughter were infants. They're doing the same today for their 12-year-old twins, through a 529 college savings plan.

Today, the Ebingers pay all tuition, books and rent for their college students – and a $400 monthly allowance that "is theirs to do what they want." But unusual expenses, like overseas calls to friends studying abroad or a big shopping bill at Nordstrom are on their dime.

It's not for every family, but some financial planners recommend signing a spending contract. Bob Dreizler, a longtime Sacramento financial consultant, says he's heard "too many stories of parents resentful of their kids' college spending" or horrified by the huge debt accumulated by college graduation.

When his own daughter, Sonya, went off to UCLA a decade ago, Dreizler and his wife typed up a simple contract on the computer. It spelled out in basic, clear terms how much they'd provide every year for four years of college. Anything over that amount was to be paid by their daughter. If she needed more, they'd loan her the money at a nominal interest rate.

The contract didn't go over well at first.

"I didn't really like it," said Sonya Dreizler, now 29, "but in the back of my mind I knew it was a good idea."

It changed her approach to college, she said. "Once I knew I was responsible for paying for a good portion of my college, I applied for a lot more scholarships, the kind I didn't have to repay."

Dreizler picked up between $500 and $3,000 in annual scholarships and took part-time jobs. According to her father, she graduated in four years, debt-free.

And her parents' financial lessons evidently rubbed off. The English and Latin studies major is now a certified financial planner in San Francisco. As for that college contract her parents handed her? "It's something I'd recommend to my clients today."

Textbooks are often one of the biggest sticker shocks at college, especially for families in public schools who have never had to buy books. With new textbooks costing $100 and up, books can be a major budget-buster.

Students like Betty Lamptey, a California State University, Sacramento, biology major, have learned to cut corners. During her first semester last fall at CSUS, Lamptey said she forked over $600 for textbooks and supplies. Not anymore.

Now, she looks for used books online at websites, like www.campusbooks.com and www.textbooks.com.

"My chemistry book last semester was $150 new. I got a used one for $35," said the Natomas, Calif., resident.

Many college bookstores, including CSUS, let students rent textbooks online, instead of buying them.

College doesn't have to be a budget-buster if students are aware of what they're spending, Dreizler recalls that many of her Southern California college friends enjoyed unlimited spending accounts. Those who didn't, like herself, gravitated to gathering friends and entertaining at home, saving fancy drinks and dinners out for special celebrations. "And we went to the beach a lot, which was free."

Others cut back where they can. At CSUS, Lamptey, a 29-year-old single mother of four who commutes from Natomas, says she saves by parking several blocks away and walking onto campus. Instead of paying $150 a semester, "I walk in and get some exercise."

Should college students carry a credit or a debit card? There are two schools of thought, especially with credit cards. Some financial experts believe in starting early. Dreizler, for one, believes students should have a credit card while still in high school so they can learn from their mistakes while under the helpful eye of parents.

Others, like kids-and-money expert Janet Bodnar of Kiplinger's personal finance magazine, say college students should wait until they have a job or income to pay the monthly bill.

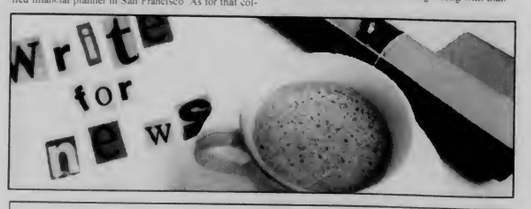
College students have an average of 4.6 credit cards, according to student lender Sallie Mae. And a recent study said the median credit card debt of college freshmen in spring 2008 was $939, nearly triple from four years earlier.

Starting next February, anyone under 21 must have a parent's co-signature or proof of income to obtain a new credit card. And companies will be prohibited from offering free T-shirts, CDs and other trinkets aimed at enticing college students to sign on the dotted line.

Students who are considering a credit card should look for one with the lowest interest rates, annual fees and best rewards. Use one of the comparison websites, such as www.lowcards.com, www.creditcards.com or www.cardratings.com.

For the bare essentials, college students need a checking/savings account with a debit card they can use to get cash withdrawals. They should use a bank or credit union with branches in their college town, so they won't get hit with out-of-network ATM fees.

Students discuss financial concerns, including how to pay for textbooks and how to handle the responsibility of personal banking while in college.



Students should consider signing up for e-mail or cell-phone alerts that let them know when the checking account is running low or a direct deposit has landed.

But they need to pay close attention to the terms of any account they are setting up, especially fees for overdraft protection and other services.

Above all, students shouldn't overly worry about the financial stuff. Mistakes happen. They can learn from them.

Harlan Cohen, author of the college advice book "The Naked Roommate," said: "Financial circumstances can be the same as a difficult roommate. It helps you to persevere, to reach out for help and to appreciate what you have. And there's nothing wrong with that."

Vita nova church
...life from the ashes...
naked church
a sermon series beginning september 17th.
Downtown above Stackers
10:30am and 6pm
www.lifefromtheashes.org

Make Yourself Heard.
Contact Collegian News Editor Nick Bush at news@dailycollegian.com.

Body bacteria examined

MICROBES from page 1

research grants took effect this summer.

"The composition of the complex microbial communities inhabiting the human body has a tremendous influence on human health and disease," said Richard Gibbs, a leading human genome researcher at the Baylor College of Medicine in Houston, Texas. Gibbs received a grant to sequence the genes of 400 bacterial strains by 2011.

The goal of the Microbiome project, which is international in scope, is to identify which microbes are harmful and to figure out ways to prevent or treat diseases they cause.

It's a bewildering task because scientists estimate there are about 1,000 different species of microbes living in the human gut and about as many more separate species on human skin.

The microbes form tiny colonies of bacteria that settle in different areas of the body. Jeffrey Gordon, a microbiologist at the University of Washington in St. Louis, Mo., likened them to "ecosystems," similar to those that plants and animals form on islands on Earth.

The most popular site for human skin microbes, surprisingly, is the forearm, which is home to 44 different microbial species, according to a recent study by Julia Segre, a microbiologist at the National Human Genome Research Institute in Bethesda, Md. The most barren region is behind the ear, where only 15 species typically settle, she reported in the journal Science last May.

"Hairy moist underarms lie a short distance from dry forearms, but these two niches are as ecologically dissimilar as rainforests are to deserts," Segre said.

Different tribes of microbes are associated with different maladies. For example, bacteria associated with the skin disease psoriasis favor the outer elbow, Segre reported. Eczema bugs prefer the inner elbow.

Microbes also vary between people. Matthias Tschoep, an obesity expert at the University of Cincinnati's College of Medicine, identified 383 microbial genes that differed significantly between pairs of obese and slender twins. Microbes in obese people harvest sugars and fats in the diet more efficiently than do others on slender people, he reported in Nature.

"It is possible that drug targets or drug candidates for the treatment of obesity could be identified from the obesity-associated microbiome," Tschoep said.

At a Conference on the Beneficial Effects of Microbes held in San Diego, Calif., last fall, scientists described many ways in which microbes can be helpful - even essential - to humans.

Bacteria in the gut make it possible to digest food, synthesize vitamins, remove toxins and develop the immune system after birth.

One of the new Human Microbiome grants went to Robert Modlin, a dermatologist at the University of California, Los Angeles, to study microbes lurking under the skin that cause 17 million Americans - including 80 percent of those age 12 to 24 - to suffer from acne.

"Success may lead to the development of new, effective therapeutic strategies for treatment of acne," Modlin's grant announcement declared.

Complex communities of bacteria in human bodies are being examined by scientists to unlock potential secrets to diseases and health issues plaguing people around the world.

Dogs may heal soldiers

CANINE from page 1

sional dog training, along with conventional treatment. A comparison group will receive treatment alone.

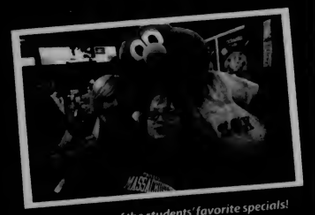
Every three months, the soldiers will take psychological tests and have their stress hormone levels checked.

The Defense Department funds combat-related work on such topics as Gulf War illness, traumatic brain injury and physical rehabilitation. But it also tackles research on childhood asthma, food allergies, osteoporosis and multiple sclerosis, among other maladies.

Advocates for various medical conditions have been pleased with how the Defense Department dispenses its research money. Illness survivors and family members are included on the panels that review grant applications.

"Congress has been impressed with how we administer our programs. We're very efficient," Kaime said.

WELCOME GUEST CHEF BRUNO WEHRLI from Las Vegas
Taste of Tuscany
SEPTEMBER 8–11 from 5–9 PM
• Tuesday, September 8 Worcester DC
• Wednesday, September 9 Berkshire DC
• Thursday, September 10 Hampshire DC
• Friday, September 11 Franklin DC
Sample Bruno's signature recipes at any of the above locations!
In partnership with Barilla
UMASS DINING UMassAmherst
umassdining.com



Welcome! Join in the fun and excitement presented by your Award Winning Dining Services!
First Week 2009
Welcome New Students! UMASS DINING

September 2009
umassdining.com
UMASS DINING UMassAmherst

Late Night Brunch
Thursday, Sept. 10 · 9 pm – Midnight
Worcester & Berkshire DCs
First Week 2009

Voted as one of the students' favorite specials!
UMASS DINING UMassAmherst
umassdining.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 2009

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
– Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The 2 'Fs' of UMass

Thomas Moore

In the words of my very own dirty door mat, welcome.

Welcome for the first time, welcome for another time or welcome for the last time. In this early issue of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, I hope to load first time freshmen and new transfer students with some tips, tricks and tools of the trade to make your experience here worth all those pennies.

Today as you read, we'll be covering the two most important "F's" that are on everybody's mind as soon as they step on campus: the facilities and the food. With two years of the UMass college experience under my belt, here goes everything.

It doesn't take a map to realize just how big campus is, but it sure will help when trying to figure out where your classes are. Because I study journalism and chances are you study something different, it is silly for me to share about specific buildings that a writer might be in, but not a biologist. One academic building comes to mind, however, that the majority of all UMass students will have spent some time in: the Mahar Auditorium.

Mahar 108, as it will read in your schedules, is the largest lecture hall on campus. It sits on Massachusetts Avenue across the street from the Robsham Visitor's Center and beside the Isenberg School of Management. Although it is labeled as room 108, Mahar is home to one lecture hall. The subsequent numbers refer to bathrooms and utility closets. But enough of the boring logistics, let's get to the meat.

Mahar is a desirable lecture hall to be in for three reasons. One, it's air conditioned. Some might wonder if this really is a big deal or not, but compared to a non-air conditioned lecture hall in Thompson that prepares oven-baked students quite nicely, it makes a world of difference. Two, it's large. You have plenty of room as a student to sit with a large group of your friends, or just hide as an anonymous person. It's very versatile. Finally, it has two back entrances that must remain unlocked.

These back doors are great for the inconspicuous late slip-in, or the early Friday afternoon getaway. Be warned of the former. When not done correctly, you will have 1,000 eyes at your attention, two of which hold your grade in their pocket.

It doesn't take a map to realize just how big campus is, but it sure will help when trying to figure out where your classes are.

Facilities are nice, but you won't make it there without some grub in your belly. Food is a proudly hailed subject here at UMass. Berkshire Dining Commons, located in the Southwest part of campus, is home to award-winning meals with more variety than an Asian supermarket (don't worry, I'm Asian). Most of it is delicious, some of it is healthy, but most importantly, all of it is edible. When compared to other college dining halls, this last point is a very important.

Most of you new students will be enrolled in a campus meal plan. You will learn in time that the different areas of campus with their prospective dining commons will have different highs and lows. I find that, although the food is phenomenal at Berkshire, finding a spot to eat at peak student traffic times can be stressful to say the least. I have found Worcester to be the quietest of the four DCs with many places to be able to sit alone to study while munching. Hampshire has the most televisions if you're trying to catch a game, but Franklin has the most open seating for large groups.

The things you will want to do to get the most out of your dining experience are to memorize what nights are special dish nights such as sushi or buffalo wing night in the DC. It's important to note that, if coordinated correctly, you can eat sushi or Buffalo wings every night of the week. You also need to find the Facebook group for dining commons that offer "late night," which is food from nine to midnight when other DCs are closed. Once you're a member, you'll receive the weekly menu for "late nights." This is crucial.

Finally, everyone on a meal plan receives special meal swipes that can be used at other places on campus such as the Pita Pit or The Blue Wall. These places offer yet even more food that is arguably more delicious. Although one may want to use them right away, my suggestion is to save them for the end of the semester when Dining Common food gets bland and finals demand a special kick.

Your stay here will be an amazing time and the facilities and food are just a fraction of the college experience. I encourage you to take this insight lightly, and to explore for yourself the actual depth of culture and fun that is held in the life that you now have at UMass. On behalf of the writers at The Collegian, the returning students, reigning faculty and selfless staff – welcome to UMass.

Thomas Moore is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at tjmoore@student.umass.edu

Fed/Up? Ed/Op.

editorial@dailycollegian.com

Potty training 101

Matthew M. Robare

To be perfectly, honest, I never thought I would have to write this column.

I thought all college students would be the responsible adults they're expected to be instead of the incompetent stereotypes as seen on TV.

But no, a few ne'er-do-wells had to go and spoil my pie in the sky.

By taking a dump on it.

That's right, my subject for today is the state of campus bathrooms. In a word, they suck. Full of low-brow (if occasionally and worryingly creative) graffiti, poor material conditions (some of the library bathrooms are missing stall doors), but above all the bathrooms contain evidence that a segment of the campus population was not potty-trained.

You all know, or suspect, about whom I am talking. The person who pees and poops outside the toilet, leaves toilet paper and paper towels strewn about the entire bathroom, does not wash their hands after concluding their business, and I dare say has been wearing the same change of underwear since high school.

This has got to stop.

Imagine shaking hands with a person who does not wash his own after pooping. It makes you want to vomit, doesn't it? Even better, imagine such a person accidentally eating some undercooked meat and catching E. coli. It would spread around campus like the plague and most likely overwhelm the medical capacity of the area. More frightening, suppose this person worked at a restaurant in town or one of the dining commons – just look up Typhoid Mary.

There is no excuse for someone not washing their hands with soap and warm water – except that, on this campus, both can be in short supply. This needs to change.

Now, some psychiatrists have suggested that toilet training leads to repressions and neuroses, which can be harmful later in life. This may or may not be true, but I don't care one bit. Human beings are not ordinary animals, we do not run free and wild in small populations spread throughout diverse ecosystems so that the spread of disease is limited and the mortality rate among the young is so high that anyone who lives to see 20 years is going to have one hell of an immune system.

There is no excuse for someone not washing their hands with soap and warm water – except that, on this campus, both can be in short supply. This needs to change.

No, humans are highly populous, highly social animals with relatively weak immune systems and a life style which has developed over thousands of years to isolate and insulate ourselves from the hardships of "free-range" living.

In other words, using a bathroom correctly might make you neurotic, but the benefits of hygiene, cleanliness and general health outweigh the costs.

At this point I would like to go on to subject number two: the graffiti.

It is of exceedingly poor quality in general; although, the second floor men's room in Herter has been rather interestingly decorated on occasion (two instances of intricate line designs, a chaos star, and some rather heated political commentary). But overall, the men's rooms on campus are havens of misogyny, crudely drawn and highly exaggerated sexual organs and a lot of references to the Wu Tang Clan.

I suppose it's probably asking too much, considering the materials available with which to work, but is it asking too much for a higher quality variety of bathroom graffiti? Proper spelling, grammar, punctuation and elimination of misogynistic and racist words would be a very good start.

Relieving oneself, after all, ought to be a pleasant experience and not one that makes visitors wonder if UMass is secretly a preschool with hormonal adolescents.

For an improvement in the skill level of the "poetry" found in campus bathrooms, I suggest the great science fiction writer Isaac Asimov, who wrote several books of limericks which would fit in with current themes. The UMass library has "Asimov's Sherlockian Limericks," "A Grossery of Limericks," "Lecherous Limericks," and "Limericks."

For those of a more philosophical or literary bent, I suggest investing in a copy of Bartlett's Quotations or similar books with more specific subjects of quotations. There's nothing really to do about political commentary, it's already a good side more intelligent than YouTube, blog comment or forum debates online. Godwin's Law, however, is in effect whether you like it or not.

It is my hope that with these two ideas of cleanliness and better graffiti in mind, our bathrooms will become the best in the state. We certainly do need them.

I neither like having to walk several flights to find a clean and empty bathroom, nor do I think that anyone does. So, the choice is clear: clean stalls with passages from Milton on the walls, or disgusting stalls covered in James Joyce. What will it be, UMass?

Matthew M. Robare is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mrobare@student.umass.edu

For 'The Rock of Boston,' it was time

Nick Milano

What are those clichés? Don't kick dirt on a grave, don't beat a dead horse?

But in the case of "The Rock of Boston," WBCN, its death should have been celebrated with an orchestral symphony of celebration. Unlike the classic New Orleans, La., funeral dirge, the mourning was unnecessary; only the dancing and upbeat music were fitting for such an occasion.

WBCN, despite the "alternative" music it played, was nothing more than a corporate monkey, stuck playing the same rotation that left too much to be desired. The death of WBCN is long overdue, but unfortunately, its demise does not bode well for the radio industry.

WBCN was not always stuck in the motions of a regular rotation filled with the same music over and over. Flip it on for the last decade and you would hear Red Hot Chili Peppers, Alice in Chains, Soundgarden, Pearl Jam, Nirvana, Nine Inch Nails, Rage Against the Machine, Beastie Boys and so on. Not to knock these bands they all have some great music – but when it is played over and over ad nauseum, it takes this great music and strips it of its entire flavor.

When WBOS 92.9 changed from a pop station to a more adult/alternative format recently, this made three stations in eastern Massachusetts that were all pumping out the same rotations. Turning the radio dial from 92.9 to 107.3 to 104.1 was nothing more than a futile attempt to maybe catch a second or two of a song one had not heard in the last week. New songs by new musicians were hard to find.

I thought there was a glimmer of hope when WBCN started playing Kings of Leon, but they stuck to the two pop hits, "Sex on Fire" and "Use Somebody," without exploring the rest of their catalog. The same thing goes for breakout artists Cage the Elephant, whose CD is impressive, but their only song played on BCN or the other stations was "Ain't No Rest for the Wicked."

With WBCN's passing, there is one less garbage radio station to get stuck with.

So, with WBCN's passing, there is one less garbage radio station to get stuck with. Unfortunately, its death was not the result of poor ratings, but an attempt by the station's owner CBS Radio to launch a new sports station to challenge perennial champion and sports talk behemoth WEEI.

Full of blowhard sports commentators, for the most part, WEEI has never really had a significant challenge to its dominance of Boston's sports airwaves. Clearly, CBS Radio ran the numbers, and the risk-reward for starting a new sports talk station in Boston, Mass. beat the projections that WBCN was due to make.

This means several things. First, CBS Radio realized that WBCN was not getting a large enough audience to deserve a valuable FM signal or that a sports talk station might generate more listeners. Maybe as time goes by, the corporations who own radio stations in large markets across the country will realize that the failure is not that another station might attract a larger audience, but that listeners would actually appreciate variety in the songs and artists played, rather than the farce of ads that say it does (seriously, someone should track down the KISS marketing agency and sue for false advertising on the grounds they claim to play Boston's most variety).

Anyways, radio is obviously catered to corporate interests and wherever corporate realm enters, similarity ensues. It's the endgame of what Henry Ford kick-started over 100 years ago with the assembly worker. Every Home Depot, Wal-Mart, Lowe's, Target and all the other big-box, corporate-dominated enterprises demand the cloning of stores and operations. How else would employees be shuffled around so easily? How else would skills required at a job stay at the bare minimum? How else would a downward loss of wages and benefits be enforced?

This sick, disgusting side effect of the corporate culture so alive and kicking in the United States was emblematic at WBCN. While some shows had independence (Toucher & Rich and Boston Emissions), the music played by the DJs was a set rotation.

From Toucher and Rich in the morning, who blasted WBCN's policy of forcing them to play music and choosing the songs for them during their morning show, and for the rest of the day, WBCN rarely strayed from orders issued from up top. It seems CBS Radio had a playlist it wanted, and 'BCN acquiesced.

KISS 108, MIX 98.5, WBOS 92.9 and WAAF 100.7 all seem to be in the same boat. It is just a blessing that there is one less station out there. The only independence seems to come from WFRS 88.9 aired from Emerson College. Its low audience share may be a blessing in disguise – it is exempt from the synchronization endemic among large radio stations and their owners. I thought I was going to miss WBCN, how mistaken was my first instinct when the announcement of its closure first aired.

Nick Milano is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at nmilano@student.umass.edu.

Memoirs of a parking attendant

Chris Amarosi

Last year, I found summer employment in a large alligator mascot suit. Seeking further experience in the field of sweltering discomfort, this past summer I worked as a part-time parking lot attendant. On Friday, Saturday and Sunday, I covered the lunch breaks of the full-time attendants, who worked 12-hour shifts.

My shift was one-third as long but was perhaps the hottest because their lunches came around noon. I wore sunglasses, but more to hide my rolling eyes as customers, air conditioned in cars chilled like mobile morgues, lamented about how ineffective their climate control worked against the sun.

It's like complaining to a eunuch that your condoms fit too tightly.

Incidentally, my boss offered his own son one of the full time positions. Despite being of the hardy European stock who boldly built our free market upon the ashes of tepees and moccasins, the son opted against a rare employment opportunity in a recession. An East African immigrant promptly filled the position. You never hear that sort of immigrant labor story on talk radio. But enough digression, into politically-charged polemic.

The average parking lot patron is an arrow-illiterate, pedal-smashing, foam-chinned SUV jockey who would be overwhelmed by the horsepower and acceleration of a big wheel. Each one is a lawyer who argues for the phantom constitutional right to keep and park cars. At will. Free of charge.

They stared at me with wounded expressions, gape-mouthed and vomiting incredulity at the charge indicated on a sign they passed before reaching me. They insisted that the charge was "new" whether it was my first day or my last week, that the lot was "always" free since Noah's fabled ark came to rest on the sacred asphalt. They argued that residents "shouldn't pay," though the selectmen they elected disagreed.

I wore sunglasses, but more to hide my rolling eyes as customers, air conditioned in cars chilled like mobile morgues, lamented about how ineffective their climate control worked against the sun.

Most people relented, perhaps grumbling a final protest as they grappled with their buttocks over control of their wallets. Patrons blur together in my memory because they all went through similar stages of grief in parting with the five dollar fee. The cretins to remember are the defiant ones. Each of them found a triumphant way to begin hours of futile searching for nonexistent free parking.

The first time I ever saw an Alfa Romeo sports car was the time one careened past my booth to flee a mere five dollar fee, which probably pays for more gas than it took for the car to enter and exit the lot. Sports car owners were paradoxically the cheapest people, often not bothering to stop while twirling a finger to indicate they were turning around or perhaps crazy.

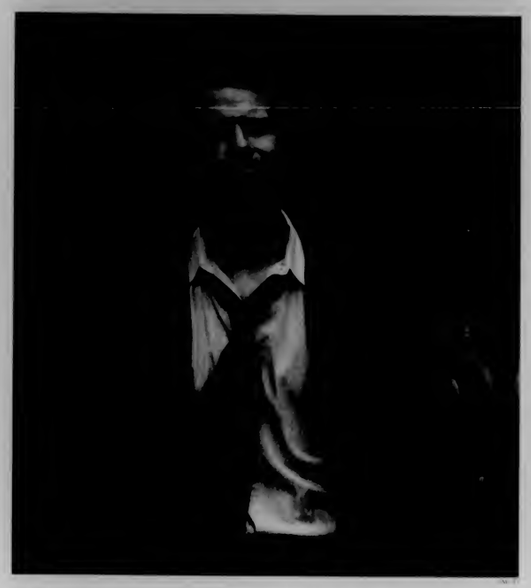
My favorite of my least favorite non-patrons was the Hummer driver who flipped me off as he drove by. It was as if the very King of Jackasses unsheathed his sword to knight me into the Order of the Moron. Shame on him who thinks evil of it, indeed.

As His Majesty completed the quarter mile arc required to U-turn his leviathan, I gave him a curt wave farewell. I immensely preferred such encounters to end succinctly rather than with drawn out arguments. Others before him argued the illegality of charging the handicapped, the elderly, citizens of the town, patrons of local businesses or the chronically obese for services rendered.

I did have one pleasant experience half-way through my tenure. An elderly couple travelled a relatively long distance to stroll the boardwalk without knowing there was a charge. When I told them the lot wasn't free, they were disappointed but refrained from petulant anger directed back at me. As they slowly turned around to leave, I decided to seize this singular moment to actually leave someone satisfied.

I ran after their car, waving my tickets until they stopped. Senior citizens of the town got free parking so I pretended they were locals and gave them a free ticket. They thanked me, and my heart grew three sizes.

I hoped recalling that happy time moment would soften my recollection of the whole experience, but I prefer to take a twofold lesson instead: stay in school until I'm more qualified than a ticket dispenser, and don't emigrate to a wealthier country with a car fetish richer and more fetishist than my own.



Chris Amorosi is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at camorosi@student.umass.edu.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 2009

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Ray Drecker, played by Thomas Jane on HBO's new drama series, pleases female clients and audiences alike. In an effort to provide for his family, Drecker looks to prostitution to put food on the table.

HBO's Sunday lineup heats up with 'Hung'

By Haley Navarro
Collegian Staff

It's the world's oldest profession, and cable TV's newest topic du jour Although prostitution is illegal in most places and frowned upon in others, it has become the subject of choice for many television shows and movies. Showtime has "Secret Diary of a Call Girl," about a woman who records her adventures as a call girl. But not since Deuce Bigoolo have we seen a mainstream effort to explore the life and travails of a male prostitute. HBO has changed that, jumping on the bandwagon for their summer line-up (alongside "Entourage" and "True Blood") with "Hung," a show about what its like to be a male hooker. The title pretty much says it all.

The main character, Ray Drecker, is portrayed by Thomas Jane, whose past credits include "The Punisher" and Stephen King's "The Mist." As a divorced high school basketball coach with two kids, the show opens with Ray suffering from a series of unfortunate events – including a fire in his house, his two kids moving in with their mother (a desperate Anne Heche) and the inability to make ends meet. Ray is a relatable character – Jane does an excellent job of showing Ray's soft side as well as his devotion to – and desire to provide for – his kids, which helps motivate him to become a prostitute. Because in the end, prostitution is always for the kids.

The show itself drags on a little bit. Because it's HBO, that means it has a green light for swearing, violence and nudity. Considering the show is called "Hung," most viewers probably expect it to be more smutty and less plot-driven, but that isn't the case at all. The nudity and sexuality are only subplots within the lives of Ray Drecker, his family and the other supporting characters.

After meeting a woman named Tanya at a self-help success seminar, Ray confides in her that he wants to start working on the side as a prostitute, and she agrees to be his "pimp." The character of Tanya (played by Jane Adams) seems written-in for comic relief – because although Ray Drecker is a relatable character, he just isn't really that entertaining. Tanya and Drecker's ex-wife, Jessiea Haxon (Heche) pick up the slack from the character of Ray. But Ray isn't supposed to be funny, so it's not that big of a flaw. He is just a single dad trying to fix all the mistakes in his life; prostitution seems to be the light at the end of the tunnel.

Tanya, on the other hand, is unbelievably scatter-brained, working as a temp at a law office and trying to find a way out of her situation. This is what makes her likeable as a character. As an audience, it's hard not to sympathize with Tanya's endearing persona or with the situations she's put in. Even under the most stress (for example, losing the partnership with Drecker), she stays in complete control of her emotions and still manages to keep a lightness to the character.

The first four episodes are mostly uneventful. They chronicle the life of Drecker and his encounter with many unfortunate events during one period of time; they also cover the back story with his wife and kids. Despite its slow pace in the first couple episodes, the writing is unbelievably clever and the situations seem genuine of those that might be experienced by an unlucky, middle-aged guy. The characters are really what drive the show. Once Drecker finally gets on his feet within his chosen side profession, it seems that the show will gain more momentum and possibly pull in a larger audience. Up until now, the previews for the coming episodes have been more monumental than the episodes themselves. But ultimately, "Hung," which airs on Sunday nights on HBO at 10 p.m. (between "True Blood," which airs at 9 p.m., and "Entourage" at 10 p.m.), is a nice addition to the summer lineup.

Haley Navarro can be reached at hnavarro@student.umass.edu.

Del Toro sinks his teeth into a new venue with 'The Strain'

By Haley Navarro
Collegian Staff

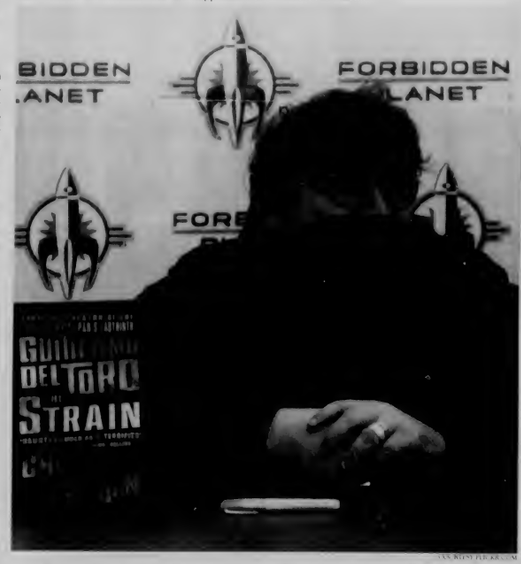
Within the plethora of angsty teenage vampire romance novels (cue the screaming legions of "Twilight" fans), enters "The Strain": not exactly the anti-norm, but close to it. Penned by Academy Award-winning director Guillermo Del Toro and Chuck Hogan, "The Strain" is the first book in the upcoming trilogy, with "The Fall," hitting stands in 2010, and "The Night Eternal," following in 2011.

Set in present-day New York City, an empty airplane lands at JFK Airport and to the surprise of employees, is completely quiet. Dead silence resonates from inside the plane and more eerily, it has no electricity and the shades over each window have been drawn. The protagonist, Dr. Ephraim Goodweather – or "Eph," as he is commonly referred – is called in to investigate, as he is the head of the Centers for Disease Control (CDC).

While the plot volleys between the current disaster at hand (vampires – but they don't know it yet) and the family problems between Eph's son and his ex-wife, Eph tries to figure out the mystery behind this airplane. But between forensics and common sense, it's unclear to the CDC how an aircraft full of corpses could've landed cleanly with no electricity. Even more puzzling is how so many wound up dead in the first place, and with seemingly no sign of struggle.

While different writers have different, revisionist approaches to the vampire myth (i.e., how one becomes a vampire), Del Toro and Hogan have crafted a new, yet fresh, idea that leaves the reader ignorant of the secret until all chaos breaks loose. The vampires, instead of being the traditional Dracula-esque bloodsuckers, are more like hosts for an ancient virus. Del Toro and Hogan challenge the traditional ideas of feeding, mental capacity and myth. In short: this isn't a love story.

The book caters to a different kind of audience: one that, although aware of the various other myths and methods, are forced to suspend their beliefs to accommodate the happenstances within the book. The vampires in "The Strain" are more akin to a vampire-zombie hybrid. Instead of having fangs to draw blood from their victims, as most vampires have done for centuries, they use a different method for feedings. Once they become a full-fledged host, they no longer have any mental capacity besides the need to feed. Traditionally, this is a classic trait of zombies, but zombies typically aren't choosy about what they're eating, as long as it's got flesh.



Vampires, on the other hand, prefer blood that's most commonly been harvested from the carotid artery on the neck. The descriptions of the hosts' bodies descending into madness (read: vampirism) are chilling. "The Strain" is written as if Del Toro and Hogan were imagining a movie: surreal and utterly informative. If this were made into a movie, which it probably will be, the screenplay would probably be a shortened version of the novel.

Since Guillermo Del Toro is no stranger to crafting superbly visual movies ("Pan's Labyrinth," the "Hellboy" series and the forthcoming "The Hobbit," among them), it is no surprise when the reader imagines a scene in an abandoned subway to be a little more real than expected.

Instead of having traditional chapters, Del Toro and Hogan divide "The Strain" into parts according to the plot. There are different sections for the description and search of the plane, as well as the back story of the legend of the vampire.

Overall, "The Strain" is well-imagined and executed, as well as effective. Without giving away too much too early, the story will leave readers guessing until the pivotal moment when all is revealed. W"The Strain" also provides an easy set-up for the second book. By novel's end, it's apparent that if New York City could be taken over in a matter of days, the world doesn't stand much of a chance. The following parts of the trilogy will most likely chronicle the spread of the disease, as well as Eph's fight against it – but with more force and knowledge.

Haley Navarro can be reached at hnavarro@student.umass.edu

Del Toro introduces the first installment of 'The Strain' trilogy in which vampires storm New York City. The creatures, more akin to vampire-zombie hybrids, are discovered on an abandoned airplane.

Bonnaroo bonanza in the long-standing spirit of Woodstock

By Peter Rizzo
Collegian Staff

Forty years ago this summer, music and culture collided in the grassy fields of Bethel, N.Y., where roughly half a million Americans gathered for three days of "peace and music." The result was the zenith of the summer of love, the now infamous Woodstock Music and Art Fair, where bands were transformed into musical icons, where our nation's theme was channeled through a distorted amplifier, and where rock 'n' roll itself became permanently intertwined with the American counter-culture movement of the 1960s. In short, Woodstock's legacy has become a hard act to follow, as its numerous reincarnations proved with disastrous fires and disappointing lineups.

However, it is in this spirit that music festivals carry on, rising to prominence over the last decade. There is, perhaps, no better example of this feat than the Bonnaroo Music & Arts Festival. The annual event, held over the last nine years in Manchester, Tenn., has become one of the premier destinations for music enthusiasts, offering diverse lineups that have included everything from modern-day rock titans Pearl Jam and Radiohead, to hip-hop staples Kanye West and The Roots, to more recent lineups integrating comedians like Chris Rock, Jimmy Fallon and even Woodstock alums like The Band's Levon Helm.

The 2009 Bonnaroo Music & Arts Festival promised a revival of this ancient connection, channeling the spirit of the past while providing amenities akin to our current iPod age. Its overall effort stepped up this year with an even more diverse collection, which sought to expand the festival's musical palette while returning it to its jam band roots. The centerpiece of this was a heaping portion of the festival's headliners Phish spread over two nights and nearly six hours of music. While the newly reunited band proved the festival's biggest draw, they were not to be outdone by fellow headliners Bruce Springsteen & the E Street Band, Nine Inch Nails and the Beastie Boys.

Despite the anticipation for these acts, the biggest news as the festival commenced came with the announcement that the annual Superjam had been canceled, opening speculation that this would end the festival's popular presentation of once-in-a-lifetime musical collaborations. Though rather than uniting a few legends for a single show, Bonnaroo upped the cross-generational collaborations, a process that found Elvis Costello dueting with Rilo Kiley vixen Jenny Lewis, Snoop Dogg sharing the stage with Erykah Badu, and David Byrne accompanying newcomers, The Dirty Projectors.

If the first day was highlighted mostly by sporadic weather, Thursday night's attractions were met with even more varied results. The prediction ranged from bands that generated the high voltage of the day's lightning storms, to acts that were greeted with the same disdain as the evening's passing showers. Hip-hop artists opened the festival in full force with high-energy shows from newcomers, MURS and People Under the Stairs, who packed fans into a maze of bodies fighting to reach the oasis of the tents' rain-soaked awnings.

The night was uneven for the festival's young rock acts, with the biggest pressure falling on the shoulders of Massachusetts natives, Passion Pit. The group generated a heavy buzz throughout the scattered camp-ground benefitting from word-of-mouth advertisement that found them playing to the biggest crowd of the night. The young band seemed calm at the outset, with lead singer Michael Angelakos stirring up chants in his button-down shirt like a ring leader under a big top. Draped by their lighting personnel in the soothing pastels of pink and purple, the group's sound was similarly limited by a bland musical palette and seemed a bit outmatched by a crowd eager to get its money's worth.

Despite Thursday's uneven events, Friday brought much-needed relief in the form of bright skies, high temperatures and titillating rumors. Big Hassle Media, however, would neither confirm nor deny the biggest conjecture: that the living members of the Grateful Dead were present amongst the never-ending sea of tents, cars and over-priced vending options planning a surprise appearance. In response to the queries from the press, Big Hassle Media spokesman Ken Weinstein answered with coy statements like "the Dead are with us always."

Before the rumors could be digested, the meat of the festival's lineup had already commenced, leading off with a surprise appearance by Jimmy Buffet, who "made it through customs and immigrations" to join Ilo and the Coral Reefer Allstars for a mid-afternoon set on the red satin-dripped stage.

Animal Collective followed, running through "My Girls" and "Summertime Clothes" off their latest album, "Merriweather Post Pavillion." Mixing the art of the turntable into the traditional band format, Animal Collective's heavy electro sound fell victim to the heat, wilting under the burden of the sun.

The Yeah Yeah Yeahs were greeted by tumultuous applause, particularly for their eccentrically clad singer Karen O, who dominated the stage with her wild persona. Armed with an even mix of old favorites and newer tunes, the Yeah Yeah Yeahs kept things tight and upbeat, the new material benefitting from the atmosphere and energy of the afternoon affair. Wearing her signature K.O. studded jacket, the singer proved adept at turning violent screams into soothing "la la las" with whirlwind force, eventually demonstrating her ability to grasp a microphone without hands. The group later covered "Gold Lion" and "Maps," the latter morphing into an all-out acoustic sing-a-long.

The evening offered an overstuffed lineup that one needed a time-turner to navigate as soul-legend Al Green laid it down on the main stage, while rising acts Santigold and Grizzly Bear fought for fans against old hands like Ani DiFranco and Lucinda Williams. The dizzying atmosphere was perhaps summed up best by Bonnaroo veteran, Williams.

Bonnaroo bands have fans on their feet at annual festival

Springsteen and Phish rock the stages

BONNAROO from page 7

"I always love how there's so many great bands," Williams said. "I used to get frustrated when I couldn't see the other bands at the festival, now I sort of just hang out and save my energy for the show. So I can really admire anyone who can come here and stick it out."

Night began with festival-goers flocking to an evening set by Brooklyn's TV on the Radio. Fresh off their latest album, "Dear Science," the group led off with slow jam "Love Dog" before segueing into more up-tempo material, such as "Crying," and a primal rendition of their staple, "Wolf Like Me."

Hip-hop legends the Beastie Boys followed suit, coming out swinging while wielding classics tracks, "No Sleep 'til Brooklyn" and "Sabotage" like assault weapons on the sleepy evening crowd. On the later tracks, the emcees even trotted out fellow hip-hop legend Nas; however, both acts were left proving their live prowess for a crowd that was merely fighting for prime location for the first of Phish's shows. Despite working against the crowd, the Beastie Boys played a diverse set that featured the trio jamming through tunes from their recent album "The Mix-Up," while dipping into punk tunes from the group's earliest days.

Elsewhere, the alternative to the Beastie Boys was a career-spanning solo set from former Talking Heads frontman, David Byrne. Byrne placated the festival crowd with the set's second half dedicated to his former band. Clad in a pure white wardrobe, the singer was flanked by a group of matching gymnasts who provided the song's visuals, their bodies even forming human waves during the Talking Heads' classic, "Once in a Lifetime."

By Saturday afternoon, the Tennessee sun had begun to spill its unforgiving heat upon the masses, the extreme temperatures causing set difficulties and delays for highly anticipated sets like Of Montreal, as even those seeking shelter underneath the tents found little relief. However, like the bands, they had little choice but to press on.

Opening with fan favorite "Skinny Love," Bon Iver provided a strong show that found lead singer Justin Vernon hulked over his guitar, bellowing out notes with pinpoint accuracy, while his band provided a steady dose of rippling accents. Speaking about the festival, Vernon's approach differed from that of his peers in presentation but not sentiment.

"Sweatiness is what I'm going for, I just need to look as wet as possible on stage," Vernon joked. "But the festival thing, it's a different energy. There's less pressure because people aren't there necessarily to see you, and we can get away with playing our nine songs over and over."

Playing under a bright blue afternoon sky, Wilco led with material off its latest effort, "Wilco, The Album." Jeff Tweedy spanned the range of his career, integrating newer material with older tracks, with a particular emphasis on "A Ghost is Born"-era tracks, while guitarist Nels Cline brought the spark, riffing off solos from his chipped black Fender. Hardly stopping to banter with the crowd, Tweedy, clad in all black, offered up, "It's good to be back," as the group's lone sentiments to the gathered fans.

While musically the festival was living up to the glory days of old, it wasn't until Robert Kennedy, Jr., graced the stage that the event was given a proper political edge. Despite his "great faith in President Obama," the younger Kennedy raged against everything from deforestation in the Appalachians to pollution by America's coal industries.

"My children have been coming [to Bonnaroo] for six years, so this was a way for me to earn their respect," Kennedy said. "It is also an opportunity to avoid the worse environmental catastrophe in American history. If a foreign country did what these coal companies were doing, it would be viewed as an act of war."

Kennedy was greeted with a strong ovation for his sentiments and larger cheers when he invited all environmentalists to join him in civil disobedience over the government's lack of action. A lacking that thankfully did not translate to the rest of the day's acts.

Coming out to a distorted spaghetti-western soundtrack, the Mars Volta descended onstage with the outright intentions of baffling the crowd. After stumbling through "Goliath," the group powered through the opening gulf, settling down into a psychedelic set marked prominently by Omar Rodriguez Lopez's unique guitar showmanship, which dominated the band's mammoth sound.

If two hours of Mars Volta seemed overbearing, The Decemberists were close by, providing a soothing distraction to those not enamored by Mars Volta's spiraling insanity. Despite their melodic leanings, the Oregon outfit proved capable of stadium-sized rock, with tracks that found lead singer Colin Meloy and guitarist Chris Funk trading shrieking Black Sabbath-sized riffs.

Headliners Bruce Springsteen & the E Street Band played unopposed to a capacity crowd at night dusting off classics like "Born to Run," alongside odd requests from fans like "Santa Claus is Coming to Town." Bruce addressed the crowd often, thanking Bonnaroo for the invite to what he dubbed their "second festival appearance." On stage, the band performed without drummer Max Weinburg, but came complete with a slew of guitarists, backing singers, and brass instruments, thickening the sound for the football-sized arena. The Boss was loose and loud, playing songs with a stamina that would put most musicians to shame. Grooving his way through "10th Avenue Freeze Out," the Boss kept the audience involved with quick song transitions, leaving fans screaming for more even after the finale, "Dancing in the Dark," brought their set to its three-and-a-half-hour limit.

The marquee act was far from the last item on the festival's Saturday menu, as Nine Inch Nails and MGMT provided the crowd with reasons to extend their bedtime into the wee hours. In what lead singer Trent Reznor dubbed Nine Inch Nail's "last U.S. show ever," the 20-year old industrial act pounded away over cascading smoke, layers of lasers and raining glow sticks, while showcasing their off-kilter rhythms and shrieking guitars. The set was far from a greatest hits occasion, featuring cuts from their recent all-instrumental release, "Ghosts (I-IV)," as well as a startlingly bleak cover of David Bowie's "I'm Afraid of Americans."

M.I.A., among other artists, performed at this year's Bonnaroo concert in Tennessee. The artists ranged from hip-hop to rock 'n' roll to easy listening tunes, drawing crowds from every musical background.

Across the way at a smaller tent, MGMT's second appearance in two years was a significant departure for the young act, which showed willingness to break away from their traditional keyboard heavy sound. MGMT brought fresh material from their latest recording sessions, which was met with mixed reactions, but big singles "Time to Pretend" and "Kids" still proved the band's ability to rile a crowd.

By Sunday, the throngs of sleepy music fans needed a bit of an extra kick, something that was provided by the slew of hardcore and metal acts like Shadows Fall, Coheed & Cambria and Dillinger Escape Plan on the day's bill. The latter band inspired early afternoon mosh pits, as their singer imparted useful knowledge like "it's never too early to rock and roll."

Elsewhere, while Todd Snider was entertaining the crowd with stories of his own psychedelic transformation and missed football practices, Citizen Cope kept a large audience rapt with his simple R&B-influenced brand of rock. The afternoon also provided non-musical entertainment in the form of comedy shows from The Daily Show All-Stars and the traveling "Lebowski Fest," which found the movie's fans adorned as bowling pins and lovable side characters, all of whom fought their way into the festival's film tent.

However, the festival still provided a decent dose of rock and roll from acts like Band of Horses, Andrew Bird and Okkervil River. Opening up with "Plus Ones," Okkervil River's frontman Will Sheff showed his penchant for slow songs and straining his vocal chords. Across the fields and shopping stalls was Andrew Bird, whistling his way through a tight set with his clear singing and violin virtuoso-ship. Backed by swirling gramophones, Bird was determined to provide an old-fashioned feeling to his set, which was capable of both breathtaking quiet and mounting musical drones.

On the main stage, Snoop Dogg seemed at ease, if a few minutes late to his main stage evening set. Snoop proved adept at working the crowd at times using anything to get a reaction. This included numerous shout outs to the ladies as well as a tribute to deceased rapper Tupac Shukur, which came complete with a mini East Coast, West-Coast chant battle.

Even after almost four days, of music it seemed as though few attendees had left by Sunday night, most intent on seeing the reunited Phish for their triumphant closing of the festival. Armed with their signature light show and wild crowd, which brought everything from beach balls to inflatable octopuses, Phish jammed out for an extended time on classic songs like "Tweezer" and "Gotta Jibboo."

Phish proved a satisfying live act, with all four members showcasing their instrumental abilities, even welcoming Bruce Springsteen onstage to showcase his own. The Boss fronted Phish through a series of songs including "Mustang Sally" and "Glory Days," the band successfully proving that their personal glory days have not yet passed them by. And while the 2009 incarnation of the Bonnaroo festival might not have lived up to satisfying the ultimate wishes of the assembled Phish fans and deadheads, the festival had no shortage of surprises. And if nothing else, fans can take comfort that there's always next year.

Pete Rizzo can be reached at prizzo@student.umass.edu.

Because you always remember your first time....

Your first time to Israel!
Travel for free with other UMass students for 10 days during Winter Break.

Jewish?
18-26 years old?
Never been on a peer-tour of Israel?
Sign up!!

REGISTER ONLINE
ONE DAY ONLY!
SEPTEMBER 9, 12 NOON
www.israelwithisraelis.com/boston-community-trip

For more info:
Michal at michalb@admin.umass.edu
413-549-1710 x210 or 413-330-6164
www.umasshillel.org

This trip is a gift of Taglit-Birthright Israel.
CJP ShoreshIM Taglit-Birthright Israel

TRAVEL TO ISRAEL for FREE!!

UM returns healthy Stoll, Gould in 2009

By Steve Levine
Collegian Staff

Between a new coach, new players (or returning players who were out last year) and a new season, Massachusetts women's soccer coach Angela Napoli hopes the changes during the off-season will bring her team a different result than in recent years.

The Minutewomen will add midfielder Meghan Gould and forward Sydney Stoll back into the mix after missing last year due to injuries.

"I think Meghan and Sydney coming back will provide us with a great impact especially because they're both just itching to get back on the field," Napoli said.

Stoll, a redshirt junior, has a strong career at UMass so far despite battling injuries throughout her tenure. As a sophomore in 2007, Stoll started the first 11 games, and despite missing the remaining six games, she still finished second on the team in scoring (15 points, six goals).

Gould, also a redshirt junior, started in 13 of the 14 games she played in 2007 before getting injured. She finished with 14 shots – six on goal.

Aside from their returns, the Minutewomen brought in four freshmen this year including goalkeeper Emily Cota, defender Jess Howe, midfielder Meredith Fox and forward Jenna Goodwin.

"Jess Howe is a quick, speedy little player who I definitely see getting playing time and helping us," Napoli said. "She is ready for this level, and her experience on other teams backs that up."

Fox and Goodwin will likely see limited playing time, but Napoli believes that their presence off the bench will be solid, praising their athletic ability and vision of the field. Emily Cota will see limited time as well, backing up veteran goalkeeper Lauren Luckey.

"Luckey will have a great year," Napoli said. "She's training really hard, and everything looks good."

The success of this season relies heavily on the veteran players, especially after losing Tina Rodriguez, Amy Ballew, Vanessa Lima and captain Vanessa Patry to graduation. Offensively, the veteran forwards and midfielders need to step up. Junior midfielder Thereve Smith will play a key role in the Minutewomen offense this season.

"Therese really picked it up last year," Napoli said. "She was always a great player but also pretty reserved. Now I believe she is more dynamic and aggressive, which will help her and help us."

Of the players on the active roster, Smith was second in scoring (three goals) and assists (two) last year. The only other Minutewoman to score a goal (one) was senior Christina Adams.

Joining the attack this year will be junior Kelsey Anderson, who also plays midfield and defense. Although Anderson scored no goals last season, her contributions offensively did not go unnoticed. She was one of six Minutewomen to start every game, while picking up two assists and 17 shots.

Muka, a sophomore forward, played the second most time as a freshman behind Meghan Collins. Despite failing to record a point, Muka was frequently in the middle of offensive opportunities, registering 17 shots – 10 of which were on goal.

The freshman who made the biggest impact last season was Collins, who notched two assists, making her the only freshman to record points in 2008.

Rounding off the offense will be redshirt freshman Amanda Carvalho, senior Jacquelyn Desjardins, junior Ashley Hamel, senior Katie Ruggles who also plays defense – and sophomore Lauren Yelinik.

Last year's defense had bright spots, despite being out-shot by 97 goals. The Minutewomen recorded five shut-outs when junior Alyssa Visconti teamed with now-graduated defenders Rodriguez and Melissa Toulouse.

Napoli is looking for improvements on both sides of the ball for this year's team. UMass must also improve its away game, where it won one of nine conference games.

Despite questions surrounding the team and a new coach at the helm, the Minutewomen still have the same goal in mind, one that eluded them last fall: reach the Atlantic 10 tournament.

Steve Levine can be reached at slevine@student.umass.edu.

Napoli deals with fresh faces

Minutewomen bring in five freshmen after graduation

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

With a new head coach and new team strategy already in place, the Massachusetts women's soccer team is hoping new results will also come this season.

Former UMass head coach Jim Rudy announced his retirement in late May. Two months later, former UMass standout goalkeeper and assistant coach Angela Napoli received an offer to replace the 21-year coach.

Napoli said she will look to change the type of style the team plays this season to a more direct, up-field approach.

"Last year, I think our team got stuck where we were trying to 'possess, possess, possess,' no matter where we were on the field," Napoli said. "I would rather have us get a quick connection and everybody heading forward."

After having a decent first half of the season last year, which included a stretch of three consecutive victories, the Minutewomen (6-9-3, 3-7-1 Atlantic 10, 2008) lost their last five games in score-less fashion.

To make matters worse, the graduation of Vanessa Patry leaves the Maroon and White without its captain and top offensive threat from last season. Patry led the team in a number of categories, including goals, assists, points and shots on goal.

Nevertheless, Napoli feels confident with the team heading into the start of the season. Her only concern: injuries.

"Everyone tells me I shouldn't talk about injuries. It's only going to be bad luck," Napoli said. "After being here for four years, I know that no matter what, things are going to happen."

The Minutewomen might have already lost two players for this season in Meghan Collins and Amanda Carvalho. Both will be recovering from ACL surgeries from the spring, so Napoli isn't counting on seeing either on the field anytime soon. Alyssa Visconti was also diagnosed with mono in early August, but the time she will miss is still uncertain.

"It could be a problem for as short as a couple weeks, or it could be as long as six months," Napoli said. "I'd rather be ready for the worst and be prepared, but if not, then great."

UMass suffered from significant injuries last year as well when redshirt junior Sydney Stoll suffered a knee injury during a spring game, which caused her to miss the entire season. Meghan Gould sat out the year with a concussion in addition to a previous ankle surgery. Both will be back this season, which will give a big boost to the offense and will bolster the strength of the team.

The weakness of the team will most likely be the youth. The back line will be fairly new and inexperienced. Napoli also feels the lack of height on the team could cause problems in the air game.

"We have some [players] who can head the ball very well, but they will be going up against taller competition."

Napoli also mentioned that her team needs to play better against A-10 opponents throughout the first half of the conference schedule. UMass stayed in the hunt for a post-season berth. But after being outscored, 9-0, in the last five games of the season, it lost any chance it had of advancing.

"I feel like in the last couple years, we've done very well in non-conference play, but then dipped in the A-10," Napoli said. "I want to approach our non-conference play as building blocks for the game in the A-10.

The A-10 is top heavy this season with teams like Charlotte, Dayton and Fordham. The Charlotte 49ers were No. 25 in the nation last year and went undefeated with 11 wins in conference. After the top tier, there is a large group of teams in the middle of the pack that are going to be competitive. Napoli feels that the Minutewomen are poised to make a run for the A-10 Tournament for the first time since 1997.

"It will be a battle, and we'll have to stay healthy. But with how the conference is set up, everyone has a shot every year."

Despite low expectations, Napoli expects this team to surprise the conference.

"I think our kids have a lot of desire to prove themselves this year," Napoli said. "People are going to underestimate us, and our kids are fine with that because they want to show we're better than people think."

Jay Asser can be reached at jasser@student.umass.edu

THE BOLTWOOD PROJECT™
Serving others since 1967 — still making a difference
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)

REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Fall Semester 2009 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings if you have participated before
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Process running time!!)
Campus Center Room 101 • Sept. 14 (Mon) • Sept. 15 (Tues) • Sept. 16 (Wed)
• Assignment notification ONLY Thurs Sept. — Hdkwood table CC Concourse
No telephone inquiries. YES — [illegible] may be notification letter.
Volunteer, while earning credit!

HERE'S THE DEAL
Our used books must pass a 10-point, three-pronged, infrared, x-ray, cover-to-cover inspection.
HALF BACK GUARANTEE
Look for books with this sticker
UMass Amherst University of Massachusetts
University Store and Textbook Annex
Amherst Campus Center • 413-545-2619
www.umass.bkstr.com
Powered by efollett.com

Keeper situation remains undecided

M. SOC from page 12

[illegible] that this game exposed [illegible] to get away with it. As the season goes on, I'm not going to get away with that, so we have time to clean things up."

The Minutemen were the second-most-ranked team on the Atlantic-10 schedule, as UMass was supposed to play No. 17 Connecticut on Aug. 29. The Connecticut match was rained out, but the Minutemen played Yale to an Aug. 22 tie in a 2-1 win in overtime play.

"There were a lot of things we didn't handle [in a way the BU game] that's a harbinger for us," Koch said. "Our fitness level I think is ok, we have some fresh legs and you don't know what they can do yet and we got them some time."

Freshman defender Dominic Skrajewski started for the Minutemen against the Terriers, with Tyler Brown, Matt Johnson and Brodie Steigerwald getting solid minutes in their first regular season game at BU.

Against Adelphi, sophomore forward Chris Roswess scored twice in 21 minutes to lead the Minutemen to their first victory after the Panthers took the lead in the 63rd minute.

Koch has been impressed with the first three games, but feels that the team must execute their skills effectively but easily.

"We've got to play simple. A lot of times when we try to take the extra cuts, we try to turn when we shouldn't have turned, we have combinations that we didn't find, and we have to go over that."

The Minutemen will next travel to Burlington, Vt. to compete in the Morgan Stanley Smith Barney Classic, facing New Hampshire on Friday and Vermont on Sunday.

David Brinch can be reached at dbrinch@student.umass.edu

MATTHEW THORSEN/COLLEGIAN

Redshirt junior Sydney Stoll looks for an open teammate during the Minutewomen's home opener against Providence in their 1-0 loss.

UM scoreless in three games

W. SOC from page 12

both goalies, something she expects to continue doing.

"During practice it has been so close that during [our last game], we just decided to give them both time," Napoli said of her goalie situation. "They are both strong keepers, they both bring a different quality, they both are going to be able to make the big saves and they both may have those situations that one is better than the other, but going with two keepers, you're going to have that happen."

Neither goalie was a concern for UMass, as Cota made four saves and Luckey saved all three shots she faced, but the offense appeared to be.

Throughout the game, the offense was played through the wings, who attempted to feed the ball into the box hoping to set up a shot. The Minutewomen had success moving the ball up the wings, especially at the feet of redshirt junior Sydney Stoll, but Providence dominated the middle of the field, preventing UMass from getting open looks at the net and holding them to just three shots.

The three shots were an improvement from the Minutewomen's previous game, a 2-0 loss at Boston University, where they were outshot 30-1. Even in its first game of the season, the offense was lackluster as it put up just eight shots in a 2-0 loss at Holy Cross.

The Friars were also very aggressive throughout the game, especially on defense, often disrupting the Minutewomen on offense. Stoll was often knocked to the ground from behind as she tried to create some offense.

"Going into it, we knew [Providence was] one of the most physical teams we were going to play," Stoll said. "I knew it was going to happen but just wasn't really ready for it."

But just as the defense has shown improvement with each game after Napoli has focused on it, she is hoping for the same with the offense.

"It is just going to be part of the process," Napoli said. "I think just getting numbers up there, we're getting more numbers in the attack and it's just more keeping the ball and connecting it and then looking for our shot."

Despite the few shots taken, Napoli still feels she is seeing her offense getting more opportunities; it's just that those opportunities may come as a surprise to her offense after struggling to put anything together in the first two games.

"I think with our first two games we didn't get much success on the attacks and I think today when we actually got [in the attacking third], they were surprised," Napoli said. "Even though we've been working on it a little bit, I think it was just almost shocking that [we got into the attacking third] and then they got nervous and just lost their heads a little bit."

Jeffrey R. Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com.

Crazy about Sports?
Then come write for the Collegian
Contact Eli Rosenwalke
Sports@DailyCollegian.com

MERCYhouse
it's a church!
knowmercy.org
385 North Pleasant :: 1/2 block from Umass

Morris to lean on senior class

FOOTBALL from page 12

in playing both fullback and halfback could allow him to see more touches out of the backfield in his final season.

TIGHT ENDS

Senior Matt Silver leads a versatile group of tight ends and heads into the season as the team's top tight end after backing up Ian Jorgenson last season. He caught five passes for 122 yards, including an 80-yard reception against Bryant. Silver is an excellent receiver from the tight end spot and looks to improve on his blocking.

Backing him up will be redshirt junior Andrew Krevis, who caught four passes last season for the Minutemen. After starting his UMass career as a defensive lineman on the scout team, Krevis looks to see playing time when the team goes to duel tight end sets and continue to develop at the position.

Redshirt sophomore Emil Igwenagu is listed as a tight end but has seen time at fullback after moving from linebacker before his second year. While his position has been in flux, Igwenagu remains a solid contributor on special teams.

WIDE RECEIVERS

Last season, former coach Don Brown promised that his no-name group of wide receivers would become household names by season's end. And now, after blossoming throughout Coen's final season at UMass, the wide receiver corps looks to help anchor an offense that's still looking for a quarterback.

Senior Victor Cruz enters the 2009 season as a preseason All-Colonial Athletic Association selection after logging 71 receptions for 1,064 yards and six scores in his breakout season last year. Cruz, who brings both speed and solid hands to the table, is expected to return most of the kicks and punts for the Minutemen after fielding six punts and three kickoffs last season.

Manning the other receiver spot is 2008 third-team All-CAA pick Jeremy Horne, who was no slouch himself last season. Horne caught 50 balls for 895 yards and eight touchdowns. After transferring from Syracuse, Horne has developed into a major weapon in UMass' offense.

Also expected to make an impact as a wide receiver are senior Joe Sanford and redshirt sophomore Julian Talley. After spending time at quarterback and on special teams, Sanford developed into a solid possession receiver last season with 20 catches for 199 yards. Talley, meanwhile, caught the fifth most passes on the team last season and is expected to develop into a major component of the offense.

Other prospects at the wide receiver spot include speedster redshirt junior Torrey Esalomi and redshirt junior Aaron Fears, fresh off a solid spring season.

OFFENSIVE LINE

The first year starting for any quarterback is tough, but having an All-American left tackle in Vladimir Ducasse protecting the blind side tends to ease things. Ducasse, a co-captain for the Minutemen, is expected to be a 6-foot-5 330 pound anchor of the offensive line.

Helping him shore up the left side of the line will be redshirt sophomore Josh Samuda, who returns as a starter at left guard after playing as a freshman.

Redshirt junior John Inhe, who got significant playing time last year, is expected to handle most of the plays at center. But redshirt freshman Quinton Sales could play a factor after a solid offseason.

Getting the start at right tackle in the opener was redshirt sophomore Brian Ostaszewski. After starting three games last season (two at right tackle one at right guard) Ostaszewski earned the nod at the right tackle spot vacated by Ducasse's move to left tackle but could also play a factor at guard if injuries dictate. Also in the mix at guard is redshirt junior Brandon Flanagan.

Rob Getek, a transfer from Connecticut as well as a tight end, started seven games last season and looks to remain in the mix at tackle. Meanwhile, redshirt freshman Stephane Milhim will add depth and competition at the spot.

DEFENSIVE LINE

The Minutemen return three starters up front in seniors Kyle Harrington, Michael Hanson and redshirt junior Bob McLaughlin. Harrington, a preseason All-CAA second-team selection, will be charged with the task of clogging up the middle at nose tackle for the Minutemen. He finished last season with the fifth most tackles on the team (56) with 2.5 sacks and 3.5 tackles for a loss.

Alongside him at the three-technique will be Collier, who enters his fourth season as a starter after serving as a team captain last year. Collier saw a dip in production last season but looks to return to the form that got him 63 tackles and third-team All-CAA honors as a sophomore.

Like Collier, Hanson looks to rebound from a junior season that saw his production limited by injuries. Hanson, who racked up 61 tackles (7.0 sacks, 16.0 tackles for loss) as a sophomore is looking healthy after a solid spring entering his final year.

McLaughlin mans the other defensive end sport after a breakout 2008 season. He looks to maintain a bigger role on the defensive line from the end spot. Senior Anthony Monette, a converted linebacker, could see some time at the defensive end spot, particularly in short-yardage situations.

LINEBACKERS

When healthy, Josh Jennings is the team's best linebacker. Unfortunately for the Minutemen, the senior's back issues have made it questionable whether or not he will take the field at all this season.

Looking to pick up the slack with their defensive star's status uncertain is senior Kurt Filler and youngsters sophomore Tyler Holmes and redshirt freshman D.J. Adeoba.

Filler, a junior college transfer, heads into the season as the top strong side linebacker. He also brings a strong pass rush and ability to play all three linebacker positions. Holmes, meanwhile, will have the nod at middle linebacker after playing in six games as a true freshman.

Getting his first ever start at weak side linebacker in the Kansas State game, Adeoba burst on the scene, earning offensive rookie of the week honors after returning a blocked punt for a touchdown against the Wildcats.

Adding depth to the linebacker position are senior Eric Dickson, who may spend time at the linebacker or defensive back and redshirt junior Scott Duggan.

CORNERBACKS

With the graduation of last season's lauded cornerback tandem, the Minutemen have a huge gap to fill in their secondary and have a crowded field of suitors.

Heading into the season, senior Corey Davis, who started four games last season, was seen as a leader in a depleted defensive backfield. After being limited to nickel and dime packages for the past few years, Davis looks to move into one of the outside corner positions.

Also looking to break into the cornerback conversation are three former wide receivers in redshirt juniors Ke'Mon Bailey, David Cozzo and Warren Wilson, all of whom were moved to the position after last season.

Bailey has shown major improvement since moving to the other side of the ball, leading him to receive the starting nod in the season opener. Wilson, a Boston College transfer, enters his second year at UMass and, at 6-foot-1 has great size and speed for the position.

Cozzo, a transfer from the University of South Florida, joined the Minutemen after his freshman season and is now looking to break into the rotation at corner.

SAFETIES

While the position battle for corner rages, there is little controversy over who will be taking the two starting safety spots.

First, at free safety is Jeromy Miles. As one of the team's co-captains and a preseason second-team All-American, Miles is the best player on the UMass defense.

After playing his freshman year at Navy, Miles has started all 25 games he has been in since joining the team. And that time has hardly gone to waste, as he racked up a team-high 104 tackles, two sacks and three interceptions last season for the Minutemen.

Starting alongside Miles will be redshirt junior Shane Viveiros. A former walk-on, Viveiros broke into the lineup last season and played in all 12 games, starting two.

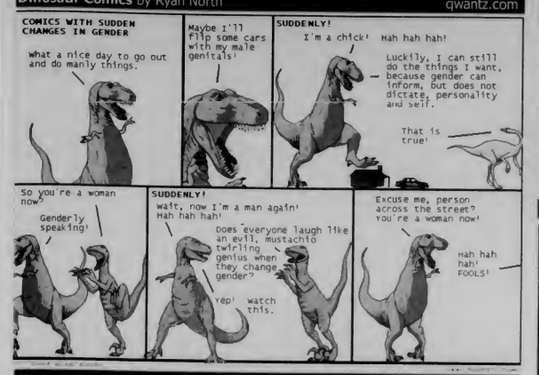
Also in the picture at the safety spot is redshirt freshman Kumar Davis. After having an exceptional year on the scout team last year while redshirted, Davis is expected to see time at the rover position and in certain situations.

SPECIAL TEAMS

On the special teams' front, the Minutemen retain senior Armando Cuko to handle the place-kicking duties while redshirt sophomore Travis Tripucka, a defenseman on the UMass lacrosse team, will handle the long snapping duties.

However, after losing Associated Press FCS first-team punter Brett Arnold, the Minutemen are in search of a player to handle punting duties. Woodward has done some punting on the side while in a backup quarterback role, but Morris has dismissed him as a permanent solution.

So, the battle goes down to freshman Jeff Strait, the frontrunner, or Virginia Tech transfer Caleb Violette. While Violette has a good chance to get the kickoff job, Strait remains the first choice at punter.



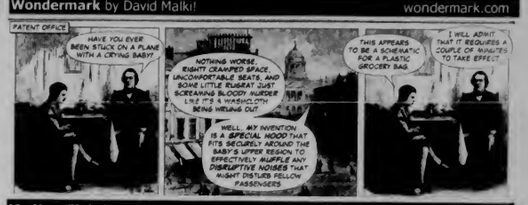
Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu.

JAY-Z
ROC NATION
THE BLUEPRINT 3 IN STORES 9/11
10/25/09
MULLINS CENTER
ON SALE FRIDAY AT NOON
BUY TICKETS AT LIVENATION.com
TICKETS AVAILABLE AT MULLINS CENTER BOX OFFICE
ticketmaster | CHARGE BY PHONE: 413-733-2500
PRESALE FOR STUDENTS
TUESDAY, 9/8 AT 10AM - THURSDAY, 9/10 AT 10PM • PASSWORD: MINUTEMEN
All dates, acts and ticket prices subject to change without notice. A service charge may be added to each ticket.
citi PRESALE FOR CITI CARDMEMBERS
TUESDAY, 9/8 AT 10AM - THURSDAY, 9/10 AT 10PM
For tickets, visit citiprivatepass.com

COMICS

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!
Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North — qwantz.com



Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub — chainsawsuit.com

Brewster Rockitt by Tim Rickard

Wondermark by David Malki! — wondermark.com

My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees — mnftiu.cc

Robbie and Bobby by Jason Poland — robbieandbobby.com

Calamaties of Nature by Tony Piro

Mr. Gnu by Travis Dandro — weepstrip.com

SUDOKU

			6		7		2
7			9
3						8	1
	8	3				1	2
9		2				6	5
							3
1		4
			7		2			4
				6	4

Quote of the day:

"I can resist everything except temptation."

-Oscar Wilde

CROSSWORD

ACROSS

1. Deficiency
5. Plod along
9. Donkeys
14. Look at flirtatiously
15. See the sights
16. An electrode
17. Adolescent
18. Bit
19. Donated
20. Undecorated
22. Happening
23. Sharpen
24. French for "Queen"
26. Paintings
29. Pressure
33. Suitable for eating
38. Dog of movie fame
39. Tribe
40. Pore
42. Initial wager
43. Jump over an obstacle
45. Senseless
47. Hardship
48. Bother
49. Governs
52. Sea
57. Displayed
60. Unforgettable
63. Delineated
64. Any minute
65. Lacquered metalware
66. Communion table
67. Part of an archipelago
68. Dolt
69. A state of high honor
70. Bottom of the barrel
71. Stetsons and derbies

DOWN

1. Egyptian water lily
2. Spy
3. Transparent
4. Japanese stick fighting
5. Mix
6. Diving bird
7. Not inner
8. Mark
9. Deep purplish red
10. Worldwide
11. Passion
12. Biblical garden
13. Dispatched
21. October birthstone
25. It's surrounded by water
27. Sell again
28. Explosive letters
30. Feudal worker
31. Seats oneself
32. Views
33. Reflected sound
34. Aspersion
35. One of 52 in a deck
36. Undergarment
37. A male cat
41. Missing In Action
44. Workplace where clothes are washed
46. A swinging barrier to a room
50. Electronic messages
51. Detect
53. Nab
54. Hemorrhagic fever
55. Apportion
56. Requires
57. Dross
58. Small mountain
59. Not deceived by
61. Blemish
62. 1 1 1 1

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Electronica is an appropriate soundtrack-du-jour. Don't knock it till you try it!

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
It's not about the size of your stimulus package, it's how you use it.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Need money? Sell your surpressed childhood memories on Craigslist!

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Deep within the depths of your imagination, Abe Lincoln wrestles polar bears.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
Today you won't have any trouble reconciling the many sides of your personality.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
It'll be easy to get too wrapped up in yourself today. Relax, guy!

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
Keanu Reeves just discovered emotion. We should all appreciate the little things.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Go back to Target and return your alarm clock. That's what UMass construction is for.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
Facebook is not the matrix. You are not "the one," and can I have my spoon back?

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
Don't fret -- there are less creative people out there. Look at Michael Bay!

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
9 times out of 10, the answer is pizza. The rest of the time, it's comics!

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
End-of-life planning is hard, but at least you'll be going green.

CLASSIFIEDS

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162

FOR RENT

Rt. 9 Hadley. 5 bedroom house. $2000/mo & utilities. 2 car garag. 1 & a qtr miles to campus. No beds. Large Lot. Music room. Skibiski Real Estate.586-1827.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 2009

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass still winless after loss to Hartford

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

With a third-straight NCAA Tournament bid as its goal, the Massachusetts men's soccer team is discovering how hard it may be as it has started the young season out winless.

The Minutemen (0-1-1) fell to Hartford, 2-0, Saturday night, in their second regular season game, as two late second-half goals from Hawks forward Carlos Villa cemented the win.

Hartford	2
UMass	0

The Hawks dominated both sides of the ball, outshooting UMass 18-5 and allowing just two shots in the first half and three shots on goal throughout the game.

After a scoreless first frame, Villa scored his first of two goals in the 70th minute on a free kick following a Minuteman yellow card.

Six minutes later he struck again, in the right corner past keeper Shane Curran-Hays for an insurance tally.

Curran-Hays is vying to fill former standout goalkeeper Zach Simmons's spot with fellow junior Chris Piekos.

Curran-Hays had five saves, while Piekos had seven including three straight saves in the first of two overtimes against No. 24 Boston University last Tuesday.

"That was [Piekos'] first varsity start that counts," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "He did a great job in the spring for us. I'm not surprised, I'm pleased, but I'm not surprised that he did that, but we have a battle. Shane is an outstanding keeper too, so the two of them battling who is going to start is going to be interesting."

The Minutemen tied the visiting Terriers 1-1 in both teams' season opener, as redshirt sophomore defender Sam DeNormandie scored his second career goal in the physical contest that ended in a 1-1 draw.

"I think the fact that we only had one scrimmage and getting over the fact that we didn't play UConn last weekend because of the weather, it was a good result for us," Koch said.

Although Koch was pleased with how his team kept up with an extremely talented team, there were some things that UMass will need to work on.

"The goal that was ruled offsides was bad marking on our parts," Koch said. "We made some

See M. SOC on page 10

Senior Mark DeSantis tries to move the ball upfield in a game last year. The Minutemen hope to rebound from their 2-0 loss to Hartford with the forward's leadership.

UM hopeful despite defeat

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

Angela Napoli's early season approach may not be providing the results she wants at the end of games, but she is seeing the progressions she wants to see.

The new head coach of the Massachusetts women's soccer team began the season focusing on her backfield, moved to working on her midfield in UMass' second game, and followed with the offense in the most recent game, a 1-0 loss to Providence this past Friday. In the loss, the offense showed that it is still a work in progress – it only managed three shots, one on net – but the defense, where Napoli began her focus, was solid.

PC	1
UMass	0

Despite giving up 17 shots (eight on goal), the Minutewomen defense was strong, shutting down the Friars (2-1-0) on many opportunities. The Friars dominated possession, controlling the ball on the ground, but the Minutewomen (0-3-0) held strong once Providence moved into the attacking third of the field.

The only mistake of the day for UMass' defense came in the 67th minute when the Friars' Jill Cambum found Nicole Benko at the top of the box. Benko found the top-left corner of the net, just outside of freshman goalie Emily Cota's reach.

"Every game they have gotten better; every game I feel they are getting more and more confident," Napoli said. "We had one breakdown and they got a great shot and it was a great finish."

The goal was the first Cota has given up in her career at UMass, and the game was her second in a UMass uniform. Cota came into the game in the second half, replacing senior Lauren Luckey. It was the second game in a row that Napoli has used

See W. SOC on page 10

Junior Kelsey Anderson tries to keep the ball away from the goal in a game last season. The Minutewomen have yet to score this season.

Nelson, Miles lead Minutemen in 2009

QB Havens earns starting nod over returning Woodward

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

Coach Don Brown is now the defensive coordinator at Maryland; ex-quarterback Liam Coen is playing Arena Football and last year's Sean Smalls-Courtney Robinson cornerback tandem has graduated. Most of the Massachusetts football teams' familiar faces of the past few years have gone on to greener pastures (turf, in Coen's case).

So it falls on coach Kevin Morris in his first year at the helm for the No. 15 Minutemen to right the ship after what many saw as an underachieving 2008 season. At the same time, the team is looking to a new starting quarterback, a young linebacking corps and a retooled secondary to improve over the season.

The key components in the new-look Minutemen will be two All-Americans, offensive tackle Vladimir Ducasse and safety Jeromy Miles, and Walter Payton Award candidate Tony Nelson at tailback.

Quarterbacks

After a prolonged position battle, junior Kyle Havens was named starting quarterback for the Minutemen one week before the season opener against Kansas State.

Havens, a junior college transfer from Diablo Valley College, averaged 300 yards per game last season with the Vikings. After impressing the coaching staff during spring and fall practices, Havens earned the starting nod from Morris, beating out senior Scott Woodward for the job. Sporting Coen's old number 12, Havens will have a strong receiving corps to assist him in his transition to Colonial Athletic Conference play.

Woodward, a lefty who has spent most of his career backing up Coen, had been expected to step into the starting role entering his final season before Havens' transfer. With 30 game appearances under his belt, he was the only quarterback on the roster to throw a pass for UMass before the season started. For his career, Woodward is 26-for-50 for 291 yards and two interceptions.

Further down the depth chart are sophomores Octavious Hawkins and Spencer Whipple. Both have shown promise in their young careers and were factored into the quarterback competition until late. Although he's a quarterback first, Hawkins has played some snaps at wide receiver in order to get some playing time. Whipple is the son of former UMass coach, Mark Whipple.

Halfbacks

Replacing Coen as the centerpiece of the UMass offense will be 2008 All-Conference running back Tony Nelson. Entering his senior season, Nelson is the newest in a long line of feature backs at UMass. Last year, he led the Minutemen in rushing with 1,325 yards on 243 carries (5.5 yards per carry) and 12 touchdowns.

Nelson will be looked upon as the workhorse for the Minutemen offense whenever the passing game struggles, which is likely, regardless of who takes snaps this season.

Backing him up will be redshirt sophomore Jonathan Hernandez, who played a significant factor last season on special teams but received six carries last season. After opening eyes during spring practice, redshirt freshman Cedric Gonnet could get some touches. Finally, Amherst native Alphonsus Aguh adds depth to the tailback spot after getting his first game action last season.

Fullbacks

When senior Chris Zardas is a healthy back who can block, run and catch the ball out of the backfield, his productivity is great. But with injuries plaguing him for most of his career, his adeptness as a player has been limited so far with 26 rushes. However, his versatility

See FOOTBALL on page 10

Safety Jeromy Miles cradles the ball after an interception in a game last year. Miles was named a 2009 Pre-Season All-American.

Sowry and Co. feeling Elite

Minutewomen aim higher, look to advance past Sweet 16

By Noah Steinberg-DiStefano
Collegian Staff

After spending the summer months coaching the U.S. Junior National Team in Boston, Mass., field hockey coach Justine Sowry is excited to be back in Amherst with her team.

Last year, the Minutewomen had one of their best seasons in recent memory, going 17-5 and finishing atop the Atlantic 10 standings before being eliminated in the Sweet 16 of the NCAA Championship. This season, Sowry has set the Elite Eight as a goal for her young team.

"Right now, we're just focused on trying to move forward as a team," Sowry said. "After our run to the Sweet 16 last year, making it to the elite eight is the next step."

The road to the NCAA tournament certainly will not be easy for UMass, which enters the 2009 season ranked No. 17 in the Kookaburra NFHCA Division I Preseason Poll. The success of Sowry and company in their 2008 campaign means a tougher schedule this season. The Minutewomen are set to face off against six ranked opponents. Preseason rankings for said teams are as follows: No. 3 Syracuse, No. 8 Connecticut and No. 10 James Madison.

A strong showing against ranked opponents will help UMass better its RPI and ultimately secure a favorable matchup in the NCAA tournament. Coach Sowry believes that if the Minutewomen can win three out of their six games against ranked opponents, they will be in good shape. In its season opener against then-No. 20 Providence, UMass got off on the right foot, coming away with a 1-0 victory.

Since then, the Minutewomen split the UMass Invitational, losing to Boston University (1-3) 3-2, and upsetting then-No. 9 Iowa (1-3). The win against the Hawkeyes was a key victory for UMass but the loss to the unranked Terriers dropped the Minutewomen two spots to No. 19 in the latest rankings.

After winning last season's A-10 Championship, the Maroon and White enter this season as the clear-cut favorite to repeat. After going 6-0 in conference games last year, another strong showing against A-10 foes this season will help the Minutewomen secure a promising seed in the NCAA tournament. However, other A-10 teams are right on the heels of UMass – Temple (1-3) and Richmond (2-2) received seven and five votes, respectively, in the latest rankings.

Compared to last season's team, the group that will take the field for Sowry this year is a very young group of players, with seven freshmen on the roster, all of whom are expected to see significant playing time. The team also returns 13 players from last year's squad, including five starters.

The team has a significant void to fill at forward with the loss of A-10 Offensive Player of the Year, Katelyn Orlando. Senior forward Jill Powers and team captain Katie Kelly, the top returning scorers for the Minutewomen, are expected to take on the brunt of the load offensively.

Sowry will also utilize a completely new midfield after losing seniors Erin Parker and Mary Shea. She expects Cher King along with a group of talented young freshmen to fill the void left by the graduating seniors.

"We just have to grow game by game," said Sowry. "We know chemistry doesn't build overnight and it might take time, but I have a lot of confidence that we'll be able to get it done."

Sophomore goalkeeper Alesha Widdall earned Second-Team All-American honors last year as a freshman and should be a major asset for the Minutewomen defensively.

As the season progresses, and team chemistry continues to build, the Maroon and White should be in position to improve on last year's impressive season. The Minutewomen will be tested early on with games against Boston University and No. 9 Iowa in the opening weekend of school, prior to the start of classes. Sowry aims to keep her players focused on taking the season one game at a time, and putting themselves in the position to win come tournament time.

Noah Steinberg-DiStefano can be reached at steinber@student.umass.edu.

Back Jaime Bourazeris chases a ball during a game last season. The Minutewomen head to Albany on Friday.

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

HIGH: 67 LOW: 53 | WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM | THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 2009

Amherst ranked among best college towns

By Sam Butterfield
Collegian Staff

Berkeley, Boulder, Ann Arbor, Austin.... Amherst?

The former locales are routinely hailed as some of America's premier college towns, but Amherst, with three colleges nestled in an idyllic valley and ample cultural offerings in the surrounding area, can now be formally added to that list, as it has been ranked among America's best college cities twice since May.

On August 27, the national Hotels and Travel Reservations site lauded Amherst, along with cities like Lawrence, Kan., Madison, Wis., and Athens, Ga., for sharing resources among members of the Five College Consortium, calling Amherst "one beauty of a college town."

In May, prominent college advisor Katherine L. Cohen, the founder of Ivywise, a college search service, ranked Amherst the number one college town in the country on MSN.com, citing the range of academic and social opportunities present within the area schools and the collaboration between the Five Colleges, as well as offering passers-by a tip on where to find cheap pizza, Antonio's, or a fine meal, Judie's. Cohen's ranking actually put Amherst ahead of such perennially heralded towns as Washington, D.C., Boston, and Berkeley, Calif.

"It appears the nation is figuring out what we've known all along - that Amherst is a great place to live and learn," University of Massachusetts Amherst undergraduate admissions director Kevin Kelly said in a release. "We're excited to share this spotlight with our friends in the Five College Consortium."

Executive Director of News and Media Relations Ed Blaguszewski said the recognition helps bolster UMass' profile both in-state and out, and will help the university in recruiting students and faculty.

"It's a wonderful set of endorsements," he said. "It highlights what a terrific setting we have here in Amherst and by association at UMass, and the setting where you live, work and play is important to us all, so I think it will be a positive tool in getting people to take a harder look at our school."

Blaguszewski added that he believes the ranking will put UMass higher on many prospective Eastern Massachusetts students' list, as he said, such students might otherwise overlook schools in Western Massachusetts. He furthered that he feels the exposure will generate more interest in the university from out-of-state students, as it will make the school seem more attractive based on the positive reviews.

Students at campus center were also enthused at the news of the high marks.

"It's exciting, you know, it renews a spirit of education to hear that your school is one of the best," said junior Danillo Sena. "I Mass Amherst is definitely the one the most students are looking towards (out of the UMass system)."

Sam Butterfield can be reached at sjbutterfield@dailycollegian.com

Amherst has been ranked by two national organizations as one of America's best college towns for its variety of academic and social offerings.

Route 116 crash sends two to hospital in Sunderland

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

Two female pedestrians were struck by a car at approximately 2:30 p.m. on Tuesday afternoon at the Cliffside bus stop in Sunderland, with one female sustaining serious injuries.

Sources at the scene reported seeing the seriously injured female being airlifted from the location of the accident. Sunderland Police later confirmed that she was taken to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield.

The accident occurred in front of Squire Village shopping center, on Rt. 116. The incident was the second pedestrian accident to occur at the Cliffside bus stop in less than a year.

When contacted, the Sunderland Police stated that the other female was taken to Cooley Dickenson Hospital in Northampton. She was released later in the day, with minor injuries.

The accident shut down Rt. 116 in Sunderland for most of Tuesday; Sunderland Police redirected northbound traffic down Plum Tree Rd., and southbound traffic was routed into the Squire Village parking lot.

Sunderland Police Chief Jeffery Gilbert could not be reached for comment.

Nick Bush can be reached at nbush@dailycollegian.com.

Cuba nixes study abroad in U.S.

By Wilfredo Cancio Isla
McClatchy Newspapers

MIAMI — The Cuban government has denied exit permits to about 30 Cuban college students who had been offered U.S. government-funded scholarships for academic programs at American academic institutions.

Not only did the students lose the chance to attend classes for free in the United States, but some also were accused of ideologically losing their way and were expelled from their colleges in Cuba. Those who were members of the Communist Youth Union were booted out, several students said.

"I've been told that I have been expelled from the university, and that I have a hearing pending with the Communist Youth, where I am to receive a temporary sanction due to the fact that, in self-criticism, I acknowledged having applied for the scholarship," wrote a student selected for a leadership program in the United States.

The student, who asked to remain anonymous, said there is deep frustration among the selected students.

"Our state of mind couldn't be worse. We feel unprotected. Nobody will defend us nor challenge the Cuban government to claim our right to exercise the option any university student in the world has," the young woman said from Havana.

This was the first year that Cuban students were included in the U.S. State Department's Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs program, which provides scholarships for students throughout the world to attend American universities.

When word of the scholarships got out in Cuba, the U.S. Interests Section in Havana was deluged with more 750 applications.

"We were disappointed in the government of Cuba not allowing Cuban students to participate in our education programs," a U.S. State Department official said, who requested anonymity due to the sensitive nature of the incident. "We had gotten the word out about the programs through pamphlets and word of mouth ... and the candidates were selected based on merit. When we tried to explain that, they said, 'No, we don't know who these kids are, and so we're saying no to all of them.

"It was a real opportunity to try something different. It was a missed opportunity."

Bisa Williams, acting deputy assistant secretary of state for western hemisphere affairs, said it was an unfortunate turn of events.

See CUBA on page 2

A poster in Havana reads "we are one." Several Cuban students were recently banned from studying in the U.S.

"It would be unfortunate if students suffered retaliation simply for seeking to take advantage of educational exchange opportunities," she said.

The U.S. State Department noted, however, that the Cuban government did not rule out participation in the future.

The students could have attended a one-year community college program in fields such as agricultural science, business management, information technology, communications and journalism. The program also includes a summer course on public leadership.

The universities were located in Arizona, Tennessee and Idaho.

Seventeen were selected for the first program and 11 for the second one.

But Cuban authorities denied their visa requests to travel to the United States and began an evaluation program at their university centers.

A few months ago, officials from the Cuban Ministry of Higher Education, member of the Communist Party and leaders of the Communist Youth Union opened an evalua-

Banks blast kids with ATM fees

By Emily Glazer
MarketWatch

SAN FRANCISCO - In his two years at Iowa State University, junior Abe Hunter has spent more than $500 on ATM fees.

Hunter has an account back home with Ameriprise Financial, formerly a branch of American Express Co., because of his family's past affiliation with that company. But U.S. Bank's prime branch and ATM location a block away from campus and exclusive debit-card partnership with the school's ID program means Hunter gets most of his cash from U.S. Bank's machines.

To minimize the hit from those ATMs' non-member fees - they run anywhere from $1.50 to $5 depending on the machine - Hunter has memorized which ATMs charge the lowest rate of $1.50.

"I try not to think about it," he says, referring to shelling out hundreds of dollars in fees for his four-times-a-week ATM habit.

Whether it's overdoing it on loans or mismanaging money, college students often struggle financially. And rather than helping them by giving one bank priority access to campus and thereby students' money, many schools are enriching themselves far more than their tuition-paying customers: While most colleges pocket between $10,000 and $20,000 a year for that exclusive bank use, some schools earn up to $200,000, according to school administrators at some public schools.

Two-thirds of the nation's largest 15 universities either partner with banks to promote debit cards or are looking to do so, according to a survey earlier this year.

U.S. Bank, a subsidiary of US Bancorp, has partnerships with about 40 colleges nationwide, including offering student identification cards that also work as debit cards.

Bank of America, its closest college-banking competitor, has about 700 relationships with alumni groups or athletic departments but focuses on college affinity credit-eard accounts as opposed to exclusive on-campus branches or ID cards, said Diane Wagner, Bank of America's senior vice president for media relations.

Although U.S. Bank would not release financial information because of confidentiality agreements, administrators at public schools with a partnership with that bank said they are paid either yearly or monthly based on the number of student, faculty or staff accounts, or by square footage of the space U.S. Bank leases.

Iowa State University originally received $10,000 in 1997 when it partnered with U.S. Bank, said Joan Piscitcello, the university's treasurer. And with about 13,000 Iowa State accounts, the school banked $200,000 from U.S. Bank this year.

Northern Calif.-based Sonoma State University and Northern Kentucky University received about $10,000 when partnerships were forged a few years ago with U.S. Bank; both universities had about 1,500 accounts at the time.

Evanston, Ill.-based Northwestern University offers a fairly typical example of how the process often works on school campuses. About 35 percent, or 3,000, Northwestern students have a U.S. Bank account, said Nick Skipitaris, U.S. Bank's branch manager at the school.

Skipitaris said in June that U.S. Bank worked strategically with Northwestern when its contract was signed in 2004 to ensure the student-center branch and the seven ATMs were no more than two minutes' walking distance from each other.

But Northwestern's financial agreement with U.S. Bank is private, as Brian Peters, director of Northwestern's University Services, wrote in an e-mail in June that "the financial arrangements between NU and any of our preferred vendors is not something that we share with the public. Most of our contracts have confidentiality clauses."

During Northwestern's orientation week, U.S. Bank often gives away thousands of promotions, including free portable speakers in 2006 and computer flash drives last year, to new custom-

See ATMs on page 2

Bank of America is among many banks that charges non-members to use their ATMs. Some schools allow only one bank's ATMs on their campus.

ARTS & LIVING

Jigga to rock Mullins

Superstar hip-hopper Jay-Z will perform at UMass' Mullins Center October 25.

SEE PAGE 4

SPORTS

Stagnant offense

The Minutewomen lost thier fourth game of the season and went scoreless again in a double-overtime loss to Albany at Rudd Field.

SEE PAGE 10

EDITORIAL & OPINION

Ed/Op editor Nick O'Malley knows what it's like to be at the mercy of SPIRE, and out in the cold.

SEE PAGE 8

DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Log on to the revamped DailyCollegian.com for all new features, including exclusive video from Matisyahu's surprise concert in Northampton.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
CXVIX
Issue 3

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief William McGuinness
Managing Editor S.P. Sullivan
Business Manager Daniel Ivtte
Production Manager Michael Sarkes
Night Supervisor Kirsten Swenson
Advertising Manager Michael Tortorici
Advertising Production Max Dorner
Arts & Living Editor Shanna Murphy
Comics Editor Annie Keithline
Editorial Editor Nick O'Malley
News Editor Nick Bush
Sports Editor Jeffrey R. Larnard
Web Editor Brian Wood
Photo Editor Matthew Harrison
IT Manager Victor Jacek
Asst. Business Manager Matt Zolnierz
Assistant Advertising Nicole Jacinto
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Distribution Manager Norman Provost
Classified Manager Katelyn Tamilio
Asst. Arts & Living Justin Gagnon
Asst. Arts & Living Elise Horowitz
Asst. Arts & Living Cal Scannell
Assistant Comics Andrew Witts
Assistant Editorial Michael Phillis
Assistant Editorial Hannah Nelson
Assistant News Samuel Butterfield
Assistant News Alyssa Creamer
Assistant News Jenn Heshion
Assistant Sports David Reinch
Assistant Sports Mike Gillmeister
Assistant Sports Adam Miller
Assistant Photo Maxwell Sparr
Assistant Multimedia Chris Shores

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts Calendar Semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Bi-Weekly Collegian in 1956. Published daily since 1967, the Collegian has been recognized since January 1994 for advertising rates and information, call weekdays 9:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nick Bush

COPY EDITOR
Chelsea Dugan

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Guanno

Banks reap ATM fees

ATMs from page 1

ers. Whitney Bright, U.S. Bank's vice president and general manager of campus banking, said most schools partnered with U.S. Bank to offer these giveaways, which cost U.S. Bank between $3 and $5 each.

Since Northwestern students' required ID card, or WildCARD, can link to their bank accounts, students often are persuaded to open a U.S. Bank account in the fall of their freshman year, even if they already have another one at a bank in their hometown.

Skipitaris estimates he hands out at least 1,500 business cards out of about 2,000 new students and their parents that come in hordes to the bank's campus branch.

"I was told 'U.S. Bank: That's the bank you get when you come to NU,'" said incoming Northwestern junior Kristi Infante. "When I got here I thought that's what everyone did."

Infante uses City National Bank for savings when she goes home, but has only a U.S. Bank debit card. The Miami native said her WildCARD is the only credit card in her wallet. "The WildCARD is hooked up, that's your ATM," she said.

But consumer researchers are wary of the necessity of these partnerships since many students arrive at school already owning credit cards or bank accounts.

For many students, adding ATM fees to their other expenses is a nightmare. College students spend about $200 a month on general items, or about $2,400 a year, more than half of their annual personal earnings of about $3,900, according to a recent study by Student Monitor, a college market-research firm, of a representative sample of 1,200 four-year, full-time undergraduates.

Banks target college students, especially with debit cards, credit cards and checking accounts because students use them so often, said Eric Weil, managing partner of Student Monitor.

"We've kind of questioned the whole value of those types of relationships because again you have so many students who are acquiring their card and checking account before they set foot on campus," Weil said.

But some students come to college without a bank account, and this new bank relationship enables schools to vet and filter any potential banking problems.

"Some campuses do partner with (banks) because they want to make sure ... it is a well-regarded card and doesn't offer unusual fees," said John Hall, a spokesman for the American Bankers Association, a trade group.

And Skipitaris said he knows many Northwestern students already have their banking set up and "it's OK to have a couple" bank accounts.

Incoming Northwestern senior Jillian Toley still uses Navy Federal Credit Union, and said her mom opened up an account for her when she was in eighth grade in Annapolis, Md.

"That's where all of my money has always gone," she said. "It didn't make sense for me to switch to another bank."

Cuba: no studying in U.S.

CUBA from page 2

tion process as part of "restructuring the political-ideological work" at higher education institutions.

Among the evaluation-session topics "the courageous ideological combat" among students, such as applying for U.S. scholarships.

"A sample of the actions taken by the current U.S. administration in its efforts to ideologically permeate university students is to offer them scholarships through the Interests Section to train them in the area of leadership," reads an internal document of the Ministry of Higher Education obtained by El Nuevo Herald.

"Applying for such scholarships reveals, at least, an unacceptable ideological inconsistency. More serious yet is the case of students selected by the Interests Section who upheld their decisions even after a political discussion with them."

The document, released in July, acknowledges that students and professors longed "to obtain personal benefits" and suffered "a confusion and poor understanding of the basic pillars that sustain the ideology of our revolution."

Water main breaks in Lederle late Wednesday classes moved

By Sam Butterfield
Collegian Staff

Work crews discovered a break in a water line at the Lederle Graduate Research Center, mandating that water to the building be turned off from Wednesday night to approximately 3a.m. on Thursday.

According to a release from the university news and media relations office, repairs may also force water to Marcus Hall and the Goessman Building to be turned off, though the nearby Conte Polymer Building's water supply was not expected to be affected.

All classes scheduled in the Lederle GRC after 6 p.m. were to be rescheduled or relocated. Assuming there were no further complications, classes were set to resume as scheduled on Thursday morning.

The break was found in a 10-inch water line that supplies emergency wash, sprinkler, and potable water to the buildings affected.

Those who need emergency access to water dependent research equipment in Lederle should contact Environmental Health and Safety at 413-545-2682.

Professors don't want back-talk

By Lisa Black
Chicago Tribune

CHICAGO-Lee Shumow doesn't want to text her students, or be their friend on Facebook, but to their chagrin prefers an old-fashioned way to communicate: e-mail.

The educational psychology professor at Northern Illinois University appreciates when students take the time to reply. It's an extra treat when they don't begin their message with, "Hey, Lee."

She and many of her colleagues believe such informality has seeped into the college classroom environment, citing student behavior that's best described as rude or oblivious. As students begin a new semester this month, instructors bracing for yet another onslaught blame technology for creating a disengaged generation whose attention is constantly diverted by laptops, phones and iPods.

Others point to the unruly classroom as a reflection of an increasingly ill-mannered society. Nearly 70 percent of Americans polled in 2005 said they believe people are more rude than they were 20 to 30 years ago.

"I literally cannot imagine having addressed any teacher I had in my career as 'Hey' and then their first name,'" said Shumow, who has a doctoral degree and has taught 15 years at NIU. "I love them. I won an award for undergraduate teaching in 2005. But man, the world has really changed from when I was a student."

To their credit, most students are respectful and more inquisitive than ever, faculty members say.

Yet professors also find they must devote space in the syllabus to ask students to refrain from surfing the Web, texting or answering cell phones during a lecture. Some have to remind students that, when making a presentation, they should remove the backward baseball cap and save the bare midriff for a beach party. Others complain that students randomly leave and enter the classroom during class.

For their part, students are irked by others who slurp and chew food, doze off or dominate discussion.

Some blame high schools for lowering the bar on classroom conduct, while others say the problems begin at home, when families fail to instill in children basic skills such as how to say "please" or "thank you."

In some cases, parents are more obnoxious than their offspring. One professor reported hearing from an irate father whose child had failed a class. The father insisted he had paid enough tuition for "at least a D."

Yet experts believe there is more to collegiate rudeness than perhaps a feeling of entitlement.

The attitude often is: "I don't need you. I have the Net," said P.M. Forni, director of the Civility Initiative at Johns Hopkins University and a professor of Italian literature.

"These are students for whom the computers are the training wheels of their knowledge since early childhood. Many of them will think nothing of starting to text as you convey a commentary on Dante's 'Divine Comedy.'"

Although the decline in classroom manners has not been documented in evidence-backed research, Forni said, the "anecdotal evidence is so massive it becomes rather reliable."

There is a sense, he said, that the relationship between student and teacher is now likened to one between a client and service provider.

"The prestige of the teacher and the professors as providers of knowledge and wisdom has decreased as the importance of the information technology has increased," he said.

Professors should set a tone of relaxed formality and define boundaries from day one, Forni said.

For instance, he begins his classes by explaining that he grew up in Italy during a different generation, where wearing caps in a classroom was considered rude. He considers it a distraction.

"I say, 'Listen, I cannot enforce this. I am just asking you as a favor not to wear a cap in class for this reason,'" Forni said. "Nobody from that moment on wears his cap in class."

Students usually respond well, teachers say, when they understand what is expected of them

See SASS on page 3

Abercrombie fined for discrimination

By James Eli Shiffer and Jane Friedmann
Star Tribune

MINNEAPOLIS — Four years after Abercrombie & Fitch refused to let a teenager help her autistic sister try on clothes at its Mall of America store, state officials have fined the company $115,264 for discriminating against a disabled person.

The hefty penalty from the Minnesota Department of Human Rights pleased the Maxson family of Apple Valley, Minn., which was forced to push hard for satisfaction after the retailing giant refused to apologize for the incident and even questioned whether the girl was disabled. The fine was levied in June but made public this month.

Michael K. Browne, the department's legal affairs manager, said the size of the penalty is the largest in at least two years. The amount reflects his agency's effort to prevent future discrimination of this kind, as well as the cost of litigation forced by the "pushback" from Abercrombie & Fitch. "We don't want anything that happened in this case to repeat itself," Browne said.

Molly Maxson, then 14, was with her older sister on a back-to-school shopping trip in August 2005 when a store employee told them they couldn't both enter the fitting room because of store policy aimed at preventing shoplifting. The store refused to relent even after the sister, and later the girls' mother, explained that Molly couldn't be alone because of her disability.

The confrontation humiliated the girl, who testified that the incident made her feel like a "misfit."

"She was singled out and required to hear her sister and mother repeatedly ask for accommodations based on her disability, in front of a long line of customers, at a store that markets itself to young people as a purveyor of a particularly desirable 'look,'" administrative law judge Kathleen D. Sheehy declared in her ruling.

When several complaints to the company were ignored, the girl's mother, Beth Maxson, took the case to the Minnesota Department of Human Rights.

The investigation encountered strong resistance from Abercrombie & Fitch. The retailer, based in New Albany, Ohio, posted $3.5 billion in sales last year and has been the target of several discrimination lawsuits. In 2004, the company agreed to pay $40 million and set up a diversity program to settle a class-action suit charging the company with discrimination in hiring and employment. The suit had accused Abercrombie & Fitch of excluding minorities from its sales floors and adopting a virtually all-white marketing campaign. The company admitted no wrongdoing but agreed to new policies to promote diversity.

In the Maxson case, the company denied that the girl suffered from a disability until the first day of an administrative law hearing in April. Her autism was diagnosed at age 2.

In her ruling, Sheehy concluded that Abercrombie & Fitch violated the Minnesota Human Rights Act and ordered the company to pay the girl $25,000 and cover the family's attorney fees of $41,069. The company had to pay the state a $25,000 fine and cover other expenses totaling $24,194.

Abercrombie & Fitch also was ordered to post signs in its seven Minnesota store explaining that disabled individuals should seek out a sales associate if they need an exception to the company's policy allowing only one person in the fitting room at a time. The company also must provide an hour of training for all employees in Minnesota who interact with the public to make sure they understand how to help disabled customers.

A spokesman for Abercrombie & Fitch did not have an immediate response to the state's action.

The judge found that the store policy allowed fitting room employees to accommodate disabled shoppers, but that employees interpreted that to mean people with visible handicaps.

Abercrombie & Fitch isn't challenging the findings of fact in the case, but the company has appealed the penalties and corrective measures, Browne said. Sheehy denied the company's request to lower the attorney fees, finding that Abercrombie & Fitch "transformed this case from a relatively simple matter into the expensive proceeding it has become."

In an interview Tuesday, Brittany Maxson, now 21, said that the 2005 shopping trip was supposed to be an occasion for Molly to find clothes that would allow her to fit in better with other kids at school.

"Because of her autism, she's very vulnerable," Brittany said Tuesday. "In social situations, everything is new to her. It's very unpredictable how she'll act. ... We've never left her alone, even at home. We never let her go anywhere by herself. We've always kept a close eye on her."

In its legal battle, the company challenged the family's claim that Molly was disabled, requesting medical and school records and subjecting the girl to an interview with a forensic psychologist, her mother said. Molly told the psychologist that the incident made her feel "bad" and "scared," and that she never wanted to shop there again.

Retailer Abercrombie & Fitch was fined $115,264 in Minneapolis for refusing to allow an autistic girl's sister to accompany her to a dressing room.

Students get rude

SASS from page 2

and what they can expect from the professor, including respect.

Rebecca Lessenberry, 19, of Waukegan, Ill., and a classmate would agree. They were stung last spring by an instructor's reprimand when they arrived for a speech class at the College of Lake County in Grayslake.

"We smelled like cigarette smoke and our teacher decided to humiliate us and say, 'Do not smoke before my class and sit next to me,'" Lessenberry said.

In response, "We would just smoke even more before class," said Allyce Doorey, 21, of Lake Villa, Ill. The two recalled how they wet their hair before smoking, to be sure the odor stuck.

Students also have little patience for instructors who ramble off topic, talk extensively about their personal lives or espouse political views or religious doctrine.

The very nature of some class subjects can provoke discussion — or arguments that offend.

"I think it's all in the way the instructor approaches the particular situation and addresses students," said Kerry Lane, assistant English professor at Joliet Junior College. She assigns readings on topics such as race and faith that can be delicate.

"When we are 18, we may not be aware of how different our views are from others'," Lane said. "I find it is interesting and worthwhile territory for us to cover, but at times it can be challenging."

John Koepke, an electrical engineering instructor at Joliet Junior College, once had to dismiss a student for tossing wads of paper around the room. The two talked about it before the next class, and Koepke said he learned that the student didn't feel challenged and was acting out because of that.

He encourages students to drop preconceived notions and try to figure out what class material they can apply in their lives.

On a positive note, "They feel more comfortable asking questions than in earlier years," Koepke said. "It used to be almost all dictation."

Ill-mannered students don't just grate on the teacher, they also irritate classmates.

"I always have the one (classmate) who thinks they know everything," said Natalia Garcia, 21, of Waukegan, a CLC student. "They actually argue with the teacher sometimes. It's annoying."

Sarah Katula, an assistant nursing professor at Elmhurst College, recently sat on the other side of lectern as a graduate student at a Chicago university. She was surprised at the number of students playing games on their laptops during lectures, and was especially annoyed by a woman who sat behind her in statistics class. "Every class, she would eat her yogurt and she would clink her spoon ... to get every last bit of it," Katula said. "The chewing of food made me nuts."

NIU's Shumow agrees that older returning graduate students pose a special set of challenges, especially if juggling full-time jobs.

"They are tired and on class nights they haven't eaten a decent meal and their nerves are frayed," she said. Some are snippy, she said, and argue about class requirements, such as preparing a formal paper.

"This is graduate school," Shumow said. "Yeah, you really do have to include citations in your paper."

MOVINGON?
Rent a Truck or Cargo Van
Starting at $19.95
Special Reduced Rates Monday to Thursday
POTTER'S AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Round Trip Rentals to and from Boston, New York & New Jersey
• One Way Rentals
• Hand Trucks & Furniture Pads Available for Rent
• Boxes & Moving Accessories Available for Sale
The Economical Way To Move
549-RENT (7368)
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
www.pottersauto.com

MERCYhouse
it's a church!
knowmercy.org
385 North Pleasant :: 1/2 block from Umass

MESSAGES FROM THE BURSAR'S OFFICE

Payment Information

QuikPAY for Students
The Umass Amherst campus no longer sends paper bills. QuikPAY is our system for all students to view and/or pay their bills online and it is the preferred method of payment. To access QuikPAY students should go to their Student Center in SPIRE and then click on "View/Pay Bill" in the Finances section, located below the classes that the student is currently enrolled in.

QuikPAY for Parents and Guardians
Students can set up parents and other individuals as QuikPAY Authorized Payers through SPIRE. Students will input the payer's email and assign a temporary password. Authorized Payers will receive an email with their login name and after signing in with the password provided by the student they can select a new password for future use. Each billing cycle the payers will receive an email notifying them that the bill is available through a link in the text of the message. Go to www.umass.edu/bursar for details. Please be advised that QuikPAY and FERPA have their own separate authorizations/access codes.

FERPA
The Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act is a federal law protecting the confidentiality of your student records. In compliance with FERPA, UMass Amherst must have the student's written permission to release information from your records. You can provide permission by filling out a FERPA privacy waiver online. Completing the waiver will allow whomever you designate to communicate with the university about your bill, financial aid, and housing. You may edit your FERPA waiver at any time to change or eliminate your designees. The FERPA privacy waiver is limited to two categories of information: finances and housing. It does not allow your designees access to your academic information (such as your grades). Fill out the FERPA Privacy Waiver through SPIRE; navigate to the Student Home ⇨ Holds & To Do's⇨ FERPA Privacy Waiver.

Excess Express
Why wait in line to pick up your refund check? Sign up for Excess Express and have your refund automatically deposited into the U.S. bank account of your choice. To enroll, log on to SPIRE, navigate to the Student Menu->Finances->Excess Express. There you will follow the instructions and enter your banking information.

Mass PIRG/Child Care Waivers
Mass PIRG and Child Care can now be waived online. Log on to SPIRE. On your Student Center, click the Mass PIRG/Child Care Waiver link under the Finances heading.

Waiving Student Health Insurance
If you did not waive the student health insurance for fall 2009 you may not waive it for spring 2010 semester unless spring 2010 is your first semester. The student mandatory health fee cannot be waived. If you are eligible to waive the Student Health Insurance Plan, visit http://spire.umass.edu for a link to the online waiver process. The Student Health Insurance waiver deadline is 10/24/09.

Eligible Graduate Student Employees (Those in the GEO bargaining unit who qualify for SHIP Fee Exemptions) who do not waive SHIP are entitled to a 95% reduction of the SHIP Health Fee for an individual. Send the Bursar's Office an email at bursar @admin.umass.edu. to inform them that you will be enrolled in SHIP and qualify for the 95% reduction of this fee.

How to Contact Us
The Bursar Teller hours are Monday through Friday from 9:00am-4:00pm and the Customer Service hours are 9:00am-5:00pm. The Bursar telephone number is (413) 545-2368 or you can contact us by email at bursar@admin.umass.edu

Welcome to Award Winning UMass Dining
We've been expecting you!
Going Green GOING TRAYLESS!

DINING COMMONS
WORCESTER, FRANKLIN, HAMPSHIRE, HAMPDEN AND BERKSHIRE

Continuous dining from 7am to midnight*
Fifteen World Cuisine options
Grab-n-Go and Breakfast-on-the-Run
Create your own stir fry and noodle bowl stations
Stealth Health Program
Weekly theme specials including Guest Chef Series, Restaurant Night, and Lobster Night
Sustainable Seafood
Sushi Bar and Dim Sum Brunch
Kosher Dining at Franklin DC • Halal Dining at Worcester DC
Five College Meal Exchange Program
Free nutritional consultation with our registered licensed dietitian
*Berkshire DC Monday through Thursday

CAMPUS CENTER
STUDENT UNION COMPLEX & CONCESSIONS

Bluewall Eatery
Bluewall Café
Marketplace Café
Starbuck's Cart
Hatch Food Court
Mullins Center and Outdoor Concessions
Café Talesi Thai Cuisine
Pita Pit serving pita sandwiches at 4 locations
Star Ginger by Lemon Grass Restaurant
Famous Famiglia Pizza at 2 locations
French Meadow
Recreational Center Café

CAFES AND CONVENIENCE STORES

Southwest Café
Whitmore Café
Herter Hall Café
Thompson Hall Café
The Procrastination Station at the W.E.B. Du Bois Library
Mulllins Café
Worcester C-Store with groceries
Franklin C-Store
Hampden C-Store
Mini Store at the Student Union
UMass Concessions

umassdining.com
LOCAL HERO
Food Management's BEST CONCEPTS
RESTAURANTS & INSTITUTIONS IVY
RESIDENTIAL
YCMP

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 2009 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Jigga Man set to Jazz Up Mullins

Lottery ticketing causes frenzy

BY JUSTIN GAGNON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The last generation of UMass students was blessed with concerts that people still talk about today when bands such as the Foo Fighters, Red Hot Chili Peppers and Dave Matthews Band played in our home arena.

Who would have thought with enormous budget cuts and new fountains in the campus pond that UMass would finally deliver a concert that had the potential to be raved about for years to come?

On Oct. 25, 2009 the Jigga Man himself, Jay-Z will take over the Mullins Center. He will be touring colleges and famous arenas across North America promoting the release of his new album, "The Blueprint 3," which will be available in stores on September 11.

Tickets to the show, like the album, also go on sale to the general public this Friday at the Mullins Center Box Office, LiveNation.com, Ticketmaster.com or by calling Ticketmaster at 800-745-3000.

No need to camp out though. Due to the anticipated high demand, Ticketmaster will institute its "random number distribution." The order in which the public can purchase tickets in person will be random. At 11a.m., numbered tickets will be handed out to each person who arrives until approximately 11:40a.m.

The box office will officially open at noon, and a random number will be called. Whoever has the lucky ticket will be the first in line. Don't arrive too early though, because all people in front of them will move to the back of the line.

The ticket prices range from $75 floor seats to $25 student seats. According to Mullins Center Director of Marketing, Scott Sasenbury, Livenation released a password via Facebook that allowed "students" to go online and purchase the discounted tickets in a student presale.

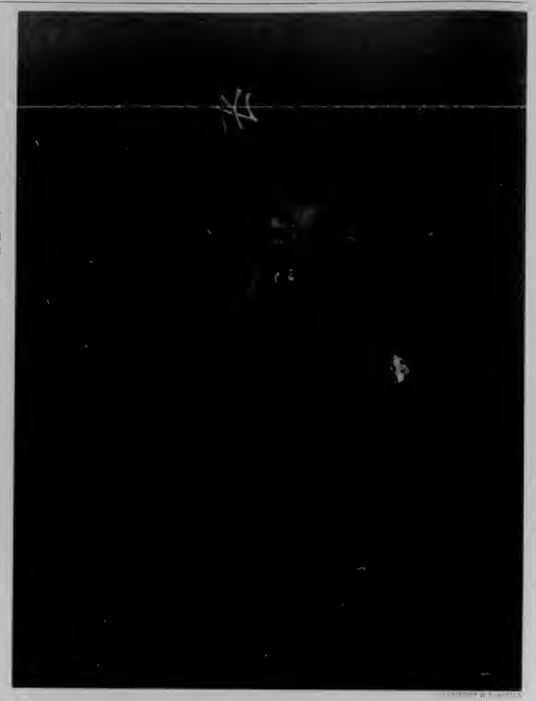
Shortly thereafter, all $25 tickets sold out. Yes, that means there are no more student priced tickets.

Of course, who is to say that it was all students that used the password? This all together completely eradicated the student I.D. verification process. While it may have prevented chaos at the physical box office, it opened the doors to ticket "reselling" agencies, a.k.a. legal scalpers, to buy cheap tickets with a high resell value.

There are already over one hundred tickets for sale on stubhub.com alone selling for as much as $556 a piece.

Sophomore Business major Dave Dennehy thinks that the online password is "bogus." He was planning on buying the tickets Friday in person, but now isn't even going to try. "I would have definitely spent $25, but not $50. Especially since I know that I could have gotten two tickets for that price."

Other students tend to agree with Dennehy. "I can't believe they would let people pay student prices without showing student I.D.," said Junior Maddy Lasky. "Doesn't that defeat the whole purpose?"



Die-hard Jay-Z fans can still buy tickets on Friday, but make sure you deposit your paychecks first. The cheapest seats that are still available through Ticketmaster and Livenation are $50.

Sasenbury encourages those who still want to buy tickets directly from the box office to do so online. The Mullins Center is anticipating a large crowd and while tickets are being sold to those in line, people in the comfort of their homes will be buying tickets at a much quicker pace.

In 2007, tickets to see the Dave Matthews Band at the Mullins Center sold out in 7 minutes.

If you got tickets to the show already, go on and brush ya shoulders off. You've got 99 problems, but gettin' in ain't one.

Justin Gagnon can be reached at jtgagnon@student.umass.edu

The Mullins Center is set to host legendary rapper and producer Jay-Z on October 25. Hova will play selections from his latest album, "The Blueprint 3," which will be released on Friday, September 11.

'Half-Blood Prince' Brings Audiences Half-Way to Finale

BY HALEY NAVARRO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince," the sixth installment in the Harry Potter franchise, opened July 15 and quickly secured its spot as a summer blockbuster. According to Boxofficemojo.com, as of August 30, the film has grossed $895,958,075 worldwide.

The film follows Harry (Daniel Radcliffe) as he returns to Hogwarts after the battle with Lord Voldemort (Ralph Fiennes) at the end of "The Order of the Phoenix." Dumbledore takes Harry to visit Horace Slughorn (Jim Broadbent), the old potions teacher at Hogwarts, to try and convince him to return to his position. He agrees to return after talking to Harry, as he had Lily Potter as a student when she was at Hogwarts. Meanwhile, Harry's longtime adversary Draco Malfoy (Tom Felton) has been given a task to carry out for Lord Voldemort, although it is unclear why.

After arriving at school, Harry rejoins his best friends, Ron Weasley (Rupert Grint) and Hermione Granger (Emma Watson) for the start of another year. Professor McGonagall (Maggie Smith) suggests that Harry and Ron sign up for Slughorn's potions class, and they reluctantly follow her orders. In the classroom, Professor Slughorn instructs the boys to get two textbooks out of the cabinet, and inside, Harry's book is inscribed as "Property of the Half-Blood Prince." The book contains notes that add to or sometimes defy the potions listed, but are always successful. Rapidly, Harry rises to the top of the potions class.

Meanwhile, Dumbledore (Michael Gambon) begins to show Harry a series of memories regarding Tom Riddle (Lord Voldemort's given name as a child) and his time at Hogwarts. He shows Harry a memory that has been tampered with by Professor Slughorn, and instructs Harry that he must find a way of uncovering the memory, as it holds the key to defeating Lord Voldemort.

Though the film is mostly informational (as in, no climactic showdowns with Lord Voldemort like in the previous two films), and sets up the rest of the adventure for the upcoming "Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows," that shouldn't suggest that "Half-Blood Prince" isn't enjoyable.

On the contrary, as the students enter their sixth year at Hogwarts, they begin to experience all the hormones and mood swings that come along with being 16, which is fun to behold. After watching these actors grow up, the audience has formed a bond with the characters, and can see mad, for instance, when Ron can't tell that Hermione likes him.

The special effects are good, as always. The Pensieve, which Dumbledore uses to inform Harry of Lord Voldemort's youth, is the tool used to show memories. The memories themselves are kept in small glass vials, which are clear and glittery in composition.

Though the Pensieve was introduced in the fourth installment, "Harry Potter and the Goblet of Fire," it doesn't really become a vital tool until now. The contents of the Pensieve do not flourish until a memory is inserted into it, at which point a cloud of smoke becomes the surroundings where the memory took place. When the memory is happening, there is almost a fuzz-like quality to the picture – as if mimicking a dream.

Familiar characters also reappear, such as Luna Lovegood (Evanna Lynch) and Severus Snape (Alan Rickman). New characters, such as Ron's girlfriend, Lavender Brown (Jessie Cave) and Draco's mother, Narcissa Malfoy (Helen McCrory), also appear. As serious as the film is, there are also touches of humor in it, to help lighten up some of the often dark situations. Voldemort's followers, (referred to as the "Death Eaters,") are at large and yet, Harry still finds time to develop a crush on the youngest Weasley, Ginny (Bonnie Wright).

Per usual, the film ends with Harry saying something inspirational about friendship and the journey ahead of him. "Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince" simply sets up for the final installment by explaining the methods in which Harry will try to defeat Lord Voldemort.

Director David Yates, who joined the series with the "Order of the Phoenix," will also be directing the final installment, which will be split into two films. "Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows: Part 1," which is planned for release on Nov. 19, 2010 and "Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows: Part 2," which is to be released on July 15, 2011.

"Harry Potter and the Half-Blood Prince" is currently still in theatres and is rated PG.

Haley Navarro can be reached at hnavarro@student.umass.edu

The sixth entry in the wildly successful "Harry Potter" series pits beleaguered hero Harry Potter against familiar foe Lord Voldemort and his own unbridled teenage hormones.

The 'Ugly Truth' on Summer Cinema

Creepy tweens, indie queens highlight summer blockbusters

BY SHAYNA MURPHY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

While some may have spent the summer perched by a window, longing for the rain to stop, others spent it in the air-conditioned, free-flowing soda fountain bliss of a local movie theater. Whichever side you belong to, this season's films took us well beyond the thunderstorms of summer days – from the halls of Hogwarts to the bustling streets of 1950s France – and in some cases, brought us straight to hell. Here we break down the best (and worst) of the season.

"Drag Me To Hell" (Released May 29): When a perky bank employee (Alison Lohman) pisses off the wrong one-eyed gypsy (Lorna Raver), she inadvertently becomes the target of the dreaded lamia – a curse that promises, in three days' time, to drag its sufferers on a one-way journey to the fiery pits of hell. Horror and hijinks ensue as our besieged heroine scurries to weasel her way out of eternal damnation. While the effects may seem corny to the CGI-spoiled eye (projectile vomiting; churlish, talking goats) they play to director Sam Raimi's (once better known for the "Evil Dead" trilogy than for "Spiderman") schlocky strengths. The only thing that's lacking is a cameo from Bruce Campbell. To make up for it, watch for the "Mac Guy" (Justin Long) to be frequently within eyeshot of an Apple gadget.

"Away We Go" (Released June 5): In the ranks of "I'm-pregnant-so-it's-time-to-grow-up-now" movies, "Away We Go" sticks out like a sore hemorrhoid. Maybe it's because Burt (John Krasinski) and Verona (Maya Rudolph) already have their act straightened out – they're happily together and eager to have a child. All that's lacking is a place for them to hang their hats and spare pacifiers. Embarking on a meandering road trip that brings them to the doorsteps of old friends and selfish relatives, the two discover that home might just be a state of being. McSweeney's own Dave Eggers and wife Vendela Vida are responsible for the script's moments of striking poignancy, while director Sam Mendes, fresh off the lukewarm reception of "Revolutionary Road," rebounds with a film that feels almost as sweet as a trimester is long.

"Whatever Works" (Released June 19): Woody Allen's movies are starting to smell like milk that's been left out too long in the summertime. This one – based on a script that's been collecting dust in his file cabinet for about 30 years – places Larry David as a nastier, more elitist version of the Allen prototype. When he's not busy whining about the expanding Universe, the inevitability of death or the pointlessness of higher education (all tired talking points, even among Allen loyalists), he's romancing 21-year-old Evan Rachel Wood – kind of. His idea of romance is to insult her constantly, which she, a ditzy but likeable Southern runaway, somehow finds irresistible. As creepy as their pairing is, Wood pulls it off with finesse. There's a little something extra and enigmatic lurking beneath that tight ponytail of hers, which is more than can be said for this truly disappointing endeavor.

"The Hurt Locker" (Released June 26): Kathryn Bigelow's latest film explores the perils of the Iraq War through the eyes of three soldiers whose mission – defusing roadside bombs – proves to be as fraught with risk as it is exhilarating. Danger hangs thick in the atmosphere of "The Hurt Locker," keeping viewers on a short leash of suspense as the trio's tour abroad slowly winds down. The film doesn't quite stop there, and continues after the lads have made it home. There, Bigelow deftly shows how for some men, the rush of the frontline never leaves, making it impossible to

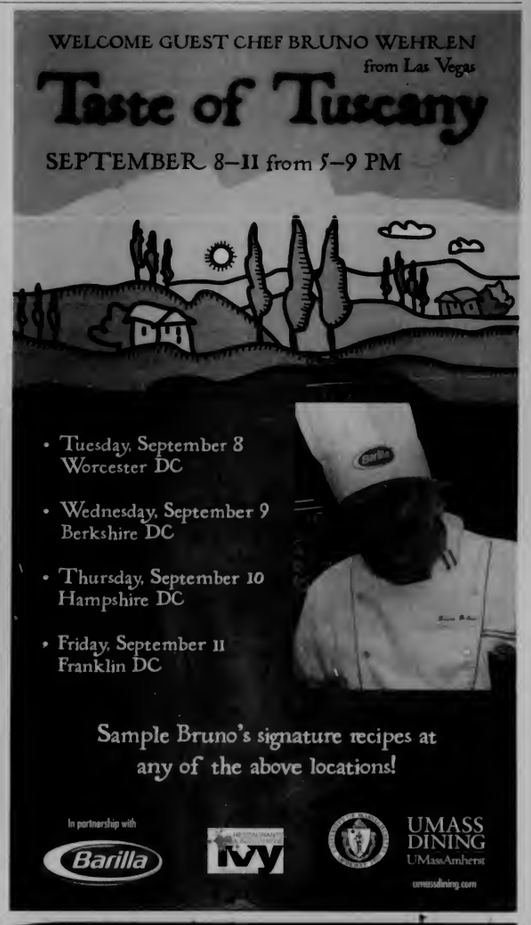
See CINEMA on page 6

Houston 'Looks' to reconnect with old fans on latest album

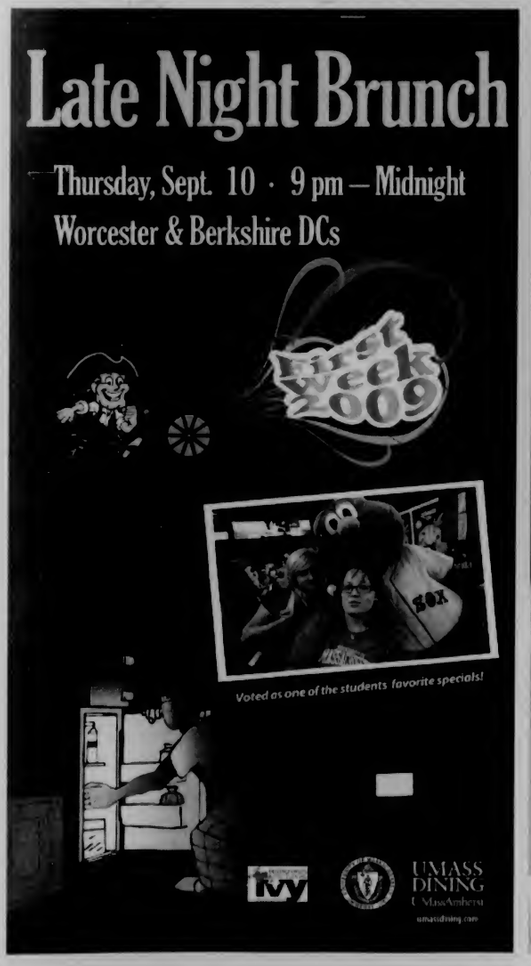
BY JESSICA GRESSA
BADGER HERALD
(UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN)

Last Wednesday, Whitney Houston performed a mini-concert for "Good Morning America" and thousands of die-hard fans in New York City's Central Park, her first appearance on television in seven years. Needless to say, fans and music critics alike waited anxiously to see whether disappointment or applause would greet Houston in what is considered to be the most anticipated comeback of the year. While Houston was criticized for losing her breath on stage and missing a few high notes, she brought an upbeat attitude and a surprisingly gorgeous appearance — especially for the former drug addict famously quoted saying, "Crack is whack." It was obvious from the energy in the crowd that fans were glad to have the diva back.

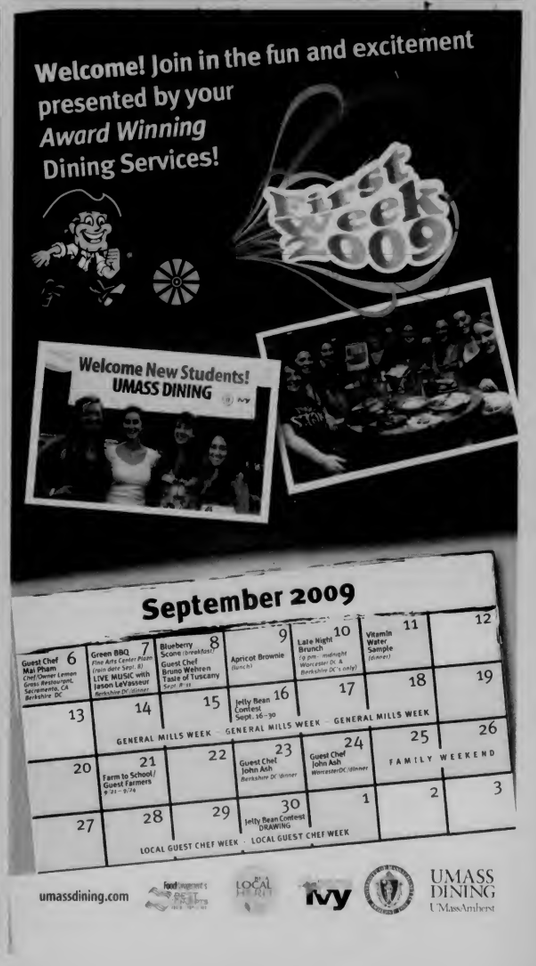
And Houston is grateful for their constant support. Her latest album, "I Look to You," is dedicated to her fans, and since most of them loved Houston for her sound a decade ago, she wisely chose to stick to her roots. "I Look to You" is undoubtedly a flashback album, with powerful ballads and '90s dance pop tracks. Houston did not attempt to create a novel sound or try to reinvent herself. It is exactly what you would expect from Whitney. If you are a classic Houston fan, this album is what you've been waiting for.



Although her range during her live performance received scrutiny, her voice does not sound faded or overproduced on "I Look to You." It remains as commanding and smooth as it was a decade ago on her famous "The Bodyguard" soundtrack. It is the truth behind the narrative that makes songs like title track "I Look to You" and "I Didn't Know My Own Strength" compelling. Houston's reckless, very public struggle with drugs as well as her tortuous relationship with ex-husband Bobby Brown give lyrics like, "And every road that I've taken / Led to my regret / And I don't know if I'm gonna make it" more emotional for listeners.



Among slower ballads are high-energy tracks such as "Million Dollar Bill," written by Alicia Keys. It is an upbeat, danceable song that is one of the best on the album. It is the only song that has potential to top charts. Other tracks are good, but fall short when it comes to becoming mainstream hits. "Nothin' But Love" is dedicated to the "haters" and is reminiscent of Houston's work in the early '90s. "Call You Tonight" has a more modern sound, but has a country-like twanging that makes it a little questionable. An interesting addition to the album is the vocal abilities of Akon on the track "Like I Never Left." This is the only real effort Houston makes to connect her self to the modern music scene. "A Song for You" starts out strong with just Houston's distinct voice and piano, but then breaks into a dance beat that ruins the initial power of the track.



After listening to "I Look to You," a younger generation that might have missed the reign of Houston can definitely see the influence she has had on modern female vocalists such as Keys and Keri Hilson. That being said, the album will most likely only gain popularity with old fans of hers, but Houston's is one not to be dismissed. Check out her appearance on "The Oprah Winfrey Show" Sept. 14. It will be Houston's first major TV interview in seven years.

Whitney Houston was in good spirits performing live on "Good Morning America," in promotion of her new album, "I Look to You."

Out! FOR REEL LESBIAN COMEDY
LGBT film series PRESENTS

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 2009 7:30 PM
Academy of Music Theatre, Northampton, MA
+ AFTER PARTY! 9:30 pm – Midnight
Northampton Center for the Arts Ballroom, 17 New South St, Third Floor TICKET OUTLETS: Pride & Joy, Food For Thought Books, World Eye Bookshop, Odyssey Bookshop info+tickets online: OutForReel.org Advocate GAZETTE womensTimes Rainbow Times

A one-eyed gypsy (Lorna Kaver) wreaks havoc on the life of a mild-mannered bank officer (Alison Lohman) in veteran director Sam Raimi's chilling horror-comedy hit, "Drag Me to Hell."

'Julie & Julia' proves summer movies a dish best served warm re-adjust to civilian life. Before this, Bigelow's claim to fame might have been the 1991 guilty pleasure "Point Break." If "Hurt Locker" rides this current wave of critical acclaim straight over to Oscar season, it wouldn't be a surprise.

CINEMA from page 4

"(500) Days of Summer" (Released Jul. 17): Here's a movie that, at the very least, knows its audience and isn't afraid to pander to it. "(500) Days" documents the doomed relationship of Tom (Joseph Gordon-Levitt) and Summer (Zooey Deschanel) – he a lowly writer at a greeting card company, she a big-eyed siren in the mold of Bettie Page. Their romance runs the gamut of hipster clichés – they romp through IKEA, bond over the Smiths and when they break up, they do so suddenly (and ever so unusually) over pancakes. Later on, he subs out a dreadful karaoke rendition of "Train in Vain," much to the chagrin of his blind date, who doesn't get what all the fuss is about. Frankly, neither do I. "(500) Days" is annoying and formulaic; none of it feels authentic, certainly not coming from Deschanel, the indie poster girl who, although fun to watch in her band She & Him, does little more than stare blankly into the camera, offering no depth and zero protest as Tom (and, by extension, us) projects all sorts of misplaced fantasies onto her.

"Orphan" (Released Jul. 24): Little Esther (Isabelle Fuhrman) can paint and play the piano with an ability that goes well beyond her nine years. She's also the craziest youngster this side of Damien in "The Omen." The usual creepy kid troubles start to manifest soon after she's adopted by the yuppie Colemans (Peter Sarsgaard and Vera Farmiga). Nuns go missing and classroom bullies get mysteriously pushed off of play sets, with Esther always lurking nearby. But wait for it – you may think you know where this is headed, but "Orphan" has a few juicy plot twists up its sleeve. And here you probably thought M. Night Shyamalan had ruined them permanently.

"The Ugly Truth" (Released Jul. 24): Katherine Heigl has griped in the past about film roles that demean women. Funny, then, that she chose to participate in this sexist rom-com migraine about an almost-frigid TV producer (Heigl) on the prowl for Prince Charming. Things go disastrously wrong until she recruits a callow jerk (Gerard Butler) to school her in the ways of tart-dom (lessons include how to thrust out one's bosom and giggle mindlessly at every stupid thing a guy says). Heigl strains to be charming but ends up sounding shrill and off-putting. Butler, for his part, works better in mano-a-mano action porn like "300" here, he's just a poor man's Matthew McConaughey.

"Julie & Julia" (Released Aug. 7): Julia Child, of omelet-flipping fame, occupies half the screen time in this effervescent comedy; modern-day Manhattanite Julie Palmer occupies the other. The two collide over – what else? – fine cuisine, and the results are scrumptious, indeed. Veteran screenwriter Nora Ephron ("Sleepless in Seattle," "When Harry Met Sally") pulls from Child's personal memoir and Palmer's, who in the summer of 2002, decided to blog her way through all 524 recipes in Child's penultimate work, "Mastering the Art of French Cooking." Meryl Streep and Amy Adams star as the two leads, respectively, in a culinary adventure that's bound to leave you grinning warmly at the screen and jonesing for one of Child's magnifique dishes.

Shayna Murphy can be reached at skmurphy@student umass.edu.

THE BOLTWOOD PROJECT™
Saving others since 1969...and STILL making a difference!
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)

REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Fall Semester 2009 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Campus Center Room 101 • Sept. 14 (Mon) • Sept. 15 (Tues) • Sept. 16 (Wed)
• Assignment notification ONLY Thurs. Sept. 17th at Boltwood table @ Concourse
No exceptions, regardless YOU must check mail pickup for the notification letter.
Volunteer, while earning credit!

GET A 5% REBATE
On Textbooks
It's easy to get your 5% rebate on textbook purchases from the
UMASS Textbook Annex
Here's how it works:
Step 1: Purchase your books from the UMASS Textbook Annex.
Step 2: Bring your receipt and UMASS I.D. to the UMASS University Store in the Campus Center between the fourth week and last day of classes.
Step 3: Get a 5% rebate credit to use on anything at the UMASS University Store.
Rebate offer is good only on textbook purchases. Valid I.D. required. Returned books not eligible for rebate. Textbook receipts must be presented during the semester purchases where made. Store rebate credits expire at the end of the semester they where received. Rebate not to exceed $50.00 per semester. See store for details.
UMASS AMHERST University of Massachusetts
University Store and Textbook Annex
Amherst Campus Center • 413-545-2619
www.umass.bkstr.com
Powered by efollett.com

Vita nova church
...life from the ashes...
naked church
a sermon series beginning september 13th.
Downtown above Stackers
10:30am and 6pm
www.lifefromtheashes.org

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
EDITORIAL OPINION
Thursday, September 10, 2009
"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself." – Sir Salman Rushdie
Editorial@dailycollegian.com

That new college smell

H.C. Wang

It's that time of the year again, folks. The last sultry days of summer are winding down.

The smell of the bouquets of freshly sharpened pencils and previously unopened notebooks hang in the air as we begin the new academic year. The promise of crisp, colorful leaves and cooler weather are just around the corner. Sounds picturesque, right?

Think again.

To our new freshman class (not to mention a little reminder to some of our returning students who may have forgotten): Welcome to western Massachusetts, where the valley dips low and the surrounding mountains create a basin effect of heat and humidity. The dog days of summer linger into September, well after the metaphorical school bell rings and classes commence. Invest in a fan for the dorm room. If you're stuck in one of the lecture halls in the basement of Hasbrouck for 50-75 minutes, beware of heat-stroke and body odor. Dress accordingly, drink plenty of water and wear deodorant.

Welcome to western Massachusetts, where the valley dips low and the surrounding mountains create a basin effect of heat and humidity.

Whether you chose to attend the University of Massachusetts to obtain that coveted higher education degree or because it has a reputation as a party school, this column is here to help you succeed in everything from study tips to balancing school work and social life. There are plenty of things available on campus and in the neighboring area to do for fun, not all of them having to involve partying like Ozzy Osbourne until you're passed out in the emergency room getting your stomach pumped. Contrary to what is seen in movies sometimes, throwing up on the hot guy or cute girl you're trying to chat up is most likely not going to score you any points.

OK, fresh meat, you're finally in college. Unless you attended some ritzy private boarding school in the Alps, this will probably be your first time living so far away from home for a great length of time. Does that sound scary? It doesn't have to be. Of course it doesn't help if you've been assigned to all-freshmen housing. Not the greatest idea the university has ever had, sticking a bunch of bright-eyed and bushy-tailed freshmen to stew together in their misconceptions of the college life.

So, before you take out the posters of expensive cars and half-naked attractive people from behind your shot glass collection, get the facts straight. In a setting of only your fellow inexperienced peers, your first resource should always be your Resident Assistant (RA). Living there on the same floor with you, they would be the most knowledgeable in how to handle most situations that students might run into. That is, after all, what they're trained to do.

Don't give them too hard a time if they bust up one of your rowdy parties. As much as they might want to cut you some slack because they're good people, it is their job to enforce the rules. Read up on what is and is not allowed in the dorm rooms – some of the things will surprise you – so you won't get written up for something innocuous such as having the wrong kind of lamp or wrapping a cord in the wrong place.

Living in a small dorm room with another person can be tricky if you're not used to sharing your space. If you're rooming with someone you knew prior to college, just realize that even the closest of friends can sometimes make poor long-term roommate material.

If you're rooming with a complete stranger, the key is communication, as in any relationship. You're not required to be best buddies, but it would be nice if you could tolerate each other.

Work out what you will expect from one another early so there are no grievous misunderstandings later. Do you snore? Are you an early bird? Does he or she prefer to sleep with the window open? Do either of you have a food allergy? Define boundaries.

Almost everyone has heard of the sock-on-the-door signal. That's all well and good, but it is inconsiderate if you don't warn the roommate ahead of time that you're having an overnight guest. After all, it's your roommate's space too. If there is ever a problem, it is better to voice it than to keep feelings pent up.

Perhaps you are worried it is too insignificant of an issue that you don't want to come off as a whiner. As long as you address the concern calmly and respectfully, your roommate will most likely honor that request. Just think, if you don't say anything, you could be kept up until 4:00 a.m. every night by your roommate's friends who are always over until you explode due to lack of sleep. And then, no one will be happy.

College is a time of transition. My series of back-to-school articles will continue throughout the month of September. As an advice column, however, I need feedback from you. Suggestions of topics to discuss or more traditional Dear Abby letters of inquiry are both welcomed. Welcome – or welcome back – to UMass, everybody.

H.C. Wang is a Collegian columnist and can be reached at hui@student.umass.edu.

Bumming it UMass Style

Nick O'Malley

It's 5:21 a.m. and I'm sitting at the top of the ramp outside Whitmore wondering to myself: "Why am I not asleep?"

I got here roughly an hour ago with my now ex-roommate Jake. Believe it or not, there was one guy, Greg, crazy enough to beat us there. He'd been waiting since 10:00 p.m. the night before.

Why am I here? To stop being homeless.

It started a week ago when I came back to Amherst a week before the regular move-in day. Because I work for this fine publication, I came up Monday, Aug. 31 to work on the production process, which took a few days. I decided that, in the mean time, I'd crash at a couple of peoples' places until I got to move in on Sunday, Sep. 6.

In retrospect, I realize that this absolutely made me a bum.

Everything was going as planned until Thursday. Oh, Thursday. I had gone into Wheeler, the dorm I expected to live in, to visit a couple of friends. However, they had gone to the Route 9 Diner without telling me (thanks guys). So, with nothing to do, I went to my room-to-be just to check it out.

This is where the trouble began.

The door to 121 Wheeler was supposed to have the names Nicholas O. and Jake D. on the door, to designate the tenants. Instead, I saw Chris and Dan. With move-in in three days away, this was not a good sign.

After speaking with the wonderful folks and consulting my SPIRE account, it quickly became apparent that neither me nor my roommate had a housing assignment. We had no place to live. Then there was the bad news: I had to tell my mom.

A glitch here, a missed click there, a hold here and you're screwed. Whether you like it or not, we're at the mercy of SPIRE.

According to SPIRE, I never requested a housing appointment, which is weird because my roommate and I distinctly remember skipping class for our appointment so that we'd get the best room possible. I guess "select room" doesn't mean what it used to mean.

When I inquired as to why I didn't have a place to live this semester, a very kind lady at the housing assignment office informed me that I never requested a housing appointment and, being a junior was not guaranteed housing. She then suggested I look for off-campus housing.

And therein lies the problem of attending a big school where our academic lives are maintained by the second cousin of Skynet. You can get lost in the system.

Did my roommate and I screw up? I don't think so, but that was about five months ago. Did the system screw up? I don't know, the servers won't return my calls.

It's no fault of the housing people, they didn't see us hunched over the computer hitting refresh. They saw what SPIRE showed them.

A glitch here, a missed click there, a hold here and you're screwed. Whether you like it or not, we're at the mercy of SPIRE. And like any machine, it's a cold, cruel mistress that is one California governor away from ending us all.

Like a lot of people out there, my roommate and I got lost in the system. Our housing assignment (for whatever reason) never got processed and we never knew it. It happens all the time. The problem is, most people have only their Facebook statuses to complain about it. Status updates, though, will inform a mind-boggling amount of people of your problems.

If only there's something we could do about it.

But we can't. It's the product of a cruelly efficient system. Yesterday in class, my professor talked about how she would have to stand in atrociously long lines with a card to slip into a computer to pick classes. We don't even have to put pants on.

Yes, SPIRE's a good system and manages the get everyone's business done with rare exceptions. The issue is that, with such a large system on such a large campus, people can fall through the cracks and, with an inflexible system, you're kind of boned if something goes wrong.

This one goes out to all the little people. The ones whose classes get mysteriously cancelled, whose computers freeze long enough for them to not get into that class and those who spent an hour trying to figure out why they don't have the right amount of credits.

Because, with no way to go around SPIRE, we end up with conversations like this: "So should I have him bring a tent?" my mother asked.

"Oh, there's no need to camp out," the employee on the other end said, referring to the walk-in appointment.

"No, to live in."

It's always nice when Mom's got your back.

Nick O'Malley ended up getting a dorm in Northeast and now has a bed. He can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu

On health care, the GOP's POV is BS

Dan Rahrig

The American political system seems to operate under the assumption that there are two sides to every issue, and that each side has a legitimate position that should be heard, given weight to and respected. This is not an incorrect or flawed premise in most cases, since it is only fair to presume that a political party's stance is logical and credible, regardless of one's personal opinions.

However, sometimes a group's stance proves to be neither logical nor credible. Sometimes a debate between two groups stops being a matter of difference of opinions and becomes a matter of right versus wrong. When a group begins to rely on lies, deceit and slander to support its position, we should not have to continue to acknowledge and respect their point of view as legitimate.

This is the case with the current health care debate being waged in Congress and throughout the nation. Throughout August, Republican leaders have been railing against the proposed Democratic health care legislation through use of misleading rhetoric and outlandish remarks. Many prominent voices within the GOP have contended that the proposed single-payer health care option is socialist and dangerous.

Former Alaska governor and vice-presidential candidate Sarah Palin, wrote on her Facebook page on Aug. 7, "The America I know and love is not one in which my parents or my baby with Down Syndrome will have to stand in front of Obama's 'death panel' so his bureaucrats can decide, based on a subjective judgment of their 'level of productivity in society,' whether they are worthy of health care. Such a system is downright evil."

Since then, Palin's remarks served as the rallying cry for many Republicans. Her representation of the proposed legislation, however, is completely fraudulent. Nowhere in any of the proposals is there talk of government run "death panels" or a system in which a panel of bureaucrats decide who will be insured. Palin's Orwellian depiction of an America with universal health care is loosely based on an end of life counseling provision which was intended to help the sick or elderly by allowing them to consult their physicians about living wills and other "end of life" arrangements and decisions.

It is this sort of wild extrapolation that is beginning to bring down reform efforts. Though outlandish, such claims and scare tactics used by Republican leaders have struck a chord with a part of the American population that has come to view government as a dark conspirator in their lives.

Given all of this information then, why is the prospect of a government-regulated insurance option so, as Mrs. Palin put it, "evil?"

In a report in 2000, the World Health Organization ranked the United States' health care system thirty-seventh in the world, behind countries such as France, Canada, Cyprus, Saudi Arabia and Costa Rica. In July 2008 the New York Times reported that roughly 75 million people in America lack adequate health insurance or have none at all – a figure that is more than double the entire population of Canada. And despite the fact that U.S. health care is the most expensive in the world, it still pales in comparison to systems in many other industrialized nations – many of which have a universal system.

Given all of this information then, why is the prospect of a government-regulated insurance option so, as Mrs. Palin put it, "evil?" One argument is that a government-run health care system would be socialist, and that it would hurt insurance companies. But these aren't mom & pop health care companies. These are the multi-billion dollar corporations whose high prices and limited care have left millions of Americans vulnerable.

And as for this system of "socialized medicine" flying against what our country stands for? Let's a take a look at some of the government-run, "socialized" services that we now take for granted: the United States Postal Service, police departments, fire departments and our national defenses. Yet Republicans aren't out blasting these things, in fact you'd probably have a difficult time finding anyone who is against those things.

Even Medicare, which in recent town hall meetings people have called for the government to "keep their hands off of," is a government-run program. So much for the idea that a government-regulated health care system would be ineffective and faulty.

It is good and healthy for there to be debate over health care reform. But when slanderous remarks and fear-mongering are used to turn the public against something that has the potential to do so much good and help so many, we have passed the point of a sensible discussion with respectable views on both sides.

When talk of death panels and government-aided euthanasia are used as reasons to oppose health care reform, it isn't an opinion – it's a fallacy. We have to stop pretending that nobody is wrong in these kinds of debates. When this kind of warped reasoning enters the equation, there is such a thing as "wrong."

Throughout the past month we as a nation have let the GOP scare us into opposing health care before we've given it a fair shake. It's time that we see the far right's argument for what it is – wrong.

Dan Rahrig is a Collegian columnist and can be reached at drahrig@student.umass.edu

Letters to the Editor

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

NEW WORLD THEATER WORTHY OF FUNDING

Dear editor,

I am writing out of shock, outrage and disbelief. I have just learned that the University of Massachusetts Amherst has decided to cut New World Theater (NWT) out of its budget. I am an alum of New World Theater. When I was there I assisted teaching theater in Holyoke to underserved Latino youth; I worked in the literary department where I assisted choosing the New World production season. I worked alongside world-renowned directors Dipankar Mukarjee and Chuck Mike. I also helped with the planning and worked for two Intersection conferences (and have attended every one since).

New World Theater and its staff have provided not only me, but hundreds of other students and artists with remarkable professional experiences. NWT has been a haven for the creation of new works including MacArthur Genius Award recipient Guillermo Gómez-Peña (Borderscape 2000), Universes (Amerivillo) and many other influential theater makers. NWT has consistently inspired audiences throughout the New England region, as people travel for hours to get a glimpse of the work that New World produces.

NWT has been and remains to be a haven for students of color on campus and artists of color around the world. For 30 years, NWT has provided international leadership on the cutting edge of theater for all peoples with a minority voice (queer, Native American, Latino, Asian African-American and many more).

Recently NWT began the Intersections conference series. This conference has been pivotal to the creation of new works, for professional networking, for idea exchanges. Wherever the future of theater is going NWT has remained in the epicenter of this movement.

To lose NWT would be to lose a(n) (Inter)National Treasure.

As a previous student and now professional director I have never forgotten the influence and teaching that NWT passed onto me. NWT is a generous place full of encouragement and ideas. Artists throughout the world hold NWT in the highest regard. For the university to lose NWT would be devastating.

NWT is a fantastic recruitment tool for the university and a professional development training ground for students.

Since I have gotten involved with NWT, I have had amazing opportunities to become close colleagues of some of the theater artists that I not only learned about, but was personally introduced to while at NWT.

I suggest, request and demand that UMass must fund New World Theater for at the very least one more year and take longer to assess this decision. I guarantee once a full assessment is made that NWT will be recognized as a necessary thread in the fabric of the university's community, the greater Amherst community and the world theater community. Review and assess before a regrettable decision is made.

Steven Ginsburg
Co-Founding Artistic Director HartBeat Ensemble

OBAMA'S SPEECH CONCERNED MORE THAN SCHOOL

Dear editor,

President Barack Obama continues to hover over us like "Big Brother." Tuesday, Sept. 8, 2009, Obama's targeted audience was our impressionable school children.

Obama beamed a speech into schools all across the country. Although the speech was marketed as non-political and encouraged students to do well in school, it set a current precedent for future speeches by Obama to our students. It can be construed as unduly influencing our educational system with more government interference in our daily lives and should be considered an invasion of privacy.

The original lesson plans that were supposed to accompany the speech recommended students "write letters to themselves about what they can do to help the President." This was designed as a program for Obama to have direct contact with youth across the country, and therein bypassing parents. Obama might be trying to impact our youth with his philosophy, and build his constituency with millions of high school students who will be eligible to vote in 2012.

Thankfully, many school districts refused to air the speech in an attempt to keep government intrusion out of our educational system.

Note: President George H. W. Bush and President Reagan intruded in the schools when they spoke to students.

Donald A. Moskowitz
Londonderry, NH

Letters to the editor should be no longer than 550 words and can be sent to editorial@dailycollegian.com or submitted online at dailycollegian.com. We regret that, due to space constraints, not all letters will be printed.

Offensive play still stagnant

W.SOC from page 10

however, as momentum clearly shifted to the Great Danes. Lacking offensive opportunities for the Minutewomen allowed Albany to press hard on offense. After two missed shots, the Great Danes netted their third, ending the match and the Minutewomen's hopes of putting one in the win column.

If UMass wants to put together a winning season, some things are going to have to change.

"We need to improve on our speed of play," Napoli said. "Also, we can't get stuck on the sides. We've been on the players all season about changing the point of attack and basically going from the left side to the right side and vice versa."

There is still room to turn it around, as the season is still very young. Although taking a loss, Napoli did see some bright spots in the gritty match.

"I thought Lindsey Diorio played well," Napoli said. "Both Luckey and Cota played well in net, too. A couple of kids had some good days and now it's just a matter of putting it all together. The effort is there, we're definitely fighting and we got a lot more chances today than in previous matches."

The Minutewomen will return to play this Sunday, September 13, when they travel to New Hampshire for a road match against the Wildcats.

Steve Levine can be reached at slevine@student.umass.edu.

STAFF FILE PHOTO / UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Tailback Tony Nelson breaks out of a defender's grasp in last year's victory over Albany. The Great Danes return to Amherst this Saturday at 6 p.m.

Host Albany under lights

FOOTBALL from page 10

with the most questions marks, as it at times struggled to move the ball. In Kyle Haven's first start at UMass, the junior went 10-for-34 for 102 yards with one touchdown and two interceptions. Haven's performance was better than his numbers would indicate given his circumstances.

"That was a tough environment to run a squad in, it was loud with 51,000 people yelling and screaming every time we touched the ball," Morris said. "So it was hard to communicate, and he did a great job leading the offense and we didn't have a lot of hiccups in that regards and obviously we have to get better at throwing and catching.

Haven's had the typical overthrows and underthrows that every quarterback has in a game, especially a new quarterback. But in addition, the junior college transfer had multiple passes that were on target, but dropped by his receivers. Nelson, who was solid on the ground (107 yards on 19 carries), had trouble catching the ball as he dropped four screen passes thrown his way.

But to Havens, it is only a matter of time before the offense finds some rhythm.

"I felt I made good decision's [at Kansas State], I may have just been a little late or a little early," Havens said. "Just with working with the receivers, that will all come."

Jeffrey R. Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com.

555 deal
Three Medium One-Topping Pizzas
$5.55 Each!
Domino's Pizza
413 - 256 - 8911
OPEN LATE NIGHT TILL 4 AM!

Six recieve All-CAA Preseason honors

ACCOLADES from page 10

Second-Team All-American by Sports Network, an All-American by Draft Consensus as well as a member of the Phil Steele All-CAA First-Team. The senior is the leader of an offensive line that allowed a conference-low six sacks in 12 games last season. In Ducasse's 24 career starts, the Minutemen's offensive line has allowed 22 sacks.

Wideout Victor Cruz and linebacker Josh Jennings were also named to the All-CAA First-Team after each had breakout seasons in 2008. Cruz had one career reception prior to last season, but became one of the conference's best wide receivers, as he led the CAA with 71 catches for 1,064 yards and six touchdowns.

Jennings was named to the All-CAA First-Team after a 2008 season in which he had three interceptions and recorded 90 tackles, second most on the team. The senior was also named the CAA Defensive Player of the Week on three separate occasions in 2008.

Kyle Harrington was the last Minuteman named to the All-CAA team. Harrington earned a spot on the preseason second-team after ranking third in the CAA among all defensive linemen with 56 tackles.

But for Miles and the rest of the Minutemen honored this preseason, they know the awards mean nothing if they don't perform once the season begins.

"It feels good [to be awarded], but at the same time it is a preseason award," Miles said. "I know I have a lot more work to do and a lot more progress to make as the year goes on."

Jeffrey R. Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com.

UMass to face UVM, UNH

M.SOC from page 10

Curran-Hays and junior Chris Piekos as goalkeeper.

UMass fell to Hartford on Saturday, 2-0, as Curran-Hays made five saves in the loss.

"[Curran-Hays] made a couple of great saves," Koch said. "He made one short stop that was as good as any I have seen. He gave up two goals, but he didn't have much help defensively."

Piekos was impressive against a nationally-ranked BU squad Sep. 1, recording seven saves including three in the second overtime of a game that would end in a 1-1 draw. Regarding both keepers, Koch made clear that it is still undecided on which one will get the starting nod.

"It's a battle between the two, and this weekend, they'll both play and we'll decide after the weekend where they are."

The defense for UMass has allowed an average of 18.5 shots per game, while the offense has averaged nine shots per game.

Because classics are similar to regular season games with a Friday-Sunday schedule, Koch may look to incorporate a variety of different players, including some freshman into the game plan against the Catamounts, depending on the situation.

"Whether we'll play as many, I don't think so, but I don't know, because you have to go game by game and see what happens."

After the classic, the Minutemen have a week off before hitting the road again against Northeastern on Sept. 19 in a game slated for 6 p.m.

David Brinch can be reached at dbrinch@student.umass.edu

Arikian's leadership praised

ARIKIAN from page 10

... I want to do what's best for the team."

With everything Arikian has done so far, Koch has raised his expectations of his central midfielder.

"Obviously there's a fair amount of pressure on him," Koch said. "He will definitely lead this team by example."

Koch wants to see Arikian and senior Mark DeSantis become the leaders of the team because of how they lead by example. As far as Arikian is concerned, that fits in perfectly with how he sees his role on the Maroon and White.

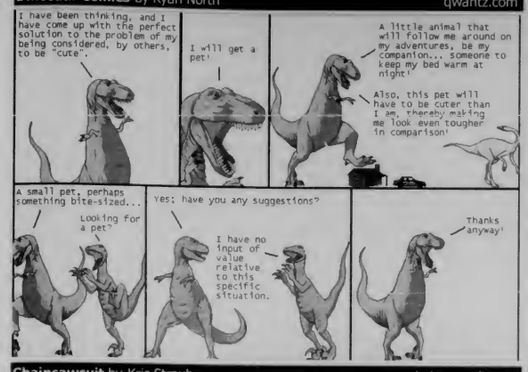
"When we do fitness or practice, I make sure I'm in the top of the group," he said. "I try to work the hardest and make sure that everyone is doing their best in practice."

That leadership will be needed most in the midfield because of its depth. This year's Minutemen feature 10 midfielders, including five newcomers (four freshmen, one transfer).

Arikian's job as mentor will be relatively easy as the midfield remains mostly intact from last season, with Mike DeSantis being the only starter from his position to graduate. Despite having several new faces, the midfield has plenty of experience, and should take some of the load off Arikian.

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill@student.umass.edu.

HERE'S THE DEAL
Our used books must pass a 10-point, three-pronged, infrared, x-ray, cover-to-cover inspection.
HALF BACK GUARANTEE
Look for books with this sticker
UMass University of Massachusetts AMHERST
University Store and Textbook Annex
Amherst Campus Center • 413-545-2619
www.umass.bkstr.com
Powered by efollett.com



LIQUORS 44
$22.99 $22.99 $31.99 $27.99 $17.99
$23.99 $35.99 $36.99 $28.99 $17.99
$28.99 $16.99 $19.99 $26.99 $30.99
$15.99 $29.99
LOWEST PRICED KEGS IN THE VALLEY
BUDS LIGHT 1/2 KEGS $54.99
KEYSTONE LIGHT 1/2 KEGS $54.99
NATURAL LIGHT 1/2 KEGS $50.99
DEPOSIT REQUIRED
Please visit us at www.liquors44.com
AT THE BARDLEY LOCATION
413-253-0346
FULL REDEMPTION AT ALL LOCATIONS
DON'T DRINK & DRIVE

3 American Red Cross Bloodmobiles
Friday, September 11th
10am - 3:30pm
UMass Mullins Center
All presenting donors will receive a RED SOX TEE SHIRT,
and, courtesy of
SIX FLAGS NEW ENGLAND,
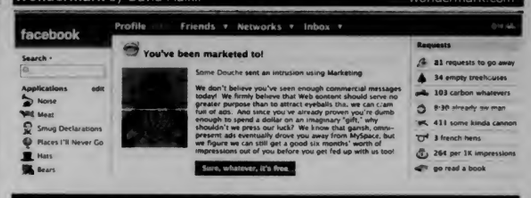
A FREE ONE DAY PASS TO THE PARK, including Frightfest, while supplies last.
Please help support the community blood supply by rolling up your sleeve on September 11th to give the gift of life.
For an appointment, please call 1-800-448-3543
A positive ID is required.
BOSTON RED SOX
SixFlags NEW ENGLAND
MULLINS CENTER
American Red Cross

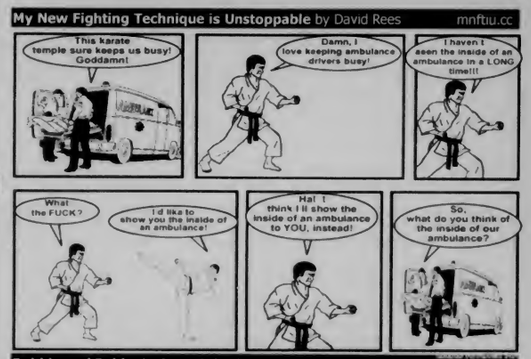
COMICS

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!
Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North — qwantz.com



Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub — chainsawsuit.com



Opiate of the People by Emily Regan

Wondermark by David Malki! — wondermark.com

My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees — mnftiu.cc

Robbie and Bobby by Jason Poland — robbieandbobby.com

Mr. Gnu by Travis Dando — weepstrip.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Now's the time to be worried about what your doctor isn't telling you...

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Maybe you should lay off Tequila for a little while, Shawne Merriman's doing it!

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Mr T pity the fool who don't go to class!

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Jaws is a biopic about you! Head down to Cape Cod and destroy those prehistoric hunks of Satan!

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
You need an Australian accent. Even Wolverine has one.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
Your girlfriend has been cheating on you in World of Warcraft. It's no use — he's level 70 and rides a gryphon.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
Write vampire stories on napkins and sell them to tweens. Your movie deal will follow shortly.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
The most amazing part of your day is this sentence.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
The models for your master plans have gotten out of hand. Seek help and join the Coalition for Tinker Toys Anonymous.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
Be wary – the squirrel community has been introduced to The Art of War.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
Playing chess in the nude is not a good way to play with yourself.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
Deny that thing on your lip, everyone else does.

SUDOKU

		7	8					1
				7		4
3	2		4				5
8	5			4			6
						7		3
	3	9	2
		5	7
				2	1		8
9								2

Quote of the day:

"I swear to drunk I'm not God."

-American folksaying

CROSSWORD

ACROSS
1. Agitate
6. Survey
10. A potter's material
14. Coil
15. Region
16. Fit as a fiddle
17. Angered
18. Fortuneteller
19. Dogfish
20. Autocratic
22. Neckwear
23. Apple or rhubarb
24. Floating in water
26. Narrate
30. Fortitude and determination
32. Weightlifter's pump this
33. Cease
35. Put on clothes
39. Pointed arch
41. Egg cells
42. Move furtively
43. Diatonic
44. Fodder holder
46. A gas found in some lights
47. Oversight
49. It attracts metals
51. A person with white hair and milky skin
54. Minimum (abbrev.)
55. Coagulated milk
56. Valid
63. Murres
64. Nile bird
65. Hoarder
66. Hue
67. Civil wrong
68. Operatic solos
69. Border
70. Concludes
71. Minimal

DOWN
1. Boat
2. Not there
3. Winged
4. Toy with a tail
5. Nontaxable
6. Adhesive
7. Chocolate cookie
8. Lascivious look
9. Voice box
10. Clicking uncontrollably
11. Female demon
12. Unearthly
13. Bakery supply
21. American ones are apple
25. Boosts
26. Violent disturbance
27. Therefore
28. Metal money
29. Nullify
30. Film
31. October birthstone
34. Throw
36. Biblical garden
37. Gin flavor
38. Dispatched
40. Flair
45. Bypass
48. Civil
50. Not vegetable or mineral
51. Critical
52. Sensational
53. Convey
54. Fogs
57. Black, in poetry
58. Encircle
59. Bog
60. Largest continent
61. Earl Grey and orange pekoe
62. At one time (archaic)

READ OUR COMICS ONLINE!
http://www.campuslive.org/~dailycol/catagory/comics

CLASSIFIEDS

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

EMPLOYMENT

Calzone Transport (Drivers) and Calzone Production Engineers (kitchen help) wanted. Apply at DP Dough, downtown Amherst.

FOR RENT

Rt. 9 Hadley 5 bedroom house. $2000/mo & utilities. 2 car garag. 1 & a qtr miles to campus. No beds. Large Lot. Music room. Skibiski Real Estate.586-1827.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 2009

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Junior Kelsey Anderson has helped the Minutewomen's defense with her play, but the offense has yet to score a goal in four losses.

UM still without win, goal

Minutewomen struggle, drop fourth game to begin season

By Steve Levine
Collegian Staff

For the Massachusetts women's soccer team, two weeks have passed since the beginning of the season and they still cannot see a win in the standings.

On Wednesday, the Minutewomen looked to change that against Albany at Rudd Field. The decision would not be designated easily, however, as the match required two overtime periods to label the Great Danes victorious.

Albany	1
UMass	0

"It was definitely a battle," UMass coach Napoli said. "Albany is a solid team which is very good one-on-one and whenever we got matched up with them in a tight space they usually humped us off the ball. We should have looked to pass a little bit quicker."

Scoreless with under seven minutes left to play in double overtime, Albany's Chelsea DeVerna eluded several defenders and placed a shot inside the right post to give the Great Danes a victory.

"One of their players pulled two of our defenders out of place, allowing space for their attacker," Napoli said disappointedly. "We got a touch on the ball but it just wasn't enough as she stayed with it and placed it near side."

As the score would indicate, the match was highlighted by a number of near misses. After a very evenly-matched first period, the Minutewomen took a 6-5 shot advantage into the second half, where they nearly broke the scoreless tie on several occasions. The best chance came in the 56th minute, when Junior Therese Smith redirected a cross right on goal, only to have it deflected away by a Great Danes' defender.

With 25 minutes remaining in regulation, the field opened up and opportunities came more frequently for both teams. Lindsey Diorio was in the middle of some of those chances, once in the 69th minute with a shot just wide, and again in the 76th minute when her header was denied by Albany's goalkeeper.

With two minutes remaining in regulation, Albany manufactured a breakaway, only to be stopped by freshman goalkeeper Emily Cota, who aggressively charged out, got low and deflected the shot high to send the match into overtime.

The first overtime period continued the competitive trend, as both teams registered two shots apiece, sending the match into double overtime.

The Minutewomen could not match Albany's efforts there,

See W SOC on page 8

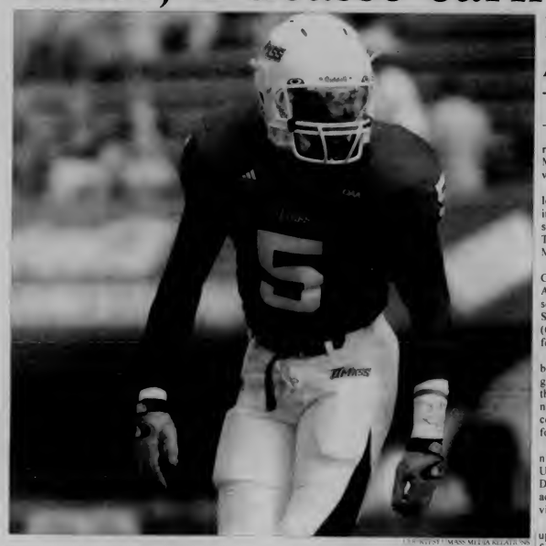
Team set for home opener

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

No one can blame the Massachusetts football team's loss to Kansas State on a lack of effort, and if it can replicate that effort, coach Kevin Morris likes the No. 17 Minutemen's chances against Albany this Saturday.

"Effort is certainly an area where we can always get better with, but we had tremendous effort so maybe that is the area that if maybe we maintain our effort and intensity we'll be in pretty good shape as a team," Morris said.

But as Morris knows, effort alone can't win football games, and UMass (0-1) can't take the Great Danes lightly when they come to Amherst to play the first game under the lights this season at 6:30 p.m. This is the same Albany team that the Minutemen opened the 2008 season against and managed a shaky 28-16 win. In that game, the Great Danes jumped out to a 9-0 first quarter lead, and were down by five at the start of the fourth quarter.



Albany rode David McCarty last season against the Minutemen, and he piled up 197 all-purpose yards with 125 on the ground in 24 carries. This time around, UMass can expec much of the same. The senior is a 2009 Walter Payton Award Candidate – the top offensive honor in the Football Championship Subdivision and the same award UMass' Tony Nelson is up for – and was the nation's second leading rusher at 154.3 yards per game.

The Minutemen's defense will need the same effort that it put forth against Kansas State to contain McCarty. UMass allowed 225 yards on the ground against the Wildcats, with 83 in the second half. After three runs of 16, 20 and 24 yards in the second half, the Minutemen defense clamped down with timely defense, not allowing another first down on all three drives.

The defense, which had its share of question marks heading into last week's game, showed flashes of the defense that helped UMass reach the 2006 FCS National Championship Game. Those flashes came with four first-time starters on defense (Ke'Mon Bailey, Anthony Monette, D.J. Adeoba and Kurt Filler) and another three who had started fewer than five games prior to this season.

Miles, Ducasse earn accolades

Duo named Preseason All-Americans in '09

Defensive back Jeromy Miles was named a Preseason FCS Second-Team All-American by Sports Network. Miles led UMass in tackles (104) and was tied for the lead in interceptions (3) in 2008.

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

Despite losing Liam Coen, one of its most decorated players of all-time, to graduation, the 2009 Massachusetts football team does not fall short when it comes to preseason awards.

While the Minutemen's preseason ranking is lower than in past years (No. 18 instead of No. 5 in 2008) the team still has players grabbing, what seems to be, every preseason award out there. Taking the place of Coen as the most decorated Minuteman this preseason is Jeromy Miles.

Miles was named a preseason Football Championship Subdivision (FCS) Second-Team All-American by Sports Network, as well as a preseason All-American by Draft Consensus. The Phil Steele Preseason All-Colonial Athletic Association (CAA) later named the senior safety – along with four other Minutemen – to the First Team.

The latest preseason honor Miles received was being named to the Buck Buchanan Award list, given to the FCS's top defensive player. Miles is the third Minuteman in the past five years to be named to the Buchanan list, and was added after compiling 104 tackles, three interceptions and two forced fumbles in his junior campaign.

"Being a part of the [Buchanan] list is definitely a great accomplishment," Miles said to UMassathletics.com at the CAA Football Media Day in Baltimore. "It lets me recognize that people actually recognize me out in the world and people view me as a top-flight player."

On the offensive side, one Minuteman is also up for one of the FCS' top awards. After rushing for 1,325 yards in 2008 – third in the CAA – Tony Nelson was placed on the Walter Payton Award list, an award given to the top offensive player in the FCS. In addition, the senior was named to the Phil Steele All-CAA First-Team after being honored as a member of the conference's First Team.

Another Minuteman that has been continuously honored this preseason is left tackle Vladimir Ducasse. The Haitian native was also named a

See ACCOLADES on page 8

"I think a lot of younger guys really stepped up. There were a lot of question marks at corner and the other safety beside me," All-American safety Jeromy Miles said of his secondary. "Shane Viveiros did a great job and made some big plays, I think he had three pass break ups and eight tackles. Ke'Mon bailey had a crazy game and Corey Davis had a solid game. Pretty much the whole secondary came in and filled the shoes for the All-Americans that left in Sean Smalls and Courtney Robinson."

The offense came out of the loss to the Wildcats

See FOOTBALL on page 8

UMass looks for first win

Koch looks for more offense

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team has scored one goal in its first two games of the 2009 season. One contest ended in a tie, while the other ended in defeat.

"We didn't play well on Saturday and that's what we have to focus on," said Sam Koch, UMass coach. "We have to focus on doing the things we need to do to be successful and do it for 90 minutes, and that's what our focus is this weekend."

The Minutemen hope to get back to producing offensively and get their first victory of the season when they take on New Hampshire Friday and Vermont Sunday in the Morgan Stanley Smith Barney Classic, held in Burlington, Vt. Both games are slated for 1:30p.m.

"We need to make sure we're getting shots on target and create opportunities, and against Hartford we didn't," Koch said.

UMass was outshot by the Hawks, 15-8 last Saturday, and fell 2-0 in its second game of the season. But, regardless of last week, Koch and the rest of the Minutemen are looking forward to the annual tournament hosted by UVM.

Junior Ben Arikian was one of 38 players named to the watch list for the Hermann Trophy. He and the Minutemen head to Burlington, Vt. this weekend to compete in the Morgan Stanley Smith Barney Classic.

"You have to come to play and were going against two difficult teams," Koch said. "UNH is big, they're good in the air, they're very physical [and] we haven't beaten them in five years and they battle, and we're going on a field that is not in great shape so it's going to be more of an air game."

UMass last defeated the Wildcats (1-2-0) back in September of 2003, with a 74th minute goal giving UMass the 1-0 victory and kept the then-Minutemen's winning streak at five.

UNH fell to Central Connecticut State Sunday, 3-1, in the final of the 20th Annual UNH Nike Fall Classic, hosted by the Wildcats.

Last season, senior Mark DeSantis tallied UMass's lone goal against the Wildcats, as UNH went on to win, 2-1.

The Catamounts (0-3-0) have yet to win a game, and have been outscored by opponents 5-2 in its first three matches this year.

"Yes, I want to win the tournament, yes, I want to win both games," Koch said.

"But I'm more concerned about making sure that our guys are sticking in their roles and doing their jobs well, and I feel if we do that, we're going to win games."

Some roles on the Minutemen's team are still undecided, with Koch still rotating redshirt sophomore Shane

See M SOC on page 8

Arikian named to Hermann watch list

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

In the 78 years there has been a Massachusetts men's soccer team, no Minutemen have ever made the watch list of collegiate soccer's most prestigious award, the Hermann Trophy. In year 79, UMass has its first representative on that elusive list, Ben Arikian.

Following a season where he led the team in points with 15 (four goals, seven assists), the midfielder has the attention of the Atlantic 10, as well as the rest of the nation.

Arikian was the only Minuteman to make the A-10 Preseason All-Conference Team after finishing the 2008 season as the Midfielder of the Year.

"It's always good to get that stuff, but I'm more focused on working on my individual play to help my team," said Arikian of receiving pre-season honors.

Arikian's all-around offensive ability has earned him much attention. He finished fourth in the A-10 for assists and was second on his team in goals. As much as his numbers stand out, they don't begin to tell the story of what the junior means to UMass.

Six of his 13 career assists were against the nation's Top-20 teams. In the Minutemen's two victories over then No. 10 Saint Louis, Arikian played a role in three of their four goals.

In UMass' first match with the Billikens, Arikian had two assists to go with a golden goal two days later to beat Charlotte, which earned him NSCAA National Player of the Week honors. His high level of play didn't begin last year, however.

The New York native started 25 of 26 games his rookie season and finished with 10 points (two goals, six assists). His quick adjustment earned him A-10 All-Rookie Team honors along with Soccer America All-Freshman Second-Team honors, and he still wasn't done producing for UMass.

In the second round of the 2007 NCAA Tournament, Arikian set up the goal that tied top-seed Boston College on the way to giving UMass a historic upset win. The Minutemen eventually advanced to their first NCAA Men's College Cup in team history.

Unlike many of the other Hermann candidates, Arikian is not much of a scorer. Not only is he not in the A-10's top 10 in scoring, he wasn't even the leading scorer for his own team (Prince Ofosu led UMass with five goals).

When the Minutemen need Arikian to be a scorer, he fills that role in comfortably, proving to be a timely scorer with three game-winning goals.

"I've always been one to help my team out before myself," Arikian said. "When I'm going to the goal, I have the best intentions

See ARIKIAN on page 8

the daily collegian

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM SEPTEMBER 11, 2009

inside this issue:

SPORTS

SEE PAGE 13

ARTS&LIVING

SEE PAGE 8

ARTS&LIVING

SEE PAGE 8

UMass prepares for swine flu threat

ough an emergency drill last April. The university is taking a number of steps s semester.

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN

CXVIX
ISSUE 28

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief William McGuinness
Managing Editor S.P. Sullivan
Business Manager Daniel Jette
Production Manager Michael Sarkes
Night Supervisor Kirsten Swenson
Advertising Manager Michael Tortorici
Advertising Production Max Detmer
Arts & Living Editor Shayna Murphy
Comics Editor Annie Keithline
Editorial Editor Nick O'Malley
News Editor Nick Bush
Sports Editor Jeffrey R. Larnard
Web Editor Brian Wood
Photo Editor Matthew Harrison
IT Manager Victor Jacek
Asst. Business Manager Matt Zolnierz
Assistant Advertising Nicole Jacinto
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Distribution Manager Norman Provost
Classified Manager Katelyn Tamilio
Asst. Arts & Living Justin Gagnon
Asst. Arts & Living Elyse Horowitz
Asst. Arts & Living Cal Scannell
Assistant Comics Andrew Witts
Assistant Editorial Michael Phillis
Assistant Editorial Hannah Nelson
Assistant News Samuel Butterfield
Assistant News Alyssa Creamer
Assistant News Jenn Heshion
Assistant Sports David Brinch
Assistant Sports Mike Gillmeister
Assistant Sports Adam Miller
Assistant Photo Maxwell Sparr
Assistant Multimedia Chris Shores

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
ON STAFF TODAY

NIGHT EDITOR
S.P. SULLIVAN

COPY EDITOR
HANNAH MCGOLDRICK

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
MICHAEL SARKES

UMass steps up to stop H1N1

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

Although it may have been the last thing on the minds of most University of Massachusetts students as they enjoyed their summer break, the very real possibility of a campus-wide outbreak of the swine flu (H1N1) virus over the upcoming semester has had university officials preparing for a wide range of possible scenarios.

On Thursday, it was widely reported by national media outlets that over 2,600 students at Washington State University have contracted swine flu, and that number could rise to as many as 9,000 students if CDC estimates are accurate. Such a situation occurring on the UMass campus is highly unlikely, but most university officials are weary of ruling anything out when preparing for the H1N1 virus, which is especially contagious among school-aged populations.

"Higher educational institutions, like K-12 schools, have been cited by the Center for Disease Control (CDC) as workplaces which may be impacted greater by the H1N1 virus than other workplaces due to the concentration of children and young adults 5 to 24 years of age," said Juan A. Jarrett, assistant vice-chancellor for human resources, in a memo to UMass faculty and staff sent out last Friday.

"This age group has shown more susceptibility to the H1N1 virus," continued the memorandum. "Reported cases of H1N1, or Swine flu, have remained steady this year, and the CDC expects reported cases of H1N1 to dramatically increase during this year's upcoming flu season."

One theory suggested by the CDC and others for the H1N1's strong effects on young people is that they have not lived through other decades when the virus was more prevalent, and therefore have less natural resistance to the virus.

In a media briefing on Sep. 3, Dr. Thomas Frieden, director of the Center for Disease Control, estimated that the H1N1 vaccine will not be available until mid-October. Clinical trials into the effects of the vaccine are still ongoing, and the CDC has also suggested that as many as 40 percent of the population will come in contact with H1N1, despite the fact that most people will only exhibit minor symptoms.

"We have worked closely with the Massachusetts Department of Public Health," said University of Massachusetts spokesperson Ed Blaguszewski. "We are certainly aware of federal guidance on the matter, and working closely on that front."

The university has a number of suggestions for students and faculty to help them avoid coming in contact with the virus, including frequent hand-washing and limiting contact with those exhibiting flu-like symptoms. Jarrett's memo also recommended that anyone exhibiting flu-like symptoms themselves should visit their health care provider as soon as possible, "in order to decide the best course of action."

University officials have based much of their response on existing federal guidelines for addressing the H1N1 threat in collegiate settings.

Besides taking cues from the government, Blaguszewski also noted that UMass is taking cues from peer institutions, as well.

"We are aware of what other colleges and universities are doing in institutions such as ours," said Blaguszewski. "They are taking their lead from the public health officials in the state. We are well-prepared, but we need to monitor the situation closely."

The UMass administration has sent out a number of emails to students in order to inform them of what they could face this semester, and the university seems intent on keeping the student body updated on what could be a rapidly-changing state of affairs.

"A lot of messages went out to parents and students as the semester approached," said Blaguszewski. "There will be communication within residence halls [and elsewhere] as the semester goes on, with university students, faculty and staff."

Students are advised to visit http: www.umass.edu/uhs/services/publichealth to get up to date information on H1N1, and to learn ways that one can avoid the virus.

Nick Bush can be reached at nbush@student.umass.edu.

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO
University officials have been taking steps to help prevent a major outbreak of the swine flu virus on the UMass campus.

3 American Red Cross Bloodmobiles

TODAY! 10am - 3:30pm
UMass Mullins Center

All presenting donors will receive a RED SOX TEE SHIRT,
and, courtesy of
SIX FLAGS NEW ENGLAND,
A FREE ONE DAY PASS TO THE PARK, including Frightfest, while suppiles last.

Please help support the community blood supply by rolling up your sleeve on September 11th to give the gift of life.

Walk-ins are welcome!
A positive ID is required.

American Red Cross

Swine flu vaccine highly effective

By Rob Stein
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — The new swine flu vaccine appears to be highly effective for adults with just one shot, a major boost to the massive immunization campaign that officials are planning to protect against the first influenza pandemic in 41 years, researchers reported Thursday.

Preliminary data from a study involving 240 adults in Australia found that a single standard dose of vaccine produced an immune response within 21 days that appeared easily adequate to protect against the new virus, known as H1N1. The vaccine also appeared safe.

The eagerly awaited findings mark the first results from a flurry of studies that scientists have been rushing to conduct as part of a crash program to develop a vaccine against the virus. The findings indicate that plans to vaccinate millions of Americans — the most ambitious vaccine campaign in U.S. history — and around the world could occur much more quickly and require far less vaccine that officials had feared when they assumed two doses would be necessary.

"This is good news," said Anthony Fauci of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases, which is leading the nation's efforts to develop the vaccine. "This is very good news. If you needed two doses that would be a major strain on vaccine supplies nationally and globally."

The Health and Human Services Department is planning to release the results of its studies testing the vaccine Friday. Fauci would disclose no details except to say that the findings will be consistent with these findings and show the response occurs even more quickly, after just eight to 10 days.

"The NIH clinical trials results verify and corroborate the exciting results" from the Australian study, Fauci said, adding there was no reason to suspect vaccine produced by any of the five companies producing the vaccine would be different.

"They are really the same. The seed virus is the same. They are made the same way," Fauci said. "Even though they are from different companies you don't usually see differences from one company to another."

Results from additional studies will be needed to see whether children need one or two doses, he added. Young children usually need two flu shots because they have never been exposed to the flu.

The National Institutes of Health is conducting a series of studies testing the vaccine on a total of 4,600 volunteers, including adults, children and pregnant women.

"We will hopefully get some information about kids from our trial in a couple of weeks," Fauci said.

The results from the CSL vaccine manufacturer in Australia will be published in the New England Journal of Medicine but were released early by the journal online Thursday because of the urgency of the findings. The study involved a standard dose of 15 micrograms of vaccine.

They were published with a second study led by Iain Stephenson of the Leicester Royal Infirmary in Britain involving 175 healthy British adults ages 18 to 50 who received another version of the vaccine made by Novartis. They received half that dose along with a substance known as an adjuvant, which can boost the vaccine's effectiveness. The study found that produced adequate immune response within 14 days. Adjuvants have been used widely in Europe, which could extend the supplies even further.

U.S. officials were considering approving an adjuvant in this country if supplies ran low.

Since the virus, known as H1N1, emerged last spring in Mexico the virus has spread around the world, causing at least 2,837 deaths, including at least 556 in the United States and prompting the World Health Organization to declare the first influenza pandemic since 1968.

Because the virus is new, most people have no immunity against it, raising concerns that it could widespread illness and death. A presidential advisory council recently estimated the virus could infect half of all Americans, leading to 1.8 million hospitalizations, including at least 300,000 who would require intensive care, and as many as 90,000 deaths. About 36,000 Americans die each year from the seasonal flu.

The virus continued to spread throughout the summer, causing outbreaks at summer camps and elsewhere, but officials are expecting a second larger wave of cases beginning this fall and winter as children and college students return to class and colder temperatures return. Increased cases are already being reported in some parts of the United States, particularly the Southeast, and nearly 5,000 cases were reported at colleges and universities in the past week.

The federal government has already spent $2 billion to buy 195 million doses of vaccine and plans to purchase enough to vaccinate every American if necessary. The vaccine campaign would be the most ambitious in U.S. history.

Federal health officials are urging everyone ages 6 months to 24 years to get vaccinated, along with pregnant women, people who care for children younger than age six, health care workers and adults 25 to 64 with health problems that put them at risk for complications.

Although the H1N1 vaccine is not set to arrive until mid-October, initial studies have shown it to be very effective, even in smaller doses than previously thought.

'Poop group' looks to clean up capital

Geese and other animals have been piling up quite a problem at the Washington Mall, leading some to volunteer to clean up their mess.

By Lori Aratani
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — Broom in hand, trash can in tow, Mark Burnett arrived at Constitution Gardens on Thursday with a mission: rid the Mall of poop.

Others might volunteer to sweep up trash, paint benches or pull weeds, but Burnett and the 14 others who joined him for the "Scoop Up" are experts in poop.

All are employees at DoodyCalls, a professional pet waste removal company. After reading about the mess that geese, ducks and other fur-covered friends were leaving behind on the Mall, the group was inspired to deploy their scoopers.

Their overtures were welcomed enthusiastically by the National Park Service, the Mall's official keepers.

"We think greatly of all volunteer efforts," said Ed Petru, volunteer program manager for the Park Service. "But this is the first time we've had someone volunteer to do the droppings."

The employees of DoodyCalls are among many groups that have stepped forward with efforts to improve the look and feel of the vast green space between the Capitol and the Lincoln Memorial that some refer to as "America's Front Yard."

In the past few years, tourists, along with environmental and preservation groups, have voiced alarm that the Mall is becoming an eyesore pocked with bald patches and weeds. Despite an infusion of cash slated to go toward renovating the Lincoln Memorial, the Reflecting Pool and the seawall in front of the Jefferson Memorial, the Mall has an almost $400 million maintenance backlog.

Petru said a group from Tourism Cares will be painting benches on the Mall. Volunteers with DC Cares, a local nonprofit group, often pitch in to help with lawn care. Earlier this week, officials with the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund announced they will spend about $96,000 to help with lawn care and sprinkler repair in a 13.5-acre area around the Vietnam Veterans Memorial.

After a brief pep talk, the 15 scoopers split into two teams and began to circle the lake. There were no geese in sight, but a group of ducks floated lazily in the Constitutions Garden Lake, near 17th Street and Constitution Avenue.

"They're laughing because they don't have to do this," David Jensen, director for sales at DoodyCalls operation in Fairfax, Va., said in a joking reference to the ducks, as he flicked his broom along the edge of the lake.

Growing fees increase the need for aid

By Matt Krupnick
Contra Costa Times

Families have always agonized over how to save money for their children to attend college, but these days planning can be even more difficult.

Colleges and universities have been raising fees sharply and often, making it particularly difficult for families to plan. The phenomenon also has widened the gap between low-income families who can secure enough student aid to pay for college and wealthier families who can pay for school themselves.

For the middle class in particular, priorities may have to change, said Sean Connors, founder of College Planning Specialists in Concord, Calif.

"They have to be realistic," Connors said. "Where can the student go? And what's realistic for the pocketbook? People generally look at one or the other. Now, more than ever, you have to be on the same page."

Every family, experts said, should check its eligibility for government need-based scholarships, California's Cal Grant and the federal Pell Grant. That exploration should begin during a student's early high-school years.

But grants and loans likely will not cover everything, especially if fees continue to rise.

"Student loans have an annual maximum per grade level that has nothing to do with fees going up," said Barbara Hubler, San Francisco State's financial-aid director. "I think it's really very hard for middle-class families to meet that extra little bit."

Families often use what are known as 529 plans – named after a U.S. tax code – that provide tax breaks on money set aside for college tuition. But, like all investments, 529 plans can be unpredictable.

Students and parents need to decide whether additional costs should be covered through loans or a student job, Hubler said.

"Either you borrow now and work later, or you can work now," she said. "Working isn't a bad thing, but there needs to be a balance (between work and school)."

Although fees in the California State University and University of California systems are lower than those in most other states, the schools themselves do not provide as much financial help to needy students as wealthier private schools, Connors said. Contrary to conventional wisdom, he said, families unable to save money should consider more expensive colleges.

"Far too many families are looking at the Cal State and UC systems and saying, 'That's the cheaper option,'" he said. "Private schools can make it much cheaper for students to go away to school."

The cheapest option, however, remains California's community colleges. Even with this year's $6-per-unit fee increase, community colleges can make the first two years of college significantly more affordable, and they can also improve an academically weak student's chances of graduating from a high-quality university.

"It's not a bad route to go," Connors said. "It's a viable option. In some cases, it's the only option."

Joy Bronson, a merit scholarship student at the College of Wooster, works in the financial aid office on campus. As fees at schools have increased, many are looking for extra help.

THE
BOLTWOOD
PROJECT™

Serving others since 1969 – and STILL making a difference!

A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)

REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS

Your life will NEVER be the same!

••EARN 1-2 CREDITS •GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE •REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN

Fall Semester 2009 — Recruitment Nights

You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!

6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)

Campus Center Room 101 • Sept. 14 (Mon) • Sept. 15 (Tues) • Sept. 16 (Wed)

• Assignment notification ONLY Thurs. Sept. 17 @ Boltwood table CC Concourse
No telephone inquiries. YOU (or a friend) must pick up the notification letter!!!

Volunteer, while earning credit!

editorial&opinion

"FREE SPEECH IS THE WHOLE THING, THE WHOLE BALL GAME. FREE SPEECH IS LIFE ITSELF" - SIR SALMAN RUSHDIE

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Despite budget, UMass construction on track

Evan Haddad

For University of Massachusetts students and employees who can't enjoy a professor's three-month retreat, a sultry summer around campus can be a frustrating holiday.

Many full-timers across celebrated the solstice this year with something of an office purging. And in turn, you can be sure that student employees took the heavy end of the bargain. That's because summertime at UMass spells one thing: Renovations.

But with more than 40 construction projects peppering the campus, from roof repair to the building of a new $50 million recreation center, the administration's thought of mounting costs and employee frustration would seem non-existent.

The question easily follows: In light of the state and local economies, could UMass be spreading itself thin with all these costly projects? Hearing the constant crash and scrape of big machinery this summer, it is certainly tempting to say yes. But in the long run, the short answer is no, not really.

Because not all building projects around campus draw their resources fistful out of the exhaustible well of student dollars. Thanks to the Division of Capital Assets Management (DCAM) a state institution like UMass can get some help.

It comes in the form of financial planning and public-building management, which employs cost-effective strategies for maintaining long-term construction. DCAM oversees hundreds of public projects statewide and makes sure that money is being spent wisely and that the people who are working on them are, well, credible and certified.

There are several on-going projects around UMass associated with DCAM. A significant one is phase two of what DCAM dubiously terms "Dubois Library Improvements." This entails the entire upgrade of a worn-out heating and cooling system and the other safety improvements that must accompany it. The estimated cost of phase two is $13 million, according to DCAM's website.

> In light of the state and local economies, could UMass be spreading itself thin with all these costly projects? … The short answer is no, not really.

Sounds reasonable enough. But, of course, no good construction is ever done without pounding hammers and making something of a racket – it's just when people have to hear and see and smell it that they get annoyed.

Picture people at the main level computers with headphones, trying to ignore the buzz, saws and drills. Picture contractors sweeping across the floor with wood beams and metal pipes. That is exactly what happened in the W.E.B. Du Bois library this summer.

It all started back in 2005 because the library's main floor had fallen into disrepair due to poor drainage and water leaks. So a project was hatched to fix some design issues, which included work on the waterproof membrane system and adorning the concrete plaza on the main level. That was phase one, and it cost $6 million.

Fast forward to June 2009. It just so happened that some employees were working in the way of the phase two renovations. For safety reasons, a temporary partition was needed where reference librarians had worked for many years, and they were forced to relocate.

For some, it was a difficult move. Those employees who have put decades into UMass surely had memories, and change isn't always easy.

Melinda Mcintosh, a passionate reference librarian of many years, is just one example. When asked for comment about the library construction, Mcintosh told me she would be happy to talk.

"Though I won't be able to say certain things about how I really feel," she said with a wink.

To get a clearer picture of the higher powers at work, I interviewed Theresa Warner, the library's assistant director for administrative services. I asked Warner how she would respond to a passer-by who, naively, scoffed at how much money appears gobbled up in these campus renovations.

"Because people can't afford to renovate their homes in this economy, they think UMass can't," she said." I know the process; I see jobs being created and maintained, and that's a good thing."

Her opinion offers a taste of that old American work philosophy: Keep building. Keep building because it keeps people at work, even if a community's need for it is sometimes usurped by more immediate needs.

I've both witnessed and participated in the Du Bois library renovations this summer, and despite everything, I'll say it's a good representation of that philosophy at work. It's a strange brew of elements swirling around in there. The feelings and personalities of the employees so greatly contrast with the seemingly gruff determinism of it all, that it's a wonder how they work together. But the amazing thing is, they do.

Evan Haddad is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at ehaddad@student.umass.edu

No Such Thing as 'Free' in government, healthcare

Ben Rudnick

I spent the bulk of this summer participating in the University of Massachusetts Oxford Summer Seminar. Studying at Trinity College is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity, especially if one takes advantage of the transportation system to see other places in Britain and Europe.

I took two trips to London, England, one to Portsmouth, England and Normandy, France and even one to the Dorset countryside. Meanwhile, others went to Edinburgh, England, Dublin, Ireland, Salzburg, Austria, Paris, France and other places. I do not know about my compatriots, but it will take me some time to put everything I did and learned into perspective, though perhaps this column will be good practice for that task.

Of course, the most important part of the experience was the people – the amazing and ever-present people. I could spend this entire piece whining or waxing rhapsodic about living shoulder-to-shoulder with so many great people in the dorms at Trinity. But I think that is better left for Facebook. Suffice it to say that the memories I will cherish the most revolve around the friends I made and that I fervently hope to keep for years to come. However, some of the most valuable lessons I learned during my time abroad have less to do with the people I was living with and more to do with those that I met along the way.

For example, Oxford is an ancient city, which imposes certain restrictions on what accommodations can be made for the physically challenged. Faced with a choice between preserving archaic streets and buildings and tearing them apart to make way for wheelchair ramps, elevators and other aids, the government and people of the city have chosen to keep their cobblestones and their history.

Meanwhile, in America, a town would be forced by the threat of legal action to destroy the old to make way for the new and accessible. In England there is pride in protecting the walls and pathways built by their ancestors. The people I spoke with were acutely aware of the fact that their dedication to their history came at the cost of making life a bit tougher for those with physical disabilities. But they believe that preserving the historic character of their city is for the greater good.

I also learned that there is a general feeling in Britain that providing health insurance to everyone is worth the sacrifices made to do so. Again, the needs of the individual are placed behind those of the society in general.

> The simple fact is that government solutions always impose some price, however unintentional it may be.

However, a friend I met told me of the injury he suffered in an accident, and notes that, if he had been limited to only the coverage provided by the government, his leg would likely have been amputated. He was fortunate to have private insurance through his employer, and so the leg was repaired instead, but this illustrates another tradeoff made by the British.

Instead of workers deciding whether to purchase health insurance, either on their own or in concert with their employers, as is the case in America, in England, the government provides everyone with basic health care coverage. In order to do this they must control the costs of such insurance, which means that state-of-the-art procedures that are available to those with private insurance are often not available to those with only the government's coverage. This is not to say that many in America cannot afford such expensive procedures as well. Rather, it means that this dichotomy has also not been solved in Britain, even with supposedly universal health care coverage.

I admit that I was out of touch with goings on in the States while I was in England, and deliberately so. I wanted to focus on the environment I was in, and so, I tried to pay as little attention as I could to the health care debate raging back home. As such, I am not up to speed on the plans that are on the table, and the various arguments in favor or against them. Therefore, I am not trying to say that Britain's universal health insurance system, or Amherst's plans to preserve the historic nature of the town, is a good or bad thing, merely to point out the essential nature of government action in any aspect of society.

The simple fact is that government solutions always impose some price, however unintentional, it may be. Although the unintended consequences of new laws and regulatory structures may pale in comparison to the problems that they solve, that does not negate the fact that they occur. The best that we can hope is to do the most good for the most people. Yet, make no mistake. That inevitably comes at the cost of individual freedom.

Whether it comes in the form of higher taxes or more laws regarding what we can and cannot do with our own bodies, any increase of government power, even in the name of the most beneficent goal, always takes a toll on our liberty. As anyone who has lived in Oxford can tell you, there is no such thing as a free lunch, and I am quite sure that the same is true for health care coverage.

Ben Rudnick is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at brudnick@student.umass.edu

POINT-COUNTER-POINT

How would you grade President Obama?

In danger of failing

Alex Perry

Grading a president is hard to do because they are responsible for so many different things. When it comes to grading Barack Obama at this point, it's only fair to grade him on what he has done with the economy up until this point.

It's the most pressing issue to Americans right now. And, ultimately, Obama was elected not only because he was a good speaker but because the public thought he would be better suited to solve our economic woes than a Republican as president.

This wasn't, of course, based on anything concrete but rather more on the message he ran on. "You've seen what republicans have done." People agreed they didn't really like what George W. Bush had accomplished or didn't accomplish as president, so that was a powerful message.

But because people accepted that message for what it was, Obama was never held responsible to lay out anything to get the economy moving forward again. Instead, we were left in wait-and-see mode. What we have seen so far is a smart and talented speaker with no business experience trying to drive the world out of the largest economic struggle in the last 30 years.

How has he handled the burden of getting the economy moving forward? Well to this point, he has outright failed with flying colors. So far since Obama has taken office, the country has buried itself into more debt then all the presidents before him combined. We are in a recession, and the country now faces its biggest deficit of all-time.

So what has Obama decided to do? Spend like a teenage girl on one of those "sweet 16" birthday parties. When Obama took office, the U.S. deficit was $455 billion, but most of that deficit was not from Bush. Rather, $323.5 billion of that deficit came from the bank rescue bill Obama pushed for in the fall.

Since Obama has taken office, the U.S. deficit has swelled to an estimated $2.2 trillion by the end of 2009. To put that ludicrous number into some perspective, the entire federal budget in 2003 was $2.2 trillion.

We're spending all this money but where has it gotten us? No where very good. When Obama took office, his administration and counterpart cronies in Congress urged the American public to rush through a $787 billion dollar stimulus bill. Their main reason for rushing the bill was people was losing their jobs. Fair enough. But they also said there was no time to read it through, meaning there was no time for the American public to understand its possible – and likely – lack of efficiency, not to mention the addition to the deficit.

The unemployment they were concerned with the stimulus' addressing at the time was at 7.6 percent and government said that, if the stimulus passed, they could limit unemployment by the end of the third quarter of this year to eight percent. The National Economic Director Larry Summers said on CNN, "You'll see the effects begin almost immediately." Obama went as far to say that the money from the stimulus would, "go directly to... generating three to four million new jobs." That was the projection. But when the third quarter actually started, unemployment was at 9.5 percent. For those keeping score at home, that's 1.5 percent above the projected maximum, and unemployment is still on the rise.

About 2.6 million people who had jobs when Obama took office no longer do. All of this despite the fact that the stimulus had been rushed through, packed with wasteful spending because Congress didn't have the time to address all of its inefficiencies. But, worst of all, the American people were misled.

It makes me wonder if Obama learned anything from Bush's mistakes. Bush was criticized for misleading the American public as well. Wasn't that the turning point for Bush in the eyes of the media and public perception when we didn't find weapons of mass destruction in Iraq?

People had felt they had been misled by their president into a war many didn't think was warranted. Well, here is Obama doing the same thing, but instead of putting American lives at stake he is putting our American currency and financial future into the garbage disposal.

And how does Obama defend his statements and assurances made prior to the stimulus passing? He is now lying about what he wanted the stimulus to accomplish. Defending his stimulus bill Obama is now saying that his stimulus was "from the start, a two-year program." He points out that not all of the money from the stimulus has been spent, and we shouldn't be feeling the positive effects of it entirely yet.

Why, when this bill was in Congress, was he saying things such as most of the stimulus money "will go out the door immediately" when really only 7.7 percent of the stimulus was spent in the six months after the bill was passed?

Obama is constantly contradicting himself and his administration. This is because he knows his stimulus isn't working the way he envisioned it would, but he still needs to buy himself more time. Obama knows if he loses the support of the American public, and, in turn, the rest of congress – much like Bush did – he will become helpless and he won't be able to fulfill the rest of his apple pie high in the sky campaign promises such as universal healthcare.

Obama gets an F through his first nine months as president but the grade is clearly incomplete because maybe Obama's stimulus bill really will end up working. After all, government has never let us down in the past.

Alex Perry is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at amperry@student.umass.edu.

Meets expectations

Ted Rogers

This being a collegiate setting, we've heard the rumor that, if your roommate dies, you get straight A's for the semester. So, what kind of grade do you get when you've inherited a country with a dying economy, two wars, skyrocketing prices and a full third of the citizenry wishing that your predecessor was impeached?

In terms of grading Barack Obama's presidency up to this point, he's done a mostly satisfactory job both at home and abroad - given his resources. In addition, most complaints lodged against him are either ill-thought-out or completely nonsensical.

First, I'd like to go over the positive work Obama has done for the domestic situation. Since we can all be honest, I'll admit something - the words "positive" and "domestic situation" are going together like oil and water at this point. The thing is, as a country, the United States would be in a lot worse shape without Obama's leadership and collected thinking.

Take, for example, the infamous bailouts that were given to failing businesses at the start of the year. These bailouts were opposed by many people, often on the grounds that it would be a good thing to see poorly run businesses take a nosedive. It takes a smarter sort, like our president, to see the forest among the trees.

Sure, it might be satisfying to see American auto companies fail after years of putting out noncompetitive, gas-guzzling cars. The Obama Administration, however, was smart enough to see that the only thing keeping Detroit from turning into a mid-western Thunderdome was an infusion of much needed cash. The same thing counts double for the Wall Street bankers.

Another comfort from the Obama Administration is the lack of hostility towards alternative views. After November's upset, there wasn't immediate talk of a "permanent Democratic majority." Obama started his term by asking for a greater understanding between ideological viewpoints.

While bipartisanship is still a mythological concept in Washington (especially on the tricky case of healthcare), this is little fault of Obama's. Rather, it's the opposition saying, "we won't" without offering viable alternatives.

While the slimier slice of the opposition is busy conjuring up images of old folk's death camps, the president has been courting Christian groups under the faith that the true religious will care about the least among us. It's things like this that give me, what's the word? Hope.

As for foreign affairs, I stand by Obama's choices. While the president may be on better terms with the world community simply by merit of not being George W. Bush, it must be said that he's doing nothing to rock the boat. When I think of the journalists held hostage in North Korea and Iran who were later released, I wonder if the same thing could have happened 10 months ago.

Obama's handling of the two-front war on terror has also been intelligently handled. While the process of handing over security of Iraq to Iraqi forces has been bumpy, it's altogether a wise thing to do. And while a larger amount of Americans are starting to oppose the war in Afghanistan, I am willing to go out on a limb and say I unconditionally support the surge in troops in order to stabilize the country.

It was a Taliban-controlled Afghanistan that allowed Osama Bin Laden and al-Qaeda to plan and execute 9/11. If more troops are needed to stop this type of human scum from pulling off another attack, I support it.

The subject of Afghanistan also makes an interesting segue to my next point: Most critics of Obama are willfully ignoring the facts. To wit, Conservative columnist George F. Will claims that the war in Afghanistan is unwinnable, given that, "Taliban forces can evaporate and then return, confident that U.S. forces will forever be too few to hold gains. Hence nation-building would be impossible even if we knew how." This type of defeatism is surprising, given he waited through eight years to say it.

On the subject of spending, radio talk show host and Vicodin enthusiast Rush Limbaugh has said, "This is the guy who has just saddled us with $11 trillion in budget deficits for the next 10 years ... We can't continue Obamaism." So, what did he say about Obama when the president opposed the war in Iraq, which contributed about 3 trillion to the deficit?

"This is a guy who sought their defeat. This is a guy, Barack Obama, who voted against every progress-in-Iraq vote that came up. This is a guy who was out there impugning the United States military along with everybody else in his party." Ah yes, the power of a selective memory.

Finally, given that the state of affairs was well on its way to hell when he got into office, Obama has done his part in making sure things will get fixed. It might be hard to acknowledge it sometimes, but things are looking up for America. Like any student who normally gets to class and finishes his work on time, Obama deserves a B.

Ted Rogers is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at tvrogers@student.umass.edu.

arts&living

YOUR WEEKEND GUIDE TO ART, MUSIC, FILM & CULTURE ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Brad Pitt stars in Quentin Tarantino's latest action film, "Inglourious Basterds." Pitt plays Lt. Raine, the leader of a Jewish-American pack of Nazi killing soldiers seeking revenge.

'Basterds' Inglorious Effort

Tarantino's screenwriting outshines his directing in his latest film.

Nicholas Ortolani
Collegian Correspondent

What a beautiful mess this film is. Quentin Tarantino's new endeavor, "Inglourious Basterds" is a rock 'em sock 'em caper that takes place during World War II.

The movie, in part, follows a group of United States soldiers in Nazi occupied France, known only as The Basterds. They are an ultra effective, ultra violent fighting squad with one mission: to kill as many Nazis as humanly possible. Brad Pitt convincingly plays their leader, a serious man who loves his job, but rarely shows it. When he orders his men to collect 100 Nazi scalps each, there is not much joy in his voice, just the seriousness of describing a necessary aspect of the job.

Meanwhile in a subplot somewhere, revenge is brewing.

The film opens in France, 1941, in a small pastoral scene. Colonel Hans Landa, of the S.S., is in charge of locating Jewish families in hiding. He visits the house of a French milk farmer to question him about the neighboring families. This scene is Tarantino writing in top form. The scene is long, but dramatically so.

Tension builds as the motive of the characters become clearer. Landa, played brilliantly by Christoph Waltz, is a manipulative and amoral figure. He is so sure of himself that he seems incapable of fear. After he concludes that there is, in fact, a Jewish family hiding in the house, he calmly, and with businesslike ease, orders their execution. One girl, however, flees.

That girl is Shosanna (Melanie Laurent). The film then finds her three years later, where she now owns a cinema. She meets a Nazi war hero Frederick Zoller (Daniel Bruhl), who becomes enamored with her. He is so infatuated that he convinces Joseph Goebbels to hold the premiere of his new film, "A Nation's Pride", about and starring Zoller, at Shosanna's cinema.

The two distinct plots of the film then meet. Shosanna wishes revenge on the Nazi's for what they did to her family, so she decides to host the premiere. The Basterds want to get into the premiere because, well, it's what they do.

There are many great scenes in this film and for the most part Tarantino's script is incredibly constructed. His characters have a distinctly delicious way of leading each other on, manipulating them, and spelling things out for them, which make his dialogue so savory. This is Tarantino doing what he does best; writing cool, manipulative, tense dialogue. One small flaw with the script is an occasional voice over narration, a device rarely used by Tarantino, which comes in sporadically and clumsily, and stands out in the otherwise impeccable narrative.

Unfortunately in this film, Tarantino the director betrays Tarantino the writer. He adds a stylistic flair to his films through many cinematic devices. In this particular film, he has sacrificed none of these characteristics of the Tarantino style. This is the greatest weakness of "Basterds."

There is still all the gloss and slickness of a Tarantino film, but the style clashes with the subject matter. The final act of a film is set to David Bowie's "Cat People (Putting Out Fire)," but it takes place in 1944, approximately 38 years before the song's publication. This tends to make one's brain hurt. Most importantly, Tarantino must admit that he does not make action movies. He is excellent at making an action-filled movie, but he stresses the violence and action of this movie a little more than he should.

Tarantino's films have become increasingly less serious as the years go by. He's gone from absolute masterpieces like "Pulp Fiction" and "Jackie Brown" to fair movies such as "Death Proof" and "Basterds."

This film is not bad, and even a sub par Tarantino film has a lot to offer. But Tarantino is not working to his full capacity. This film, which has beautifully tense and serious moments, is not a serious feeling film (take note of the ending). Maybe this is Tarantino's goal, but it seems to fall a bit flat. He is capable of making films that do everything this one does, but better.

Nicholas Ortolani can be reached at nortolani@student.umass.edu.

Burnham Coming to UMass

By Justin Gagnon
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts will host its annual First Week comedy show this Saturday night at 9 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. The show will feature two comedians, Amy Anderson and Bo Burnham.

Anderson, the lesser known name on the ticket, is a stand-up comedian who has appeared on shows such as "Hannah Montana." She describes herself as "a funny American girl who happened to be born in Korea and adopted by Swedish parents in suburban Minnesota."

Bo Burnham is a 19 year old comedian from Hamilton, Mass. He made a name for himself on YouTube by posting a variety of satirical songs.

Burnham, the youngest person ever to record a Comedy Central special, will be stopping at UMass amid his Fake ID Tour.

Admission to the performance will be $5 for UMass students with proper I.D.

Justin Gagnon can be reached at jrgagnon@student.umass.edu.

Bo Burnham and Amy Anderson will be at the FAC Saturday night.

USF Grad Wins Big on 'Millionaire'

By Kerry Klecic
The Oracle (U. South Florida)

Nearly two weeks ago, University of South Florida graduate student William Capp sat in the fastest finger circle and waited for his chance on the game show "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire" — a chance that never came.

On Tuesday, Capp was on the show again on Tampa TV — and this time he got his opportunity.

Sitting in the hot seat, Capp battled his way through host Meredith Vieira's questions and walked away with $25,000 after correctly answering the $100,000 question.

"I was extremely excited to get to the first ($25,000) milestone and even more so when I got the $50,000 question correct," Capp said. "I didn't have any lifelines, and I wanted to get as far as I could and was willing to risk the $100,000 question if I had made it to $100,000. I would not have took the same risks and would have walked."

Capp originally was in the fastest finger circle for "Who Wants to Be a Millionaire's" 10th anniversary show on Aug. 23. Those who did not get the chance to sit in the hot seat were invited back by Vieira.

As Capp climbed his way up the millionaire ladder Tuesday, Vieira fed the $100,000 question: "What popular women's magazine began in the 1930s as a menu leaflet handed out at A&P supermarkets?"

Capp's answer was "Good Housekeeping," when the correct answer was "Woman's Day."

"[It was] so different than being at home," Capp said. "Most of the time, I can answer the higher dollar questions without even seeing the choices, but in that seat life becomes different. There is so much going on: which camera to look at, all the people staring at me, making sure not to make a dumb mistake — use my time wisely. A lot of pressure."

Capp used all of his lifelines in the early stages of the round. He asked the audience on his $4,000 question, which was to define the meaning of the Chinese food "Bok Choy."

In a jam, Capp used his final three lifelines — phone a friend, double dip and ask the expert — on the $16,000 question, which related to the reason why England's Prince Harry visited the United States last year. The answer was to attend a charity polo match.

Out of lifelines, Capp took a risk at $100,000 but said he was happy with the whole process of being on the show. He said he will use the money to pay off his student loans.

"This experience has been fun, exciting, and humbling. I am looking toward applying to other shows like 'Wipeout' and 'Amazing Race,' so if anyone wants to join me for 'Amazing Race' let me know," Capp said.

Dr. Gary Marcus from New York University is researching the popular video game to see if it could actually be used to better education.

NYU Students Study the Psychology of 'Guitar Hero'

By Sara Gates
Washington Square News (NYU)

You might not get credit for a perfect score on "Guitar Hero," but if you can explain the psychology behind the addicting game you will likely get an "A" in a new class at New York University.

The one-semester course, titled "Guitar Heroes (and Heroines): Music, Video Games and the Nature of Human Cognition," is offered as a weekly honors seminar to qualifying NYU freshmen.

Dr. Gary Marcus, a professor of psychology and director of the NYU Center for Child Language, came up with the idea for the seminar based on a growing interest in music and a curiosity of whether video games could be used to better education.

"Freshmen seminars ought [to] be fun and intellectually provocative," Marcus said. "I thought this would fit the bill."

In the seminar, students will discuss the psychology of "Guitar Hero" and the human mind's attraction to the simple action of pressing buttons in conjunction with colored lights on a TV screen.

"From a certain perspective, the game ought to be incredibly boring," Marcus said. "Yet many people find themselves entirely sucked into the game. What does that say about how our brains are constructed?"

Although an article in the New York Post this month characterized the seminar as being entirely about "Guitar Hero," students learned the first day that it was not so.

"It's not what it's been represented in the papers," said Phillip Juncker, a freshman in the class.

"Guitar Hero" and other video games aside, the seminar will mostly delve into various forms of music from the viewpoints of both cognitive and evolutionary psychology.

"The primary focus is on the psychology of music, with video games serving as counterpoint," Marcus said.

Marcus's approach to the course has allowed students to view music from a different perspective.

"I'll never listen to music the same way again, especially as a dance major," Tisch freshman Marlon Feliz said.

Although students won't learn how to score above 90 percent on Guitar Hero (on expert), they will learn the relationship between psychology and video games, and why they are so addictive, Marcus said.

"Society doesn't really need people to excel in mashing colored buttons in synchrony with a TV monitor," Marcus said, "but any technique that can be used to rapidly and effectively impart new skills is worth serious consideration."

-- Additional reporting by Lana Lee. Sara Gates is features editor.

Red Summer Sun shines on Monkey Bar

By Sara Cody
Collegian Staff

Local band Red Summer Sun is ringing in the new semester by playing a show at the Monkey Bar on Friday, September 11th.

Monkey Bar opens its doors at 11 p.m. with a $5 cover charge.

"We're having fun when everyone else is having fun," said guitarist Pete Hunt. "Our main objective is that we want everyone to be really involved and be really happy. What we'll tend to do is we'll tend to really go out in the audience and involve them."

Hunt is a senior at Cornell University, while band mates Adam Fisher (bass), Andrew Gregory (vocals and rhythm guitar) and Nick Mathews (percussions) are all seniors at the University of Massachusetts.

The band name "Red Summer Sun" is a reference to a song by Third Eye Blind. Aside from being a tribute to one of their major influences, the band felt the name "Red Summer Sun" fit the type of music they play.

"We play happy music for everyone," said Mathews, which is why the band gravitates more towards pop music. "We liked that it was summer-y, which is the season we think our band invokes the most."

Hailing from the North Shore, Fisher, Gregory, Hunt and Mathews all attended the same high school. Mathews, itching to use his drumsticks, brought the band together. "High school is just not fun without a band," he said. He first called his friend Hunt, whom he'd known since their days playing youth soccer. He also convinced his friend Fisher to join. At first, he was reluctant because he felt his skills were not developed enough to be in a band. "Yeah, he showed me," laughed Fisher, who is now the band's leading bass player.

Gregory was more of a serendipitous addition. While in their junior year, Gregory, a hulking football player, tagged along with one of his friends to band practice because he was interested in learning how to play guitar. "It wasn't his guitar that impressed us. He started singing along with one of the songs and we all just kind of stopped playing and said 'that's what we need!'" said Fisher.

Since high school, Red Summer Sun has signed with a manager and has played at many different nightclubs in Boston. The have also traveled to New York, Georgia, Vermont and hope to expand their tours in the future. The resounding favorite event of the band was playing the Hatch Shell in Boston during Radio 92.9's Earthfest on May 30, 2009.

Mathews was excited to share the same stage as the musicians he had looked up to, such as conductor John Williams and singer Neil Diamond. "I mean, ever since you're a kid, you're in Boston, that's where you want to play ... amazing," said Mathews. Their goal within the next year or two is to sign with a major label.

Despite their recent success and big ambition, this ragtag group of "high school buddies" seems to keep each other grounded and realistic about their careers. They intend to finish college before pursuing a deal with a major label, and hope that they can support their families in the future by doing what they love to do.

In the mean time, they are focusing on what they can do to advance their music career. "I would really like to get another album out, and play a few more shows, get the fan base built up and get ready for the next stage," said Fisher.

Red Summer Sun also offered up some advice for those who want to be in a successful band. "You want to be real about it, and you want to put in a lot of time. It's a lot of money, but it's also a lot of fun. It's definitely worth it," said Gregory.

Sara Cody can be reached at scody@student.umass.edu

Red Summer Sun, a local band of high school friends, will be playing tonight at the Monkey Bar. There is a $5 cover charge and doors open at 11pm.

Ellen takes Paula's place on 'Idol'

By Maureen Ryan
Chicago Tribune

So much for the idea that Paula Abdul might reach some sort of accord with "American Idol" and return to the show for its ninth season.

Nope.

Talk show host Ellen DeGeneres will be "Idol's" fourth judge in Season 9, Fox announced Wednesday. Before she begins her stint, a series of guest judges will be part of the audition process. Those guest judges include Victoria Beckham, Mary J. Blige, Kristin Chenoweth, Joe Jonas, Neil Patrick Harris, Avril Lavigne, Katy Perry and Shania Twain.

"I'm thrilled to be the new judge on 'American Idol,'" said DeGeneres. "I've watched since the beginning, and I've always been a huge fan. So getting this job is a dream come true, and think of all the money I'll save from not having to text in my vote."

TV Guide posits that DeGeneres will be a softer judge who will counteract Kara DioGuardi's judging style.

"Hopefully I'm the people's point of view because I'm just like you. I sit at home and I watch it and I don't have that technical ... I'm not looking at it in a critical way from the producer's mind," DeGeneres said at a taping of her talk show, according to TV Guide.

Back in August, when the news broke that Abdul was leaving the show, some thought that she and Fox might patch things up before Season 9 began. But Fox, which started lining up guest judges within days of Abdul's departure, is done with Paula, at least as far as Season 9 is concerned.

It's something of a risk for the show, which has seen some ratings erosion in recent seasons. Will DeGeneres' brand of folksy humor be as popular as Abdul's patented brand of erratic effusiveness? Who knows.

Regardless, it's a shame that Fox isn't reverting back to the three-judge format. Four judges seemed to be one too many in Season 8, when many episodes of "Idol" ran long. That was quite irritating.

Critic Alan Sepinwall also didn't like the four-judge format, and he thinks that the new season could be "awkward," despite DeGeneres' ease on camera.

"Take Kara — and/or the equally useless Randy Jackson — out of the mix, and this probably all sorts itself out nicely by the end of the semi-final round. Leave four judges in there, and make one of them an incredibly high-profile newbie, and this has the potential to be awkward for at least half a season, if not more," Sepinwall wrote.

If you're an Abdul fan, by the way, you're in luck. She'll appear in the Sept. 20 episode of Lifetime's "Drop Dead Diva."

Talk show host Ellen DeGeneres will take the seat of former American Idol judge, Paula Abdul

How to organize your Facebook

By Jeff Elder
Collegian Staff

Once upon a time you joined Facebook and took the attitude of "The More the Merrier." Friend's requests? Sure! C'mon in. I barely remember you from middle school and you appear to have joined some kind of cult, but I'm sure you'll behave. Weird applications that take up half my screen? Oh, that'll be no problem.

Now you sign on and it's like your trapped in the Mall of America. There's stuff everywhere competing for your attention (Lil' Farm Life and Fishes and Gifts) and that middle school friend writing diatribes that seem about to crash your computer.

Have no fear. We're about to clean all that up. Why don't you create a new window and bring up Facebook. We can walk our way through together.

First let's get rid of stuff.

KILL OFF DUMB APPS

Chances are you don't want about half the applications you've approved for your page. A friend requested you do something, and before you knew it you'd OK'd it. There are several ways to edit your applications. The easiest might be clicking on the Applications link at the bottom left corner of your page. That raises a pop-up box that includes the link Edit Applications. Click there and you'll be taken to your Applications Settings. Let's get rid of some of these. Run through the toggle switch on the top right and look for apps you don't use anymore (or never did). By clicking on the X on the right of them you can delete them. I'd go through each choice on the toggle switch and clean them all up.

HIDE ANNOYING FRIENDS

Now let's deal with some annoying friends. I don't recommend unfriending people. It leads to drama and hurt feelings. (Been there.) And you might regret it later. Far less emotional is the "hide" option. The easiest way to accomplish this is to do it as people annoy you. (To put it bluntly.) Go to your Facebook Home page. There on the Newsfeed are all the posts and status updates of your friends. See somebody who's been bugging you? Hover your cursor to the right of their post and "Hide" appears. Click it. That friend is now hidden from your Newsfeed. You can also do this with applications. (I highly recommend hiding anything with Farm in the name.) If you ever want to reconsider hiding someone or something, you can click Edit Options at the bottom of your Newsfeed and see who you've been hiding.

HIDE STUFF FROM A PSYCHO FRIEND

But wait, maybe you have a friend who has gone pretty psycho — perhaps temporarily — and you need to shut them down. This requires a trip to your Privacy Settings. Click on Settings on the top of your page, and then Privacy. Click on Profile. You now can choose how to control who can see different parts of your profile. One problem might be the friend in question posting weird stuff to your wall. Let's stop that right now. Go down to Wall Posts, select Customize from the toggle switch, and add the person's name. They can no longer post to your wall. If you're having problems with a friend, you might also want to perform this same operation on the status and links option, so they can't see what you're doing. Click Customize and type in the name of the person you don't want to see your status updates. While we're here, it's a really good idea to control who can see photos tagged of you. (Like employers seeing party picks.) Customize the Photos Tagged of You option, and the Edit Photo Albums Privacy section.

CREATE "CHANNELS" OF FRIENDS

Still with me? Good. Because we've actually arrived at my favorite section: How to Organize Your Friends. This is a huge time saver. The best thing about Facebook is that it brings so many aspects of your life into one place. That's also the worst thing. You might not want to jumble up work friends, family, high school friends and people from around town. But how can you just see one section of these at a time? Let's create some friends lists. This lets you create "channels," so you can watch the Jen's Friends Channel on Facebook, or the Jen's Family channel.

Click on the Friends link at the top of your Facebook page. Once there, click on Create New List. Let's create a Work Friends list. Name it that and run through your friends, selecting everyone you work with. Click Save List. Now you can click on your Work Friends list on the left side of your home page, and see only that group of people. This might be handy on Monday morning before you head into work, so you can see what everybody's been up to over the weekend. Or if there are changes afoot in the office and you want the lowdown.

I have half-dozen lists. It's very helpful for me if I want to see what my "Media Types" are up to, or my "Very Close Friends," "My Family" or "Newsmakers." I just find it very tiring to look through my newsfeed at everyone all together. And if I need to find out very quickly what's going on with, say, people at work, I can click to that "channel," and see right away.

SUPER NEAT-O TRICKS

Want to call one of your Facebook friends, but don't have their number handy? Go to your Friends list by clicking Friends at the top of the page. On the left you'll see the link Phonebook. Click it and you'll see the phone numbers of all your friends — who haven't hidden that information. Which, actually, is not such a bad idea. But wait: You want some people to be able to call you and contact you, right? So this is where things get super neat-o. If you created friends lists of close friends and family, you can allow them to see your contact info, but not anyone else! How cool is that? Just click on Settings, Privacy, Contact Info, Customize. Some Friends, and type in the name of the lists of intimate connections you created. Now only those trusted friends can see your contact info.

What if you want to see what all your friends are saying about a certain topic, like the favorite sports teams or health care? Type what you want in the search box at the top of the home page. Scroll down a little on that results page and you'll see what your friends have posted about health care. Click View All Posts by Friends, and you'll see everything your friends are saying about your topic.

GOT SOME TIPS?

I hope this has helped you clean up your Facebook page some. I believe that "channels" will become more and more necessary to organize our online lives. The better you organize, the more focused and rewarding your experience can be. And you don't have to spend so much time online!

Remember, you can always turn to the Help Page on Facebook with a question.

It's time to finally delete those friends you really don't talk to and delete all those pointless apps. Start of this semester with a clean slate on your facebook.

CINEMARK
For advance tickets & showtimes visit
cinemark.com
or call 1-800-FANDANGO + Exp Code 1118#
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL
FIRST MATINEE SHOWTIME (7 DAYS A WEEK) $5.50
ADULT MATINEE BEFORE 6PM $6.25 • STUDENT $7.00 (WITH ID)

FINAL DESTINATION: DEATH TRIP - REAL D 3D ($2.75 SURCHARGE) [R] ⓘ
140 450 705 915

◆ SORORITY ROW [R] ⓘ
150 440 750 1030
◆ TYLER PERRY'S I CAN DO BAD ALL BY MYSELF [PG13] 110 410 700 1005
◆ WHITEOUT [R] ⓘ 120 430 740 1020
◆ ALL ABOUT STEVE [PG13]
130 425 710 945
◆ EXTRACT [R] ⓘ 145 435 735 1010
◆ GAMER [R] ⓘ 115 405 720 1000
DISTRICT 9 [R] ⓘ 155 445 730 1015
JULIE & JULIA [PG13]
105 400 725 1025
THE TIME TRAVELER'S WIFE [PG13]
125 420 715 950

CinéArts
◆ 9 [PG13] 100 310 520 745 955
INGLOURIOUS BASTERDS [R] ⓘ
135 455 820

◆ NO PASSES-NO CLASSIC SUPERSAVERS

Kellogg pursues national attention

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

Derek Kellogg will only schedule games that are beneficial to the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

By the second-year coach's definition, that means they need to potentially get the Minutemen on national TV. If it isn't receiving national attention, he wants the game to be somewhere in Massachusetts in order to rebuild the fan base his team once had.

Nearly every non-conference game UMass plays this season will accomplish just that, whether it's the season opener at the University of Central Florida or going to Texas to play Baylor.

Kellogg has no doubts that his team's first game will be on national television for a number of reasons. The main one is a partnership the Minutemen have with Conference USA that rewards teams with national television exposure in exchange for playing one of the conference's teams.

With that game featuring UCF freshman Marcus Jordan (son of Michael Jordan) playing his first game on Friday, Nov. 13, Kellogg feels that the game is sure to get national exposure.

Strategically, the game against the Knights gives UMass another benefit.

"Ironically, it's an area that has turned into a recruiting base," Kellogg said, referring to the signing of Florida native Freddie Riley.

Kellogg understands that in order to recruit the nation's best players, the Minutemen will have to compete with the country's best teams, which is why they have one of their toughest schedules in recent history.

UMass will play in the Legends Classic Championship on Nov. 27-28, competing against Rutgers and either Florida or Michigan State in Atlantic City, N.J. The Minutemen will also play Memphis in Boston on Dec. 19.

"In putting together the schedule, I wanted to have a very challenging non-conference schedule that will get us as many tough opponents as possible," Kellogg said. "In the end, it's the kind of schedule that I know the guys want our schedule to be."

Before the Minutemen return to national prominence, Kellogg acknowledges that he needs to raise the team's popularity in Massachusetts, which is why he scheduled four games in areas of Massachusetts other than Amherst (Boston, Worchester and Springfield).

With the exception of their game against Holy Cross in Worcester, none of these games will inconvenience the students. They are all during winter break, and after selling over 5,000 seats to the MassMutual Center in Springfield for last year's game against Dayton, he decided that going back was necessary if it could be played when students aren't in session.

Planning a schedule with as much diligence as Kellogg has its price. The schedule wasn't released until Sept. 3 because he had to find a team willing to play at the Mullins Center on Dec. 11, and Kellogg didn't want to change the date or venue.

Once Grambling State agreed to come to Amherst on that date, UMass could release its schedule.

Even with a complete schedule, the Minutemen are still waiting for the Gazelle Group, which is in charge of the Legends Classic, to find a new opponent to play in Amherst on Nov. 21. The group moved former opponent Toledo to East Lansing to play the Spartans a day earlier.

UMass is currently scheduled to play Cornell on Nov. 18 and Saint Francis on Nov. 24 as part of the tournament.

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill0@student.umass.edu.

Guard Ricky Harris tries to get past former Boston College guard Tyrese Rice in last year's home game against Boston College. The Minutemen are schedule to play BC again on Dec. 23.

2009/2010 Men's Basketball Schedule

^11/07/09 vs. Dowling College 7:00 p.m.	*1/16/10 at Temple TBA
11/13/09 at UCF 8:00 p.m.	*1/20/10 vs. St. Bonaventure 7:00 p.m.
11/18/09 vs. Cornell 7:30 p.m.	1/23/10 at Baylor 4:00 p.m.
11/21/09 vs. TBA 7:00 p.m.	*1/27/10 at Saint Joseph's TBA
11/24/09 vs. St. Francis (NY) 7:00 p.m.	*1/30/10 vs. Charlotte TBA
11/27/09 vs. Rutgers 5:30 p.m.	*2/3/10 vs. Xavier TBA
11/28/09 vs. Fla./Michigan State TBA	*2/6/10 at Rhode Island 2:00 p.m.
12/02/09 vs. Quinnipiac 7:00 p.m.	*2/11/10 at Duquesne TBA
12/05/09 vs. Holy Cross TBA	*2/14/10 vs. Saint Joseph's TBA
12/07/09 at Seton Hall TBA	*2/17/10 at George Washington TBA
12/11/09 vs. Grambling State 8:00 p.m.	*2/21/10 vs. Saint Louis 4:00 p.m.
12/19/09 vs. Memphis 6:00 p.m.	*2/27/10 at Dayton TBA
12/23/09 at Boston College 7:00 p.m.	*3/3/10 at La Salle TBA
12/30/09 at Davidson TBA	*3/6/10 vs. Rhode Island 7:00 p.m.
*1/06/10 vs. Fordham 7:30 p.m.
!*1/10/10 vs. La Salle 2:00 p.m.
*1/13/10 at Richmond TBA

^ Exhibition, * Conference game,  Played on TD Banknorth Garden, ! played in Worcester

555 deal
Three Medium One-Topping Pizzas
$5.55 Each!
Domino's Pizza
413 - 256 - 8911
OPEN LATE NIGHT TILL 4 AM!

Minutemen hope for A–10 repeat

Minutewomen look to rebound

By Gary Tarantino
Collegian Correspondent

The 2008 Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year, Ken O'Brien, and the Massachusetts men's cross country team have been chosen to repeat as A-10 Champions for the 2009 season behind a hefty veteran squad of 13 upperclassmen.

The Minutemen will compete in five events before the A-10 Championships on Oct. 31 in St. Louis, Mo. The men open their season on Sept. 12 with the Dartmouth Invitational in Hanover, N.H. A week later, the team will take on Connecticut, Maine and Vermont for its only home meet. The squad will then have two weeks of rest before competing in three events to finish out the regular season.

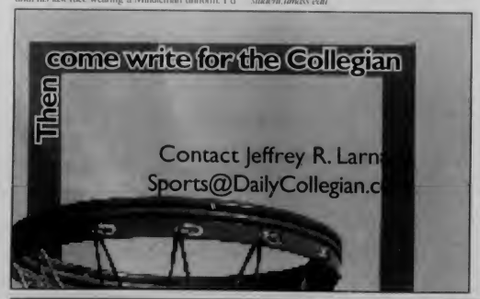
UMass competes again on Oct. 2 in the Paul Short Invitational in Bethlehem, P.A., followed by the New England Championships eight days later in Boston, Mass. The Minutemen conclude their regular season in Terre Haute, Ind. to compete in the ISU Pre-Nationals on Oct. 17. The last two events the team will compete in are the NCAA Regional Qualifier in Boston on Nov. 14, and the IC4A Championships on Nov. 21 in New York.

The conference head coaches picked Richmond to finish behind the Minutemen, followed by Duquesne, Dayton, La Salle, Charlotte and Saint Joseph's University. Rhode Island and Saint Bonaventure were picked to finish at the bottom of the 14-team conference, respectively.

The 2009 squad will be without their number-one runner from last year, Nils Fischer, and the team's most consistent runner, Jesse Regnier, who graduated last spring.

"It will be very difficult to replace the loss of Nils Fischer this fall. He became the catalyst that provided us the spark for the entire season," O'Brien said. "Jesse Regnier was the team's most consistent performer, and leader, from the day he won his first collegiate cross country race as a freshman at UMass, until his last race wearing a Minuteman uniform. I'd love a team of five Jesse Regniers every year."

Instead, the Minutemen will look to 2008 All-Conference runner Jonathan Pierce and fellow seniors Nicolai Naranjo and Andrew Mulvaney. Last season at the Atlantic 10 Championships as a junior, Pierce finished first on the team, ninth overall. Nicolai Naranjo placed third on the team, 16th overall, and Andrew Mulvaney placed fourth on the team, 18th overall. This effort was crucial for UMass in capturing its second-ever Atlantic 10 crown by one point over Duquesne. The Massachusetts women's cross country team is predicted to finish seventh (as they placed) at this years A-10 Championships, in a pre-season ranking voted by the league's head coaches. Richmond is selected to defend its 2008 A-10 title.



The rest of the A-10 Championship finishes are projected with Charlotte finishing second, followed by Dayton, Duquesne, La Salle, Xavier and Saint Joseph's to finish eighth. Saint Louis follows with George Washington, Fordham, Rhode Island, Temple and Saint Bonaventure rounding out the bottom. No team is projected to make a big jump in the Championships from last season except La Salle, who finished eleventh last season and is expected to finish fifth this season.

The Minutewomen will also compete in five events before the A-10 Championships. Just as the men's team, the women's team will also open their season on Sept. 12 with the Dartmouth Invitational. The following week, will be against cross-state rival Boston College, as well as Vermont and Maine in Amherst. The Minutewomen will participate in the Paul Short Invitational and will make the trip to Boston on Oct. 10 to compete in the New England Championships.

UMass will have one final event before the A-10 Championships, the Albany Invitational on Oct. 17.

The Minutewomen will look to its two All-Conference runners to help remove itself from the middle of the A-10 to its pinnacle. Junior Shiyi Zan finished first for UMass in every event last season and in four out of those six events, she finished within the top 10 overall. Sophomore Karen Rou placed second for UMass in every event last season except for one where she placed fourth.

Gary Tarantino can be reached at gtarantino@student.umass.edu.

Cross Country 2009 Schedule

09/12/09 Dartmouth Invitational 10:30 a.m.

*09/19/09 UConn-Maine-Vermont 11:00 a.m.

10/2/09 Paul Short Invitational 11:00 a.m.

10/10/09 New England Championships 1:00 p.m.

10/17/09 ISU Pre-Nationals 11:00 a.m.

10/31/09 Atlantic 10 Championships 10:00 a.m.

11/14/09 NCAA Regional Qualifier 2:30 p.m.

IC4A Championships 10:30 a.m.

*Home meet

Mulvaney, Zan expected to lead UMass in 2009

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts cross country teams will travel to New Hampshire for the Dartmouth Invitational on Saturday, with the men looking to take their first step towards back-to-back Atlantic 10 titles.

The Minutemen, who edged Duquesne by one point at last season's A-10 Championships, will face a new set of challenges this season. On paper, the team didn't lose many players, but the caliber of athletes that left the roster puts the team in a difficult position. The team will have to work hard to fill the void left by the departure of two of the team's top performers, Nils Fischer and three-year captain Jesse Reigner. However, UMass coach Ken O'Brien believes the roster is loaded with experienced athletes who can step up and lead.

"As the indoor and outdoor [track and field] seasons progressed, I noticed some of the younger competitors step up and improve performance-wise and mentally. They started to become active leaders and… accept responsibility," O'Brien said.

While the younger members on the team are improving, the Minutemen have experienced veterans to support them in seniors Andrew Mulvaney, Jonathan Pierce, Nicolai Naranjo and Andrew McCann. Mulvaney had a particularly strong season in 2008. He posted the team's best time in both of the meets in which Fischer did not compete, and finished two places behind him (fourth) when the two went head-to-head at the A-10 Championships.

Pierce finished first on the team at that meet, and also had an impressive track and field season. The same could be said for McCann and Naranjo, who consistently finished top five on the team.

"We have a schedule which is relatively consistent [with those of recent years]," O'Brien said. "We use the first two meets to shake out the competitors. It is a schedule we are familiar with and can plan around."

Meanwhile, the women's team will try to get on track early after a sub-par 2008 season. Redshirt junior Shiyi Zan looks to lead the Minutewomen once again, and will be at the forefront of a talented group of sophomores and juniors.

Zan was undoubtedly the team's best competitor last season, notching the team's best time whenever she competed. In addition, she also had a strong track and field season this past spring.

Along with Zan, sophomores Karen Rou and Claire Petrit consistently finished in the top three, and never finished lower than fourth on the team in any competition. Rou was second on the team in five races, while Petrit finished second once, and third three times.

Juniors Gina Perno, Elizabeth Fisk and Kristin Darling could also factor into determining the team's success. Perno was one of the team's best performers last season and is poised to take the next step. She finished in the top five on the team in all of her races, while Fisk and Darling consistently hovered just above that mark.

UMass starts the season off with two smaller competitions. After the Dartmouth Invitational, the teams return to Amherst to host four-way meets. The men will take on Connecticut, Maine and Vermont while the women will take on the latter two in addition to Boston College.

Mike Mastone can be reached at mmastone@student.umass.edu.

Minutewomen to face Albany, JMU

Forward Katie Kelly fights for the ball with a Temple defender in a game last year. She hopes to help UMass continue its success against Albany and James Madison this weekend.

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

Coming off a big upset win over previously ranked No. 9 Iowa, the Massachusetts field hockey team heads to Albany this weekend to take on two tough opponents in its first road trip of the season.

After leaping from No. 17 to 15 in the Kookaburra/NFHCA Division I National Coaches Poll, the Minutewomen (2-1) will try to maintain their highest ranking since the 2000 season.

Though UMass began its season with three consecutive home games, coach Justine Sowry feels the time is right for a change in scenery.

"It's always fun to get away on your first road trip, take the bus together and recollect especially after the first week of school," Sowry said.

UMass will first face a recognizable Albany team on Friday, which began the season with an impressive start. The Minutewomen will then see an unfamiliar but strong foe on the field in No. 12 James Madison on Saturday.

Albany (3-0) comes into Friday's game recording three 2-0 shutouts over Hofstra, Radford and Bucknell. Freshman Kristi Troch is 2-0 with four saves, while junior Christine Hoffman is 1-0 with seven saves in a timeshare in goal.

Coach Sowry realizes that Albany's defense has played extremely well but is confident that the Minutewomen's attack can be the first team to put up a score against the Great Danes.

"Our goal is to get return in the circle so if we can't get off a good shot, we can earn a penalty corner. Our penalty corner right now is on fire and I'm sure that will continue," Sowry said.

The Minutewomen are familiar with Albany as the two teams have played in each of the past two seasons, splitting a game apiece.

"The last couple years the games against Albany have been tough and physical," Sowry said. "They're undefeated and we're playing at their house so they'll be motivated."

This will be the first time, however, that UMass plays JMU in 10 years. Though the Dukes defeated the Minutewomen, 1-0, at Totman Field in their last meeting, UMass holds a 5-3 lead in the series, which dates back to 1989.

The defending Colonial Athletic Association champs are 2-1 to begin the season after picking up wins against Ohio State and Kent State. Offensively, the production has been spread around as the Dukes' five goals were scored by four different players.

Senior goalie Kelsey Cutchins has been the anchor of the defense, posting a 1.67 GAA and an impressive 0.848 save percentage while playing every minute this season.

"JMU is a good team with a good goalkeeper and they are very well coached," Sowry said. "They bring a different style of play so we'll see what happens."

Coach Sowry knows if the Minutewomen can stay relaxed and calm, they have a great foundation and structure in place to be successful not only this weekend, but the rest of the season.

Jay Asser can be reached at jasser@student.umass.edu.

Sowry, Widdall obtain international experience

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

In recent years, members of the Massachusetts women's field hockey team who have participated in international play have faired better when returning to college.

Most recently, sophomore goalkeeper Alesha Widdall and UMass coach Justine Sowry both took part in the 2009 Junior World Cup, held at Harvard's Jordan Field in Boston.

The United States Junior National Team earned a spot in the competition with a gold medal-winning performance at the Junior Pan-Am Cup in Mexico City. The U.S. defeated Chile, 2-1, for the title and a subsequent World Cup berth.

Team U.S.A. finished the tournament third in its pool (2-3) and eighth overall.

"It was an amazing experience," Sowry said of being an assistant coach for the U.S. in Boston.

"I always love working with the U.S.A. I love working at the elite level and have learned so much in the last four months with the new rule changes in place. I've probably learned more in the last four months than I have in the last eight years."

The International Hockey Federation (FIH) is currently implementing an amendment to the Free Hit Rule. Now, a player may hit the ball to themselves during a free hit by hitting the ball in one action and committing a second separate action to play the ball downfield.

With the new rule in place, games should progress at two or three times its speed before the rule change.

Collegiate umpires have attended various clinics throughout the course of the past year to understand how to better implement the rule during games.

Widdall had little trouble adjusting to the accelerated speed of play this summer.

The U.S. earned a 4-0 win against Chile in her only time in front of the net.

When she returned from the Pan-Am Cup last season, Widdall became more confident in goal and employed a more refined skill set.

She commanded the defense with less hesitation, calling out more plays and sorting the backs to her comfort area. When the offense didn't take over games, Widdall kept the Minutewomen afloat.

Upon her return from international play last season, she played in four one-goal games, winning three of them, including two overtime games against conference opponents. The only UMass loss in games decided by one goal came in its final game of the season – a rematch against Syracuse.

In her first game against the Orange, Widdall allowed five goals at home – four in the first half alone. The rematch came at Syracuse in the first round of the NCAA Tournament. Widdall allowed three goals while making nine saves, but the Orange defense limited UMass to four shots on goal, compared to 13 by Syracuse.

After Widdall's latest tournament against international opponents, Sowry noted that her goalie had again made strides in becoming a better player.

"She's in the best shape she's ever been in," Sowry said.

"Her knowledge of the game has tripled at least. [Her experience] is great for our program because we have players on our team who are striving to make the U.S. team. [With] more players, we can get to make it to the highest level possible. I know the team's going to do well."

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

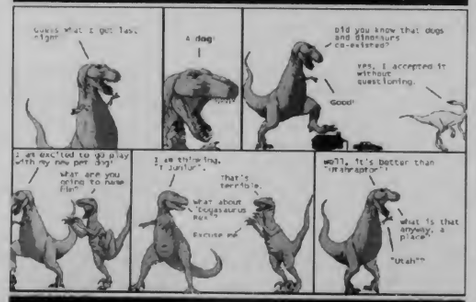
Midfielder Makaela Potts tries to move past a Temple defender during a game last season. She finished with four goals and three assists in 2008.

MERCYhouse
it's a church!
knowmercy.org
365 North Pleasant :: 1/2 block from Umass

comics

JORNALISM AT ITS FINEST

My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees — mnftiu.com



Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub — chainsawsuit.com

Wondermark by David Malki ! — wondermark.com

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North . — qwantz.com

Robbie and Bobby by Jason Poland — robbieandbobby.com

Mr. Gnu by Travis Dandro — weepstrip.com

This message is addressed to Douglas Marko.

Please contact us at your earliest possible convenience.

Email: comics@dailycollegian.com

-Comics Editor

Classifieds

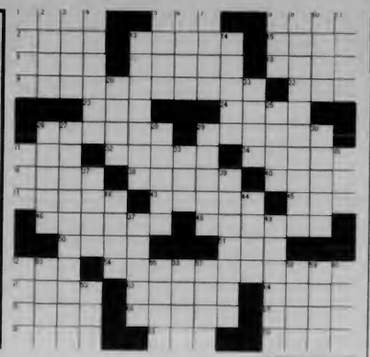
EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO expenence necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

Calzone Transport (Drivers) and Calzone Production Engineers (kitchen help) wanted. Apply at DP Dough, downtown Amherst.

FOR RENT



Rt. 9 Hadley. 5 bedroom house. $2000/mo & utilities. 2 car garag. 1 & a qtr miles to campus. No beds. Large Lot. Music room. Skibiski Real Estate.586-1827.

LOST & FOUND

Lost two hearing aids on Saturday, 9/5/2009. Please call Mark at 413-455-5226. Reward.

SUDOKU

			8	6
		5			6
		9				7	2
7			8		1
9						8
	4		7		3
3				6				7
	6					9
8	5		9					4

CROSSWORD

ACROSS
1 Have the nerve
5 Pale
8 Sediment
12 "Smallest particle"
13 Serf
15 Leg joint
16 Grave
17 Avoid
18 Inspiration
19 A meeting arranged in advance
22 Remark
23 Standard operating procedure
24 Hearing organs
26 Squandered
29 Assault
31 Cap or beret
32 Pungent
34 Tiny parallel grooves
36 Pests, insects
38 Fate
40 Transmit
41 Sharpen
43 Pretend
45 Scrape by
46 Torment or 48 Accord
50 Live in a tent
51 Wise bird
52 Chooser
54 Bulges
61 Duo
63 Uncanthly
64 Joy
65 Dwarf buffalo
66 Covered with linoleum squares
67 Not there
68 Gave temporarily
69 Not young
70 Grabbed
100 WSW
1 Information
2 At the peak of
3 Frolic
4 Raise as a relief
5 Whip mark
6 Astringent
7 Connecting point
8 Schuss
9 Imprudent
10 Lascivious look
11 Furniture wood
12 Nag
14 Article of faith
20 Bit
21 Makes lace
25 Rodents
26 Deserts
27 The quality of arousing interest
28 A preliminary version of a written work
29 Acknowledge
30 Perverted
31 Possesses
33 Anger
35 Summer refresher
37 Fizzy drink
39 No longer afloat
42 Ponderer
43 Current event informa tion
47 Small herring pro cessed like a sardine
49 Come to rest
52 October birthstone
53 Sheet of glass
55 Melange
56 Cash drawer
57 Marsh plant
58 Margarine
59 A Roman emperor
60 Search
62 Rodent

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Relieve some stress and become Samuel L. Jackson for an hour.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Help troubled elephants find a new home. You don't mind being the little spoon, do you?

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Only people with souls have disco balls in their living room. Hint, hint.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Everyone except you gets a stroll down memory lane. Instead, you must discover the locale of Carmen San Diego.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
Change is not a bad thing. Just get a piggy bank.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
Why keep paying with cash when red gummy bears are way more awesome, and – did I mention – delicious?

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
Smokey says, "Lay off the rolled up forest fires."

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Got a stupid song stuck in your head? The only cure is humming the Indiana Jones theme song. Works, right?

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
That droning sound isn't your cell phone on vibrate. It's the lecture going on next door.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
The ducks on the pond are not laughing at you, but you might want to zip up your pants.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
Man on man stunts are not pretty. Man on fire stunts are 100% awesome.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
Don't worry Hef, there are other fish in the mansion pool.

HAC Hampshire Athletic Club
HAMPSHIRE ATHLETIC CLUB
GUEST PASS
Ask about our Fall Semester Special!
$39.95/month EFT valid with student ID
The pass is good for one FREE visit to HAC. Present this coupon to the front desk upon arrival. Coupon valid through September, 2009.
90 Gatehouse Rd. - Amherst (413) 256-6446 hampshireac.com

WE WANT YOUR COMICS

Put your comics in front of thousands of readers!

EMAIL:

comics@dailycollegian.com

Or friend us on facebook "Collegian Comix"

If one synchronised swimmer drowns, do all the rest have to drown too?"
- Steven Wright

Opiate of the People by Emily Regan

Labrat by Richard Martelly

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY
COLLEGIAN

HIGH: 76 LOW: 55 | WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM | MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 2009

UMass student killed in hit-and-run accident

Police seeking information on vehicle's driver

At 10:26 p.m. Saturday night, former University of Massachusetts student Blake Goodman was struck and killed by an as-yet undetermined vehicle while bicycling on Montague Road in North Amherst.

The 21-year-old Goodman and 24-year-old John Deary were riding their bicycles near 115 Montague Road when they were struck by a dark colored sedan, which fled the scene.

Both were taken by ambulance to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton, where Goodman was pronounced dead.

Deary was treated for a leg injury and then released from Cooley Dickenson.

The vehicle involved in the accident is still at large. According to an Amherst Police press release, witnesses at the scene described it as a dark colored sedan, which may have been a Ford based on evidence gathered at the scene.

The vehicle would have sustained heavy damage to its front passenger side door and mirror.

Amherst Police are working with the Massachusetts State Police Accident Scene Reconstruction Team and investigators from the Northwestern District Attorney's office.

Anyone who may have witnessed the accident or who has any information on the case is urged to contact the Amherst Police Department at (413) 259-3000.

More coverage of this story will come as information is made available.

— Collegian News Staff

Sophomore killed by train in Leverett

By Sam Butterfield
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A University of Massachusetts sophomore was struck and killed by a Washington, D.C. bound Amtrak train Thursday afternoon.

Executive Director of News and Media Relations Ed Blaguszewski was able to confirm that the student was 19-year-old Peter Boutarel, a political science and philosophy major from Dax, France.

The incident occurred at 1:22 p.m., according to Amtrak spokesperson Cliff Cole.

Boutarel lived on campus, though Blaguszewski would not say where. Dean of Students Jo-Anne T. Vanin will be releasing a statement shortly to the campus community, Blaguszewski said, adding that UMass will provide counseling and support services to Boutarel's friends and acquaintances.

"Any time an incident like this happens, it's very sorrowful and tragic. Our thoughts and prayers go out to his family and friends," he said.

State Police officials in Northampton said the investigation was being handled by detectives from the Northwestern District Attorney's Office, which covers cases in Hampshire and Franklin counties.

Voicemails for the District Attorney's spokesperson were not returned. The Leverett Police said only that State Police detectives were investigating.

Spokesperson Cole said that the train was en route from St. Albans, Vermont to Washington, and that the train was delayed four hours for an investigation after the incident.

"This underscores the dangers of venturing onto the tracks, our overall message is that these incidents are avoidable if people are safe and stay off the tracks," he said.

Sam Butterfield can be reached at sbutterfield@dailycollegian.com

'Pop' artist Warhol honored with Fine Arts Center party

Partygoers mingle at the Fine Arts Center's University Gallery at Saturday night's party celebrating Andy Warhol.

By Tim Jones
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A party celebrating the art and culture of pop artist Andy Warhol was held on Saturday at the Fine Arts Center's University Gallery. All proceeds raised were in support of the gallery's internship program.

The event, titled, "Andy's Loft: The artist, the Legend... and the Party!" featured a martini reception, art exhibitions, a dinner buffet, a 1960's trivia quiz, costume contest and a video on the internship program.

Doors opened to the gallery at 7:00 p.m. and attendees were presented with two exhibitions, one being "The Minox and the Big Shot: Andy Warhol's Photography (1970-87)," which contained rare photography and Polaroid pictures taken by Warhol. These items were donated to the gallery by the Warhol Foundation in 2007.

The other showcase was entitled "Connecting the Dots...The Warhol Legacy. Tom Friedman, Ellen Gallagher, Vik Muniz and Rob Pruitt," which was a display of four contemporary artists' work based off Warhol's work.

Friedman, one of the featured artists, made a guest appearance during the night.

Originally to be located in the Campus Center Auditorium, the event was changed to the gallery to add to the overall atmosphere.

According to event designer Robert Christiansen, a 2009 graduate of the University of Massachusetts, the goal was to "create a space that facilitated conversation and was comfortable to be in."

An open bar was available all night as well as a dinner buffet which included, of course, tomato soup.

Around 9:00 p.m., the crowd was gathered to watch a movie depicting the overall impact of the gallery on certain people.

Loretta Yarlow, the gallery director, thanked her entire staff for all of the work they put into the event as well as well as their work throughout the years. She also thanked the crowd for their help and stated that "we are a teaching museum, and we are involved in training the next generation of students."

Tickets, which were $100 each, benefited the internship program.

The movie, a testimonial to the greatness of the gallery, featured many people speaking on how the gallery personally influenced their lives and what the program had done to help them succeed in the future.

See WARHOL on page 2

New degree in historic preservation offered

UMass partners with Hancock Shaker village

By Michael Toomey
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts Amherst is joining forces with Hancock Shaker Village, a National Historic Landmark in the Berkshires, to offer a new graduate program in Historic Preservation and Design starting in the fall of 2010. The program offers prospective students the unique opportunity to enliven traditional coursework with onsite experience at the historically rich village.

Hancock Shaker Village was founded in 1783 by a community of Shakers, who practiced a unique form of Protestantism. Today, the village consists of 20 buildings and has been rigorously maintained since its inception by experts in historical preservation.

"When the HSV museum opened it was a leader in the preservation movement," said Ellen Spear, president and CEO of HSV. "And this was before the country passed the 1976 Secretary of the Interior's Standards for Historic Preservation."

The Standards for Historic Preservation were passed to ensure comprehensive care and upkeep for the nation's historic treasures.

Prospective students of the program gain from both its synthesis of academics and real-world experience, as well as the opportunity to learn from a culture that embraced sustainable practices. The Shakers embraced alternative energy sources from water to wind power, and maintained self-sustaining farms and well-designed buildings, many of which still stand today.

"The Shakers' pragmatism and economy never overtaxed the environment, as far as using too much – they were always considerate of the environment and their surroundings," said Stephen Bedford, the Historic Preservation and Design program director and a 20-year veteran of architectural history.

"There's a lot to learn from the construction of these buildings," said Bedford, "and the program is a great way to expand knowledge about building in general, as well as how to care for and preserve historic buildings that have different needs than modern ones."

Before finding it a home at UMass, Bedford shopped the curriculum to a number of institutions without success.

"This program came to be largely through the commitment of myself and Ellen [Spear] to the curriculum we had created, and it wasn't until we found an institution with both the resources and interest to really get this on its feet," said Bedford.

Bedford worked hard to assemble a faculty of some of the

See SHAKER on page 2

Minutemen rout Albany see pg. 10

MATTHEW HARKINS

Led by its front four, the UMass defense caused problems for the Albany offense all game as it forced five turnovers all game. The Minutemen offense capitalized on those turnovers, turning them into 17 points.

ARTS & LIVING

Bo Burnham

The YouTube-powered comedian fills the Fine Arts Center.

SEE PAGE 5

SPORTS

Schneider goes pro

After finishing his career at UMass last spring, Doc Schneider was drafted to play in the Major League Lacrosse. Soon after, he found himself playing for the MLL title.

SEE PAGE "

EDITORAL & OPINION

In the age of iPhones and PSP's, Nick O'Malley says you should go back a decade to get some real entertainment.

SEE PAGE 4

DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Writer Chris Shores shares a video documenting this year's Hillel House "Ride to Provide."

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM | FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 2009

No. 15 UMass to face Danes and Dukes

Minutewomen travel to Albany

See Page 13

CROSS COUNTRY

The Minutemen will look for leadership from 13 upperclassmen to repeat as A-10 champions in 2009, while the Minutewomen will look to rebound after a dissapointing 2008 finish.

SEE PAGE 12

MEN'S HOOPS

Coach Derek Kellogg and the Minutemen hope that nationally televised games will help them get back to A-10 dominance in 2009.

SEE PAGE 11

DAILY COLLEGIAN
sports
WEEKEND EDITION

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
CXVIX
Issue 5

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief William McGuinness
Managing Editor S.P. Sullivan
Business Manager Daniel Jette
Production Manager Michael Sarkes
Night Supervisor Kirsten Swenson
Advertising Manager Michael Tortorici
Advertising Production Max Detmer
Arts & Living Editor Shasta Murphy
Comics Editor Anne Kerthline
Editorial Editor Nick O'Malley
News Editor Nick Bush
Sports Editor Jettres R. Larnard
Web Editor Brian Wood
Photo Editor Matthew Harrison
IT Manager Victor Jairk
Asst. Business Manager Matt Zolnoski
Assistant Advertising Nicole Jacinto
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Distribution Manager Norman Provost
Classified Manager Katelyn Tamilio
Asst. Arts & Living Justin Gagnon
Asst. Arts & Living Elyse Horowitz
Asst. Arts & Living Cal Scannell
Assistant Copyed Andrew Witte
Assistant Editorial Michael Phillis
Assistant Editorial Hannah Nelson
Assistant News Samuel Butterfield
Assistant News Alyssa Creamer
Assistant News Jenn Heshion
Assistant Sports David Brinch
Assistant Sports Mike Gillmeister
Assistant Sports Adam Miller
Assistant Photo Maxwell Sparr
Assistant Multimedia Chris Shores

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1905, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Bi-Weekly Collegian in 1956. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian pays for subscriptions sold January 1994. For circulation rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nick O'Malley

COPY EDITOR
Caitlin Quinn

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Guanno

your week ahead on Daily Collegian

Monday

NEWS

Writer Chris Shores shares a video documenting this year's Ride to Provide.'

Tuesday

ARTS

An online slideshow features the best of Cirque du Soleil's Mullins Center performance.

Wednesday

ARTS

Some of the Farmer's Market's offerings will be displayed in an online slideshow.

Popping corks in memory of the influencial 'pop' artist Andy Warhol

WARHOL from page 1

A disco ball was one of only many retro touches at Saturday night's party at the EAC celebrating Andy Warhol's art and culture. All proceeds raised from the event will go towards the University Gallery's internship program.

A guest appearance was made by Chancellor Holub, who could not be recognized until he was called out to speak for the audience.

Donning a leather jacket, white tank-top and beret, the chancellor played along with the overall theme of the 60's, and was even eligible for the costume contest, although the award was granted to five people depicting Ludwig Van Beethoven and four different colored pictures of him, an allusion to Warhol's work.

"This is really a wonderful event and gallery," Holub said.

"And the best thing about it is that it helps students, and that's what this campus is about."

The night ended with a dance party set to songs and themes of the 60's, appropriately enough.

The gallery will continue to showcase the work and exhibitions throughout December 13.

Tim Jones can be reached at timothyj a student.umass.edu

UMass to offer new graduate degree in Historic Preservation

SHAKER from page 1

Shaker Brother Ricardo Belden, making wooden oval boxes in a workshop at the Hancock Shaker village near Pittsfield, Mass. in 1935. The village and UMass have teamed to provide a new graduate degree.

field's most esteemed experts, including UMass professors Max Page and Marla Miller. Page is an architectural historian and Miller is an historian specializing in early American culture and women's labor.

Joining them is Robert Adam, one of the leading preservation educators in the country, whose expertise is bolstered by his long career in restorative carpentry.

Both Spear and Bedford expect the Historic Preservation and Design degree program to also interest working professionals involved with buildings and structures, architects, engineers, carpenters and masons.

"Like many graduate programs — and this is very important in today's economy — this is something you can complete without leaving your job, it meets intensively twice a week," said Bedford.

Joel Martin, dean of the College of Arts and Humanities said he is enthused that UMass is pairing real-world skills with its academic offerings.

"I think it's exciting to connect our excellent academic programs in historic preservation at UMass Amherst with an important historic site in New England because it will connect theory and practice in a powerful way," said Martin.

"Students will be able to integrate what they learn in courses with work in the field and gain important insight into the real world challenges associated with a historic site."

Michael Toomey can be reached at mjtoomey a student.umass.edu

Taking a thousand-mile Ride in order to Provide

By Chris Shores
Collegian Staff

Hillel House uses the money raised from Ride to Provide to send alternative spring break students across the globe to help those in need.

Chancellor Robert Holub speaks to the crowd during the annual Ride to Provide, in which 85

At this year's third annual Ride to Provide, over 85 participants rode their bikes a combined 1,200 miles in an effort to raise funds for the University of Massachusetts Hillel House, a Jewish community on campus.

"The purpose of this fundraiser is to support the community service programs and the environmentally-friendly projects of Hillel," said Rabbi Saul Perlmutter, executive director of Hillel House and one of the four co-chairs of the event. These programs include both local efforts and large alternative spring break trips.

Perlmutter said that UMass ranked fourth out of over 500 Hillel Houses in total number of students sent on alternative spring breaks last year, when it sent students to Israel, Nicaragua and New Orleans.

Since the top three schools have very large Jewish populations, UMass has the highest per capita total, he said.

Riders departed from the Hillel House at staggered times throughout the morning. Participants could choose between three loops of nine, 18 and 36 miles. Upon finishing their routes, riders were treated to refreshments at the Hillel House.

Perlmutter gave the opening remarks and then handed off the microphone to a variety of speakers. On hand to greet and thank the group for their contributions were Chancellor Robert Holub, State Representative Ellen Story and State Senator Stan Rosenberg.

"With each passing generation, the world is getting smaller and smaller," said Senator Rosenberg. "It's important to help your neighbors here but it's also important to remember and recognize that we're all part of one world family. People in other places need our help and need our attention."

Representative Story praised the group, calling the event a "win-win-win."

Students participated in a healthy activity, avoided "leaving a carbon footprint," and simultaneously helped others in need.

Chancellor Holub also thanked the contributors by referring to a speech he gave last week.

"One of the things I said when I welcomed the new first year class and one of the reasons I'm most impressed about this [event] is that there is so much participation from the students of the University of Massachusetts Amherst. What I told [the students] last week is that one of the points of UMass pride is giving back. You are already giving back to your community and giving back to the entire world and I think that is a great point of pride for you and for us at UMass," he said.

Perlmutter then allowed three students who took part in alternative spring break programs last year to share their experiences.

Hannah Moverman traveled with a group to New Orleans to help rebuild homes destroyed by Hurricane Katrina. Originally dismayed that she would only be working on a picket fence, she soon realized that her group was "really doing something great." Through working on the project, she formed a bond with the other members of her group and felt a real sense of community with UMass and the Hillel House.

Ben Lichtman spent his break in Israel. His team worked to beautify a community destroyed by rockets.

During afternoons, his group was able to spend time with residents, talk and form a connection with them.

Lichtman was so touched by the experience that he continued to raise funds upon his return to the United States. The group has been invited to return to Israel this year.

Event co-chair and Hillel House development director Courtney Pupkin said that this year's ride was forced to be early in September due to the upcoming Jewish holidays.

She said that the early date may have reduced attendance slightly, but it was still a "great turnout" with more volunteers and individual donors than ever.

In addition to Perlmutter and Pupkin, Craig Kannel and Ted Diamond served as co-chairs for the Ride to Provide.

Amy Trombley, Adam Gorlovsky-Schepp and Gary Kaufman were this year's top fundraisers. They were rewarded with Ride to Provide baseball caps.

A video of the "Ride to Provide" will be on DailyCollegian.com this week.

Chris Shores can be reached at cshores a student.umass.edu

Researchers look for long-term connection between diet and the survival of the 'fittest'

By Faye Flam
The Philadelphia Inquirer
(MCT)

Hunter-gatherers, such as the early hominid Homo erectus, may have had a dietary advantage over their evolutionary competition.

PHILADELPHIA — Health care as we know it didn't exist 3,000 years ago. But along the Georgia coast, the Pacific Northwest and coastal Brazil, people grew tall and strong and lived relatively free of disease. They ate game, fish, shellfish and wild plants.

But as corn farming spread through various regions of the Americas, people got shorter. Many became prone to anemia and began dying of tuberculosis and other infectious diseases.

"It's counterintuitive, with agriculture, people should have been better nourished," said Emory University anthropologist George Armelagos. But a different story is emerging from studies of ancient bones and teeth as well as blood samples from isolated hunters and farmers.

Hunters, of course, were not exactly invulnerable. Their skeletons showed many fell prey to violence. But new evidence may overturn what we understood about the diseases that killed humans over the centuries and how those threats have changed in the modern world.

With prevention now being touted as a strategy to counter crushing health care costs, insights from the past could help us better understand whether we can really prevent disease and how to best go about it.

The latest effort is mapping health over at least the last 3,000 years across the globe. Although that study is just gearing up, the results are backing up earlier work showing that people were probably healthier 3,000 years ago than they were 300 years ago.

In Europe and America, health started to improve only recently — about 150 years ago — with safer food and better sanitation, and the rise of modern medicine.

"Our health conditions didn't pop out of nowhere," said Clark Spencer Larsen, an anthropologist at Ohio State University. "Our interest is in looking at the context for our health today."

Emory's Armelagos said this work might help settle debates over the so-called Paleolithic diets, which periodically become trendy, advocating little more than wild meat, seafood, a few nuts and vegetables.

Did humans really evolve to eat this way, or has our species adapted to dairy products, domestic animals and grain?

A surprising amount of information can be gleaned from skeletons, said Larsen, so he and colleagues are studying 17,000 of them as part of the Global History of Health Project. They unveiled their first results, which covered Europe, this year.

The global project followed a similar one that compared different populations living in the Americas over the last 3,000 years.

That project showed that the rise of farming often came along with a fall in health. One common measure of health is height, said project leader Richard Steckel of Ohio State University. This can be approximated by thighbone length when researchers don't have complete skeletons. When people are poorly nourished, their children fail to grow to their full potential height.

People got shorter through most of the last 3,000 years, reaching the lowest point between the 1600s and late 1800s, Steckel said. That's when British philosopher Thomas Hobbes coined the phrase "nasty, brutish and short" to describe life before civilization.

Several other telltale signs on the bones show that farming populations often suffered from anemia and Vitamin B-12 deficiency. There was also more infectious disease — TB, for example.

Armelagos, who was not in the project, said it was not that surprising that infectious diseases would rise with farming since it allowed denser centers of populations. Humans have certainly always gotten sick, but disease was less likely to spread into epidemics when populations were sparse, he said.

With the rise of cities, crowding and exposure to human waste allowed disease to spread as never before. Raising animals also allowed new pathogens to jump to humans. Livestock hosted influenza, allowing the viruses to mutate and evolve, leading to ever more deadly pandemics.

And when farming of grains brought about greater quantities of food, he said, what people ate lacked certain nutrients — iron and Vitamin B-12, for example, whose effects show up in the bones and teeth.

The only health measure that was generally worse for hunter-gatherers was violence, said Ohio State's Steckel. Many of their skeletons had signs of injuries inflicted by other humans. Otzi, the 5,300-year-old "ice man" discovered frozen in the Alps, may have been typical. An analysis shows he was 45 years old and the cause of death was an arrow lodged in his shoulder.

Longevity will be harder to estimate — but more research may eventually reveal whether hunter-gatherers who avoided spears in the back lived longer than their farming counterparts.

Some clues may come from isolated pockets of modern people who still live more ancient lifestyles. This month, for example, a collaboration of gerontologists and anthropologists published a study on a remote group in Bolivia called the Tsimane.

These indigenous people got most of their food from growing rice and a starchy vegetable called manioc, with some added protein from game and fish. They live in groups of 50 to 100 people with no sanitation, running water, electricity or modern medical care.

"This population lives in conditions as close to those of a historical population as we can get in the real world today," said team member Eileen Crimmins, a gerontologist from the University of Southern California.

For this study, the researchers focused on the concept of inflammation as an agent of our deterioration and aging. Though inflammation can help the body clear infections, it's also been associated with heart disease as well as cancer and Alzheimer's. One common signpost of inflammation is a substance called C-reactive protein or CRP.

The Tsimane CRP was so high that they appeared to be suffering sky-high inflammation levels — enough that they should be dropping dead from heart attacks. And yet they had very little evidence of heart disease or the sort of deterioration of the vascular system that appears to be almost inevitable among Western populations.

Working in their favor, most Tsimane had low body fat and low cholesterol, though they had unusually low levels of the "good" HDL cholesterol. Their overall life expectancy is in the 40s, but the average is brought down by a high infant mortality rate, said collaborator Hillard Kaplan of the University of New Mexico. Those who reach adulthood usually live into their 60s or early 70s.

"What's really fascinating is that as different as our environments are, the schedule of life isn't all that different from ours," Kaplan said. "A 65-year-old Tsimane looks and acts pretty similar to a 65-year-old American."

But instead of dying from heart disease, the Tsimane die from infections. Kaplan suspects that fighting a relentless onslaught of infection eventually breaks down their immune systems by the time they reach 70.

Thomas McDade, an anthropologist from Northwestern University, recently discovered that Tsimane of the past may have benefited from traditional medicine. He found parents with the greatest traditional knowledge of local medicinal plants had the healthiest children. The sickest children belonged to those who had lost this knowledge.

Yale student goes missing days before her wedding

By Matthew Chayes
Newsday
(MCT)

Yale doctoral student Annie Le, 24, went missing just days before she was to wed her fiance, Jonathan Widawsky.

MELVILLE, N.Y. — The FBI and police in New Haven, Conn., on Friday continued their intensive search for a Yale University graduate student who disappeared just days before she was set to marry a Long Island man this weekend.

On campus early Friday, missing-persons posters with photos of Annie Le were taped to the windows of the Yale research lab where she was last seen on Tuesday morning. One of the photos in the posters shows her entering the building, carrying papers, the morning she went missing.

The 24-year-old doctoral student in pharmacology "has not been seen or heard from by family, co-workers and friends" since then, according to the poster.

Le is to wed Huntington, N.Y., native Jonathan Widawsky, 24, a Columbia University graduate student in physics, at the North Ritz Club in Syosset, N.Y., on Sunday morning, according to a neighbor who is invited to the ceremony.

"I heard she was a nice girl and very much in love with him, and he with her," said Lucille Mayer, who lives next door to the Widawsky family in Huntington.

No one answered the door at the Widawsky home Thursday night, and Jonathan Widawsky could not be reached for comment. On Friday morning, a bouquet of flowers leaned against the front door.

Yale officials told the Yale Daily News that Widawsky is in New Haven, cooperating with authorities investigating Le's disappearance.

Entries on Le's Facebook page indicated a young woman excited about her upcoming wedding, the New Haven Register reported. "Lucky I'm in love with my best friend," Le posted.

Le swiped her university identification card to enter the lab building about 10 a.m., but left her purse, cell phone, credit cards and cash in her office, located in another Yale building about three blocks away, the Yale Daily News reported. The university stepped up security in that building Thursday, according to published reports.

Tom Conroy, a Yale spokesman, told the New Haven Register Thursday night that "there's no evidence ... at this time" of foul play in Le's disappearance.

State police used bloodhounds to search the area where Le was last seen, and the FBI was assisting the investigation, Yale Police Chief James Perotti told The Associated Press. Authorities also are reviewing images from closed-circuit cameras.

"It's an intense, ongoing investigation," Yale spokeswoman Dorie Baker told the Hartford Courant.

Photocopied missing person posters featuring photos of Le and a police tip line phone number are posted across town - from the main campus to the research building where the bride-to-be was last seen to the downtown Dunkin' Donuts.

At the research building Friday morning, Amistad Hall, the block is lined with satellite trucks and press vans.

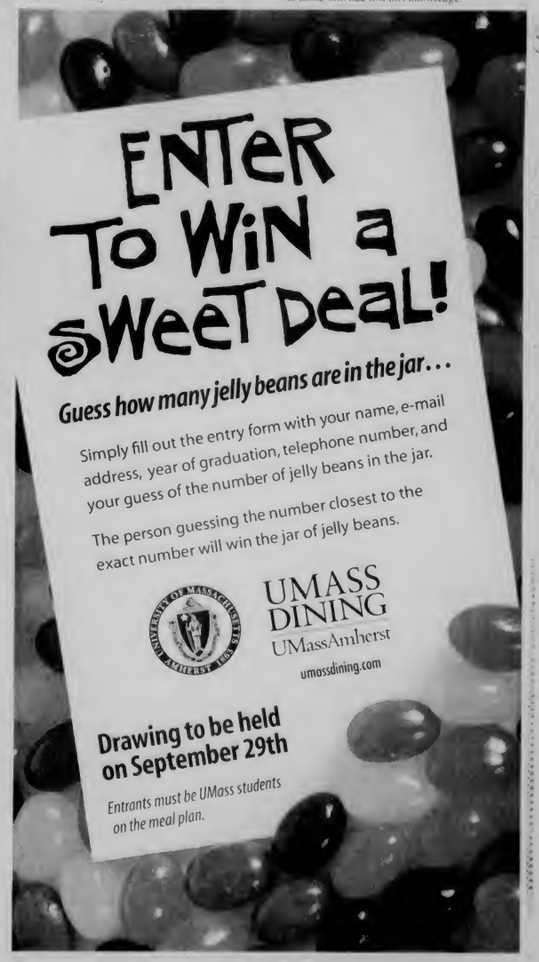
On the quiet, tree-lined block where Le lives, gone are the scrim of reporters who had camped out on the day news broke of her disappearance, neighbors said.

A package in the bride-to-be's name was left at the stoop of her New Haven home, where she lives on the third floor. The package was from Rue La La, which bills itself as "an exclusive online destination of premier brand, private sale Boutiques."

A resident of the house declined to comment Friday morning.

On the Columbia campus, Widawsky lives with roommate Theodore Kramer on the sixth floor of a six-story beige brick building at the corner of 118th and Amsterdam streets. Kramer was not available Friday morning.

Le, originally from Placerville, Calif., met Widawsky when they were undergraduates at the University of Rochester, according to published reports.



She was a lively, hardworking student then, according to her mentor, Rocky Tuan, who supervised a highly selective National Institutes of Health undergraduate scholars program.

"She was a very happy person," Tuan told the Register. "Everybody got along with her. She's always smiling, laughing."

Le, 4-foot-11 and weighing 90 pounds, was last seen wearing a brown skirt, green short-sleeved T-shirt, brown shoes and a brown necklace.

Her cell phone voice message says: "Hey. You've reached Annie. Please leave your name, number and a brief message, and I'll get back to you as soon as I can. Bye."

(Joseph Mallia, Pervaiz Shallwani, Karla Schuster and Chau Lam contributed to this report.)

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 2009

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Those indispensable buses

Hannah Nelson

As I'm starting my fifth semester on campus, I can admit that I still get on the wrong bus from time to time. It's an easy mistake to make. I couldn't tell you from memory alone how many bus routes that there are to travel.

But, like everything at the University of Massachusetts, it seems complicated at first, more than need be. Sometimes you've just got to jump in feet first lest you risk missing out.

Once you've gotten on the wrong bus at Walmart and find yourself at the end of the line in the middle of NoHo (the neighboring Northampton) it cures you of making the same mistake in the future.

This brings me to lesson number one; always ask the driver when you get on the bus where exactly he or she is headed.

Yes, you feel like the rest of the passengers are staring at you awkwardly as the newbie who has no clue what they're doing. But you'll thank yourself for not ending up in downtown Northampton at six o'clock in the evening in the dead of winter.

There are two basic approaches to the bus system. One is to stop by the campus center and pick up the six or so neatly folded PVTA transit route maps.

The other is just to wait at the Haigis Mall until one of the buses comes along that looks about right and take your chances. There's a website for UMass transit too in case you lose those schedules, in addition there is a phone number (413-545-0056) if you're really stuck.

Don't end up like one of the shameful seniors who still can't make heads or tails of the bus schedule. The buses are a way of life on campus and simply part of the UMass culture.

The orange buses and any non-shuttles require that Five College students show the driver their student ID when boarding, or else you'll have to pay the normal fare. With your I.D. you can ride for free.

Be ready for weekends and holidays when the schedule changes up. And I can't reiterate enough the need to be diligent so as not to get stuck at the end of the line at 2 a.m.

Lesson number two is to pay attention to what number bus you're getting on and the destination. The majority of the blue and white busses are on-campus shuttles. What this means is if you live in Sylvan, have an 8 a.m. class in School of Management and it's below 30 degrees with precipitation, you won't have to walk.

Have to go get textbooks at Amherst Books? Take the bus, and whatever you do, don't walk there in flip-flops.

If you do, you'll need that same bus route to CVS for some band-aids and antibiotic cream.

There are many advantages to riding the bus besides avoiding blisters, namely that you'll save gas. With the prices of the flammable gold yo-yoing past the depths of the average college student's purse, do yourself a favor and leave the keys at home. You'll also save money on parking passes, meters and tickets.

You'll also pick up memorable anecdotes from riding the bus, especially riding at midnight when more than half of the shuttle's occupancy is taken up by your intoxicated peers. And don't worry if you get on a late night bus and see a cop on board, its become the norm.

With all the coffee cups that we use at the Dining Commons, the food we leave uneaten to get passed on to the dish rooms and the plastic bottles we leave lying around the lecture halls, riding the bus is the least we can do to make up for the invisible carbon emissions cloud hanging over Amherst.

Don't end up like one of the shameful seniors who still can't make heads or tails of the bus schedule. The buses are a way of life on campus and simply part of the UMass culture.

The university is huge, but believe it or not, it starts to feel pretty darn small after a semester or two. Getting off campus is essential to the experience of living and learning in Amherst. "Oh the places you'll go," to quote a piece of Dr. Seuss wisdom that becomes a fast favorite during graduation season.

Yes, it's awkward to be crammed in the bus like a sardine with people standing on the steps and the bus swaying with the weight of the passengers as you take a turn off of North Pleasant Street. But the bus's grimy hand-rails are like the temperature in Bartlett Hall. It's just part of our lifestyle at UMass.

We complain and nitpick, but our campus has character and it's ours to both love and hate. You'll soon find the pros outweigh the cons.

Hannah Nelson is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at hnelson@student.umass.edu

High-end 90's tech

Nick O'Malley

Last semester, my friend Amy was all excited because of what she was bringing back with her from home. It wasn't her new iPhone (which she might have by now) or a new TV, it was something much more awesome: a Super Nintendo.

Featuring advanced titles like Street Fighter 2 and Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles: Turtles in Time, the Super Nintendo offered entertainment like our dorm had never seen.

Now, keep in mind, we weren't deprived of 21st century technology. In a two-room radius of Amy's dorm, there was a Nintendo Wii, and Xbox 360, a Playstation 2 and a Nintendo Gamecube available. We had Super Smash Bros. Brawl and Resident Evil 3, but the presence of that gray and purple box brought too much nostalgia.

You could say that we made a weird choice. But the truth is, to a group of poor, overworked college students, 18-year-old technology is just more fun.

Look at it this way. For the past four or so years, most kids in high school were playing the newest games thanks to funds from the bank of Mom (or Dad). But now that these kids are in college, the funds are gone and all that's left are the same games you've been playing on your PS2 for the last three years (Madden '06 for me).

So, the only way to get a new game is by going back to one you haven't played in nine years. And hell, you remember all the tricks of the game, so you're right back where you were in seventh grade.

It's that sort of "back in the day" feeling that you're going to find on any dorm floor and at almost every floor meeting. Not everyone knows what's going on in Lost or plays Halo, but everyone watched Hey Arnold.

At the beginning of the year, and especially for freshmen, there's a lot of insecurity and awkwardness because of the fact that dozens of kids were just thrown into living within 10 feet of each other and want to make some friends.

How do you do that? Not by showing off your new iPhone (no one cares about that), but by keeping your door open and playing Mario Kart 64. People complaining about getting blue-shelled are much more approachable than those with their doors closed playing Final Fantasy XII.

You could say that we made a weird choice. But the truth is, to a group of poor, overworked college students, 18-year-old technology is just more fun.

Now, you could argue that having a Playstation 3 or an X Box 360 is a big deal (and making you, by proxy, a big deal as well), but those things cost money and their games take forever to get into. Got Goldeneye? There are at least 20 people on your floor that want to play it – now.

If you're the kind of guy – or girl – that has their door open, you're going to get at least one solid friend out of it. Half the reason I have my current roommate is because we both played Super Smash Bros. Melee, Starfox 64 and Earthbound.

You don't have to get plastered to have a good time (especially on a weeknight, go to class). It may help, but it gets expensive and you shouldn't be drinking anyway (if your RA asks). But I digress.

No one cares about your new iPhone. Unless you bought it yourself, then everyone knows you're loaded. Cars are annoying. If you have one, everyone's your best friend on a weekend and wants you to be their designated driver or to take them to Wendy's. But if you have an N64 in your room, you're the coolest kid on the block.

Video games, especially the classics, are a uniting force for college students. The Mario Karts and Mario Parties of the world can sometimes bring people together better than a half a handle of Captain Morgan's you bought off a senior for 25 bucks.

And if you don't like videogames, find something you and other people do like. Whether it's reading, listening to music, or exercising the new laws set forth by Proposition 2, there are other people that want to do the same.

Regardless of what you do, keep your door open.

Nick O'Malley is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu

Obama's newest health care hypocracy

Leave it to President Barack Obama to pile on partisan attacks and deception with another one of his infamous speeches.

In front of a joint session of Congress, Obama addressed the nation on Wednesday trying to gather support from the American public for his health care reform effort. He was supposed to squash the concerns of the majority of Americans – 52 percent disapprove of the way Obama has handled health care, according to a recent Associated Press poll. He was supposed to show the American public what he envisioned and how it was going to get done without adding to our ever enlarging deficit.

Alex Perry

Instead, Obama took the usual Obama rout to addressing the masses, sounding more like a presidential candidate trying to get attention than a man who's been president for almost a year. His speech lacked any significant substance and he spent most of the time attacking anybody and everybody who has provided opposition for his version of reform in recent weeks.

He went as far as to completely disregard the legitimacy of his opposition's concerns saying merely that, "Instead of honest debate, we've seen scare tactics." That's funny coming from the same guy who later in the speech threatened to call out anyone who he thought was misrepresenting his reform. Scaring people into silence? This is hypocrisy at its finest.

Health care reform doesn't come down to what side you're on. It comes down to common sense and basic intuition. If you apply either of these tools, you will realize Obama's proposed radical overhauls to the system are flat-out ridiculous and doomed to fail.

Everything government has control of is essentially a financial disaster and has led to many of the problems our country faces today. Take for instance, the Post Office, Medicare and Social Security.

The [illegible] government and they are all bankrupt. Then there is Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. They were Government-sponsored enterprises that were also supposed to be subject to government oversight. Unfortunately, corrupt officials such as Barney Frank never took the threat these firms posed to our economy seriously. When reform for these two companies was called for in 2000, Frank dismissed the reform saying the concerns were "overblown" and that "there is no financial liability there whatsoever." Do we really want these people in charge of health care?

[Obama] took hypocrisy to a level even I didn't think he could achieve when he made the claim that he will not sign any health care reform that adds so much as a dime to the deficit.

The handling of Hurricane Katrina is another example of government run mismanagement. There is only one certainty when government expands in this country. The projection government will give for its proposed spending on programs will be underestimated greatly.

You can look at what government said it needed to fund food stamps, Medicare and Social Security if you don't believe me. Obama has continued the trend of underestimated projections. In August, he admitted his 10-year projected budget deficit of $7.1 trillion was off by nearly $2 trillion. The actual projected 10-year deficit now is $9 trillion. I have no doubt he will underestimate health care as well.

Then there is Obama's speech from Wednesday. He took hypocrisy to a level even I didn't think he could achieve when he made the claim that he will not sign any health care reform that adds so much as a dime to the deficit. He later stated in the same speech that the healthcare reform he is proposing will cost $900 billion. How can this be done? According to Obama, "Reducing the waste and inefficiency in Medicare and Medicaid will pay for most of this plan."

This was really said in his speech. That's how he is going to pay for it, "reducing the waste and inefficiency." Obama has either lost his mind or he is flat out lying. In either case this is a scary situation for our economy and the state of health care in this country.

But Obama didn't feel the need to stop the lies right there. He also said, "The only thing this plan would eliminate is the hundreds of billions of dollars in waste and fraud, as well as unwarranted subsidies in Medicare that go to insurance companies."

So basically, what Obama is saying is that he and his administration know of approximately $900 billion worth of waste, inefficiency and fraud that are occurring and he is going to uncover all of that and use that money to pay for his health care reform.

Clearly if government knew how to eliminate $900 billion in waste it would have already.

I don't even need to get into the real arguments conservatives are making against this version of health care reform to completely end the debate. Based on our government's track record with the bankrupted Post Office, Medicare and Social Security, it's pretty much a sure thing government run health care would end up inefficient at best and bankrupt at worst. There is no need to talk about radical reform because it is not practical in any regard. There is no need to continue to bicker or point fingers. This whole issue, much like any other liberal argument, is built on a foundation of nonsense.

Alex Perry is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at amperry@student.umass.edu

We
<3
Opinion!

editorial@dailycollegian.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

5 MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 2009

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Bo Burnham has students in stitches at FAC

YouTube and Comedy Central star thrills crowds at Saturday performance

BY JEFFREY LARNARD
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

& SHAYNA MURPHY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Bo Burnham performed to eager audience members this past Saturday during his University of Massachusetts stop on the Fake I.D. Tour of college campuses across the country. Burnham's act far overshadowed opener Amy Anderson.

Bo Burnham looks a little awkward. With his mused hair and his wire-rimmed glasses, the singer-songwriter-comedian famous for broadcasting angsty videos of himself over YouTube isn't exactly the sort you'd expect would rake in such a large crowd at the Fine Arts Center. But Burnham works a special magic over skeptics, winning them over faster than University of Massachusetts students leaving a football game.

Combining razor-sharp wit, a willingness to offend pretty much everyone and – to indulge in a little hyperbole – musical talent basically beyond compare, Burnham's show on Saturday at the Fine Arts Center was one that few will forget.

Comedian Amy Anderson opened the show to fine applause, despite the fact that she had to contend with a raucous crowd largely unfamiliar with her work. Anderson, who has previously appeared on Comedy Central and on commercials for Southwest Airlines, has been likened in the past to notoriously raunchy comedian Margaret Cho.

Still, Anderson has a style that is strikingly her own. And it didn't take the experienced comedian long to get into a groove, firing off-kilter jokes in rapid succession that dealt mostly with Asian people and strangely enough, her breasts.

As her routine went on, there was clearly some sentiment in the crowd that she was overstaying her welcome, as her limited scope of topics grew tiresome. She was, however, able to close effectively with a bit on a website specializing in scatology – the site allows viewers to rate the quality of other people's excrements.

Even with Amy Anderson's better-than-anticipated set, it was clear all night what drove audience members to turn up for this leg of the Fake I.D. Tour.

Burnham took the stage with assertiveness, the young performer exuding a strong stage presence. The Hamilton, Mass. native, who in addition to stand-up also plays the electric piano and the ukulele, has garnered plenty of controversy for his often outrageous skits.

Whether it was piano-driven ballads about sexual disorientation or haikus about African children eating pennies, Burnham has a subversive streak that runs deep. Burnham also fired off lightning-fast raps oozing with puns and clever wordplay, the kind that would make most English professors envious.

When a member of the crowd yelled out that Bo could sleep with anyone on campus, Bo responded dryly – and without missing a beat – "My mom's here." Moreover, he called out an obnoxious crowd member and proceeded to humiliate him in front of the entire audience.

However, what was most impressive about Bo Burnham's act was the sheer amount of ingenuity and creativity worked into his musical-comedy style. There's an every-man quality to his comedy that resonates with an audience. Burnham is able to draw from a myriad of comic styles (from Andrew Dice Clay to George Carlin) and executes them all deftly, appealing to virtually everyone in the audience.

His strange-but-true statistics, like "One out of every 44 presidents can dunk," drew just as many laughs as a song about how Helen Keller is the perfect woman because she can neither talk nor hear. At once blatantly offensive and painfully funny, Mr. Burnham's act seems to have the potential to become one of the most highly demanded comedy acts in the nation.

At only 19, who knows what his true potential could be? Just like Burnham's Jackson Five joke, it is probably "too soon" to tell.

Jeff C. Larnard can be reached at arts@dailycollegian.com. Shayna Murphy can be reached at skmurphy@student.umass.edu

Halloween II, directed by rocker Rob Zombie provides viewers with creepy imagery and ample amounts of blood and gore in a re-make of John Carpenter's 1981 original.

'Halloween II' remake conjures up mayhem

BY SHAYNA MURPHY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Somewhere between Quentin Tarantino's witty, pop culture-infused banter and the sly commercial sleaze of the "Crank" series, people forgot what true exploitation cinema is like. Aggressive, offensive and always in poor taste, few modern filmmakers have the chutzpah to venture over such tough terrain.

Not Rob Zombie though. The metal rocker turned filmmaker is still devoted to serving up real exploitation films – the kind that leave viewers gasping and respectable critics retching all over their memo note pads. (Ones writing for their college daily need not apply.) With "Halloween II," he doesn't disappoint.

Picking up where his 2007 "Halloween" remake left off, Zombie's sequel catches up with Laurie Strode (Scout Taylor-Compton, in a role better suited to Scream Queen Jamie Lee Curtis) shortly after she's unloaded a round into masked killer Michael Myers (Tyler Mane). She's quickly shipped off to Haddonfield's I.C.U., where, in a clever nod to the original 1981 "Halloween II," the bloodbath continues.

Even before the body count rises, the opening scene is the stuff of nightmares, giving us an insider's glimpse as fingernails get clipped off and faces get sewn back together on the operating table. It's vicious and repugnant, but it's Zombie doing what he does best.

Fast-forward a year later. Laurie's traded in her bellbottoms and pullover sweaters for prescription drugs and shredded band tees. The memory of last Halloween still leaves her tossing and turning at night. Shacking up with Sheriff Brackett (Brad Dourif) and his considerably less rebellious daughter Annie (Danielle Harris), Laurie goes through the motions, all the while maintaining a tenuous footing in reality.

Zombie's affection for Brackett and Annie seems palpable. Perhaps because Danielle Harris has been outrunning Michael Myers since she was 11-years-old, Zombie keeps her around long past her due date. Sadly, he doesn't have the same fuzzy feelings for Sam Loomis (Malcolm McDowell). Aside from giving the good doctor little to do, he turns Loomis into the story's only veritable bad guy. (Myers, as antihero, doesn't count.)

It's a far stretch for Loomis, the stalwart savior who always seemed to arrive in time to cry out emphatically, "Don't you get it!" He's Baaaaaaack!" Zombie twists him into a fame-seeking dirtball, eager to get rich off a tell-all of the murders. If Zombie were a better storyteller, he'd have something here, but instead he pushes Loomis to the fringes of the narrative, until its time for him to get what Zombie surely thinks are his just desserts.

Like most worthy exploitation films, "Halloween II" is an acquired taste. Zombie's taste errs toward the tawdry, making it an exploitation flick in every sense of the word. In his 2007 "Halloween" remake, he enhanced Michael's white trash pedigree, suggesting (in his own flimsy, roundabout way) that redneck rock and a lousy childhood were the impetus for Mike's future homicidal instincts. But such dime-store psychology didn't really register with audiences; all that Zombie did was strip away the mystery that John Carpenter worked so hard to create initially.

To his credit, Zombie neglects no part of the franchise. While visions and a prophetic connection between the Myers clan gets introduced later, in 1989's "Halloween V: The Revenge of Michael Myers," Zombie brings vision to the fore in his sequel. His wife Sherri Moon Zombie (a walking case for nepotism if there ever was one) returns in visions – along with a white steed and a bad wig – as the ghostly specter of Michael's dearly deceased mama.

It may be a little wacky, a little faux-Lynchian on Zombie's part, but at least he offers up a creative vision. The "Halloween" series has been devoid of such since 1981. Still, some critics have gone on record, claiming that they prefer "the smooth, well-ordered universe" that Carpenter created in the original to the senseless sadism that Zombie unleashes here. What Carpenter did was help set a standard. Tellingly, he quickly distanced himself from the series (although he collected writing credits for the original "Halloween II," he didn't direct it).

Zombie's sequel is sleazier than Carpenter would have envisioned in 1981 – more graphic, even, than the many flicks that followed in the franchise. Zombie doesn't go for the jugular like he did in "House of 1,000 Corpses" or its salacious sequel, "The Devil's Rejects." In a sense, it feels here (as it did in his promising but hurried 2007 remake) that he's too tied down with reverence for the franchise to really break out and make it his own.

But his Michael grunts as he attacks his victims and he devours raw animal organs – both ghoulish touches that lend an air of menace to the all-too-familiar killer. His blade produces a loud, walloping sound as it penetrates chest cavities, making the act of killing seem more vicious and visceral. What Carpenter did for creepy ambiance, Zombie seems to do for ultra-violence, before getting stuck in a slasher movie spin cycle wherein all the killings become imitations of each other.

Ultimately "Halloween II" might not impress critics, but it doesn't have to. It's for those who still curl up every October 31 to watch the movies (especially the original) air on AMC. And especially for those who, probably like Zombie, still relish every thrust of the blade and every repetitive death sequence. While he's not a revisionist in the strictest sense, at least Zombie conjures up a little mayhem for them.

Shayna Murphy can be reached at skmurphy@student.umass.edu

HALLOWEEN II

DIR. ROB ZOMBIE

2 / 5

★★

ARTS & LIVING IS HIRING

WANT FREE TICKETS?

WRITE FOR US!

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

SGA ELECTIONS

★★★★★★★★★★★

RUN

House Council, Senate & Sylvan Lt. Governor

BUILD CONNECTIONS.
MAKE YOUR VOICE HEARD.
BECOME A LEADER!

PICK UP A NOMINATION FORM IN YOUR CLUSTER OFFICE OR THE SGA OFFICE (420 STUDENT UNION). NOMINATIONS DUE THURSDAY SEPTEMBER 17 TO THE SGA OFFICE.

THE ELECTIONS COMMISSION
STUDENT GOVERNMENT ASSOCIATION
ELECTIONSCOMMISSION@STUAF.UMASS.EDU
BLOGS.UMASS.EDU/ECSGA
UMASS AMHERST

Schneider moves on to MLL

Drafted 13th overall in draft, wins championship as rookie

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

As one of the top goalies in the nation, Doc Schneider never got to watch much lacrosse playing for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team.

It's a different story being a rookie for the Toronto Nationals.

The New York native was the 13th selection in the 2009 Major League Lacrosse draft after establishing himself as one of the nation's top goalies, helping UMass make two NCAA appearances including a run to the NCAA Championship in 2006.

Schneider started all 61 games he played, finishing with a career 61.1 save percentage (second best in the NCAA during that time) and a 7.43 goals-against average.

His dominance in goal this past spring earned him several honors including Eastern College Athletic Conference Goalie of the Year and USILA Second-Team All-American, the first Minuteman to receive the honor since former goalie Sal LoCascio in 1989.

Schneider followed up his first losing season (5-9) in 2008 with a 9-6 record and a first round NCAA Tournament match-up against fourth-seeded Princeton in 2009. His successful season earned him an invitation to the USILA North-South game as well as the MLL combine.

The former UMass goalie was the only senior to compete in the combine. His performance earned him a spot with the Nationals, where he splits time with teammate Brett Queener.

As a rookie, Schneider has played plenty of minutes as a starter, which he has done his whole life, but now sits behind Queener in the second half.

"It is interesting getting to watch the game for once," Schneider said. "My teammates are the best players in the world so it's really interesting watching these players play and seeing how skillful they really are."

Aside from gaining experience from one of the league's premier goalies in Queener, he has also had to adjust to a more demanding lifestyle, as well as a different culture. He is one of the only Americans on a primarily Canadian team.

"I would've never played with them unless I got drafted by Toronto," Schneider said. "It's almost like going to college again."

Getting used to being in Toronto has involved more than exchanging money and seeing everything in French as well as English. Unlike college lacrosse, game days consist of playing a game at night after a day of flying to Toronto's road games.

The game play is also much faster compared to college. There is more shooting, partly because every player is capable of scoring, including the defense.

In his first year, Schneider has already shown his potential, ranking seventh in the league in saves (90) and fourth in save percentage (.556) this season, despite playing roughly 34:44 minutes per game. Schneider credits UMass coach Greg Canella for preparing him for the transition from college to professional lacrosse.

"The work ethic that he instilled in me got me to be the player I am, so my success is because he taught me how to do things," Schneider said.

MLL ended its season August 23 with Schneider's team taking a 10-9 victory over the Denver Outlaws to win the championship. He played the first half, as he did in the past, and finished with 12 saves.

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill@student.umass.edu

Former UMass goalie Doc Schneider was picked 13th overall in the 2009 Major League Lacrosse draft by the Toronto Nationals. Schneider went on to help the Nationals win the 2009 MLL Title.

Doc Schneider posted a 61.1 save percentage and a 7.34 goals-against average in his time as a Minuteman.

Progress being made, Napoli still winless

W. SOCCER from page 10

Backed by the joint efforts of senior goalkeeper Lauren Luckey and freshman counterpart Emily Cota, the UMass defense has been very strong as of late, allowing just two goals in its previous three games. Although Luckey is strong in net, UMass coaches want to get Cota minutes as well, as she was a highly touted recruit from previous coach Jim Rudy.

"Both keepers are playing really well and they are both capable of making great saves," Napoli said.

UMass has a tough task on Thursday, when they travel to Connecticut to face Hartford. The Hawks (3-3) are 2-1 at home and are coming off a 5-2 victory over rival Central Connecticut.

With her team improving, coach Napoli will focus on the same things this week in practice.

"Practice will be more of the same this week," she said. "Emphasis will be on keeping possession, changing the point of attack, increasing the speed of play, and finally, looking to finish on scoring opportunities when facing a lot of pressure."

The Minutewomen have not forgotten that the season is still quite young. Although not scoring goals, their grit and heart is what is keeping them in games, demonstrated perfectly in their past two double-overtime matches.

Steve Levine can be reached at slevine@student.umass.edu

Sophomore Meghan Collins looks to settle the ball against Holy Cross last fall. Collins and the Minutewomen made progress on offense against UNH, taking 23 shots, 10 of which were on goal.

Minutemen to play at Ann Arbor in 2010

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

When the Massachusetts football team traveled to Texas Tech University last September, the Minutemen set a record for most fans (53,190) to see a UMass sporting event. But that number should disappear soon, as UMass and Michigan agreed to a contract earlier this summer to play in Ann Arbor, Mich. in 2010.

The Minutemen will travel to Michigan Stadium on Sept. 18, 2010 to take on the Wolverines, one of college football's most storied teams. Michigan Stadium is also one of college football's most famous fields.

"Playing at Michigan presents our players with a unique opportunity to play in one of the best venues college football has to offer," UMass coach Kevin Morris said to UMassathletics.com.

The "Big House," as Michigan Stadium is known, has an official capacity listed at 106,201, almost double the number of fans who saw UMass face the Red Raiders. When the Minutemen travel to the "Big House," the official capacity is expected to be over 108,000 as construction began in 2007 on an expansion project. The project is expected to be completed prior to the 2010 season.

Even playing against a team from the Football Championship Subdivision, the game is sure to bring a large crowd to Michigan Stadium as the Wolverines have had crowds of over 100,000 for 215 consecutive games – a streak that dates back to 1975.

Besides Penn State's Beaver Stadium, Michigan Stadium is the second-largest football-only venue in the world.

In 2003, Michigan set the NCAA single-game attendance record when 112,118 fans filled Michigan Stadium past capacity to see the Wolverines take on Ohio State University. Michigan has also led the nation in attendance for 33 of the past 34 seasons.

Besides last year's game against Texas Tech, the only other crowd over 50,000 to see a UMass sporting event was in 2002. A crowd of 51,221 watched the Minutemen take on North Carolina State University in a game on Sept. 28.

The Michigan game will mark the 11th time in 12 seasons the Minutemen will take on a Football Bowl Subdivision team with UMass holding an 8-20 all-time record against FBS teams. The last win for the Minutemen against an FBS team came in 1984 when they upset Ball State University.

The Wolverines hold NCAA records in most games won (872) and an all-time winning percentage of .740. The program has also won 11 national titles.

"We are extremely excited to play a game against a program with such history and prestige as Michigan," UMass Director of Athletics John McCutcheon said to UMassathletics.com. "We think it will be a tremendous experience for our student-athletes and our fans. We are looking forward to playing before more than 100,000 people and think it will be a very memorable event."

For Michigan, its last lost to an FCS team came in 2007 in one of the greatest upsets in college football history. To open the 2007 season, the then-ranked No. 5 Wolverines took on the then-defending FCS champion Appalachian State University. Before a crowd of 109,218, Michigan fell to the Mountaineers, 34-32, after Appalachian State blocked a last-second field-goal attempt to seal the victory. The win marked the first time since the Division I subdivisions were created in 1978 that an FCS team beat a team ranked in the Associated Press poll.

Jeffrey R. Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com.

Michigan football head coach Rich Rodriguez watches the Wolverines play from the sidelines at Michigan Stadium. UMass will head to Ann Arbor, Mich. to play the Wolverines on Sept. 18, 2010.

BE THE FIRST

REGISTRATION

$35 fee, only the first 70 contestants will be accepted

Who can register:
16 - adult

For more information or to register, either call 413-259-3065 or visit www.lsse.org

Amherst Idol

Where:
Amherst Regional Middle School Auditorium

When:
Friday September 25th 6:30 pm: General Audition Night
Saturday September 26th 7:00 pm: Top 25 perform
Friday October 2nd 7:00 pm: Top 10 perform
Saturday October 10th 7:30 pm: Top 5 perform

FINALS

Get it All! Daily Hampshire Gazette | 98.3 The Valley's Best Variety | Amherst Leisure Services Community Theater | Hot 94.1 | Shining Star Karaoke www.TrioMusic.com

This is not a school sponsored program

THE BOLTWOOD
PROJECT™
Serving others since 1969— and STILL making a difference!
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)

REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!

••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN

Fall Semester 2009 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Campus Center Room 101 • Sept. 14 (Mon) • Sept. 15 (Tues) • Sept. 16 (Wed)

• Assignment notification ONLY Thurs. Sept. 17 at Boltwood table CC Concourse
No telephone inquiries. YOU (or a friend) must pick up the notification letter!

Volunteer, while earning credit!

Defense grabs 3 picks

FOOTBALL from page 10

whole CAA," Collier said.

Miles, Tyler Holmes and true freshman Perry McIntyre each pulled in an interception off Esposito (13-of-26 for 124 yards). Holmes' interception gives him a pick in three straight games dating back to last season.

The only score of the game for Albany came on a 3-yard run by option quarterback Andrew Smith with nine minutes left in the second quarter.

On the same drive, the Great Danes lost tailback Dave Mcl arty who injured his hip. Mcl arty rushed for 125 yards last year in UMass' 28-16 victory, and is Albany's career rushing leader.

The touchdown cut UMass' lead to three, but it would be back up to 10 less than a minute later. Kyle Havens found Victor Cruz running towards the middle of the field and the senior wideout caught the ball and took it 67 yards for the score.

"That was huge, that is the same play that I threw an interception on last week," Havens said. "I came back this week, and threw a better ball executed better just like we said we wanted to do this week. That was just huge psychologically for the team."

Havens and Cruz had a rhythm all night as the two hooked up six times for 121 yards and two touchdowns. Havens posted significantly better numbers than last week as he went 20-of-32 for 284 yards with two touchdowns and one interception.

Nelson carried most of the load for UMass (83 yards on 21 carries), but wasn't the leading rusher for the Minutemen. Redshirt sophomore Jon Hernandez, who came in during the fourth quarter, had nine carries for 90 yards and two touchdowns. After putting UMass up 34-7 in the fourth quarter on a 1-yard touchdown run, the first of his career, Hernandez broke a 58-yard touchdown run on UMass' next offensive play.

"You want to get that first win on the board and the guys did a great job of turning the ball over, and the offense putting the game away with those turnovers in the second half to get us that first win," UMass coach Kevin Morris said.

Jeffrey R Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com.

Justin Sawicki and Bryan Fisher of UMass' offensive line prepare to protect quarterback Kyle Havens in UMass' victory over Albany. The offensive line allowed one sack in the win.

Senior Victor Cruz listens for orders from quarterback Kyle Havens. The two hooked up six times for 121 yards and two touchdowns.

Horne, Ihne lost in victory

HAVENS from page 10

down and two picks), junior quarterback Kyle Havens had a coming out party in his first game at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Havens, 20-of-32 passing for 284 yards two touchdowns and an interception that deflected off a receiver's hands, showed why he won the starting quarterback job for UMass just two weeks ago.

Hitting nine receivers on the night, Havens used a strong running game to his advantage, using play action and finding openings deep in the Albany secondary.

While Havens was effective in the pocket and reading the defense, he showed off his play making ability when, on a bootleg, the junior college transfer fired a pass through traffic to senior Victor Cruz who broke from the crowd and down the sideline for a 67-yard score.

"In just his second start, Havens already seems to have the confidence of the coaching staff behind him. On multiple occasions on third down and short situations, Havens was given the ball even with an All-Conference tailback in Tony Nelson behind him.

Collateral damage

While UMass did major damage to Albany on the scoreboard, the Danes made a dent in the Minuteman roster when senior wideout Jeremy Horne and redshirt junior center John Ihne both left the game with injuries.

Horne left the game early in the second quarter when he was hit hard after a nine yard reception, his only catch of the game. He remained on the ground for a few minutes before leaving the field under his own power. According to Morris, Horne left the game with a mild concussion and was kept out as a precautionary measure.

Ihne was hurt during the first half and left with a shoulder injury. Details of the injury following the game were vague. He was replaced at center by senior Jared Chivers.

Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu.

Quarterback Kyle Havens barks out commands to his offense in UMass' win over Albany. The junior got a win in his first start in Amherst.

Minutemen tie UNH, UVM during weekend tournament with five of the Minutemen's 10 shots, only to be outdone by Vermont's 15 shots, including five during both overtime periods combined.

M. SOCCER from page 10

On Friday, UMass and New Hampshire finished the game scoreless, despite the Wildcats' aggressiveness. UNH (1-2-1) outshot the Minutemen, 16-5, with shots coming from nine players, including three off the bench.

However, none found their way into the goal as keeper Chris Piekos finished with seven saves.

One of the biggest differences between the two games was set pieces. In the game against UNH, the Maroon and White managed five corner kicks between regulation and overtime compared to the Wildcats' 16. Against the Catamounts, UMass finished with eight while limiting them to four.

The Minutemen have now tied three of their four games with two goals so far and are still trying to figure out their keeper situation for the season.

Curran-Hays started his second game of the season on Sunday, giving up three goals with a 0.769 save percentage. Piekos (who started on Friday) has allowed one goal in the two games he started this season with a 0.933 save percentage.

Curran-Hays was originally the starter-in-training for UMass alum Zack Simmons during his two years on the bench, but a knee injury during the summer has opened the competition up to Piekos, who has so far put up better numbers.

UMass coach Sam Koch is hoping to go with a clear No. 1 starter soon, once either candidate proves themselves to his satisfaction.

Aside from not having a definitive goalkeeper, the Minutemen have struggled offensively to find opportunities. Opponents have put up 68 shots compared to 33 from the Minutemen.

Even with the disparity on offense, the only loss so far happened when Hartford defeated UMass, 2-0, on Sept. 9.

After two games this weekend, Koch and Co. should get plenty of rest and time to figure out the situation in goal.

The next game for the Minutemen will be against cross-state rival Northeastern on Sept. 19. The Huskies are 1-2 this season and will play UMass in their second of three straight home games.

The Minutemen will then return home the next day for an exhibition game against the Winstars.

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill@student.umass.edu.

Senior Mark DeSantis crosses ball to a teammate in a match last season. The forward scored in the 39th minute against Vermont on Sunday off a free kick from junior Ben Arikian, tieing the game at one goal apiece.

McPherson to be inducted in HOF

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

While Massachusetts coach Kevin Morris begins his career at the helm for the Minutemen, a UMass coaching legend has been enshrined in the College Football Hall of Fame.

Former coach Dick McPherson, who led the Minutemen to four Yankee Conference Championships in his seven years at UMass, was one of 18 inductees to the College Football Hall of Fame Class of 2009. Other inductees include Lombardi Trophy winners Chris Spielman of Ohio State, Grant Wistrom of Nebraska, Heisman Trophy winners Tim Brown of Notre Dame and Gino Torretta from Miami.

McPherson, who has an all-time record of 111-73-5, is already a member of the UMass Hall of Fame, having been inducted in 2004.

The 2009 class of inductees was announced in December of 2008 by the National Football Foundation & College Hall of Fame (NFF) dinner at the Waldorf-Astoria hotel in New York City. The official induction into the hall itself in South Bend, Ind. will not occur until the summer of 2010.

McPherson coached at UMass from 1971-77, earning the third most wins in school history (45) before going on to coach at Syracuse University from 1981-90. His tenure marked an era of newfound success for UMass as he became the first coach in school history to produce three eight-win seasons.

The Minutemen reached the postseason for the first time under McPherson's watch, losing to Lehigh University in the Division II NCAA Playoffs. He was also the coach during UMass only bowl game victory, defeating the University of California at Davis in the 1972 Boardwalk Bowl after coaching the Minutemen to nine wins for the first time since 1901.

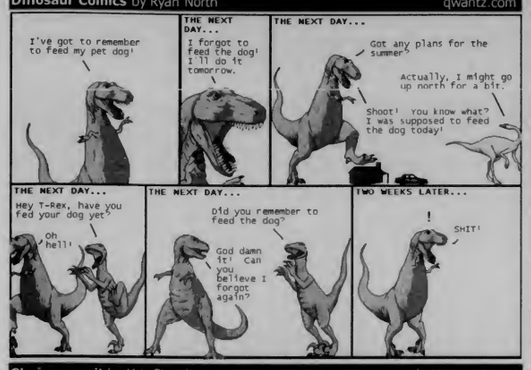
McPherson's teams dominated conference play. His .781 winning percentage with a 28-8-1 record is the fifth best mark ever for a Yankee League coach.

Those Minuteman teams churned out a number of great players, with 55 players earning first team all-conference honors and seven players getting named first team All-America. Seven of McPherson's players also reached the professional ranks.

McPherson continued his success after he moved on to Syracuse during the 1980's. He remains the school's third-leading coach in wins (66) and seasons coached (10).

While leading the Orange, McPherson's teams reached five bowl games, going 3-1-1. Syracuse's best year under the coach came in 1987 when the team went an undefeated 11-0-1, tying Auburn in the season-concluding Sugar Bowl. McPherson was also named 1987 NCAA Coach of the Year. The Orange ended the season ranked No. 4 in the country by the Associated Press.

McPherson remains affiliated with Syracuse today, acting as the color commentator for Syracuse Football radio broadcasts.



Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu.

The Daily Collegian asks,
"Are you a
SPORTS FAN?"
THEN GO WRITE FOR THE COLLEGIAN!
Contact Jeff Larnard at
sports@dailycollegian.com

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!
Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

COMICS

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North — qwantz.com

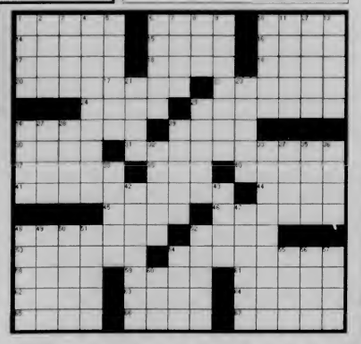
Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub — chainsawsuit.com

College Ninja by Stephanie Ressler

Labrat by Richard Martelly

My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees — mnftiu.cc

Mr. Gnu by Travis Dando — weepstrip.com



SUDOKU

	6		9			4
	2					3
	5		2		1
							8
		8		3		9
2						6	4
8		6	7
7				1
4					9	5

UMSBC
UMass Ski N Board Club
FIRST GENERAL MEETING
WED. SEPTEMBER 16th
Campus Center Auditorium
8:00PM
Raffle
Revealing New UMSBC Apparel!

CROSSWORD

ACROSS

1. Glide
6. Zingy taste
10. Chomp
14. Merchandise
15. Found in skin lotion
16. Flair
17. Take as one's own
18. Area of cut grass
19. Essence
20. Charitable
22. Be equivalent
24. Religious sisters
25. Into parts or pieces
26. In the middle of
29. Operatic solo
30. Scarce
31. Adversary
37. Adhere
39. Male sheep
40. Hostel
41. Belonging to the past
44. Out of the wind
45. Travelled on a horse
46. Really or in truth
48. Heavy fabric with a woven design
52. "Little piggies"
53. Venue
54. Changeless
58. Matures
59. Tidy
61. Laser printers need this
62. Flesh of animals
63. Adhesive strip
64. Not tight
65. Sea eagle
66. Flower stalk
67. Cheer up

DOWN

1. Loot
2. Place a load on (archaic)
3. Press laundry
4. Relying on a person for support
5. Animal sexual arousal
6. Anklebone
7. "Oh, my!"
8. At present
9. Beginning
10. Started
11. Homeric epic
12. Flavor
13. Go in
21. Not tricked by
23. Partridge
25. Fragrance
26. Part of a foot
27. Anagram of "Mail"
28. Colored part of an eye
29. Without delay
32. A group of lions
33. A poisonous agaric
34. Indolent
35. Arch type
36. Require
38. Small Asian goat antelope
42. Rats or mice
43. King of the jungle
47. Snuggle
48. Find fault
49. Film critic Ebert
50. Sea
51. Hindu social division
52. ___ pole
54. A superhero might wear one
55. Dwarf buffalo
56. Where a bird lives
57. Tall woody plant
60. Dine

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Please remember to think about those who died a long time ago...in a galaxy far, far away.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
They invented High Endurance deodorant for a reason. Just saying.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Open up more doors of friendship by greeting everyone like Gerard Butler in 300.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Be charitable and go and see the film "Gamer." Gerard Butler needs it.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Wanna feel dangerous? Listen to the Pink Panther theme on your ipod while walking to class.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Moby Dick is not an allegory for your progression through puberty.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You're right! Who needs school when you can click random article on Wikipedia?

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You might be the kind of person that needs the Best Friend app from the iStore.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Life would be much better if you were living with zombies.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
A line in the sand has been drawn. You must choose: Pepsi or Coke.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Take care of your thongs or else you won't have any sandals left!

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Test the limits of stupidity by selling fertilized rabbit eggs for one dollar.

HAC Hampshire Athletic Club
HAMPSHIRE ATHLETIC CLUB
GUEST PASS
Ask about our Fall Faculty/Staff Special!
$400 per year for new memberships.
We are the most complete club in the area.
Pool and jacuzzi, over 50 pieces of cardio equipment, Nautilus and Cybex strength training machines, free weights, wide variety of classes, basketball/volleyball/tennis courts
This pass good for one Free visit to HAC. Please present this coupon to the front desk upon arrival. Offer expires October 31, 2009
90 Gatehouse Rd - Amherst (413) 256-6446 hampshireac.com

CLASSIFIEDS

CREDIT INTERNSHIP OPPORTUNITY
3 credit hour internship. Internet marketing and branding on bus line/ University Drive. Must be proficient with social networking sites. Call 413-549-4971 ask about internship opportunity.

EMPLOYMENT
Calzone Transport (Drivers) and Calzone Production Engineers (kitchen help) wanted. Apply at DP Dough, downtown Amherst.

EMPLOYMENT
Spring Break 2010 sell trips, earn cash, and go free! Call for group discounts. Best prices guranteed! Info/reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

EMPLOYMENT
Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162

FOR RENT
Rt. 9 Hadley. 5 bedroom house. $2000/mo & utilities. 2 car garag. 1 & a qtr miles to campus. No beds. Large Lot. Music room. Skibiski Real Estate. 586-1827.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 2009 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Taming the Great Danes

Defense sets tone early, sends message to CAA opponents

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Last year, Albany jumped out to an early 9-0 lead over the Massachusetts football team. This year, they didn't have a chance as the No. 17 Minutemen defense set the tone from the second that Great Danes quarterback Vinny Esposito got the ball.

Senior Brandon Collier went untouched through the Albany (0-2) offensive line, and jarred the ball loose as he hit Esposito. Collier recovered the football at the Albany 18-yard line and the defense had set the tone, as UMass (1-1) went on to an easy 44-7 victory.

UMass	44
Albany	7

"When I hit him I kind of blacked out and I started to hear people yelling so I turned to see the ball so I just tried to get it," Collier said. "I wish I would have seen it sooner so I could have scooped-and-scored."

UMass capitalized off the turnover, on a 2-yard rushing touchdown by Tony Nelson, extending its lead to 10 in the first five minutes of the game. Amando Cuko hit a career long 47-yard field goal on the game's opening drive and went 3-for-5 on the night with one blocked kick and another that hit off the crossbar.

"Last season, they came out on fire and we were kind of lackadaisical and out of shape," Jeromy Miles said. "So for us we worked all week on just coming out with intensity from the first snap and we just came out and they never really responded."

The Great Danes tried to respond, but found it difficult against a UMass defense that forced five turnovers – three interceptions and two fumbles – and constantly got pressure on Esposito. Albany found little success on the ground or through the air as they piled up 208 yards of total offense (84 yards rushing and 124 yard passing).

"That game [last year] was critical because that was the first game of the season and it set the tone for our season," Miles said. "Now we come back from the K-State loss and we play [Albany] and hopefully this one will set the tone for this season."

Through two games, UMass' defense looks more like the defense that led it to the 2006 National Championship Game, than the defense that often came out slow last season, putting the team in deficits. Not only has it set the tone early in the game, but also been flawless in the second half this year. The Minutemen have only allowed points in the second quarters of the first two games of the year, being outscored 28-10 in that quarter, compared to outscoring their opponents, 51-0, in the other three quarters.

"I just want to start off by saying, UMass defense is back to the

See FOOTBALL on page 8

Kyle Havens makes changes at the line of scrimmage in UMass' 44–7 victory over Albany, Saturday night at McGuirk Alumni Stadium. The junior college transfer was 20–of–32 for 284 yards with two touchdowns and one interception in his second game in a UMass uniform.

Havens finds rhythm with Cruz, offense capitalizes on turnovers

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In its 44-7 win Saturday night, the No. 17 Massachusetts football team needed little help on offense. But with five turnovers from Albany, the Minutemen got all the opportunities they needed.

Starting with a Brandon Collier forced fumble on the first play from scrimmage for the Great Danes, the Minutemen (1-1) dominated the turnover battle 5-1, converting three interceptions and two fumble recoveries into 17 points with a missed field goal.

UMass picked up where it left off with takeaways after getting an interception, a fumble recovery and a blocked punt against Kansas State. Such production from the defense was not lost with UMass coach Kevin Morris.

"That's their number one mission every time they go out on the field," Morris said of his defense after the game. "And offensively you have to put the ball in the endzone and we were able to do that tonight and get that scoreboard to light up a little bit."

After two quick scores in the first quarter by UMass, Albany had bounced back to bring the score to 10-7. But when the Danes' turnover woes continued, what little success they had running the ball had gone for naught.

"When you turn the ball over five times, you probably don't deserve to win and most of the time you don't win," Albany coach Bob Ford said.

Playing a key role in pressuring the offense into turnovers was the all-senior front four of Anthony Monette, Kyle Harrington, Michael Hanson and Collier, who kept consistent pressure on Great Danes quarterback Vinny Esposito all night. With four turnovers on the night, Esposito showed signs of frustration with the UMass defense. Without accounting for Esposito's 25 yards lost rushing when he was sacked three times, the Danes almost ran for as many yards (121) than passing (124).

HAVENS ON TARGET

After a lackluster performance against Kansas State (10-of-34 passing for 102 yards a touch-

See HAVENS on page 8

Junior Ben Arikian looks to move the ball downfield in a match last season. The Minutemen are still winless in 2009 after they came away with two ties over the weekend against New Hampshire and Vermont.

UMass still winless after consecutive ties

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Forty minutes of extra time wasn't enough for the Massachusetts men's soccer team to decide either of its two games this weekend. The Minutemen are still looking for their first win after tying both games of the Morgan Stanley Smith Barney Classic.

They finished yesterday's game in a 1-1 draw against Vermont (0-0-2). Forward D.J. Elder struck first for the Catamounts in the opening six minutes of the game.

UMass	0
Vermont	1
UMass	0
UNH	0

Senior Marty Galvin got the ball down the right hand side and sent a low cross through the box to Elder. The freshman collected the ball and kicked it past goalkeeper Shane Curran-Hays to put UVM up early.

UMass (0-1-3) had its first real opportunity when forward Chris Roswess drew a foul and set up a penalty kick for his other front-runner, Mark DeSantis. The penalty kick went to the left of Vermont goalkeeper, Tom Critz, who made a diving save to stop the shot.

Fouls plagued the Catamounts during much of the first period. UVM had 20 fouls, 12 of which came before the half. None were more costly than the one in the 39th minute where DeSantis headed in a kick from midfielder Ben Arikian to knot the game up at one a piece.

DeSantis ended the game

See M. SOCCER on page 8

Minutewomen still looking for first goal

Defense strong against UNH, Luckey, Cota split time in net

BY STEVEN LEVINE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the Massachusetts women's soccer team, the best offense is a good defense. But when the offense doesn't score, matches just cannot be won. And in the case of the scoreless Massachusetts women's soccer team, that is why they are still winless.

UMass	0
UNH	0

On Sunday, the Minutewomen traveled to New Hampshire (1-4-1) and had their opportunities to score. But they failed to do so in a match that could have given them their first win of the season.

UMass (0-4-1) instead took a draw in a match that went into double overtime for the second time in as many games. The Minutewomen have yet to score a goal in five games this season, although scoring opportunities in their most recent game were abundant.

"Their goalkeeper made about three great saves, while we also hit the post three times," UMass coach Angela Napoli said. "This was certainly not the result we wanted, but it's another step in the right direction."

The Minutewomen did amass a season-high 23 shots in the contest, 10 of which were on goal. Sophomore Rachel Miranda's three shots were all on goal perhaps representing the best chances to score in the match.

"Miranda played great," Napoli said. "She had a few chances throughout the match but none seemed to find the net. She had a great shot coming from a cross at one point, as well as a shot coming off a rebound from a corner kick."

Although winless and scoreless up to this point, UMass is looking better and better each match. The first supporter of that is coach Napoli.

"We were much more composed this match compared to previous ones, when we would get stuck playing a direct style," she said. "Today we were keeping possession of the ball and attacking as a group."

The second overtime saw especially little offense from the Minutewomen, who were outshot in the period, 5-2. Although they took just two shots, the final one was key. With under a minute left, Therese Smith put a shot on goal, but had it stopped by UNH's goalkeeper Ally Yost, who completed her 10-save shutout.

"I think we just got a bit tired in the second overtime," Napoli said.

As the offense continued to improve on its chances and style of play, the defense was really what kept the Minutewomen from taking their fifth loss of the season.

See W. SOCCER on page 7

UM upsets another opponent

Takesdown No. 12 JMU, team now 3–0 vs. ranked opponents

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Some say the best offense is a good defense – especially when the defense does the scoring.

The No. 15 Massachusetts field hockey team extended its winning streak to three after shutting out No. 12 James Madison (2-2) and Albany (3-1) this past weekend.

UMass	1
JMU	0
UMass	1
Albany	0

Junior Makaela Potts scored her second goal of the season off a penalty corner when forward Cher King pushed the ball into Nikki Panciocco, who fed Potts for the score at the 15-minute mark in the first half to beat JMU, 1-0.

Sophomore Alesha Widdall earned the 10th shutout of her career with a three-save effort against the Dukes on Saturday.

JMU pressed the Minutewomen defense hard from the opening whistle, earning three-straight penalty corners to start the game. Potts' score was UMass' only corner in the first half, as the Dukes controlled the ball for much of the game. The Minutewomen were outshot 4-3 in the first half and tallied one shot in the second half.

Meanwhile, JMU attacked harder after halftime firing 10 shots in the second half alone, including eight penalty corners.

Led by back Tara King and midfielder Dolores de Rooij's nine shots combined, the Dukes held a 14-4 shot advantage, three of which were on-goal.

UMass coach Justine Sowry frequently used her bench to rest players throughout the busy second half and to create different matchups against the Dukes.

The loss gave JMU its first back-to-back losses since losing three straight in September 2006.

UMass' last three-game winning streak dates back to last season when it made its way to the opening round of the NCAA tournament after winning the Atlantic 10 Conference title.

The Minutewomen were without senior offensive threat Jill Powers, who served a one-game suspension after drawing a red card against Albany on Friday. In a game in which seven total cards were drawn, UMass downed the Great Danes, 1-0, on forward Katie Kelly's second goal of the season.

The goal came off a penalty corner which Kelly drew by pushing into the Albany striking circle late in the second half. Potts took the initial shot and Kelly's shot went past Great Dane goalkeeper Kristi Troch just inside the right post.

Kelly received two warnings from officials for physical play and Potts drew a yellow card midway through the second half.

Jaime Bourazeris chases down her opponent in a contest last season. The junior has scored two goals for the 4–1–0 Minutewomen in 2009.

Widdall made five saves on 18 Albany shots. The Great Danes earned an astonishing 23 penalty corners, including 13 in the second half.

Albany used a similar strategy against UMass as the Minutewomen used against JMU, using many different players throughout the course of the game. The Great Danes used nearly all of their 19-player roster, with the exception of midfielder Erin Crosson.

Albany used a two-goalie system against UMass, starting junior Christine Hoffman and sitting her in favor of freshman Troch in the second half. This is normal for Albany, as Hoffman has started all four games for the Great Danes, while Troch has played an equal 140 minutes. The combination gave Albany three shutouts until the loss.

The Minutewomen return home next weekend for games against in-state rivals No. 10 Boston College (5-0) and Northeastern (2-3).

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillme@student.umass.edu.

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY

COLLEGIAN

SUNNY | HIGH: 77 LOW: 50 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 2009

Campus center flooded by leak

A sudden water leak in the campus center Monday afternoon caused disruption in the popular student hangout on campus.

A burst pipe leaves vendors and students seeking refuge

BY ALYSSA CREAMER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Sept. 14 brought out sunny skies and warm weather across the University of Massachusetts' campus. However, inside the campus center, its ceiling allegedly made it rain on top of students and vendors.

Although it unclear whether pipes burst or if there was a broken sprinkler head, there was enough flooding on the floors of the concourse entrance that caution tape blocked off the parking garage-side entrances to the building.

"We will probably know more about what caused the flooding tomorrow morning," said UMass Trade Book Manager Diane Willard, who was inside the U-Store during the flooding. "It was an impressive water feature to see," she added.

According to several witnesses that afternoon, it seemed as though several pipes had burst above the second floor of the Campus Center.

"I don't know what happened exactly," said Anthony Ritchey, a vendor for Beyond the Wall, whose posters were directly beneath the downfall of water. "The water damage was not as detrimental to our products as it was to our sales."

According to Ritchey, he made about a third of his projected sales that day. Beyond the Wall will be selling its posters, prints and general decorations for the rest of the week. The

See WATER on page 2

On Monday morning UMass held a dedication ceremony in the amphitheater of the Integrated Sciences Building celebrating the completion of the new complex after three years of construction.

ISB officially dedicated

UMass president and chancellor gather with financial and political backers to make the sciences complex official

BY JENNIFER HESHION
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After three years of construction, the Integrated Sciences Building, located on North Pleasant St. at the University of Massachusetts, received its official dedication Monday, Sept. 14 with over a hundred well-wishers in attendance.

Among the company of donors, congressmen, senators and educators, Chancellor Robert C. Holub took to the podium in the amphitheater of the Integrated Sciences Building (ISB) at 9 a.m. to offer his congratulations to all the people who had been instrumental in developing the new sciences complex.

"[ISB] will be filled with students enthusiastic about learning, and future technologies will be developed here," Holub said. "What will happen here will be beyond our imagination. In this building, we will educate the next generation of leaders in science."

According to University president Jack M. Wilson, the primary mission of developing the ISB was to teach students in the fields of chemistry, biology, biochemistry and molecular biology. The advantages of the ISB, Wilson said, will be to allow students access to scientific instruments currently in use in a professional setting.

With a cost of $114.5 million, the four-story ISB contains state-of-the-art classrooms and laboratories with hi-tech scientific demonstration facilities for 4,640 students per semester. It also holds an auditorium capable of seating 300 students.

UMass senior Alysson Gray, a legal studies and microbiology major, said she believes the ISB will certainly benefit students.

What is really nice about the ISB is how spacious it is," Gray said. "When you have a large lecture class with 300 students, you are not right on top of one another. I think that it will be nice to have new labs to work in because some other places on campus are not really up to par with what we need to get done in the labs."

Monday's dedication ceremony follows nearly three years to the day when the University first broke ground on the sciences building John W. Olver, congressman of the first congressional district of Massachusetts, was a key supporter of the development of the ISB. He also present at the first

See SCIENCES on page 3

Students take advantage of new state-of-the-art technology as well as larger classrooms and laboratories offered by the Integrated Sciences Building as part of the University's efforts to educate future scientists.

UM scientist studies climate, hurricanes

BY MICHAEL PHILLIS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A University of Massachusetts scientist has conducted research along with others in the scientific community that demonstrates a correlation between changes in the climate and frequency of hurricane activity in the North Atlantic Ocean.

Jon Woodruff, a UMass professor of geosciences, is part of a project that has used geographical data from sedimentary deposits in salt marshes and coastal ponds from eight main locations from Puerto Rico to Massachusetts.

Their data has allowed them to construct a 1,500-year history of hurricane activity in the region.

"The main finding was that there are two times in recent history – the last 1,500 years – of climate anomalies," said Woodruff.

About 1,000 years ago, sea surface temperatures were higher – much like today.

During this period, hurricane activity increased.

Similarly, during According to Woodruff, "Episodically, the whole game changes when these hurricanes come through."

By examining the "inundated" barrier after heavy sediment deposits are made, Woodruff was able to record a history of hurricane activity.

Woodruff collected much of the solid geographical data along with Jeffrey Donnelly from the Woods Hole Oceanographic Institute in Massachusetts.

This data was used, along with information from past studies, to construct a model.

A major implication of this study concerns the impact of global warming on hurricane activity.

With sea surface temperatures rising, a big question asked is how this will affect storm frequency.

"We are not there yet," said Woodruff. "The big unknown is

See CLIMATE on page 2

"Building on the Promise:" UMass wins grant to promote community service

BY HANNAH MCGOLDRICK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

John Reiff, director of Commonwealth College's Office of Community Service Learning, received word that the joint proposal for the Learn and Serve America grant had been won by the University of Massachusetts on August 19.

The five UMass campuses collaborated to earn the $471,000 grant, intended to engage students across Massachusetts in community service learning in response to needs brought on by the economic downturn.

Reiff, a co-author of the grant, said, "In a way I have been working on this grant for the past ten or 15 years."

The funder, the Corporation for National and Community Service, is a federal agency that provides funding for a whole range of community service initiatives. This includes a set of programs aimed at community service learning in higher education.

In the 90's Reiff was part of a program funded by the corporation, and when an opportunity came along three years ago, a group of faculty representing the five UMass campuses got together to write a proposal for the Learn and Serve America grant. Unfortunately, they were turned down and had to wait another three years to reapply for the grant.

"We thought this was so good, talking to one another. Let's see if we can figure out some things that we can do to build on this relationship we have established across the five UMass campuses," Reiff said.

The group of faculty decided

See COMMUNITY on page 3

ARTS&LIVING

RASCAL FLATTS

Find out how hard fans rocked at Saturday night's Rascal Flatts concert at the Comcast Center.

SEE PAGE 6

SPORTS

ALL EYES POINTING TO HAVEN

New UM quarterback Kyle Havens may wear the number 12, but the jury is still out on if he'll emulate Liam Coen's success.

SEE PAGE 8

EDITORIAL&OPINION

GLOBAL PERSPECTIVES: ARGENTINE STREETS

From abroad, Mike Fox shares a lesson in the Argentine tango, speaking from the shoes of a traveller, not a tourist.

SEE PAGE 4

DailyCollegian.com

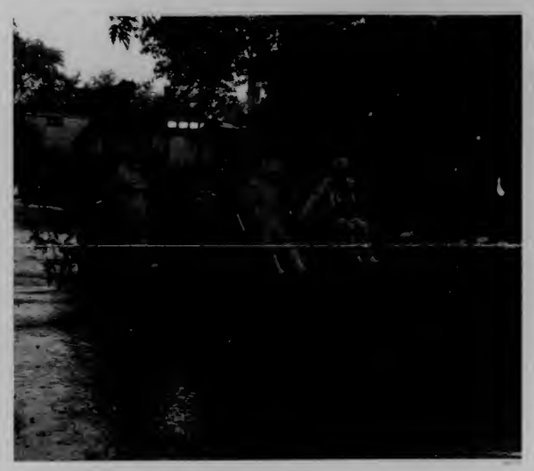
RIDE TO PROVIDE

Chris Shores shares a video documenting this year's hillel House "Ride to Provide."

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIX
ISSUE 6

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF William McGuinness
MANAGING EDITOR A.P. Sullivan
BUSINESS MANAGER Daniel Jeter
PRODUCTION MANAGER Michael Sarkes
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Kirsten Swenson
ADVERTISING MANAGER Michael Tortorici
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Max Demmer
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Shayna Murphy
COMICS EDITOR Annie Keithline
EDITORIAL EDITOR Nick O'Malley
NEWS EDITOR Nick Bush
SPORTS EDITOR Jeffrey R. Larrard
WEB EDITOR Brian Wood
PHOTO EDITOR Matthew Harrison
IT MANAGER Victor Jacek
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Matt Zolnierz
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Jacinto
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Norman Provost
CLASSIFIED MANAGER Katelyn Tamilio
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Justin Gagnon
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Elise Horowitz
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Cal Scannell
ASSISTANT COMICS Andrew Witts
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Michael Phillis
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Hannah Nelson
ASSISTANT NEWS Samuel Butterfield
ASSISTANT NEWS Alyssa Creamer
ASSISTANT NEWS Jenn Heshion
ASSISTANT SPORTS David Beinch
ASSISTANT SPORTS Mike Gillenwater
ASSISTANT SPORTS Adam Miller
ASSISTANT PHOTO Maxwell Sparr
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA Chris Shores



THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS COLLEGIATE SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SCENE IN 1903, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN INDEPENDENT SINCE JANUARY 1996. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 545-3500 M-TH 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
William McGuinness

COPY EDITOR
Chelsea Whitton

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Dan Centola

Several workers clear debris from streets after a passing hurricane left this neighborhood flooded by water and rubble.

Researcher studies history of hurricanes

CLIMATE from page 1

how El Niño will respond in the future."

This is a major point of contrast because some models, according to Woodruff, show El Niño becoming stronger, which would probably result in a future with fewer hurricanes.

The next step for Woodruff is to collect more data.

Only about one-tenth of cyclone activity worldwide takes place in the North Atlantic, and Woodruff is looking to do more research in the Western North Pacific where almost a third of worldwide cyclone activity occurs.

"The Western North Pacific responds very different to El Niño and sea surface temperature activity," said Woodruff. "What we are saying is just about the North Atlantic."

Woodruff and his colleagues have been developing records since 2001.

The research is not without some discrepancies in the data between the physical findings and the model that was used.

"Some of the signal we see could very well be a result of a change in barriers," he said.

Yet consistency across locations allows them to remain confident in their findings.

Woodruff also acknowledged that the model might not be using the entire climate phenomenon that could affect hurricane activity.

Mann called the study a "proof of concept" that his kind of link between the state of the climate and the frequency of hurricanes could be established.

Both Mann and Woodruff focused on the future potential of their research into hurricane activity.

The hope is that more data and even better models will provide more accurate predictions of future hurricane patterns.

Michael Phillis can be reached at mphillis@dailycollegian.com.

Environmental Virtue on a bun: Are You Buying?

BY RICK NICHOLS
(MCT)

PHILADELPHIA — Please welcome Elevation Burger, the latest contender for virtue-burger honors, debuting now in the Philadelphia suburbs. It has single-handedly raised the ante in the (so to speak) greener-meat niche. Elevation Burgers are not merely fresh-ground, or all-beef, or naturally raised; they are –top this! – "100 percent organic, grass-fed, free-range beef."

A single patty is about three ounces and change, so you are advised to stack at least two, or to have the Vertigo Burger, the price of which varies depending on the height of the stack. (At the other end of the spectrum, there's the Half the Guilt Burger, involving one meat patty and one veggie patty – the burger equivalent of a well-trimmed hair shirt.)

The burger joint, of course, is this year's steak house – or perhaps this year's antidote to last year's steak-house epidemic. No mystery on that score: Burger budgets do not porterhouses buy.

But if you do not have a drive-through, or thousands of locations across the country, or a spokes-clown, you've got to have something.

In the case of Elevation – the Rocky Mountain-peak motif of its shopping-center storefront disconcertingly resonant of a Coors label – the something is its devotion to renewable-bamboo flooring, energy-efficient ovens, and waste oil destined, eventually, to grow up to be biodiesel.

But its "biggest contribution to a better planet," the fine print on its shake cup says, is the beef itself: it's fed on grass, not corn, which sucks up far less carbon dioxide, and, well, if all cattle were pastured (not grain-fed), it would be like taking four million cars off the road.

It might be the only shake cup with a footnote. The essence of that aforementioned claim can be found, it reports, in "The Omnivore's Dilemma," p. 198. (And so, yes, there it is. You can look it up.)

"The Omnivore's Dilemma," of course, is eco-author Michael Pollan's passionate critique of the depredations of industrial agriculture, and currently the sacred text of ethical eaters: supersizing and "cornification" don't just make you fat, he warns, but make the soil dangerously thinner (and the water and air worse).

Whether Pollan would be flattered that his critique is being stamped on shake cups to encourage the consumption of more burgers is another question.

And there is the matter of the taste of the burger itself, the leaner (15 percent fat) patties, at $3.59 apiece, are decidedly drier and blander than their fattier, cornered-up brethren, rescued by their garnishes – a long list of gratis toppings (ketchup, leaf lettuce, tomatoes, pickles, caramelized onions, Elevation sauce, mayo, balsamic mustard, hot-pepper relish).

This can be viewed, in a certain light, as a badge of honor: Elevation Burger isn't crowing about the best-tasting burger, it's selling the most environmentally responsible burger.

A year ago, a small chain called Goodburger laid loose claim to that mantle, offering "certified, premium Hereford Beef," "naturally and humanely raised," "from small, family-run farms," "in the USA."

You can visit its storefront if you wish.

But it's shuttered; sunk, it appears, by high rent, tough competitors (Five Guys is just down the block), and — just maybe — the urge of better-burger eaters to trade up in these lean but still-hungry times.

Banking on that mood, Jose Garces' intimate Village Whiskey set sail last week. It is serving incomparably juicy, loose-packed half-pounders ($9) on buttery, toasted buns; and indulgent, bulked-up versions laden with foie gras (at $24 a burger).

They're not exactly grass-fed ground beef: The steers eat grass and hay to start, then a high-roughage barley diet.

JOIN THE FESTIVITIES FOR General Mills Week
in the DCs!

Monday, Sept. 14 — All DCs
Tuesday, Sept. 15 — Hampshire DC
Wed., Sept. 16 — Bluewall Franklin DC
Thurs., Sept. 17 — Worcester DC
Friday, Sept. 18 — Berkshire DC ROCK BAND

SEPTEMBER 14–18

Enjoy samples, prizes, and enter the Beatles Rock Band Competition!

GENERAL MILLS FOODSERVICE
IVY
UMASS DINING
UMassAmherst
umassdining.com

Western Foothill Presents
Wormtown Music Festival 2009
September 18-20, 2009 | Camp KeeWanee | Greenfield, MA

THE NEW RIDERS OF THE PURPLE SAGE
RYAN MONTBLEAU BAND · ZACH DEPUTY
REV TOR BAND FEAT MARK MERCIER OF MAX CREEK
THE ALCHEMYSTICS · U-MELT · ROOTS OF CREATION
FUNGUS AMUNGUS · PETER PRINCE & MOON BOOT LOVER
RUBBLEBUCKET ORCHESTRA · INDOBOX · GORDON STONE BAND
ENTRAIN · OTHERWISE · HOT DAY AT THE ZOO · JEFF BUJAK
FOXTROT ZULU · GARY BACKSTROM BAND · TONY LEE THOMAS BAND
TOUSSAINT THE LIBERATOR · STRADDLEDADDY · DOMINO THEORY
GOOSEPIMP ORCHESTRA · NORTH SHIRE STRING BAND
SHAKEDOWN · WEIGHT OF GRAVITY · HUMBLEBEE · PLAYIN' DEAD
BASSHOUND · BROTHERS MCCANN · BUD & BUDD · THE MUVE
CHRIS MERENDA BAND W/ BRUCE MANDARO · DOG STAR BLUE
DPR · THE LAW · TURTLE SOUP · RUMOUR HAS IT W/ KLYPH FROM ZENTRICKSTERS
THE MIGHTY LOONS · FENNARIO · FOOLS OF PERCEPTION · THE KINGS
STEAL YOUR FACE · GILMOUR'S BREAKFAST · HOLLIS BROWN
MOTU · THE GRASS GYPSIES · JIMKATA · THE HIPPOCAMPUS
HOT DAMN SCANDAL · LOVE WHIP · THE EFFECTIVE DOSE
LEROY WHITE · THE CHANGE UP · MASS ELITE · OL' BROWN SHOE
THE PROBLEMADDICTS · THE AFROMOTIVE · SKULLFUNKED
RATBOY JR. · MICHAEL MORROW & THE 21ST CENTURIANS
MASS PRODUCTION · SUN JONES · KIDS' SET FEAT MIKE TURK

TICKET PRICES
Advance Worm Now 9/13 : $85
Week of Worm Sept 13-17 : $95
Kids 16 & Under : FREE
Sunday Only : $30
RV Space is FULL

FESTIVAL FEATURES
2 NIGHTS OF WOODED CAMPING · FAMILY CAMPING & KIDS' CABIN · ARTIST DEMOS
VERNVILLE EARTHSTAGE · RIVER WORM CAFE · COMMUNITY PROJECTS · FOOD & CRAFT VENDORS
COMMUNITY BONFIRE · RIVER ROCK ART · ROAMING ENTERTAINMENT · SNS FOOD DRIVE

TICKET OUTLETS
TRADING POST : CANTON, CT 860.693.4397
BRIGHTER DAZE : GT BARRINGTON, MA 413.528.5888
FLYNN THEATRE BOX OFFICE : BURLINGTON, VT 800.594.8499
NONO BOX OFFICE : NORTHAMPTON, MA 800.THE TICK
WINE RACK : GREENFIELD, MA 413.773.9988
WORMTOWN TRADING CO. : 508.753.8882
FLYNNTIX
GATES OPEN @ 9AM ON 9/18
No Dogs · No Open Fires · No Glass Bottles
Get wormformation at: www.WORMTOWN.com p:508.753.8882

Women outpace males on mortar boards but studies say not in corporate America

BY SCOTT TRAVIS
(MCT)

BOCA RATON, Fla. – If a battle of the sexes is taking place on college campuses, women are the clear winners.

Around the country, women are graduating from college in record numbers, surpassing men in almost every degree category.

"I think that women are probably more mature as college students," said Sharron Ronco, associate provost at Florida Atlantic University in Boca Raton, where women received 64 percent of all degrees in 2008. "They tend to come in with higher high school GPAs, and they tend to achieve better academically."

In 2006-07, the latest period for which Florida figures are available, women received 60 percent of associate's degrees, 58 percent of bachelor's, 60 percent of master's and 58 percent of doctorates.

Those numbers reflect the national average, which show also that women are even with men for medical degrees and trail slightly in law degrees, with 47.5 percent.

It's a stark contrast from 40 years ago, at the dawn of the women's movement, when men received more than 70 percent of all college degrees.

Women have been catching up since the 1980s. "Women often feel like their best hope for advancement is to become well educated," said Evelyn Murphy, president of the Massachusetts-based Women Are Getting Even, or WAGE, which teaches women negotiation skills.

"We've been led to believe if we get enough education and training, we will succeed and be paid better," she said. "So I think the first line of career advancement for women has been to have the right qualifications."

The dominance by women in the classroom has been building over the years. Ohio State University research shows that girls historically perform better than boys in all levels of school.

"In the 1960s and '70s, girls were getting better grades, but many young women were not going to college, or they were dropping out of college to get married," Ohio State sociology professor Claudia Buchmann said in her 2006 report. "Now the benefits of a college education are growing faster for women than they are for men, and women are taking advantage."

What's happening to men? Statistics show they are receiving degrees at higher levels than in past decades, but their growth is much slower than it is for women. Some men are more likely than women to choose the military over college; many become entrepreneurs, and still others look for jobs before completing their degrees, experts said. Also, the prison population is predominantly male.

While women are wearing more mortar boards, they're not yet running corporate boards.

Women head only 15 Fortune 500 companies. Women in the American work force are paid just 80 percent of men's wages, and the gap has not narrowed in recent years.

"Even though women may have gained representation in terms of quantity, when you look at the most privileged, most prestige sectors, it's still very hard to penetrate by women," said Mikyung Ryu, a researcher for the Washington, D.C.-based American Council on Education.

Some predict this growth in college-educated women will help close the pay gap. It could eventually lead to more parent-friendly policies, like on-site child care and flexible scheduling.

Jessica Hilst, 29, a fourth-year medical student at Nova Southeastern University in Davie, Fla., said she finds no discrimination when she works in doctors' offices.

"A lot of people are very comfortable talking to a woman about some of their issues and problems," said Hilst. "We're empathetic and good listeners. Those skills are real assets to being a doctor."

But others say what happens in college may not hold true in the job market. For decades, women in the United States outpaced men when it came to education degrees, but the highest positions – principal, superintendent or college president – still went disproportionately to men.

"It doesn't necessarily follow that just because women get more degrees, they rise higher. There are a lot of other factors," said Marcia Sweedler, an assistant professor at Nova Southeastern University who specializes in conflict analysis and resolution.

Ryu, the researcher, said men without college degrees often find it easier to get good-paying jobs like electrician, plumber or computer specialist. Women without degrees often wind up in low-paid, low-skill sales jobs. And men often find it easier to use personal contacts and networking to find jobs.

But Pantuso, the FAU doctoral student, remains optimistic.

"I think there will be more women in top positions and more women running companies, because there will be so many more women in industry in general," she said. "We're going to be able to excel."

UM urges students to volunteer more not to let go of doing collective work together, so they received a small amount of funding from a state agency, Massachusetts Campus Compact, which provided funding for service learning. The group also received money from the UMass President's office to fund undergraduates on each campus to research college access programs.

COMMUNITY from page 1

"That was our first success in the UMass system-wide college access mapping program," said Reiff.

After being designated by the Carnegie Foundation as the only multi-campus public University to earn the Community Engagement Classification, the group of faculty decided to build on their successes and write another proposal for the Learn and Serve America grant, which they won.

Reiff expressed that the ambition of grant money is, "To share information with the goal of finding ideas that we can build on to create more opportunities at each campus for service learning, better opportunities to improve what we're doing and to give more students the opportunity to be involved."

Over the three years of the grant, the flagship campus will receive $74,000 to engage more students in community service learning. One of the focuses of the grant will be to expand on the Springfield initiative.

"UMass should be doing more to contribute to economic development and the general well-being in Springfield," said Reiff.

Chancellor Holub has appointed John Mullin to direct this initiative. Mullin was given four priorities to work on, but Reiff said, "The priority that interests me most is the idea of working with Springfield Public Schools to set up a program that will increase the numbers of Springfield students who apply to, are accepted by and graduate from UMass... I see service learning to play a huge role in making that happen."

Through building a community between undergraduates at UMass and students in Springfield, Reiff hopes that Springfield students will see that a University experience could be a part of their own life experiences.

Currently, programs resulting from the grant will only be available to Commonwealth College students. However, throughout the three years Reiff hopes "the grant could be available to support the growth of students from across the campus not just Commonwealth College students," he said.

Recently, the Edward M. Kennedy Serve America Act passed in the House of Representatives and in the Senate. Named after the late Massachusetts Senator Ted Kennedy, a longtime public service advocate, "the legislation will increase and enhance opportunities for Americans of all ages to serve," according to a press release from the Corporation for National and Community Service.

"Because of this legislation, millions of Americans at all stages of their lives will have new opportunities to serve their country," said President Obama in a statement to the press.

Hannah McGoldrick can be reached at hmcgoldr@student.umass.edu.

Welcome Back
Pancake Breakfast

Start your year off with flapjacks & funnies!

Wednesday, September 23
8:30 - 10:30 am • Memorial Hall

Stop by Memorial Hall and enjoy pancakes, sausage, juice and Dean's Beans coffee while watching morning cartoons!

The first 20 students who bring their UMass Amherst Alumni Association coupon from the UMass Amherst coupon book receive a special gift.

No registration required... just stop in!

The first 200 seniors will receive a class t-shirt.
Must present valid student ID.

Enter to win a UStore gift card.
Seniors can also enter to win a $1,000 cash prize from Liberty Mutual!
Drawing to be held at Commencement Ball on May 13 2010

STUDENT ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

Visit UMassAlumni.com/students for more information

Integrated Sciences Building receives a formal dedication ceremony for the ISB on Sept.8, 2006, which is when construction of the building officially began.

SCIENCES from page 1

"I am very pleased to be here for the opening of the ISB," Olver said. "Many of us here today were here three years ago for the groundbreaking, and it is very satisfying to see the project come to fruition. I would especially like to congratulate the students who are here now and who will be here in the future. I hope they will take advantage of all the ISB has to offer."

Another supporter of the ISB was the late Senator Edward Kennedy, who Congressman Olver had said exerted his considerable support in the House of Representatives and in the Senate towards having the ISB built.

Olver was not the only one who expressed his gratitude towards the senator. Holub, Wilson, as well as several donors to the ISB all stressed how instrumental Kennedy was to the development of the building.

Kennedy passed away three weeks ago after a long battle with brain cancer, but he was present for the ISB's groundbreaking ceremony in 2006, where he conveyed his hopes for the new sciences building and spoke about what it will mean for UMass students. During Monday's dedication ceremony Chancellor Holub read what Kennedy himself had said on that September day back in 2006.

"The ISB will help UMass Amherst reach the next level in its extraordinary effort to lead in the most cutting-edge fields of research in this new century of the life-sciences," said Kennedy. "This project is a major investment in the region, and it will help attract private investment and high-paying jobs to western Massachusetts."

In addition to thanking those whose political support had made the building possible, Holub also bestowed recognition on the Mahoney family who had given substantial donations towards the ISB.

The Mahoney brothers, Richard, William and Robert, were in attendance with their wives for the dedication of the building in addition to the dedication of the first four floors of the ISB's atrium which are to be known as The Mahoney Family Atrium.

Each of the Mahoney brothers is UMass alumni and former chemistry majors. They were called to the podium to receive a plaque acknowledging their generous donations to their alma mater. Robert Mahoney graduated from the university in 1970 and was chosen at the ceremony to speak on behalf of his family.

"Our story is the UMass story," said Mahoney. "We were three guys who walked this campus in the 1950s and 1960s with the anxiety that every freshman feels. I'm sure, like us, this was their first and only choice to receive a higher education and now [with the ISB] we can carry on an amazing tradition when this place was the chemistry capital of the world."

Mahoney concluded his sentiments, "Let the teaching and the learning and the research begin."

Jennifer Heshion can be reached at jheshion@student.umass.edu.

THE BOLTWOOD
PROJECT™
Serving others since 1969 -- and STILL making a difference!
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)

REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS •GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE •REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Fall Semester 2009 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Campus Center Room 101 • Sept. 14 (Mon) • Sept. 15 (Tues) • Sept. 16 (Wed)
•Assignment notification ONLY Thurs. Sept. 17 @ Boltwood table CC Concourse
No telephone inquiries. YOU (or a friend) must pick up the notification letter!!!
Volunteer, while earning credit!

ENTER TO WIN a SWEET DEAL!

Guess how many jelly beans are in the jar...

Simply fill out the entry form with your name, e-mail address, year of graduation, telephone number, and your guess of the number of jelly beans in the jar.

The person guessing the number closest to the exact number will win the jar of jelly beans.

UMASS DINING
UMassAmherst
umassdining.com

Drawing to be held on September 29th

Entrants must be UMass students on the meal plan.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 2009

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
- Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Pride or racism?

Eric Magazu

This is the time of year where the integration of freshmen into the various cliques and social groups on campus will occur at frenetic pace. For upperclassmen active on campus, this is crunch time to find new recruits for your team or registered student organization (RSO) before schedules become locked up with other commitments.

For freshmen, it may be difficult at first to become accepted as an insider into these groups. But I urge them to take the first step. While it may be the right thing to do to for the upperclassmen to welcome them while they are still strangers, generally, it will devolve upon them to make connections.

We have all been integrated into particular groups througnout out lives. We begin to accept these groups as part of our individual identity. These groups can be based on a shared talent, such as being a member of the varsity baseball or softball team, or on a shared interest, such as computer gaming, or on a shared philosophy, such as support for the Democratic Party or for revolutionary socialism. Joining these groups has the potential to become a part of our very nature.

There is a large section of our identity that is selected on our behalf, without any individual merit whatsoever. These can often be the most divisive and induce the most social strife as compared with all other forms of identification. They are, of course, identity based on race, ethnicity and nationality.

Racial, ethnic and national identity can often be so explosive that many Western countries have laws declaring that we cannot consider these factors in any official capacity when judging among different people However, these factors are a part of human experience. People will immediately make judgments based on the way a person looks, the way he talks or the manner in which he carries himself.

The question posed is whether there is value and uniqueness in racial, ethnic and national identity. Can we ascribe any form of merit in an identity that a man inherits from his parents? Is it foolish to be proud of one's ethnic identity? Is it a form of racism to be proud of an ethnic identity?

For myself, having grown up in America with a mix of inherited ethnic ancestry, and where we are taught in public school that there is no merit to inherited characteristics, my longstanding answer to this question was that there is no merit whatever to these characteristics. Martin Luther King, Jr. said it best when he dreamt that his children would be judged not by the color of their skin but by the content of their character.

If students of English, Irish or German ancestry were to assert their unique ethnic identity, would others make the accusation of racism?

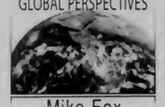
However, this dividing line is often made along cosmopolitan and provincial lines, which is really the basis of the so-called red state, blue state divide. As we move out into the American countryside, we will begin to see more assertion of these forms of identity. People are proud of their heritage. If there is not any individual merit to one's ethnic identity, there certainly is a form of collective merit.

In addition, even the briefest of tours through any other part of the world will reveal plainly that there is still in existence identity based on ethnicity and nationality. We even expect when we visit a foreign country to see people who look a certain way. However, it is not just the genetic profile but the customs and mannerisms of the various peoples of the world that are all quite unique.

The question prompted is whether or not there is value in preserving these unique traits and qualities. If there is value in their preservation, where does it cross over the line into racism? Does the value extend equally to both white and non-white ethnic groups? If students of English, Irish or German ancestry were to assert their unique ethnic identity, would others make the accusation of racism?

There are many implications to this idea. If there is a unique element to the genetic identity of a person of Irish descent, for example, then does this suggest that we should not be as open to intermarriage and assimilation among various ethnic groups? It would appear that suggesting that intermarriage is undesirable has racist undertones.

Perhaps there are positive attributes to such a position with all things considered, as from experience it can be shown that ethnic, linguistic and religious homogeneity tend towards social stability. We see the lack of this "sameness" as the basis of many conflicts throughout the world and underlying social tensions within the United States.



For a long time in America, we have shunned all assertions of pride and identification based on inherited characteristics, fearing that these things tend towards racism. But perhaps this has been a mistake on our part. It would seem that human beings naturally gravitate towards these attributes as a form of belonging. Perhaps a healthy reassertion of ethnic and religious identity would be beneficial towards solidifying the social, familial and moral framework that has decayed in modern times throughout America and all of Western civilization.

Eric Magazu is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at emagazu a student umass edu

Fed/Up?
Ed/Op.
editorial@dailycollegian.com

From the streets of Argentina

GLOBAL PERSPECTIVES

Mike Fox

The neighborhood that we got off the subway in by far seemed rougher than anywhere in the city that we've been to yet. Given, we spend most of our time in a relatively gentrified neighborhood.

It didn't seem to be anything too dangerous, just a bit rougher and realer.

I found the door that I was looking for; it matched the description perfectly – a non-descript door with a doorbell next to it and a small chalkboard in the window that said, "Milonga esta noche." I rang the bell, and the door opened up. No one came to greet us.

We walked up an old staircase and found ourselves facing a lady in front of a ledger that was flanked by two candles. It all seemed so gothic and slightly cultish. We paid ten pesos and moved our way through the crumbling mansion, the only colors were on the brightly painted abstract pictures of dancers lining the walls.

We walked down the hallway, following the sound of voices and found ourselves in a bare looking studio. Rickety wooden chairs sat around cork tables that lined the outer ring of the room. A Spartan bar was on the other side. Two haggard looking men were busy at work setting up some speakers. The ceiling was painted in pastels in some areas, and weeds seemed to be growing out of the skylight.

We were there at 10:40 p.m. I had read online that the night here began at 10:00p.m. Obviously someone hadn't accounted for Argentine time; the place was empty.

Slowly though, the room started to fill up with people who appeared surprisingly similar to us - eager young people, most from outside the country, looking for something a little more authentic than the glitzy, Vegas-like shoes that attracted most tourists.

Suddenly, one of the haggard looking men with long, gray, straggly hair and a bit of a gut, started dancing with an elegant woman in the center of the dance floor.

I took comfort in the fact that when things didn't go well; it was because my partner wasn't letting me lead.

Their moves were informed of passion, yet slow, graceful and delicate. It was both a spontaneous and a deeply controlled dance.

Then it was my turn to learn the basics. I was both too spontaneous and too controlled.

Slide to the left, right foot forward; left foot, slide to the right. Don't walk – slide. Keep the center of the body aligned, but let the rest of the body flow free. Mix things up; go left foot forward first. Pause. Sway. Sway. Let her get the feel of your body movements. Lead. Take the direction. Slide.

I took comfort in the fact that when things didn't go well; it was because my partner wasn't letting me lead.

By the end of the hour, I had acquired a basic set of tango moves. I was aware of how to move across the dance floor at least. It did take several one-on-one moments with the haggard looking man, but I'll just consider that receiving more attention.

We took our seats along the rim of the room as the place started to fill up with more people who knew what they were doing. A man with an Antonio Banderas haircut moved a gracefully aged woman across the dance floor, in and out of the headlights. A couple, who we perceived to be American and who arrived with their children, exhibited great skill.

One man, an older guy with an odd cap, took turns demonstrating moves to the two friends who accompanied me. He made them look like seasoned pros. At one point, he gave me instruction while I danced with one of my friends. I had an issue with leading with my feet, but in tango, one leads with their chest.

This isn't a dance where one keeps distance and demonstrates talent through how one can manipulate the dancer away from the body.

It requires for two people to move as one, a single body detecting the slightest change in posture, needing little personal space.

The dancing winded down, and three guitars and an accordionist set up in the middle of the dance floor. As I drifted into the music, I noticed that our "new friend" was getting more interested in the girls. They were good at watching out for themselves.

Another band came up, and I began to feel exhausted, feeling a little guilty that I wasn't keeping fully alert.

As another band finished up its set, my friends and I collected ourselves, waited for our "private dance teacher" to leave and left.

Mike Fox is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mgfox a umass student edu.

Death panels: the new liberal threat

Chris Amorosi

From the radio I rapidly caught up with death panels, the latest example of mineral water sipping liberals trying to destroy America one man at a time.

Abraham Lincoln, lawyer and log peddler, is often at the top of best president lists compiled by the academic establishment. Lincoln's role in the Civil War is the primary reason. I used to agree as I am an established academic, but over the summer I tapped into – or perhaps was tapped by – a particularly influential form of persuasion. Within minutes I rationalized an entire belief system where milk-steaming liberals like Lincoln are the arch-agents of violent chaos within and outside of our Republic.

Over the summer, I did a lot of commuting in my car. After I wore my Battlestar Galactica soundtracks and Weird Al albums down to smears of dime sized dust, I decided to give the radio some listening time. What a medium of enlightened discourse is the radio wave. With the twist of a dial, I could change from pop beats throbbing with vaginal metaphors to folksy yodeling evocative of apple pies wrapped in beer soaked flags.

Talk radio was a welcome intellectual oasis and, being as impressionable as a warm wax seal, I was soon converted to the kind of thinking that such stations promote. I do not refer to National Public Radio because I believe in the free market's economic right to support what should be heard on the air. My tax dollars should not go towards public education. They should have to pay tuition like myself.

I instead listened to WTKK in Boston, which broadcasts conservative talk hosts. From the radio, I rapidly caught up with death panels, the latest example of mineral water sipping liberals trying to destroy America one man at a time.

At first glance, death panels may sound appealing to us fiscal conservatives. After all, what better way to slash health care costs than by bodily removing entire people from the system? But more rational thoughts prevailed: it's only right to kill those who God wants dead right now instead of later.

Christ-crucifying liberals further their agenda with the most violent acts in the historical record, being eclipsed only by God's mass killing of the entire world sans Noah. Alexander the Great was a vicious conqueror of Persian lands and Greek men and the first example of a violent current in liberalism. He used force of arms to overthrow a centuries-old monarchy and spread Greek democracy throughout the known world. We still struggle with the effects of his radicalism to this day.

Centuries later, American Taliban progenitor John Brown led an abortive rebellion in the name of liberal abolitionism in 1859. Only two years later in 1861, Abraham Lincoln begins to end what Brown began by ending states' rights in favor of centralized federal control. America's own heartland attack which has left us paralyzed and drooling for over a hundred years.

Note Lincoln and his Union's position in the North, the typical geopolitical position chosen by liberals for their strongholds. Palin's Alaska forms a notable anomaly. A century after the end of Lincoln's tyranny saw a South Korea and South Vietnam fighting against the liberal socialist forces from their respective Norths. And both North Korea and Vietnam were puppets of the USSR, a Union in the northernmost points of the Earth. The abominable snowman is surely a registered Democrat.

This brings us full circle to death panels. Death panels are to President Obama as General Grant was to Lincoln. Where in the past the free market provided an adequate gauge of a person's lifespan, Obama intervenes with a government standardized measure of quality of life. European Ashkenazi Jews suffer from increased levels of hereditary and expensive to treat ailments like breast cancer or Crohn's disease. If Anne Frank survived the Holocaust, she probably would have been condemned to die by a death panel.

Are my claims ludicrous coincidences woven together with tenuous paranoia? Consider instead that the pervasiveness of our enemy provides us discerning citizens with clues everywhere. We must do our part. If Al Gore wants the world to burn, then fight back by running your car air conditioners with the windows down in February. Advocate that death panelists be given the death penalty. Stop the decay of tradition before the progressives legislate dendro-sexuality into our laws and our children are placed into arranged marriages with spruce and pine. Only be liberal in your fear of tomorrow.

Chris Amorosi is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at camorosi a student.umass.edu.

Using faith to explain what logic can't

Matt Kushi

It is a question that has been asked for as long as man has walked the Earth. It is a question that has been asked by astronomers, science fiction fans and the average human being for years. It is a question that has sparked movies, books, controversy and debate. It's so simple yet so complex. Is there something out there larger than ourselves? Are we alone in this universe or is there someone something out there that puts out a hand to help guide us.

Life out there is not merely a question of knowledge. It is a question of faith and belief in and of itself.

Why do we have religions? Why do we believe in ghosts? Do we really think that we are alone in the universe spiritually? This idea of who and what is out there spiritually differs depending on your religion, if you so choose to believe in one.

In a world that is powered on the waves of technology and science, it is easy to rationalize every single event that happens in this world to a scientific reason. That tree that fell in your yard and barely missed you didn't miss you because the Fates decided that it wasn't your time. Rather it happened because the crack in the trunk of the tree was at such an angle that the tree fell in a certain direction.

Well, that explains that. Or does it? While it is true that the tree fell due to gravity and mathematical angles, could there have been some unknown fate that determined that the tree would miss you by inches? We do not know. It hasn't been proven that there could have been an unknown fate. However, it also hasn't proven that there wasn't an unknown fate involved.

There are some things in life that we cannot explain. Sometimes we know that there could be a rational explanation to an event, but we choose to believe that something beyond the nature of the world caused the event. This is what we call belief and faith – the idea that there is an outside force helping to shape the course of history.

I will admit that I do believe in the supernatural. I believe that there are lost souls who wander the Earth.

I believe in having faith. My faith is not perfect. I have even had times of doubt when my faith was shaken and issues that I disagree with concerning my faith. Still, deep down, I believed that there was a life after this one.

In a world that is powered on the waves of technology and science, it is easy to rationalize every single event that happens in this world to a scientific reason.

This past week, there was an event in my life that made me ponder again whether there is life beyond our humanly bounds. Unfortunately this event was the death of my grandmother, Dolores (Sweeney) Samms. My grandmother was a believer. Her faith was her rock. She stood with an open heart and accepted the fact that there was life beyond our understanding.

Throughout the summer, as we watched the cancer ravage her 75-year-old body, we knew it was simply a matter of when and not if. In the end, we all knew that she was ready to go and find peace.

When she passed away the night of Sept. 7, 2009 a strange thing happened. It was 10:40 p.m. I was lying in bed listening to music and reading, preparing for the first day of classes the next day.

Suddenly, I heard a loud thump. It did not sound like the usual house settling into the foundation thump, a car door or a tree falling. It didn't even sound like the annoying squirrel that sometimes lives in my bedroom wall thumping around. I went downstairs to see if something had happened. Much to my surprise, neither of my parents had heard a thing.

No more than 15 minutes later, we received a call telling us that my grandmother had just passed away at her nursing home that she had moved into a few months before. We were told that she had passed at around 10:40 P.M. – the time of the thump.

Throughout her wake and funeral, the recurring theme was her strong faith and her willingness to believe in forces beyond the powers of Earth. On the back of a prayer card was a prayer that captured the essence of my grandmother. I would like to share it with you in her memory:

"God saw you getting tired; a cure not to be.

He put his arms around you and whispered come to me. With tearful eyes we watched you and saw you pass away, although we loved you dearly we could not make you stay.

A golden heart stopped beating hard, working hands came to rest God broke our hearts to prove to us, He only takes the best."

The force of faith is merely one dimension of belief. For me, it helped show that yes, there is life out there. This applies to all people of all religions and for anyone that has ever dared to believe that we are not alone.

Matt Kushi is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mkushi a student umass edu.

JuCo transfer earns starting job for UMass

HAVENS from page 8

seniors greeting him during his visit.

Shortly after, Havens chose to transfer to UMass, a decision that turned to be a solid fit for Havens.

"I liked the college atmosphere – the town. Everything just seemed like a place that I would enjoy," Havens said. "When I came out here in the spring, it turned out to be exactly what I thought it would be."

More importantly, though, Havens had gone all the way from no scholarships to a Division I-AA school, no small jump for the quarterback.

"I'm where I wanted to be. UMass has met all my expectations and more … I'm playing at the highest level of football right now."

Upon joining the team, Havens had decided to keep the same number he wore while playing at Diablo Valley: No. 12, the same number worn by Coen.

"A lot of people have been asking about that, but I don't really think about it," Havens said about the attention drawn by his jersey number. "Liam's a great kid, but it's not that big of a deal.

"IT'S JUST A NUMBER."

But that didn't stop his teammates from ragging on the new transfer.

"Sometimes, some of the guys would come over and say 'you better not wear that number if you're not going to do what [he did,'" Haven said. "But they were never serious about it."

Although Havens wouldn't be expected to replicate what Coen had done during his career at UMass, he would have to impress the coaching staff if he was to break the starting lineup. To do so, Haven's had to quickly adapt to a new level of play.

"It's faster, all-around faster," Haven's said about the transition to FCS. "There were definitely some guys at the junior college level who could play some big time football and were there for some reason or another. But it's definitely faster, more complex, but it's nothing that I didn't think I couldn't handle and nothing that I can't handle."

"FOOTBALL'S FOOTBALL"

It was not until the week before the Minutemen were to take the field against a member of the vaunted Big 12 conference that Morris named his starter for the season.

Speculation had been building for all of spring and fall practice. Woodward had been consistent and never disappointed. Meanwhile, Hawkins had emerged as the dark horse candidate for the spot. However, all signs pointed to Havens, who had improved dramatically in practice, growing leaps and bounds within the offense.

Earlier in camp, Havens had not yet learned to trust his teammates. Fresh from junior college, Havens was now surrounded by scholarship athletes in a strong program. But now, Havens had stopped trying to make plays alone and had learned to manage the offense.

Before the news had broken over the starter, Morris had called all of his quarterbacks into his office for individual meetings and informed them of the decision. And then, nothing.

"It was never really announced," Havens said of Morris' decision. "It wasn't really a big deal. The team's going to rally around whoever was named the starter."

So rather than revel in his new position, Havens is taking it all in stride – the new school, the new position, even the Big 12 on Havens from here on out, he now blends in with the rest of the team more than ever before. Long before he took the opening snap of the season, Havens had become part of the team.

So rather than revel in his new position, Havens is taking it all in stride – the new school, the new position, even the Big 12 on Havens from here on out, he now blends in with the rest of the team more than ever before. Long before he took the opening snap of the season, Havens had become part of the team.

Kyle Havens calls a play at the line of scrimmage for UMass in last week's game against Albany. This season, he has thrown for 386 yards and three touchdowns in his first two games as a Minuteman.

Because on the field, there's just the game.

"The game itself isn't much different," Havens says. "It's kind of like I expected it to be. Football is football no matter where you're playing it."

Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley a student umass edu

Dayton struggling against non-conference opponents

By Chris Shores
Collegian Staff

The Dayton men's soccer team's attempt to repeat as Atlantic 10 champions has gotten off to a rocky start.

The Flyers have failed in four attempts to gain their first win, getting outscored, 10-3, in the process. Dayton first lost its home opener, 5-2, against Cincinnati, tied Oakland in a double overtime shut-out match and then lost two during a westward road trip to Denver and Air Force.

Freshman goalkeeper Josh Lavallee was named Co-Rookie of the Week for his stellar performance against Oakland filling in for Tyler Picard, who had been injured during the previous game.

Both Lavallee (.882) and Picard (.579) have each started two games this year, with Lavallee earning a much higher save percentage so far. That save percentage is second highest among goalies in the A-10.

Dayton is one of five teams in the A-10 that is winless, a group that also includes Massachusetts. The Flyers have a chance to get some wins on the board during an upcoming four-game stretch at home. The Flyers face Bowling Green (1-3-1) on Friday at home and then travel across town to take on Wright State University (1-3-1) on Sunday. Later in the month, UD will host Southern Illinois University-Edwardsville (1-3-0) and Alabama A&M (1-4).

GW'S STADLER OFF TO STRONG START

George Washington University's Andy Stadler has jumped out as an early candidate for the Hermann Soccer Award, an honor given to the nation's top male and female collegiate soccer players. The senior scored the game-winning goal in a 2-0 win against Howard on September 5. Three days later, the senior forward recorded his first career hat trick in a 7-1 win against the University of the District of Columbia.

Stadler is tied for the A-10 lead in most points and goals per game with Saint Louis's Mike Roach. Stadler is one of three men's soccer players in the A-10 who was named to the Hermann Trophy Watch List, including Temple senior J.T. Noone and Massachusetts junior Ben Arikian.

GW goalie Brendan Lafferty was named co-Rookie of the Week, thanks in part to his first career shutout in a 2-0 win over Howard. The goalie's .667 save percentage is good for tenth best in the conference.

In a preseason poll by A-10 coaches, GW was predicted to finish seventh out of 14 teams in the conference. Their two losses have come from shutouts against American and California. Three of their next four games are at home, with matches against Longwood, Mount Saint Mary's and Navy.

LA SALLE LOOKING TO BOUNCE BACK

Last season, La Salle had the worst division and overall record in the A-10 (2-14-3, 1-8-0 A-10).

So far this season, the Explorers have already reached their total win mark from last year, and their 2-1-1 start is a promising sign that 2009 will be an overall improvement.

The Explorers lost their season opener, 2-1 to Bucknell before tying Niagara in a 2-2 double overtime match. They then posted two impressive wins, shutting out Robert Morris 4-0 on Sept. 11 and then winning the next day, 2-0, against Pittsburgh. Their success has relied on early scoring, in which the Explorers have outscored opponents 5-2 in the first half so far this year.

Offensively, sophomore forward Ryan Sepe has led the Explorers this season, scoring two goals and one assist, with sophomore midfielder Nick Dundon adding two goals. As a team, they lead the A-10 in points, goals and assists.

Goalkeeper junior Kyle Quigley was named the Soccer Six Player of the Week. He ranks fourth in the A-10 in save percentage (.840) and is one of three players who have recorded two shutouts this year.

La Salle will host Drexel (3-1-0) Wednsday, Sept. 16.

Chris Shores can be reached at cshores a student umass edu.

Richmond beats DU by blocked field goal

CAA from page 8

game with a Ferrara try, avoiding a 0-2 start after losing badly to No. 10 California last week.

JMU outgained UMD in total yards on the night (417-359), but 11 penalties for 105 yards gave the Terrapins the advantage they needed to hold off the unranked FCS team.

James Madison plays at home against Virginia Military this Saturday.

FIELD GOAL BLOCK ENDS GAME

No. 1 Richmond held off unranked Delaware on Saturday with a swatted field goal attempt, winning 16-15 to move to 2-0 on the season and continue their 11-game winning streak left over from 2008.

The Hens (1-1, 0-1) opened the game with an 8-0 lead on a safety and two field goals by Jon Striefsky, not allowing a touchdown until 23 seconds left in the first half.

Richmond sophomore receiver Tre' Grey caught a six-yard pass from senior quarterback Eric Ward to cap a 63-yard drive at the end of the second quarter. The Spiders couldn't score again until the fourth when they came back from a 15-7 deficit and scored the final nine points of the game.

The Spiders were led by Ward, who finished with two touchdowns on 22-32 passing for 247 yards including 46 yards on the ground. Delaware quarterback Pat Devlin was 15-for-31 for 167 yards, 81 of which were to junior Mark Mackey.

Devlin's lone interception was an acrobatic catch over the middle by Spider freshman Darryl Hamilton, who returned it 33 yards. The catch also helped set up the go-ahead field goal for the Spiders.

Richmond hosts Hofstra at 3:30 p.m. next week to open its final season playing at UR Stadium while the Blue Hens play at home against Delaware State at noon.

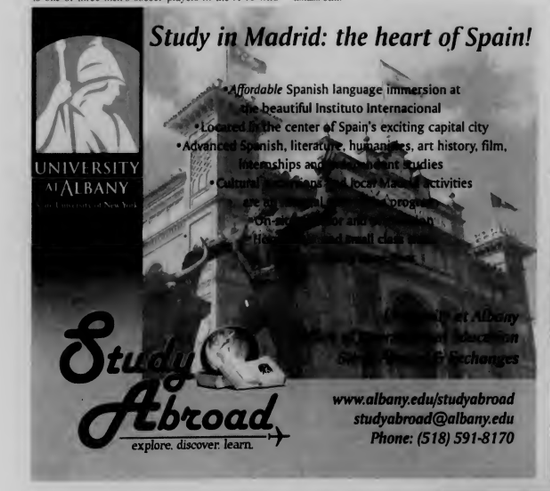
MAKE IT FIVE WINS

Exactly 13 total rushing yards does not often win football games. Thus was the case for Ball State (0-2) against New Hampshire (2-0) on Saturday.

The Wildcats made it five straight victories in six years against FBS opponents and did so against a Cardinals team that went a perfect 12-0 last year.

The Wildcats gained the lead with 9:36 left in the second quarter and never looked back. Junior R.J. Toman found freshman wide receiver Joey Orlando on a 26-yard pass to strike first.

Tomlin finished 21-for-35 with 212 yards, 70 of which were to Orlando, as well as 51 yards rushing. Junior Sean Jellison ran for 55 yards and two scores and caught four balls for 43 yards.



Junior placekicker Ian McGarvey kicked three field goals on the night for the Cardinals.

The Wildcats defense recorded five sacks and an interception while allowing 127 yards to the Cardinals, including just 27 yards on 24 plays in the first half.

New Hampshire held senior running back McQuale Lewis to just 21 yards on 14 carries. Last year, Lewis was named All-Mid American First Team after rushing for 1,736 yards and 22 touchdowns for the Cardinals. Redshirt freshman quarterback Kelly Page was 15-for-34 for 114 yards and a touchdown toss.

New Hampshire faces Dartmouth at home on September 26 at noon.

Daniel Herbeholz can be reached at dherbeh a student umass edu

ciee
www.ciee.org/study study abroad

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 2009 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The members of Rascal Flatts hit the Comcast Center last weekend during their latest tour, American Living Unstoppable. At the show, the group mixed country tunes, love medleys, and rock songs to keep the audience excited.

Rascal Flatts Soars in Boston

BY ANSHALEE GUARNIERI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Tailgating, cowboy hats and Daisy Duke denim were out in full force Saturday night as the country trio, Rascal Flatts, brought their American Living Unstoppable Tour to the Comcast Center in Mansfield.

Darius Rucker, ticketed as the opening act, recently made the jump from 90s pop sensation to a country-singing leader. His set was high-powered and truly entertaining, as he began the night with a great variety of songs ranging from his recent number one selling country singles "Don't Think I Don't Think About It", "It Won't Be Like This for Long," and "Alright" to covers of Prince's "Purple Rain."

The song with the biggest reaction of his set was the spirited revisit to the Hootie & the Blowfish big seller, "Only Wanna Be With You."

It's safe to say that the crowd left the amphitheater knowing him as Darius, but was still yearning for a little Hootie.

However, the impending rain did nothing to dampen the spirits of the fan base of all-ages. Holding on to the last days of the summer season, the crowd energetically sang along to the Rascal Flatts's opening number "Summer Nights" – a song celebrating Igloo coolers, flip flop tans and bonfires on the beach.

The sold out crowd was treated to a high intensity show full of pyrotechnics, numerous video screens displaying the band's music videos, fan reactions and song lyrics and red white and blue laser lights that gleamed brightly against the cloudy gray skies.

Perhaps the biggest country act at the moment, and arguably a pop crossover band, the Rascal Flatts are known for their albums' mushy love ballads like "What Hurts the Most", or party-inspiring tunes like "Me and My Gang." Yet surprisingly, when live in concert, the trio's rock 'n' roll edge appeared. Screaming guitar riffs and the blazing sounds of the fiddle were perfectly matched against the powerful voice of lead singer Gary LeVox.

Lead guitarist Joe Don Rooney and bassist Jay DeMarcus were also given their shining moments. In an attempt to revisit their Nashville days singing on a front porch, Rooney and DeMarcus gave LeVox a break and led the crowd in a medley of their favorite "front porch" songs. With DeMarcus taking over the piano and Rooney on the guitar, the two played "I Lean On Me" and "Backwards."

Rascal Flatts delighted fans and played most of their number one hit singles, and the crowd's reactions to each song made the night feel like a glorified karaoke event. The audience and the band were serenading each other with the ballads, "Bless the Broken Road," "My Wish," and "Here Comes Goodbye," the band's latest number one country single.

Strangely enough, the song "Unstoppable," which the tour and their newly released sixth studio album were named after, was not a part of Saturday night's set list. However, numbers like "Fast Cars and Freedom," "Prayin' for Daylight," and "I Love You Out Loud" kept the crowd gyrating and partying.

The two-hour show ended with a three-song encore filled with covers. Rascal Flatts' remakes of Tom Cochrane's "Life is a Highway" and the Beatles' "Revolution" had the crowd begging for more. Darius Rucker joined the Rascal Flatts in the final number of the evening. Together, they performed an exuberant rendition of a song from Rucker's former band, Hootie & the Blowfish, "Hold My Hand."

Anshalee Guarnieri can be reached at aguarnie@student.umass.edu.

Seeking the sustainable life

BY BARBARA WILLIAMS
THE RECORD

Many would say it's definitely the hard way to find a place to live – biking 12,000 miles, crisscrossing the country over an 18-month span.

But Ryan Mlynarczyk and Mandy Creighton are not just looking for a home, they're looking for a new lifestyle – an environmentally sustainable one. And while they're searching, they're making a documentary to get people thinking of sustainable communities.

Here in a tree-lined neighborhood, they spent one weekend speaking with people interested in all things sustainable from the home of Rachel Wieland, an adviser to the Environmental Club at Bergen Community College in Paramus, N.J. The California couple met Wieland at a sustainability conference in New Mexico a year ago.

"We've learned so much that we want to share," Mlynarczyk, 33, told the small group gathered at Wieland's house. "But we don't want to make a boring educational film or talk just about tips for people. We want to spark them, to inspire them to Google what they want to know."

The two set out from San Francisco on Oct. 5, 2008, and expect to return by Earth Day, April 22, 2010. They will decide on a permanent residence after the trek, but are leaning now toward New Mexico or Tennessee.

They've cycled more than 342 days, averaging 40 miles a day and have covered 4,985 miles. They've interviewed more than 550 people for their film.

Solar panels on their panniers – the bags that fold over the bikes to hold their gear, including food, a tent, clothing, a laptop, camera and cell phones – charge all their gadgets. They vow never to own another car.

"We believe in technology. In fact, we're pretty high-tech, but we do it in a smart way," Mlynarczyk said. "Like using solar panels."

They are financing their journey with savings and donations made through their website, withinreachmovie.com.

Rosemary Carey, who helped found the newly formed Pascack, N.J., Sustainability organization, said she "just about cut our vacation short to meet Ryan and Mandy. I find them awe-inspiring. I want to learn more about sustainability – just because we belong to a group that has it in the name doesn't mean we're experts."

Creighton started her journey to find a new lifestyle after landing in the hospital with several health issues and realizing she needed to make some major changes. She said she hopes to show people "how much is being done out there" by people like Carey.

"Things like the film 'An Inconvenient Truth' really scare people and make them feel overwhelmed with how large the problem is," she said. "But the environmental movement is really made up of a million small movements. So many people are doing so much already."

The Beatles transition into interactive game characters

BY BILLY O'KEEFE
MCT CAMPUS/COLLEGIAN NEWS SERVICE

On paper, "The Beatles: Rock Band's" mission could scarcely be simpler.

Fortunately, as it did with the original "Rock Band" - and, once upon a time, the original "Guitar Hero" - Harmonix makes it look every bit as simple in practice.

The upshot is that "Beatles" is explicitly what Beatles fans would wish it to be - the original master recordings of 45 songs, neatly organized over important periods in the band's lifespan and stuffed out the gills with the imagery that similarly defined each era's importance and influence. Beyond the new support for three simultaneous singers, which in turn allows for the formation of six-player bands, the game leaves the "Rock Band" formula alone.

Where "Beatles" goes for broke, and scores, is in its inspired dedication to fan service first and everything else second.

Unlike recent "Guitar Hero" games dedicated to one band, the playlist isn't half Beatles and half other stuff, nor is it presented out of order. The career mode rides the same chronological track as the band's journey, kicking off in The Cavern Club and culminating with the 1969 Apple Corp rooftops show.

The Fab Four makes an inspired transformation into 3D videogame characters, the venues are exquisitely recreated, and the animated imagery that pops up between venues and particularly during the Abbey Road Studios sessions makes the game as sublime to watch as it is to play, particularly since so much of that imagery is out of view when your focus is on actually playing the game and hitting the notes. In terms of presentation and devotion to the subject matter, "Beatles" puts Neversoft's single-hand tributes to shame.

For those who don't care for the Beatles any more than they do the Monkees, though, Neversoft's latest may actually be the better of the two games.

For starters, "Guitar Hero 5" isn't hobbled by its subject matter. Stuff that has no place in a dedicated Beatles tribute – custom character/band creation, support for any combination of four instruments, eight-player online competitive multiplayer, the ability to play as your avatars in the Xbox and Wii versions – fits in just fine here.

Similarly, while the quality of the game's 85 out-of-box tracks will vary from ear to ear, it's hard to argue against the value of 40 additional songs for the same price (and less if you're buying the instruments bundle). The GHStudio mode from last year's "World Tour" also returns with a significant user-friendliness boost, making it easier for players to record their own instrumentals, download other players' creations, or just jam for the fun of it in a makeshift recording studio.

In terms of gameplay, "GH5" plays by the same rules as "Guitar Hero" and "Rock Band" games gone by ("Beatles" included), with the capacity for drop-in/drop-out co-op and the aforementioned support for multiple instrument configurations being the only real noteworthy changes. But "GH5" gets a slight nod over "Beatles" in the note chart department, if only because it supports more difficulty levels and presents a friendlier graduation between each.

With a little help from your friends, you can rub elbows with the British elite in the newly released Beatles Rock Band game.

Ed Westwick plays Chuck Bass, the high school hottie we love to hate on the CW's Gossip Girl, which premiered Monday night for its third season.

'Gossip' is back with vengeance

BY JAMES BARDEN AND ELYSE HOROWITZ
COLLEGIAN STAFF

You better be wearing last season's Prada bag as you hold your breath for the highly anticipated return of the CW's Gossip Girl. That's right, the epitome of outrageous, the show which is detailed in the lives of Manhattan's elite teens, those who live on the prestigious Upper East Side, is back.

Unlimited use of Daddy's fortune to splurge on private jets and designer clothes, complete with model-like appearances and plenty of underage drinking and bed-hopping, what could be better?

After an upsetting leak of information from the infamous Gossip Girl, the end of last season saw Blair (Leighton Meester) and Chuck (Ed Westwick) finally cinch their relationship status to the delight of fans around the country.

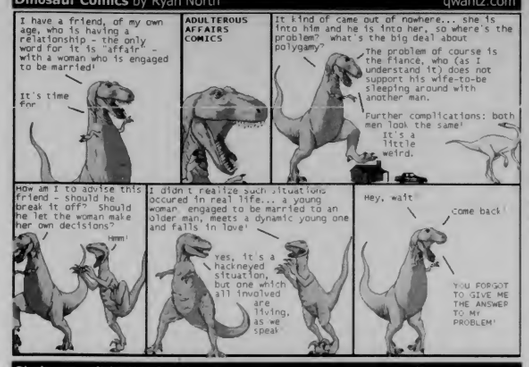
Blond bombshell Serena, played by Blake Lively, finally took matters into her own hands in an attempt to de-robe the seemingly anonymous Gossip Girl, but the tantalizing texter maintained superiority by divulging secrets – as if there were any left untold – during the teen's high school graduation.

The group comes together to realize that they have all had a hand in the tattle-tale-ing and that their lives would not have been the same without the constant reminder of scandals and secrets.

The upcoming season of Gossip Girl, which premiered Monday night at 9 p.m., promises to show audiences all the fabulousity – and complications – of the character's lives as most of them emerge from their sheltered high school days and move on to enjoy their college experience in the best playground anyone could ask for: New York City.

This season is sure to be juicier than ever before. While there's rumors of a large occasion involving on-again, off-again partners Lily Van Der Woodsen and Rufus Humphrey (whose children, Serena and Dan, respectively, are gasp – dating), Serena is expected to arrive back on the city scene in style after her European travels, as well as teen heartthrob Chace Chrawford, who portrays Nate.

Audiences are also predicting a heated battle between Blair and Georgina (guest star Michelle Trachtenberg) as they begin their college career. And surely fans will be wondering how the appointment of Jenny (Taylor Momsen) as the new Queen Bee will turn out for the rest of the Constance Billard and St. Jude's student body. There are also some rumored new additions to the cast, including Hilary Duff and Tyra Banks.



James Barden can be reached at jwbarden@student.umass.edu.

Elyse Horowitz can be reached at ehhorowi@student.umass.edu.

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!
Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

COMICS

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North — qwantz.com

Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub — chainsawsuit.com

Wondermark by David Malki! — wondermark.com

Opiate of the People by Emily Regan

Robbie and Bobby by Jason Poland — robbieandbobby.com

My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees — mnftiu.cc

Mr. Gnu by Travis Dandro — weepstrip.

SUDOKU

					4	5
	4		5			7	3	8
	9							1
					3
				5	9
			7	4				2
	3		4			2
		7		2	6
1		9			8

UMSBC
UMass Ski N Board Club
FIRST GENERAL MEETING
WED SEPTEMBER 16th
Campus Center Auditorium
8:00PM
UMSBC Ski and Tube Rides
Receive New UMSBC Apparel!

CROSSWORD

ACROSS

1. Seaweed
5. Fore-and-aft-rigged vessel
10. The Caribbean and Adriatic
14. Farm soil
15. A velvet-like fabric
16. Supplication
17. Manage
19. Parsley or sage
20. Behold
21. Chocolate cookie
22. Coined money
24. Mix
25. 25 cents
26. Lead
29. A tremulous sound
30. A religious cult
31. A manual
32. Not on
35. In order that not
36. Smidgen
37. Pearly-shelled mussel
38. Sixty-one in Roman numerals
39. A pair of parallel rails
40. Bore
41. Decrease in size
43. Vocalized
44. Astonish
46. Coke or Pepsi
47. Stops
48. Bit of dust
49. Petrol
52. Hue
53. Teenager
56. A single time
57. Hue
58. Dwarf buffalo
59. Marsh plant
60. Adolescents
61. Declare untrue

DOWN

1. "Oh, my!"
2. Prospector's find
3. Monopoly or Trivial Pursuit, for example
4. French for "Friend"
5. Ghost
6. Powerful light beam
7. Not deceived by
8. Half of two
9. Cajole
10. Globe
11. Powered by electricity
12. Eagle's nest
13. Cavalry sword
18. A V-shaped indentation
23. Asphalt
24. Chair
25. Speedy
26. A girl's toy
27. Wild goat
28. Opposition
29. Sound of a duck
31. Impressive and ambitious in scale
33. Dossier
34. Bend
36. Conduct business
37. Murres
39. Not false
40. Handouts
42. Entertained guests
43. They cast ballots
44. He plays roles
45. Parisian river
46. Part of the large intestine
48. Blemish
49. Heredity carrier
50. Any minute
51. Remain
54. Female deer
55. Scoundrel

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
It's not about what others think. It's about what Kanye thinks.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Learn to mind your manners, Sookie!

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Friendliness does not mean everyone likes sweaty hugs.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Try multitasking by singing the star spangled banner while texting, walking and blinking rapidly.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
Please help all the Taurus's spasming from over-tasking.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
Lady Gaga is not an excuse for that kind of experimentation.

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
Do not join the Greek system just because you have a grudge against Poseidon.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
There are people with bigger tempers than yours. At least Serena Williams knows how to apologize.

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
Be careful who you give your treasures to. Bill Belicheck might trade it for a second round pick.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
You should be concerned that condoms are sold in family packs.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
Going to the gym does not help you lose all that baggage.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
Finally be the one to explain what Marcellus Wallace looks like.

CLASSIFIEDS

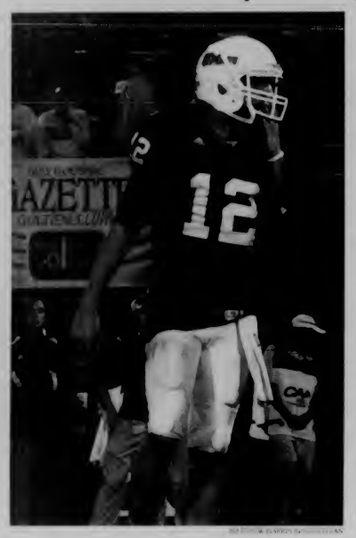
CREDIT INTERNSHIP OPPORTUNITY
3 credit hour internship. Internet marketing and branding on bus line/ University Drive. Must be proficient with social networking sites. Call 413-549-4971 ask about internship opportunity.

EMPLOYMENT
Calzone Transport Technician (Drivers) and Calzone Production Engineers (kitchen help) wanted. Apply at DP Dough, downtown Amherst.

EMPLOYMENT
Rent us your ears! $10/ hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

LOST AND FOUND
Lost two hearing Aids on Saturday 9/5/09. Please Call Mark at 413-455-5226. Reward.

EMPLOYMENT
Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162



FOR RENT
Rt. 9 Hadley. 5 bedroom house. $2000/mo & utilities. 2 car garag. 1 & a qtr miles to campus. No beds. Large Lot. Music room. Skibiski Real Estate. 586-1827.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 2009 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

All eyes pointing to Havens

UMass quarterback Kyle Havens never had much of an opportunity to play college football. That all changed when Liam Coen graduated.

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

Kyle Havens always knew he had the skills to play quarterback in college. He just had to wait a little longer to prove it.

Havens, the quarterback for Ygnacio Valley High School, had the size and ability to play at the college level. The only problem was that he never got a chance to show anyone.

"We ran the double wing-T," Havens said of his run-heavy high school offense. "So 99 percent of the time, I was pitching the ball and acting as a lead blocker."

Three years later, there was nothing hiding him as he took the field in Manhattan, Ka., in front of 50,750 fans starting his first game at quarterback for the Massachusetts football team.

From high school afterthought to starting a game against a Football Bowl Subdivision opponent, Havens has come a long way. But in order to get there, someone had to find the quarterback. Luckily for Havens, UMass coach Kevin Morris was looking for one.

Replacing Liam

At the end of last season, the Minutemen were looking for a quarterback.

Liam Coen, one of the most decorated passers in the program's history, had just graduated, leaving a gaping hole in the UMass offense. With Coen gone, the Minutemen had three talented candidates for the quarterback position with no clear-cut choice for the job.

Redshirt sophomore Octavious Hawkins had the upside. Hawkins, a highly-touted recruit from Florida had the raw talent as an athlete and passer. But so far, he had only gotten playing time at wide receiver.

Spencer Whipple, another redshirt sophomore, had the pedigree. The son of former UMass head coach Mark Whipple was a longshot but remained in the competition.

Finally, senior Scott Woodward had the experience. After spending the past four years as a backup to Coen, Woodward was now the frontrunner for the starting job but had yet to establish himself.

Only weeks after the Minutemen lost their quarterback, they lost their head coach as well. Don Brown, who had posted a 43-19 record in his five years with the Minutemen, had accepted the defensive coordinator's job at the University of Maryland. Replacing him was former offensive coordinator Kevin Morris, who was now in search of another candidate for the starting quarterback job.

The candidate in Morris's search not only had to show the proper physical attributes, but also academic prowess as well in order for the coach to take a longer look at a player. Even though the prospects were junior college players, Morris knew that many players have just as much, if not more, talent than those in FCS.

While in California, Morris has been recruiting in the junior college system and had found some potential suitors.

Throughout his search, Morris had come across a handful of players who had fit model of his quarterback. One that had really caught his eye, though, was a 6-foot-4 junior from Diablo Valley College: Kyle Havens.

From passed-up to prospect

After graduating high school with no major football scholarship offers, Havens turned to Diablo Valley to continue his football career.

"I always felt that I was good enough and that I could keep playing. I loved the game of football and just wanted to continue playing," Havens said.

By getting a chance at the junior college level, Havens had set his goals high, trying to get himself into the best level of play possible. Such thinking, though, is how Havens thinks one should act when approaching the game.

"You shouldn't play the game if you don't aim for the best," Havens said.

Once he got on the field for the Vikings, Havens quickly emerged as a star, averaging over 300 yards per game, making the NorCal All-Conference team and was named the 18th best junior college quarterback by Scout.com. In addition to his on-the-field accolades, Havens was also named a Gridwire Academic All-American for his work in the classroom.

Now Havens, once the unwanted quarterback, was a prized prospect. He now had the choice of several Division I schools, including Middle Tennessee State University, Towson University, Hofstra University, FBS school Marshall University and UMass.

While looking at his potential schools, Havens saw a good situation at UMass. The starting quarterback had just graduated and there was a wide-open position battle heading into the season.

"It was just a good situation here with Liam leaving," Havens said. "It obviously opened a huge void in the offense, and it was somewhere where I thought I could come in and compete for the starting job. I wanted to come and play at the highest level of football.

"I knew that I was going to have to compete for a job. There were already a lot of good quarterbacks here already," he added. "I thought it was somewhere I could come in, the competition would make me better as a quarterback, and I also thought I could come over and take over this offense."

Havens visited the Amherst campus during winter break at UMass, coming from sunny California to the cold, largely empty campus. Despite the temperatures, he still received a warm welcome by the team with redshirt wideout Julian Talley hosting him and several other

See HAVENS on page 7

Maryland escapes upset from JMU

CAA with five wins over FBS, Spiders sneak by Delaware

By Daniel Herbertoz
Collegian Staff

Maryland needed overtime, 105 yards in penalties and a wide-right field goal to avoid an upset at the hands of the Football Championship Subdivision James Madison University on Saturday.

Freshman Nick Ferrara's 26-yard field goal in overtime captured the victory for the Terps (1-1), as the Dukes lost their first game of 2009.

Starting with a six-yard touchdown punch by junior running back Jamal Sullivan, the Dukes scored 22 unanswered points in the second and third quarters to take a seven-point lead going into the fourth.

Terps senior Chris Turner, who was 25-for-38 for 236 yards on the night, marched his team down the field in the fourth quarter to tie the game.

JMU junior Drew Dudzik, who was 9-for-15 passing for 141 yards and three total touchdowns, quickly answered with a 70-yard run to again pull ahead of the Terrapins. Turner then drove Maryland 78 yards to push the game into overtime.

The Dukes opened the extra period with a one-yard drive, before Dukes sophomore Dixon Wright missed a 41-yard field goal attempt wide right. The Terrapins then closed out the

See CAA on page 7

Gaffney hopes to make Lakers

Tony Gaffney's work ethic earned him a spot on the Los Angeles Laker's veteran training camp roster. Gaffney averaged 11.5 points and 10.2 rebounds per game for the Minutemen. But even if the Lakers don't work out for him, he already has a contract to play in Israel.

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

Back in June of 2008, when the Boston Celtics defeated the Los Angeles Lakers for their 18th NBA title, former Massachusetts men's basketball player Tony Gaffney celebrated. The team he had supported his entire life had won the NBA Finals for the first time since 1986, and they had done it over their biggest rival.

Fast forward a year, and Gaffney, after his breakout senior season, has the opportunity to experience the Celtics and Lakers rivalry on the court instead of from his living room. Just not wearing the gold and green.

"I immediately went from a die-hard Celtics fan to a die-hard Lakers fan," Gaffney said.

Heading into the 2009 NBA Draft, many thought Gaffney may end up as a late second round draft pick. He could have possibly wound up on favorite team growing up who had the 58th pick of the draft.

The Celtics instead went with Lester Hudson out of Tennessee Martin, and Gaffney wasn't selected with any of the two remaining picks in the draft including the second to last pick of the draft, which belonged to the Lakers.

Gaffney didn't have to wait long before he had a chance to prove himself in the NBA. The day after the draft, the Lakers called the power forward informing Gaffney they had picked him up and he would be playing for their summer league team. Gaffney quickly forgot about his allegiance to the Celtics.

"That part was easy," Gaffney said about becoming a Lakers fan. "They were the first team to give me the opportunity to play in the NBA, and it was easy falling in love with the Lakers organization."

Gaffney, who averaged a double-double his senior year at UMass with 11.5 points and 10.2 rebounds per game to go with 3.8 blocks per game (third best in the nation), knew that opportunities to play in the NBA come few and far between, so he made the best of his while playing for the Lakers in the NBA Summer League in Las Vegas. While there, the Lakers took notice of Gaffney enough to invite him to their veterans' camp in October.

"They told me that they loved my activeness, my energy, and they loved the way I flew around the floor," Gaffney said. "I didn't put up crazy numbers when I was in Vegas. I just did what I've always done when playing the game, and that was just making hustle plays, deflections, box outs and rebounds."

The summer league didn't go without any hiccups for Gaffney, who averaged 3.8 points and 2.8 rebounds and 16 minutes per game in the four games he played.

"It was funny because in the first game I went in, and I was starting, and I played really well in the first half. But I ended up taking a charge, and I injured my tailbone pretty badly," Gaffney said. "I know I can play at the next level, and I was worried that I wasn't going to get a chance to prove that and prove that I deserved an invite to veterans' camp.

"I ended up sitting out the second-to-last game, and it actually ended up paying off because I was able to play in the final game. I started again, and I played well. I did everything that I do, and they seemed to like it enough to extend the invite back and possibly, hopefully earn a roster spot for next season."

Although Gaffney has impressed the Lakers organization, their veteran's camp proposes a whole new set of challenges. Instead of competing against squads of players who are fighting to get to the NBA, Gaffney now has to compete and play with experienced veterans such as Lamar Odom, Pau Gasol and the 2008 NBA Most Valuable Player, Kobe Bryant.

The prospect of playing against such high competition is nothing that scares the former Minuteman. Instead it's a challenge he welcomes, and he feels confident that he can rise to it.

"I'm going into a camp with, all due respect, the best team in the world, and I'm expecting to see that and the best players in the world. I expect to have to live up to the standards of everybody else. I've said Kobe Bryant is one of the hardest workers in the world, and that comes to no surprise," Gaffney said. "When it comes to work ethic, I'll fit in just fine there."

Gaffney has the confidence that he can play NBA-caliber basketball, and he understands all he has to do know is prove it to the Lakers. But in case his road to the NBA veers off course, he's still in good shape.

"I had gotten a lot of good offers to play overseas, so I knew everything was going to work out fine," Gaffney said.

One of the offers the Berkley native took up in case things don't work out in Los Angeles. Gaffney has signed a contract with Hapoel Galil/Gilboa in Isreal, a team that plays in the same league with one of the best European basketball teams, Maccabi Tel Aviv.

"If things don't work out with the Lakers, which I don't anticipate, I anticipate hopefully come early November wearing a Lakers uniform," Gaffney said. "But if not, I'll make my way out to Israel and do some damage out there."

No matter where Gaffney ends up, he understands there will always be people trying to bring him down. But just as he quieted any critics he may have had prior to his senior season at UMass, Gaffney expects to do much of the same in the future using those critics to help him get there.

"My whole life I never though I would be in the position I'm in now, and I've had plenty people tell me that I don't belong there that I can't do this or can't do that, there is no chance I make the Lakers," Gaffney said "That stuff motivates me, and when I do make it, it's just all the more sweet. I'll just smile and wave and keep doing what I do."

Jeffrey R Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@student.umass.edu.

Minutemen take 2nd at invitational

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

Last year's Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year, Ken O'Brien, and the Massachusetts men's cross country team began its 2009 campaign with a second place finish this past weekend at the Dartmouth Invitational.

The Minutemen tallied 37 points, placing them behind host Dartmouth (21 points). Boston College finished in third place with 73 points, and Quinnipiac took fourth with 120 points.

The Massachusetts women's cross country team, led by co-captain Lauren Stocker, competed in the Fairfield Invitational on Saturday and took third place behind UConn and Yale. The Minutewomen's 62 points placed them behind UConn's 28 points and Yale's 34. Rounding out the rest of the meet was Fairfield (121 points), New Haven (162), Siena (163) and Bridgeport (212).

The Minutemen were led by senior Jonathan Pierce, with a time of 26 minutes, 2.9 seconds in the 8K race. Pierce finished fourth overall behind Tom Robbins (25:35), Chris Zablocki (25:42.4) and Ethan Shaw (25:58.7), all from Dartmouth. Sophomore Zachary Gordon had the second best time for UMass, 26:10.3, placing him fifth overall.

Six Minutemen finished in the top 12 of the race with Andrew Mulvaney (26:20.3) finishing seventh and Jeffrey Hill (26:28.7), Jason Ayr (26:29.7) and Daniel Barry (26:38.3) finishing 10th through 12th respectively.

Stocker was one of four Minutewomen to place in the top 15 with an eighth-place finish and a time of 19:25. The other three UMass runners in the top 15 were Gina Perno (19:31) in 11th place, Claire Petiti (19:31) with a 13th-place finish and Karen Roa (19:32) in 14th place.

UConn had three runners place in the top five in the 5K race at the Fairfield Invitational with Courtney Dinnan (18:49) taking first place, freshman Megan Jacoby (18:54) finishing second and Sara Leslie (19:14) taking fifth.

Yale had the other two runners in the top five with Stephanie Pearl taking third (18:57) and Elizabeth Marvin (19:08) finishing in fourth.

Both the Minutewomen and Minutemen will compete next weekend as they host five-team meets in Amherst starting at 11 a.m. on Saturday, Sept. 19. The Minutemen will compete against Amherst, UConn, Maine and Vermont and the Minutewomen will host Amherst, Boston College, Maine and Vermont.

Jeffrey R Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY

COLLEGIAN

HIGH: 61 LOW: 47 www.DailyCollegian.com WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 2009

UMass student Jelisa Difon speaks on higher education with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, U.S. Rep. George Miller (D-CA), chair of the House Education and Labor Committee and Secretary of Education Arne Duncan.

Missing girl disrupts traffic near Big Y

By Matt Rocheleau
Collegian Staff

A six-year-old girl found wandering along University Drive near Big Y Supermarket on Sunday morning has been returned to her parents by the Massachusetts Department of Social Services, according to the Amherst Police Department.

Town police received multiple phone calls from drivers concerned for the safety of the young girl who was reported to be walking in traffic, and officials responded at around 9 a.m., said Sergeant Michael D. Sullivan.

The girl was taken into custody after being checked by emergency medical technicians, found to be unharmed, and held until Sunday evening when her parents were located.

Prior to locating the girl's parents, police speculated they may be homeless, a claim which turned out to be false, Sullivan said.

Charges will not be filed by the police department, he said, and it remains unclear if the charges will be filed by social services.

He added that, as of Sunday evening, police did not want to disclose further details about the incident because of the girl's age.

Matt Rocheleau can be reached at mrocheleau@dailycollegian.com.

A six-year-old girl was recently found wandering down University Drive near the Big Y Supermarket parking lot, shown above.

Students vie for bill

SAFRA introduced, plans to match Federal Pell Grant scholarships to rising costs of living

By S.P. Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Several University and Massachusetts students and alumni took part in advocacy events in Washington, D.C., yesterday to support legislation that would significantly change the way the federal government facilitates student loans.

The Student Aid and Fiscal Responsibility Act (H.R. 3221, also known as SAFRA), introduced to House Education and Workforce Chair George Miller, would look to match Federal Pell Grant scholarships to rising costs of living, raising it from just over $4,000 at present to $5,550 in 2010, and to $6,900 by 2019.

It would also simplify the Federal Application For Student Aid (FAFSA) forms by allowing students and their families to apply using the same information that is on their tax returns.

Proponents of the bill claim it will save the federal government $87 billion over 10 years by allowing the U.S. Department of Education to choose lenders based on a competitive bidding process and effectively ending the current Federal Family Education Loan program. Student advocacy organizations nationwide, including local chapters of MassPIRG and the United States Student Association (USSA), have taken up support of the bill.

Michael Kebede, a UMass senior, spoke about his own student debt during a teleconference with Miller, U.S. Secretary of Education Arne Duncan, New York Congressman Timothy Bishop and members of the press.

"Federal money makes up the vast majority of my financial aid package," Kebede said. "State aid has never matched it, and for this reason I support the committee's financial aid package."

Jelisa Difo, a UMass senior and USSA member, spoke at a press conference with Miller, Duncan and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

"By investing in federal aid programs, SAFRA will ensure that millions of students like me have access to a quality and affordable higher education," Difo said.

Former UMass Student Trustee Lyndsay McCluskey, now vice president of the USSA in Washington, D.C., said in an interview Tuesday that revamping federal funding programs for education would put the U.S. on par with other nations that have matched or surpassed American college graduation rates.

"When you look to other nations that are providing free

See SAFRA on page 3

Plasma exchange helps treat patients with multiple sclerosis

By John Fauber
McClatchy-Tribune News Service

MILWAUKEE — Thirty years ago, Bhupendra Khatri was an impressionable neurology resident in Milwaukee who had just seen a presentation about a strange treatment for multiple sclerosis.

Khatri was so struck by the therapy – a blood-filtering process known as plasma exchange – that he traveled to California to learn more about it.

Once there, he found a used blood exchange machine that he purchased for $2,500. He rented a trailer, hitched it to his Plymouth Scamp and drove back to Milwaukee in search of his first patient.

Over the next three decades he would treat nearly 500 people.

Through it all Khatri has endured the ridicule of other doctors, fought with insurance companies and tried to convince the medical community that the therapy really is helping MS patients. It's a quest that may never be resolved.

"They said it was rubbish and voodoo medicine," Khatri said.

His story is one that cuts through the heart of the debate about the cost and effectiveness of health care as well as the influence of drug companies in medicine, or, in Khatri's case, the lack of pharmaceutical interest.

The treatment he has championed is not cheap, not FDA approved and not likely to get widespread use because it doesn't offer big returns for the pharmaceutical industry.

Others in the field acknowledge there is growing evidence that plasma exchange offers benefit as a short-term therapy in treating acute MS episodes.

But without financial backing, the large-scale, rigorous clinical trial that might prove the therapy's effectiveness for long-term maintenance may never get done.

Until then, doctors in the field will continue to raise their eyebrows when they hear about Khatri's approach, questioning the science supporting it and whether it really is effective.

Indeed, Khatri probably is the only one in the field who is using plasma exchange as long-term maintenance therapy, said Bibiana Bielekova, an MS researcher with the National Institutes of Health.

"It's clearly not something that is widely accepted in the field," she said.

Unless you're one of the many patients Khatri treats at Aurora St. Luke's Medical Center in Milwaukee.

The treatments involve removing blood through a catheter in the arm and separating out the plasma. The red blood cells then are mixed with artificial plasma, which is returned to the body through a needle in the other arm.

See TREATMENT on page 2

Fresh academic record set by freshmen class

By Sam Butterfield
Collegian Staff

The freshman class at the University of Massachusetts came to campus last week with a very special distinction – the class of 2013 had the best academic profile of any class ever to enroll at the University.

The approximately 4,100 students boast an average SAT score of 1171, up 16 points from last year's 1155, according to UMass' Office of News and Media Relations release. The incoming students' grade point average was 3.57, up from 3.56 in 2008. This year's average enrolling student also ranked in the 20th percentile of their high school class, a one percent improvement.

The class of 2013, which also set a record for applications at 29,469, enters with similar demography to classes past, with 22 percent minority enrollment.

Executive Director of News and Media Relations Ed Blaguszewski said the news reflects a trend over a several year period of a broader pool of students considering UMass for varying reasons.

"I think this shows a trend that's happened over the last four, five years where we've seen applications rising at a considerable rate," he said. "We believe that is driven by a greater appreciation for the excellence and value of the University and by the common application, which helps us get into the mix with more students and with a broader range of students."

Blaguszewski further explained that implementing an early action plan has also accounted for some of the rise in applications, as many students will express their preference for the University from the start.

Chancellor Robert C. Holub spoke on the record-setting class in a release before the start of the year, expressing enthusiasm about the class' place in the University.

"UMass Amherst ranks among the best public research universities in the country, and we're proud to have an outstanding group of new students from across the Commonwealth and the nation join our community this fall," Holub said.

Across campus, freshmen were excited to be part of a record-setting group.

"It feels kind of competitive with so many accomplished freshmen, but it's also interesting to meet such smart kids," said freshman Natalie Crowley.

Freshman Christina Marchetti reads for class in her UMass dorm. Her class holds the record for best academics upon entrance to UMass.

UMass has also dedicated $28 million to financial aid this year, nearly doubling the amount of funding available for aid allotted just six years ago.

This year's class outranks only one UMass class before it in academic merit; 2008's entering class was then heralded as the most distinguished class ever to enter the University.

Sam Butterfield can be reached at sbutterfield@dailycollegian.com.

Arts&Living

Cirque du Soleil Comes to UMass

Cirque du Soleil twists and tumbles into UMass' Mullins Center this weekend.

SEE PAGE 5

Sports

Clegg drafted to minor leagues

Former UMass pitcher Kevin Clegg took one more step towards his dream of playing for the majors in June after getting drafted by the Washington Nationals.

SEE PAGE 10

Editorial&Opinion

Do status updates destroy your social status?

Dave Coffey dives into the unexpected dangers of social networking tools like Facebook and Twitter.

SEE PAGE 3

DailyCollegian.com

Ride to Provide

Chris Shores shares a video documenting this year's Hilltop House "Ride to Provide."

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIX
ISSUE 7

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF William McGuinness
MANAGING EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
BUSINESS MANAGER Daniel Jette
PRODUCTION MANAGER Michael Sarkes
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Kirsten Swenson
ADVERTISING MANAGER Michael Tortorici
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Max Deimer
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Shanna Murphy
COPIES EDITOR Annie Krishline
EDITORIAL EDITOR Nick O'Malley
NEWS EDITOR Nick Bush
SPORTS EDITOR Jeffrey R. Larnard
WEB EDITOR Brian Wood
PHOTO EDITOR Matthew Harrison
IT MANAGER Victor Jacek
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Matt Zolnierz
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Jacinto
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Norman Provost
CLASSIFIED MANAGER Katelyn Tamilio
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Justin Gagnon
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Elyse Horowitz
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Cal Scannell
ASSISTANT COPIES Andrew Watts
ASSTANT EDITORIAL Michael Phillis
ASSTANT EDITORIAL Hannah Nelson
ASSTANT NEWS Samuel Butterfield
ASSTANT NEWS Alyssa Creamer
ASSTANT NEWS Jenn Heshion
ASSTANT SPORTS David Bronch
ASSTANT SPORTS Mike Gillmeister
ASSTANT SPORTS Adam Miller
ASSISTANT PHOTO Maxwell Sparr
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA Sara Cody
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA Chris Shores

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUES. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ADAM'S LEAF, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1904 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN OWNED BY ITS STAFF SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL MONDAYS THROUGH FRIDAYS 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Kirsten Swenson

COPY EDITOR
Elizabeth Tran

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Michelle Abbasciano

Hard facts reduce hard liquor intake

BY BALDUR HEDINSSON
MCCLATCHY-TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

MILWAUKEE — Give college students a clue on how much their friends are really drinking, and those students will tend to drink less alcohol, according to a recent paper.

Scientist agree that scare tactics that highlight the harms of heavy drinking don't reduce alcohol consumption among youth.

Almost 30 years ago, health officials began using a novel method to combat alcohol abuse on campuses by informing instead of scaring. Students were made aware of how their drinking compares with others on campus in various ways.

A study that reviews research on different communication strategies found that individual feedback either via a computer or in person effectively reduced drinking among students.

Group counseling and mailed feedback did not have a significant impact on student drinking, and the jury is still out on mass media campaigns.

The study was published recently in the third issue of the Cochrane Library 2009.

The majority of young people overestimate how much and how often their peers drink. And that can foster an environment that encourages heavy drinking.

"This creates a type of peer pressure, which drives levels of drinking upwards," said David Foxcroft, professor of health care practice at Oxford Brookes University in the United Kingdom and the review's co-author.

Foxcroft and his fellow researchers analyzed data from 22 previously published studies that included 7,275 mostly U.S. college students. All the studies had the same goal – to reduce drinking by educating students on how their drinking behavior compared with others on campus. The review sought to determine which methods are effective and which are not.

Students who received personal feedback either through the Internet or individual face-to-face sessions reduced their overall alcohol consumption compared with those who did not get personal feedback. The review also found evidence that Web-based feedback reduced binge drinking – defined as five or more drinks in one sitting for a man and four or more for a woman – and alcohol-related problems.

The researchers did not find group counseling and mailed feedback to be effective methods to reduce drinking.

The review tried to determine the effectiveness of media campaigns to correct student misperception, but because of rigorous inclusion constraints, only two studies by the same researcher, William DeJong, a professor at Boston University's School of Public Health, were included in the review. One of the two showed success in reducing student drinking, and the other did not.

"Re-analyzing data from both studies shows that the mixed results are due to differences in the number of campus communities with alcohol outlet density," DeJong said. "Powerful social marketing media campaigns are needed to work where there is easy access to alcohol, but they do work."

Many studies that focus on the effect of social media campaigns on a single campus – such as billboards and newspaper advertising – were excluded from the review.

"It is very difficult to do randomized assignment of subjects in social norms marketing campaigns within a campus community," said Wes Perkins, professor of sociology at Hobart and William Smith Colleges in Geneva, N.Y. A study published in this month's Journal of Studies on Alcohol and Drugs estimates 1,825 college students ages 18 to 24 die annually because of alcohol-related unintentional injuries.

"Every college student has roughly two age-mates not in college, which means that over 5,000 18- to 24-year-old Americans die each year due to alcohol-related causes," said Ralph Hingson, director of the Division of Epidemiology and Prevention Research at the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism and one of the report's co-authors. "That is more than the number of U.S. soldiers that have died during the entire Iraq war."

The report found an increase in unintentional deaths and injuries related to alcohol consumption from previous years as well as an increase in drunken driving among college students.

Amie Rosenberger, left, talks with Dr. Bhupendra Khatri durign plasma exchange treatment at Aurora St. Luke's Medical Center in Milwaukee, Wisc. Rosenberger suffers from multiple sclerosis.

MS improvement seen

TREATMENT from page 1

Each session takes about two hours. The treatments cost $4,000 to $5,000 per session.

The prevailing theory is that the process removes antibodies and other substances in the blood that leak into the brain and damage the myelin coating on nerve cells.

After developing blurred vision and difficulty walking, Katherine Roback was diagnosed with MS in 1981. When her symptoms worsened, she contacted Khatri, who then was at Froedtert Hospital.

Since 1983, she has been getting plasma exchange treatments from him every month or two.

She has gone from being in a wheelchair to using a cane or walker, she said. More importantly, she said, the treatments have slowed her deterioration.

"It's helped me tremendously," said Roback, 58. "I wouldn't be walking without it."

Melinda Winter was diagnosed with MS in 1990. She underwent plasma exchange for six months, but went off it for about two years while she was in remission.

Then she woke up in the middle of the night with vertigo. She could barely move or talk.

She was taken to the emergency room and admitted to St. Luke's for six weeks, where she underwent plasma exchange once or twice a week.

Since then, Winter, 38, goes in for treatment every three weeks. Insurance now covers the cost, she said. Winter also takes two other drugs for MS.

But she said she believes it is the plasma exchange that has allowed her to get through college and graduate school.

Without it, she said, "I'd either be dead or in a nursing home."

In May, Khatri and researchers at Stanford University and the Medical College of Wisconsin presented research at the annual meeting of the American Academy of Neurology on a 25-year study of 271 patients who underwent plasma exchange.

A total of 217 patients showed improvement in their disability.

However, the research as well as the patient stories are not the kind of well-designed, randomized clinical trials that are needed for FDA approval or that might convince doctors of the effectiveness of a treatment.

Plasma exchange as a long-term treatment for MS remains outside the mainstream of medicine because of a lack of evidence, said Lily Jung, an MS expert at the Swedish Neuroscience Institute in Seattle and a spokeswoman for the American Academy of Neurology.

"That doesn't mean it doesn't work," she said. "(But) I have about 1,000 patients and I think I've used it once."

Michael McQuillen, then chairman of neurology at the Medical College, remembers Khatri returning to Milwaukee in 1979 with his used blood exchange machine.

There was a woman with MS who had been admitted to what is now Froedtert Hospital. She could not walk and was not responding to conventional treatment, although, at the time, there were few drugs to treat MS. Khatri asked if he could try plasma exchange.

"I said, 'That doesn't make any sense, but go ahead,' " said McQuillen, now a clinical professor of neurology at Stanford University.

Within two weeks she was walking.

"I was amazed," McQuillen said.

Over the next year, Khatri started using the therapy on the worst MS cases and most of them got better, McQuillen said.

He said Khatri epitomizes what a doctor should be to his patients. "He stands by them," he said.

Early on, Khatri was a one-man show, finding patients who would be candidates and doing all the work himself, including staying up until midnight to clean the centrifuge in the machine and sterilize other equipment.

"I had no nurse or no technician," he said.

Today, he has a team of professionals at St. Luke's who handle plasma exchange. The equipment is more sophisticated, with disposable components.

Khatri said a major frustration is getting insurance companies to pay for the therapy. While Medicare and Medicaid have agreed to cover the treatments, some private insurance firms have refused or have cut off payments, he said. Patients usually get worse when that happens, he said.

Khatri now takes video of all his patients to document their improvement, and he may use the videos when appealing a denial of coverage.

"Sometimes they will not listen at all," he said. "I get so angry with the insurance companies."

A quiet and understated man, Khatri's belief in the therapy seeps out the more he talks about it.

"It does bring about improvement, and there are no side effects," he says. "For those patients who we have nothing else to offer, this is a viable treatment."

In the 1980s, Khatri and others performed smaller studies showing that plasma exchange provided significant improvement, compared with a sham treatment.

However, other research has failed to show a significant benefit.

Plasma exchange has showed benefit as a short-term therapy that can be used to treat acute MS episodes in patients who don't respond to conventional corticosteroids, said Brian Weinshenker, a neurologist with the Mayo Clinic.

However, there is not compelling evidence that plasma exchange works as a long-term treatment, he said. To do that a large, rigorous clinical trial showing is needed.

It is possible that Khatri's success may be due to a placebo effect, he said.

"I know he says the patients do well," Weinshenker said. "The question is, how would you expect them to do otherwise? I don't think the data is there, but there may be something."

New Merchandise. Same Unbeatable Prices
COLLEGESAMPLESALE.COM
UMASS
SEPTEMBER 16TH
STUDENT CENTER
9AM TO 6PM
Cash and Credit Card accepted
Be sure to mention your sorority's letters to help raise money for your philanthropy!
AKA ROK Voce puella pump CRYSTAL tri kappa Zeta
FOR INFO VISIT COLLEGESAMPLESALE.COM or CALL 973.723.5303

THE
BOLTWOOD
PROJECT™
Serving others since 1969 -- and STILL making a difference!
A STUDENT / COMMUNITY SERVICE LEARNING PROGRAM
(an RSO and Dept. of Landscape Architecture & Regional Planning sponsored prog.)
REACH OUT—AND BECOME A SPECIAL FRIEND TO PEOPLE WITH SPECIAL NEEDS
Your life will NEVER be the same!
••EARN 1-2 CREDITS ••GAIN VALUABLE EXPERIENCE ••REWARDING, CHALLENGING, and FUN
Fall Semester 2009 — Recruitment Nights
You must attend ONE of these meetings. No exceptions, even if you have participated before!
6:00-8:00 PM (Note: Prompt starting time!!!)
Campus Center Room 101 • Sept. 14 (Mon) • Sept. 15 (Tues) • Sept. 16 (Wed)
•Assignment notification ONLY Thurs. Sept. 17 @ Boltwood table CC Concourse
No telephone inquiries. YOU (or a friend) must pickup the notification letter!!!
Volunteer, while earning credit!

Bill strives to simplify federal student aid or very inexpensive higher education, it's almost entirely through the federal government."

SAFRA from page 1

McCluskey, who as student trustee was a vocal opponent of last semester's $1,500 fee increase, said that given the dire condition of state budgets, including Massachusetts', federal money may be the most effective way to increase access to higher education.

"I think that one of the things that has really been clarified to me working at state and federal level is that students and faculty all over the country are fighting these state-by-state battles," she said.

Chairman Miller said that the bill was created in response to President Barack Obama's call to action on education reform.

"We're making these investments because these are the priorities that President Obama has set for his education agenda," he said.

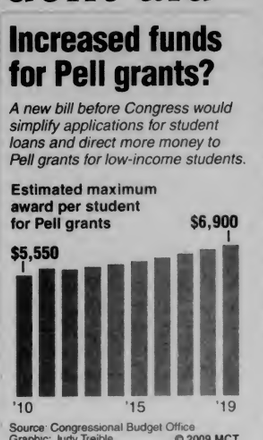
In addition to simplifying FAFSA and restructuring federal loan programs, SAFRA would also expand the Perkins Loan program, a campus-based program, to other schools and invest over $2.5 billion in "historically black colleges and universities and minority-serving institutions."

A particularly controversial portion of the bill would also put an end to federal loan ineligibility based on prior drug convictions. Under SAFRA, students convicted for drug possession would still be eligible for loans, while those convicted of drug distribution would remain ineligible.

Miller, acknowledging possible opposition to the measure, said it was still open to amendment.

The bill is expected to be voted on by the house today, and Miller said during a teleconference yesterday that he hopes to complete the amendment process for the bill by Thursday so it can go to vote in the Senate and, if passed, land on President Barack Obama's desk.

"We hope to get it to the President's desk before the holidays," he said.



McCluskey said she and members of the other advocacy groups expect the bill to pass the house with relative ease, but that it will likely face opposition in the Senate.

"I think that it's going to be a considerable fight and students are going to have to gear up and show members of Congress that they need to start prioritizing students over private lenders," she said.

S.P. Sullivan can be reached at spsullivan@dailycollegian.com

Increased funds for Pell grants?

A new bill before Congress would simplify applications for student loans and direct more money to Pell grants for low-income students.

The graph above shows the projected increase in the maximum award per student for Pell grants.

Weak economy gaining strength

BY KEVIN G. HALL
MCCLATCHY-TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The deep recession that's gripped the U.S. economy by the throat since December 2007 is "very likely over at this point," Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke said Tuesday.

However, Bernanke painted a picture of an underperforming economy well into next year as he fielded questions after a speech at the Brookings Institution, a center-left research center in the nation's capital.

"From a technical perspective the recession is very likely over," Bernanke said, cautioning that unemployment is likely to remain high. "It's still going to feel like a very weak economy for some time, as many people will still find that their job security and employment status is not what they wish it was. So that's a challenge for us and all policymakers going forward."

Most mainstream economists think that the National Bureau of Economic Research, the official scorekeeper of when recessions begin and end, eventually will declare that this downturn came to an end in the summer or early fall of 2009.

What follows may not feel much like recovery, Bernanke cautioned, because structural problems in the U.S. economy are likely to resurface. There will be economic growth during the rest of this year, "but the general view of most forecasters is the pace of growth in 2010 will be moderate, less than you might expect, given the depth of the recession, because of ongoing head winds."

The "head winds" he referred to include an impaired credit system, households still trying to dig out from personal debt and ongoing adjustments in many sectors of the economy, such as construction and autos.

In addition, the government must unwind many of its massive stimulus efforts or risk igniting inflation. That's all likely to lead to a weaker recovery than after past recessions, and a lingering high unemployment rate.

The sluggish outlook was punctuated by August retail sales data released Tuesday by the Commerce Department. Sales rose by 2.7 percent over July, driven up by the government's "cash for clunkers" car sales program and higher gasoline prices.

Drop those two factors, and retail sales rose by only 0.6 percent. That's another sign of consumer reluctance to spend amid widespread job insecurity.

"The various fiscal stimulus measures, including the cash for clunkers program, are playing a pivotal role in jump-starting the economy in the third quarter of 2009, and that should create enough initial momentum to keep the recovery in motion, but we should not be looking for consumer spending to be a major driver of the recovery beyond the current quarter," Brian Bethune, a U.S. economist for forecaster IHS Global Insight, warned in a research note Tuesday.

Looking over a longer horizon, Bernanke said that a major factor in the recent global expansion of credit was significantly impaired and unlikely to revive anytime soon. The implication: less lending and at higher costs.

The Fed chief was referring to securitization, the process by which loans are sold to Wall Street firms that bundle them together into securities that are sold to investors. Their returns on investment come from monthly payments that consumers make on their homes, cars, credit cards and student loans.

Securitization is in a deep freeze right now because investors no longer want pooled loans, fearing defaults by consumers and businesses. This is one reason it's so difficult now for consumers to get credit to buy cars or houses Bernanke warned that even when this process resumes, it's unlikely to be as vigorous as it was during the go-go days earlier this decade.

"My forecast would be that the shadow banking system — securitization markets — will come back, will be a substantial part of the U.S. credit system. But they will certainly, at least in the medium term, be simpler, smaller, less opaque, subject to more oversight by regulators," Bernanke said. "And those things, I think, will constrain its growth for a period of time."

Yale bride-to-be killed

BY MATTHEW CHAYES
NEWSDAY

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — The slaying of the missing Yale bride-to-be whose body was found on what was to have been her wedding day "wasn't a random act," police here said Monday as an autopsy concluded that she was the victim of a homicide.

Authorities also officially identified the remains as those of Annie Le, 24, the Yale doctoral student in pharmacology who had been missing since last Tuesday and whose body was discovered Sunday hidden inside a wall in a basement lab building where she worked in the medical school complex.

The medical examiner in Connecticut is withholding Le's cause of death "for investigative purposes."

Meanwhile, the New Haven Register reported that detectives were focusing on a lab technician who works in the building where the body was found.

The newspaper reported that the technician had failed a polygraph test and had scratches on his chest, as if he were in some type of a struggle.

Nearly all of the basement animal research floor where Le's remains were found can be accessed only by students, faculty, staff and lab technicians who have been given specific permission to be there, student researchers said.

In an earlier statement e-mailed to the Ivy League school Monday, Yale Police Chief James A. Perrotti tried to tamp down rumors circulating on the shaken campus.

"There are no suspects in custody," Perrotti said. "We ask for your patience as we thoroughly investigate this crime."

Authorities would not answer questions about a suspect, but say they are sure that there are "no students involved" in Le's killing, Perrotti said.

New Haven police spokesman Joe Avery said Monday that because the death did not appear to have been committed at random, there was no need for alarm on campus.

"It wasn't a random act," Avery said. "It doesn't appear to be a random act."

Sari Levy, 18, a freshman at Yale from Great Neck, N.Y., said, "Everything is a little bit shaken up. It's more like emotionally distressing than actually fearing for your own safety."

Le, who is from Placerville, Calif., east of Sacramento, was to marry Jonathan Widawsky, also 24, a Columbia University graduate student from Huntington, N.Y., on Sunday. The nuptials were canceled Friday, after she was reported missing on Tuesday.

Widawsky is not a suspect and is working with investigators, police said.

Avery said police at first thought Le might have been a runaway bride. That theory was soon debunked as investigators were not able to find any surveillance video of Le exiting the Amistad lab, and she was seen on the video at about 10 a.m. walking into the building for a research lab appointment.

Yale officials say every entrance and exit to the building on the school's medical school complex is captured on video by a series of 70 cameras. The basement where Le was found in a part of a wall used for utility cables and plumbing is highly secure, university officials said, and only students, faculty and staff with a need to be in the basement are able to go there.

At Le's off-campus home about a mile and a half away, three plainclothes Yale police officers spent about 10 or 15 minutes in the residence Monday afternoon, then emerged with a camera. They would not answer reporters' questions.

Mid-priced laptops weigh less and boast 'ultrathin' frames

BY BRANDON BAILEY
MCCLATCHY-TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

SAN JOSE, Calif. — Those in the market for a laptop this fall will find a batch of new, mid-priced models that promise less weight and longer battery life than traditional notebook computers, but more performance – and a bigger screen and keyboard – than they'd get with a netbook.

The new "ultrathin" models take advantage of low-voltage processor designs that draw less power and throw off less heat, which allows computer makers to put them in laptops that are under an inch thick and weigh less than five pounds.

A few models were introduced earlier this year, including Hewlett-Packard's Pavilion dv2 and Acer's Timeline series. Dell has launched its own line, the Inspiron Z series, in recent weeks. Dozens of other ultrathin offerings from just about every computer maker are expected to hit retailers before the winter holidays.

Their sleek frames are intended to be reminiscent of premium laptops from Apple and other makers, although they may not offer all the features or souped-up performance. "It's not a MacBook Air," said PC analyst Mika Kitagawa of the Gartner research group, "but they're thin and nice looking."

At prices between $500 and $800, the new laptops will cost several hundred dollars less than those premium models. And they will do more than netbooks, which often sell for under $500 but have low processing speeds that are primarily suited for checking e-mail and surfing the Web. The ultrathins' low-voltage chips are variations on the processors used in traditional laptops, so they pack more computing power than the low-cost chips, such as Intel's Atom, that are found in most netbooks.

Analysts say the notable success of netbooks, which generally have screens under 11 inches and keyboards that are smaller than standard, suggests there's also demand for an intermediate computer that blends attributes from both ends of the spectrum. The new ultrathins have screens ranging from 12 to 15 inches, with a standard-size keyboard.

The IDC research firm predicts netbook sales will more than double this year, from 11.6 million units in 2008 to 26.5 million in 2009. That's a big surge since their introduction in late 2007, but some consumers have been disappointed by their performance.

"When people try to do 3-D games on these netbooks or try to run their office applications, they tend to think it's a bit slow," Intel CEO Paul Otellini acknowledged in a conference call last month. Many netbooks are built with the Atom, a lower-power and lower-cost processor from Intel; they also have limited memory and other features.

Some manufacturers also are concerned that netbooks have a lower profit margin than full-size laptops, analysts say. Overall, as the recession has cramped consumer spending, some computer makers have reported selling more laptops than a year ago but at lower average prices, to the detriment of their bottom line.

That's led to worries over whether consumers are steering away from full-size laptops. While most computer makers have tried to promote netbooks as a "secondary" computer for those who already have one PC, some companies have begun to use the lower-margin Atom chip in netbooks with increasingly large screens, Kitagawa said. She said chip makers may now use the ultrathin models, with the new low-voltage processors that deliver more computing power than the Atom chip, as a way to shore up sales of traditional laptops, which carry a higher profit margin.

The new ultrathins are built around technical innovations by chip makers like Intel and AMD, which have designed lower-voltage versions of some of their popular processors.

Advanced Micro Devices was first on the consumer market when HP used its Athlon Neo processor in the ultrathin dv2, according to IDC analyst Richard Shim. Acer and Dell are using Intel processors in their ultrathins, and both chip makers say their low-voltage processors will be found in many more makes and models this fall.

The low-voltage design doesn't require a big cooling system, which allows for a thinner frame while extending battery life to seven hours or more. Manufacturers say the ultrathins have enough memory and speed for "casual" game-playing, multi-tasking, editing photos or uploading video. The thin frame means some models don't have room for a built-in optical drive, however, so you may need an exterior drive for watching DVDs.

But analysts also warn that the proliferation of new models could lead to some confusion for consumers.

"You could have a situation where you have three notebooks on the same store shelf" – a netbook, an ultrathin and a traditional laptop – "with the same screen sizes but widely different prices," Shim warned.

And the choices won't end there. There are also smartphones and soon there will be "smart-books" – minicomputers designed for continuous connection to a network, built on processors originally designed for mobile phones.

With so many choices available, some analysts say it's unclear whether the ultrathins will have lasting appeal. For now, however, both Intel and AMD are promoting them as "stylish" options for consumers who want both performance and mobility.

"You may not get all the performance of a traditional notebook and you don't get all the portability of a mini-notebook," said Shim, using an alternative term for netbook. "But you're not paying the higher price of a traditional notebook and you're getting more performance than a mini."

JOIN THE FESTIVITIES FOR General Mills Week
in the DCs!
Monday, Sept. 14 — All DCs
Tuesday, Sept. 15 — Hampshire DC
Wed., Sept. 16 — Bluewall Franklin DC
Thurs., Sept. 17 — Worcester DC
Friday, Sept. 18 — Berkshire DC
SEPTEMBER 14–18
Enjoy samples, prizes, and enter the Beatles Rock Band Competition!
GENERAL MILLS FOODSERVICE
RESTAURANTS ivy
UMASS DINING
UMassAmherst
umassdining.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 2009

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
– Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Health care and politics

As the days of summer have waned, I have become more tuned in to the health care debate raging across the country. I deliberately ignored it during my time abroad, my intent being to focus all my attention on the sights and sounds around me. However, now that I have had time to catch up on the events I missed, I would like to comment on some aspects of the controversy that seem to have escaped peoples' attention.

Ben Rudnick

There is, of course, the obvious confusion of "health care" with "health insurance," which helps muddy the waters of the debate, but that is a minor issue when compared to some of the other obvious misconceptions about the true nature of the problem, as well as the solutions that are advocated by the many factions involved. For example, I was pleased to see President Obama finally acknowledge last Wednesday that there aren't 47 million Americans without health care, but rather "30 million American citizens who cannot get coverage."

That admission goes against the longstanding misrepresentation of the nature and scope of the issue, put forward by those who support a government-sponsored health care system and repeated ad-nauseum by the vast majority of media outlets. As President Obama noted, the real number of citizens who have no health insurance is far less than 47 million and, in fact, as detailed in the Census Bureau's 2007 report on "Income, Poverty and Health Insurance Coverage in the United States," the actual number of truly uninsured citizens is certainly far lower.

First, one must subtract approximately 8 million uninsured children under 18, all of whom are eligible for coverage under programs such as State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP) that have already been put in place and are being funded.

So now we are down to less than 40 million uninsured American citizens, but even that number is misleading because there are about 9 million uninsured in households that make more than $75,000 per year who choose not to buy coverage. Perhaps they do not feel they can afford it, or simply have other priorities, but either way we are down to only about 30 million uninsured that need help.

However, that number includes millions who changed jobs and were thus only temporarily uninsured. Therefore, instead of talking about massive government intervention in "health care," we, instead, should be discussing some smaller-scale solutions to cover the uninsured.

First, we need to find ways to make sure those 8 million kids are getting the benefits they already qualify for. After that, we could find ways to help those in the middle class who have chosen not to buy their own insurance, perhaps by loosening the restrictions on the sale of health insurance across state lines to reenergize competition in the industry. This will make coverage cheaper for those families who feel they cannot afford it. Finally, there are relatively simple ways to address the problem of portability, so people don't lose their insurance when they change jobs.

We still need to find ways to cover the millions of people remaining, but that is a far less daunting and expensive proposition than the 47 million, or even 30 million, which proponents of Obama-care claim we need to cover. After all, the less of the responsibility for solving this problem we give over to the government, the less politicized the health care system will become.

The simple and undeniable fact is that any aspect of society we allow the government to get involved in becomes politicized as a matter of course. Politicians run government, and therefore any issue within the government's purview is automatically a political issue. If, like me, you do not wish to see health care in America become even more politicized than it already is, you must recognize that the only way to accomplish that is to keep the health care system out of the hands of the politicians.

There is, of course, the obvious confusion of "health care" with "health insurance," which helps muddy the waters of the debate.

As one seeks a cautionary tale about the perils of handing power over to the Federal Government, one need look no farther than the Department of Education. Brought into being by the Carter Administration in 1980, this bureaucratic monstrosity spent $68 billion in 2008, roughly 500 percent of what it spent in its first year.

Can anyone honestly say that we have garnered any real benefit from that massive increase in funding since the agency's founding? Not to mention that most of its budget is discretionary spending, which gives the federal government the ability to blackmail local school districts into complying with edicts from Washington, D.C., or risk losing grant money.

So, the Department of Education is a massive federal bureaucracy founded in order to fix the education system, and has clearly failed to do so. It has squandered untold billions of dollars and has achieved nothing beneficial in return. On the other hand, federal meddling in America's schools has led to a dramatic politicization of the system, which continues to hamper our efforts to truly improve the education of America's children. What on Earth would lead one to believe that increased federal involvement in the health care system would be any different?

Ben Rudnick is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at brudnick@student.umass.edu.

Dangerous social networks

Man being the social animal that it is, one would think something called a "social networking" site would be beneficial for mankind. I, however, disagree.

Dave Coffey

Obviously, these sites are incredibly popular due to their ability to keep everyone in touch all the time. I'm not saying that social networking isn't great, but in many ways, these sites could be interpreted as vastly detrimental to the way we, as humans, function.

While research on the subject is still in its relative infancy, researchers are already alluding to the potential problems that could arise from a society in which Facebook interaction is the norm.

One factor being affected by these sites is how we process information. A popular feature on sites like Facebook and Twitter is the "status update" feature. Experts say that taking in large amounts of personal information can be detrimental to one's ability to react to it.

According to an article on Suite101.com, "Modern scientists say: Every interaction with others needs time, and the processing of the received information is often related to ethics. For instance, when a person learns about the depression of a close friend, she has to process this information in order to feel sorry for her friend."

The rest of the article goes on to say that this leads to "insensitive and numb personalities, as they are reading the most intimate and sometimes most horrible details of other's lives without the need of reacting to them as they would have to in a real conversation."

In an article on the BBC news website, Dr. Himanshu Tyagi of the West London Mental Health NHS Trust said that, "People with online activities might place less value on their real lives," which "could raise the risk of impulsive acts or even suicide."

While research on the subject is still in its relative infancy, researchers are already alluding to the potential problems that could arise from a society in which Facebook interaction is the norm.

Once again, experts are trying to say that social networking sites are making the real world seem, as Dr. Tyagi says, "unstimulating" to this generation. This, in turn, could make them lose touch with the real world to a certain degree.

Beyond the effects these sites may or may not have on mental health, some experts claim they may take a certain toll on physical health as well.

According to the Office of National Statistics, face-to-face social interaction time has slipped from six hours a day in 1987 to two or three hours a day in 2007. One of the biggest contributing factors to dwindling real social interaction is thought to be the invention of the Internet.

Now, experts are noting that this isolation can actually cause some negative health effects in the body.

According to Britain's National Health Service, research performed at the UCLA School of Medicine found that "social isolation can affect the level to which genes are active in white blood cells."

This greatly affects, among other things, the immune system, which leads to an increase in risks ranging from infections to cardiovascular disease. In addition to these potential risks, experts say that isolation can potentially lead to adverse effects in sleeping patterns, and skewed views of morbidity and mortality.

But the most disturbing part of the social networking fad is not any of the "health" effects, but the social mindset these sites encourage.

In a modern society with many problems to fix, these sites promote a philosophy of intellectual laziness and inherent self-centeredness. Everyone has seen peoples' status updates – they're the online equivalent of drivel.

Not to sound insensitive, but no one really cares that you're watching "The Hills," or that you're walking your dog or whatever mundane crap is in your status update. Do I mind that you're doing these things? No.

Should you waste everybody's time with informing us about every little thing you do? Again, the answer is no. Some experts think that by 2012, the Internet will be filled with so many "band-width hogging" sites, it will be clogged and "too slow and unreliable for important business," according to Asylum.com. But forget that you're wasting space on the Internet – you're furthering an incredibly faulty system of social interaction.

What I mean is this – A site that convinces you that everyone cares about every non-important thing you do is encouraging a selfish mindset.

Yes, I do understand that plenty of people use Facebook and Twitter in ways that is very productive, and yes, for those ends, it is a productive tool.

If you've got a friend halfway around the world, it's a great way to keep in touch with them. But let's face it – most of the individuals people interact with on social networking sites are friends they see everyday, anyway. There is most certainly a great deal of people who are using these sites in a detrimental way. And that could be quite dangerous.

Dave Coffey is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at dscoffey@student.umass.edu

We are always open for your letters!

editorial@dailycollegian.com

Our essential and fragile environment

Over the past few months, there has been much press time devoted to the issue of national health care. While I believe that this is an important issue and that national health care is in need of a makeover, this article is not about health care. This is about something that is, in fact, much more important – the environment.

Kathleen Broadhurst

According to an Aug. 10 New York Times article titled "Climate Change Seen As Threat To U.S. Security" by John. M. Broder, I shouldn't despair – at least some portions of government are giving time to the environment. Apparently, studies at the National Defense University have finally taken into account what scientists have been saying for decades that global climate change is happening, and it will have profound effects of the world. Thanks NDU for finally getting on board. The article goes on to discuss how areas like "sub-Saharan Africa, the Middle East and South and Southeast Asia" will be unstable. If you look at those areas and then compare them to what is generally defined as the 'Muslim World,' you will see a striking correlation. A double whammy, adding insult to injury. Not only has the Department of Defense finally decided that we haven't all been raving for years, but now they are using that very information to insinuate that we need more military to protect ourselves from, and offer "assistance" to the areas previously mentioned.

Some people still consider global warming to be a hoax – a left-wing conspiracy – and that's frightening.

As I often do, I checked out the comments section to see what my fellow citizens thought. Now, it's important to note that The New York Times is by no means a cross section of society. Catering to mostly elite, mostly liberal, mostly white readers, they are too limited to be called the voice of the people, but they are the voices of some people – presumably elite, liberal and white. I was curious to see their responses, as they are often one of the only groups whose voices are ever heard.

Three people out of the first 10 either denied climate change was happening, or dismissed it as "no biggie." And here I was pretty sure that we all had agreed on the facts, just not on the response. True, the name global warming is a little confusing when temperatures over the summer have sunk to a record low – which is why I prefer 'climate change.' What is currently happening to our climate is not limited to warming, though that is the overall trend. In some places it will cause deserts, in others rainforest, snow may fall where it never has before. Western Massachusetts may look more like Oregon.

Severe weather is likely to become common fare as global warming worsens. The contrast between those denying the effects of climate change and those living with them is stark. Such a disconnect between facts and opinion can be deadly.

The fact that some people still consider global warming to be a hoax – a left wing conspiracy – is frightening. Refuting the facts at this point does not portray the naïve ignorance of the uninformed, but a stubborn refusal to accept the truth.

That ignorance will prove to be our downfall if it prevents us from taking seriously the issue at hand. Though to some extent, I can rationalize the apathy of a generation which will not be alive to see the effects of their actions. By that same reasoning, I cannot comprehend the apathy of the present generation. It is our actions that can break the cycle of pollution, exploitation and destruction.

Obama has proven to be disappointingly lackluster in terms of environmental policy. Instead of the change he promised, we have a new policy riddled with loopholes for corporations to jump through.

The fact is, without a planet to support us, it isn't going to matter if there's a public option, or what the deficit is. It won't matter if we are attacking countries for the right or wrong reasons, or even if there are countries.

If our environment ceases to be able to support life as we know it, it's going to make all the socio-economic-political problems of the day moot points and the actions taken to protect corporations, to preserve profits, will seem very hollow.

We should be investing in alternative energies, in sustainable development. We should view environmental challenges as opportunities for alleviating some of our economic and health woes.

How long are we going to sit idle and wait for somebody else to take action? Realize that if the government won't take action we still can. Little actions add up, we can all have an effect. Live sustainably, boycott companies that contribute to the problem, lobby for real change and not lip service. Apathy is the ultimate act of selfishness.

Kathleen Broadhurst is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at khroadhu@student.umass.edu.

We shouldn't care about Kanye

Subhan Tariq

As I turned on my computer on Monday morning, all I could read about was Kanye West's essential diss of Taylor Swift at MTV's Video Music Awards. Facebook walls were littered with people's comments ranging from "Oh, what the heck?" to "I lost madd respect for Kanye," and that's when I began to think to myself, so what?

So what if Kanye dissed Taylor Swift (Don't get me wrong, I care, but in the larger scope of life, it doesn't matter). For the record, Beyoncé did act in a very classy manner, letting Taylor get her moment later in the show.

But the question begs to be asked, so what? In a country where our economy is still in a recession, where millions do not have healthcare, where we are mired in two wars, is there really nothing better to put on the front page of Yahoo?

Is this really what our country is coming to? At the same time that Yahoo and other media outlets were obsessed with the scandal, the body of a Yale student was discovered.

Other things were going on as well, such as a suspected U.S. drone attack, killing four in Pakistan.

The fact of the matter is that we, in this society, especially those of us in college, don't give a crap unless it's considered cool. We know the names, songs, lyrics and life stories of a ridiculous number of people in music and pop culture, but we don't know anything about ourselves or our country. Who was the 19th President? When was the 24th amendment passed?

The fact of the matter is that we, in this society, especially those of us in college, don't give a crap unless it's considered cool.

Know the answer? Rutherford Hayes was the 19th President, and the 24th amendment was passed on Jan. 23, 1964.

In a world where we as Americans have so much ground to gain, we waste such a large amount of time doing useless things.

Did you know that there are more honors kids in India then there are kids in general in the United States?

We have a lot to do in an increasingly global world to keep up with everyone else. We will soon lose our competitive advantage and will need to rely on other things to keep us on top.

But life was not always like this. There was a time when college students were at the forefront of educating others and being politically active; a time when college students had more power than the administration and a time when the administration actually listened to our needs and desires.

When the threat of taking over a building actually meant something, and when there weren't 10 student protests, there were 10 million student protests. So what happened? In short, we stopped giving a damn.

There used to be a culture of giving a damn. When music and pop culture revolved around being politically active rather than who-slept-with-whom and who-did-what-where.

Music was a means to be politically and socially active rather than a means to get into a state of trance.

Not that I'm ripping on any particular type of music or anything, but at one point, things used to be different. President Obama recently spoke to a joint session of Congress and directly to the American people about health care reform, and yet how many of us actually saw it?

More importantly, how many of us actually care?

During last year's presidential campaign, we saw an extraordinary number of students getting involved in the campaign.

Whether it be volunteering hours or donating money, students stepped up big and there was a potential for a spark, but that quickly faded once the election was over.

There are many ways to get involved right here at UMass. Whether it is through the SGA or clubs, there are plenty of opportunities for students to get out and learn about what the heck is going on.

After all, we're the ones who are supposed to run the country soon, right? So why not learn what exactly is going on. So the next time you remember what famous person's birthday it is today (Sept. 16 is the birthday of Nick Jonas, Alexis Bledel, Teddy Geiger and many others), think to yourself, does it really matter?

Subhan Tariq is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at stariq@student.umass.edu

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 2009

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Circus of the Sun' expected to shine at UM

By Alissa Mesibov
Collegian Correspondent

Cirque du Soleil, arguably the most famous circus in the world, will be performing one of their best-known shows, "Alegria," at the University of Massachusetts starting tonight.

Cirque du Soleil, or "Circus of the Sun," began in 1984 as a small show to celebrate the 450th anniversary of Canada's discovery. Since then, the Quebec-based circus has expanded to include 19 different shows that have enchanted adults and children alike.

Apart from the fact that this is the 15th anniversary of Alegria, the tour is also part of the 25th anniversary celebration of Cirque du Soleil.

While some of the more recent shows, such as "LOVE" and "Believe," are themed (the Beatles and Criss Angel, respectively), Alegria, which is Spanish for "joy," is completely original.

Since its 1994 premiere in Quebec, Alegria has been seen by more than 10 million people in over 65 countries, according to CirqueduSoleil.com/alegria. The production has been revised, so that it can be showcased in arenas, rather than the traditional circus tent set-up. The only noticeable difference for the audience is the increased space, which allows for performers to execute their incredible acrobatics.

The original production has been hailed as "the only game in town, and perhaps the world" by The New York Times.

Alegria incorporates 10 different forms of acrobatics, as well as dancing and singing. While some acts are common to the circus, like trapeze work and juggling, the elite performers in Cirque du Soleil take the performance to an entirely new level. Still other acts, such as the Fire-Knife Dance and the Aerial High Bar performance, are unique to this circus alone.

The current tour is multilingual, like almost all of Cirque du Soleil's productions. Alegria features a cast of 55 international performers from 17 countries whose talents include acrobatics, music, acting and clowning.

This particular tour began in May, is scheduled to play through January, though more dates are expected to be added on to the schedule. It will travel throughout Canada and the United States.

Alegria will play at the UMass Mullins Center starting today at 7:30 p.m., through Sunday, Sept. 20. The arena is handicap accessible. Adult admission ranges from $40 to $95, while admission for children ages 12 and under starts at $32 and goes up to $76. Children up to two years of age are free, provided that they are sitting on an adult's lap. These prices do not include additional service fees.

Tickets are on sale now through the Mullins Center Box office by calling (413) 545-0505. Tickets can also be purchased through the Cirque du Soleil website (http: www.cirquedusoleil.com/alegria), or by calling Ticketmaster (800) 745-3000. There is a discount for University of Massachusetts students, faculty, and staff, as well as seniors and military personnel, with the exception of the shows on Friday, Sept. 18, and Saturday, Sept. 19. All of those qualified for a discount must have a valid ID with them at the time of purchase. The prices range from $32 to $40.

The box office is open from 8:30 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. Monday-Friday, and 10:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. on Saturdays. Doors open at 6:30 p.m., one hour before the show is scheduled to begin.

Alissa Mesibov can be reached at amesibov@student.umass.edu.

A Cirque du Soleil artist poses mid-balance as part of the show's most recent tour, 'Alegria,' which arrives tonight at the University of Massachusetts' Mullins Center.

Dovolani finally 'Dancing with the Stars'

By Luaine Lee
McClatchy-Tribune News Service

When dancer Tony Dovolani glides through a torrid tango or hops to a lively Lindy on ABC's "Dancing With the Stars" he's just emulating what he saw as a kid.

He and his father used to watch a movie every week in his native Kosovo. "My dad found these Fred Astaire-Ginger Rogers movies and Danny Kaye, Gene Kelly, Donald O'Connor. Every Sunday we had movie night. And we watched musicals. It was so amazing because I was addicted to it as a kid. I couldn't wait to come to America to see some of this live."

He'd fallen in love with dancing at the age of four. "When I was 3 years old, my dad tells me I showed interest in music and dance, so he took me to classes where I learned how to learn instruments and a dance class. In Kosovo, it's very big to do folkloric dancing, ballet but also folkloric dancing," he says in his slight accent over lunch here.

"I quickly realized I didn't want to be behind an instrument while everybody else was dancing. So I quit taking music lessons and just wanted to do dance lessons. I was four years old. I remember telling my dad about it," he says over the din of the lunch crowd.

"My dad is one of the most wonderful, smartest people I've ever met in my life. He encouraged this and he was always there whenever I needed him, but at the same time he always gave me tough love. If I had tough times he didn't want me to quit. He said, 'This is what makes somebody good. If you can get past the tough times then you can appreciate this later on in life.' And he was right."

When "Dancing With the Stars" returns next Monday, Dovolani will partner with model-designer Kathy Ireland. This marks his eighth season on the nine-year-old show. He missed Season 1 because he was preparing for his first world title in ballroom dancing when they invited him to join.

When Dovolani arrived in the U.S. in 1989, he was heartily disappointed that there were no musicals like he'd seen in the movies.

"I was 15. I started working as a dishwasher because they didn't accept our diplomas here, and I was already in my second year in college back home. I was one of the brainiacs. My dad majored in math. And I wanted to be like my dad."

His father, who was a CEO of a computer company and his mother, a chemist, had divorced when Tony was 14. "When I came here it was sad to see on TV there was no dancing," says Dovolani, who's wearing a rose-colored T-shirt, jeans and a red baseball cap.

"The closest thing to it was 'Star Search.' I used to look for different channels. And one time I was working at the diner till 3 in the morning and the only time I could find anything that resembled dancing in the movies was at 3:30 in the morning at Nickelodeon. One of the cooks at the restaurant where I was working got an invitation to the Fred Astaire Dance Studio. I asked him where is this? I couldn't even speak English that well. He took me to it, and as soon as I walked in, that was what I wanted to do for the rest of my life. I was 16."

He'd seen ballroom dancing contests on PBS before. The day he walked into the Fred Astaire Studio he vowed, "I'm going to win that one day. The owner of the studio said, 'Sure, sure let's get you dancing first.' In 1998 I represented the United States in the world championships and in 2001 I won my first PBS championship which was the United States title."

He kept on winning, and trained Richard Gere and Jennifer Lopez for the film "Shall We Dance?" in which he had a small part.

Dovolani insists anyone who can walk can dance. "No dancer was born a dancer. Every dancer has been taught. ... Even walking takes rhythm. As long as you simplify it and understand each person's personality you can actually teach them how to dance. One of the things about the Fred Astaire system is they teach you the art of teaching so each person possesses four different personalities - two being strongest and two being weakest. If you can recognize that on person then all of a sudden you know how to teach them."

The four types, explains Dovolani, are analytical, driven, amiable and expressive. "For an expressive person there's no point is teaching left-foot-right-foot because they won't understand. You just have to show it to them and tell them about an emotion they're going to feel it. An analytical person, like an IBM person, I would teach them in a very much broken down system like 1, 2, 3, 4.

"The amiable person is a very good listener, so those people you can talk all day long and they'll never answer back, so until you stop they won't try it. Then a 'driver' you simply point them in the right direction."

Married for 10 years to Lina (he proposed four hours after they met), Dovolani has three children – fraternal twins, 1, and a daughter, 4.

"I'm living my dream," he sighs. "I'm a strong believer if you don't enjoy what you're doing now you can't think about tomorrow because you can't change the past and you can't do anything about tomorrow unless you work really hard about what happens today. My only hope in life is that my kids look at me the way I look at my dad."

Dancer Tony Dovolani, right, dances with former cheerleader Melissa Rycroft on ABC's "Dancing with the Stars." Dovolani credits his childhood interest in dance to classic artists such as Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers.

Busdriver doesn't stop for hip-hop

By Michael Deeds
McClatchy-Tribune News Service

When it comes to word speed and creativity, rapper Busdriver runs over Jay-Z, Snoop Dogg and the rest of mainstream hip-hop culture.

Born Regan Farquhar, he delivers his rhymes with dizzying, almost brain-frying quickness and clarity. He blurs ideas and quirky humor in a style of hip-hop that is challenging, if not purposely difficult. Musically, Busdriver can be equally surprising. His best-known song, "Imaginary Places" – used in the video game "Tony Hawk's Underground" – is driven by Bach and Paganini flute melodies. Midway through the hyperactive tune, Busdriver slows down enough to declare, "Kids, if you want to (tick) off your parents, show interests in the arts!"

Phoning from his home in Los Angeles, Busdriver, 30, spoke – surprisingly slowly – about his new album, "Jhelli Beam" (Epitaph Records), and his current tour with fellow rapper Abstract Rude:

Q: The type of words used to describe you have always been "crazy auctioneer" or "Gatling gun vocals" or "tongue-twisting speed." How did you come up with that approach to rap? How did you develop that style?

A: Well, I didn't come up with it. I'm from an open-mike called Project Blowed, which was an extension of another open-mike, the Good Life Cafe. That kind of approach to rap was kind of patented there. Or it was a very unique spin that was done on there. And I've always kind of had that instilled in me. So, yeah, it's part of me, my independent rap upbringing. But aside from that, I do have a musical sensibility that – I mean what sets me apart from everybody in Project Blowed and the Good Life is that my music sensibility is not always akin to everything that Aceyalone and Abstract Rude would do. But I just get it from my roots, my old rap crew, my open mike, stuff like that.

Q: When you talk about your music sensibility, are you talking about beats and production? I heard Paganini in "Imaginary Places."

A: Well, I've always had a willingness to seek out electronic musicians to do production with me. ... Nothing that I've ever seen as being unusual, but things that people wouldn't necessarily see as being traditionally rap or not necessarily even traditionally leftist rap, which is usually electronic musicians and indie-rock people and stuff like that, and using them in ways that aren't necessarily recommended.

Q: If you are forced to label yourself, is indie-rap what you would call the genre? I don't think "conscious hip-hop" fits you. Maybe unconscious hip-hop.

A: (Chuckles.) Maybe subconscious hip-hop. I don't know. It's all rap music. I don't know what kind of subgenre to assign it.

Q: But when you say it's all rap music – there's such a wide variety of music out there.

A: Yeah, I mean that's something that's not really appreciated with rap music. I think there's just a whole lot of pockets that get opened and overturned. I know that it was called underground hip-hop when it was in the '90s, the kind of stuff I would do. But I don't think you would call it that anymore. And post-underground, I don't know what it is. I have no idea. I guess indie hip-hop or whatever. I really don't know. I'm not an expert.

Q: Was making "Jhelli Beam" more of a trying undertaking than your other albums?

A: It felt like it was more so. I just think I did more. I actually did more in the same amount of time. I recorded a lot more songs than I usually do. And I wasn't really sure where I was going. But I ended up trying to make a throwback record, a record that sounded like something I did in the early oughts, like 2002 or 2003. I kind of wanted to make a record that harkened back to my second record, "Temporary Forever." That was kind of the goal. And I think that kind of got done somewhat.

Q: What is Abstract Rude's role on this tour?

A: He's an old friend of mine. He's one of the original founders of my little open-mike crew, Project Blowed. He recently signed with Rhymesayers. There's a lot of approaches that he really, I think, brought to the forefront of indie-rap in the early '90s. He was signed to Beastie Boys label Grand Royal, and I've just always been taken by his work. I've had an intimate knowledge of it. So his role is to kind of bring the lighter side or the more accessible, lighter, fun, vaguely neo-soul-like side of the phenomenon that I kind of am an extension of – this whole L.A. '90s underground hip-hop thing gone wrong. So we're like two facets of the same thing. We're like two sides of a coin. So it's more for people who aren't aware of him or aren't aware of the dynamics of the kind of approach that I use to make rap music.

He's more accessible. He's more of an elder statesman of things, and I'm way more irresponsible.

MC-singer-songwriter has growing reputation and fanbase

By Dan DeLuca
The Philadelphia Inquirer

It wasn't until Amanda Blank started making music that she realized what kind of music she was going to be making.

"It was kind of silly at first," says the fast-talking and even faster-rapping Philadelphia MC, songwriter and singer, as she sits for an interview in a local cafe. It is a few days before the release, in August, of her stylistically wide-ranging debut album, "I Love You" (3 stars, Downtown Records).

"I still don't consider myself a rapper in the traditional sense," says the 26-year-old Blank, wearing short-shorts, a crucifix around her neck, and sneaks bearing Tupac Shakur's visage, the morning after a hometown show at the Electric Factory, opening for the Yeah Yeah Yeahs. "And I would imagine that a lot of other rappers don't consider me one either."

That may be so, considering that she has taken a nontraditional route to making a name for herself. Blank, whose given name is Amanda Mallory McGrath, took her nom de rap from Jerri Blank, the 46-year-old bisexual, alcoholic, former-prostitute, high-school student played by Amy Sedaris in the 1999 Comedy Central series "Strangers With Candy."

Blank started making music in earnest around 2004 and has since busily distinguished herself as a hypersexual, word-slinging associate of such esteemed Philadelphia-connected dance-club music-makers as Spank Rock and Diplo.

You might have seen her covering PJ Harvey's "Drive." Or caught her onstage with one of her buddies, such as Sri Lankan agit-pop firebrand M.I.A., or Santigold, the alternative pop star and Bud Light Lime spokeswoman, who guests on "I Love You's" title track. Like Santigold, Diplo, and Spank Rock (whose 2006 debut "YoYoYoYoYo" was highlighted by a salacious, warp-speed rap by Blank on "Bump"), Blank is signed to the hip New York label Downtown Records.

And the label has plans to gain Blank the same kind of high-level exposure on TV shows and commercials this fall that Santigold has achieved since her debut album's release last year.

Blank also has been featured sitting on a toilet, unleashing profane couplets in the R-rated music video for "Loose" by Bangers & Cash, a side project of Spank Rock's; and adding pizzazz to Britney Spears and Ghostface Killah remixes. Along the way, she admits that she earned a reputation as "a raunchy Gwen Stefani."

But "I Love You" effectively tweaks the expectation that Blank is merely a foul-mouthed spitfire. Songs like the Depeche Mode-influenced "Shame on Me" and the soul-baring "Leave You Behind" suggest there's a vulnerability lurking beneath the scandalous exterior. In fact, Blank says, her mother told her, "Honey, I think your album is beautiful, and I can listen to every song!" (Other moms might disagree.)

"I grew up listening to rap music," says Blank, who was raised in a multiracial neighborhood by now-divorced "hippie parents." She got thrown out of high school ("I was a bad girl, running wild," she says) before earning a diploma at home. "I love rap. It would be amazing if I could do what Jay-Z does, but I don't think I can. But what is interesting is that, when I started to write songs, my brain just went into rapping."

Blank also sings in the perverse, and often perverted, Thom Lessner-fronted electro-pop group Sweatheart.

She says that band, which includes singer Rose Luardo, "is a really important part of my life . . . People think it's just a little side project but it's just as much a part of my life" as the solo career.

With a penchant for outré stage antics – Blank once dressed as an order of McDonald's fries for a gig made up almost entirely of Prince covers – Sweatheart is also an outlet for Blank's instinct for theatrical self-transformation. (Speaking of Prince, "I Love You" includes a quaking cover of "Make-Up," a song written by the purple pipsqueak for his '80s proteges Vanity 6.)

Blank doesn't write for Sweatheart, whose forthcoming EP "Tell Your Sister" is, she says, "a bit more polished, a bit more rock 'n' roll" than its 2006 debut, "So Cherri." "Thom is the brains of the operation," she says. That creatively frees up Blank, who has a dust-covered South Philadelphia apartment in which to live when she's not touring, as she has been in recent weeks with indie-rock duo Matt and Kim.

All that touring turned Blank into an artist of growing confidence, shedding the self-doubt of a period when her rapping persona seemed to her "not as cool as Peaches and not as tough as Lil Kim."

"Once I started writing songs," Blank says, "I was like, 'This is what I should be doing. This is what I love.'"

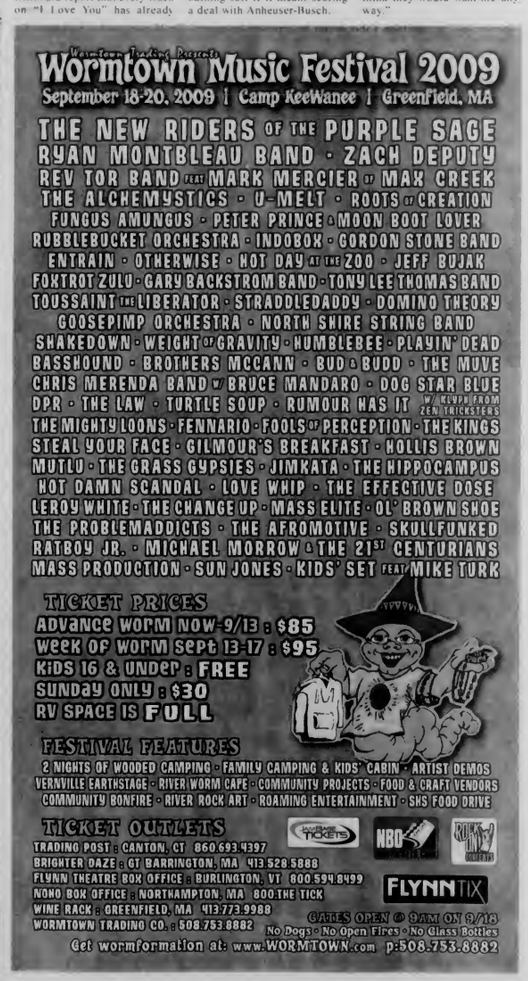
Josh Deutsch, the owner of Downtown, says, "There aren't that many people who can do as many things as she can do." The label has also signed Blank to its publishing wing and specializes in breaking artists through licensing songs to commercials and TV shows. He said Blank's ability to reach fans of hip-hop and rock and electronic music has allowed Downtown "to take a multidimensional approach to marketing, like we did with Santi."

Downtown's roster, which includes Gnarls Barkley and much-buzzed-about Chicago rapper Kid Sister, became chock-full of Philadelphia artists by accident, says Deutsch.

"I started to work with Spank Rock and Santi at the same time, and that led to signing Amanda and a broad-based partnership with Diplo and the Mad Decent label," Deutsch says. "I didn't wake up one morning and say I need to sign everything that moves in Philly. It's such a talented group of people who all came up together and are so collaborative. From my perspective, there's something in the water in Philly that's pretty great. They each have a distinct style, and what I look for in any artist: a significant voice and great songwriting."

After Moby's 1999 blockbuster "Play," Deutsch says, Santigold's debut "is one of the most-licensed albums of all time." He won't confirm a Billboard report that every track on "I Love You" has already been licensed, but says, "We're taking the same approach, and we're having an absolutely overwhelming response from the licensing community."

For Blank's part, she says that every time she goes to Downtown, she asks if they've placed her songs on "Gossip Girl" yet. "I'm obsessed with teen dramas," she says. "My whole life is like a teen drama. That's what I should call my next album." She jokes that she'd gladly don a Budweiser bathing suit if it meant scoring a deal with Anheuser-Busch.



"I'm a rapper," she says, slipping into an exaggerated hip-hop persona. "I'm trying to make that money!" But seriously, she says, "I feel very confident in who I am as an artist and a performer . . .

"I've got bills to pay, and I need to make money. I don't know if people are going to buy my record. So if (Downtown) is going to find something that fits and is cool, go for it. I mean, I wouldn't license my (stuff) to the NRA or nothing. But I don't think they would want me anyway."

Up-and-coming artist Amanda Blank mixes rap and hip-hop music on her album, "I Love You," which debuted in August.

Mass Attack schedule features BC, Friars

Minutemen to play six AP-ranked teams in 2009 season

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The 2009-10 regular season schedule for the Massachusetts hockey team is full of noteworthy opponents, many of which consistently carry their success into the post-season.

The Minutemen play six teams ranked among the top 15 in the country last season, including Hockey East Conference foes: New Hampshire, Boston University, Vermont and Northeastern.

The Minutemen play their first three games at the Mullins Center after a home exhibition against New Brunswick in the team's practice rink on Oct. 3.

UMass will kick off the regular season on Oct. 8 when Rensselaer comes to Amherst for the third matchup between the two teams since the 1998-99 season – the Minutemen won both previous contests.

The Minutemen play its first road game on Oct. 30 against Providence before facing the Friars at the Mullins Center for the tail-end of the series in one of UMass' most highly-anticipated home games of the season, its Halloween game. The Minutemen took two of three games against Providence last season, including a 9-4 thumping in Amherst during last season's Oct. 31 matchup.

UMass is 10-9-1 when playing a home-and-home series against the Friars dating back to the 1998-99 season.

Niagara follows the Providence series as the Minutemen's next opponent in the second of six home-and-home series. When the two teams last met, UMass beat the Purple Eagles, 6-2, at home.

Next on the schedule is a home series against UNH starting on Nov. 13 before the Minutemen go on their first extended road trip of the season. The four-game stretch has UMass seeing Yale, UVM, Quinnipiac and UMass-Lowell.

UMass then returns to Amherst for a game against Merrimack before a 17-day break in the schedule. UMass will return to action on Dec. 29, when it travels to Storrs, Conn. to play in the two-game Connecticut Tournament.

The five-game road trip continues for the Minutemen with games against BU, Northeastern and UNH, which finished top three in that order last season in the Hockey East. UMass finished last season's conference schedule seventh in the conference with a record of 10-14-3.

UMass hasn't had two road trips of four or more games since 2004. After the conclusion of the second road trip that season, the Minutemen went 2-7, including three-straight losses in their return to Amherst.

The Minutemen then return to the Mullins Center on Jan. 15 to take on UML, a team who UMass hasn't beaten in Amherst in three seasons. The River Hawks swept the Minutemen at home last season, giving them two of their eight losses at the Mullins Center.

After the second game of the home-and-home series against UML, UMass will return home for two games to take on UVM. The Catamounts rendered the Minutemen winless in all three games last season (two losses and a tie).

UMass will play BC three times and Northeastern twice in its final 11 games. Not only are these games important because they have post-season implications, but the Eagles were four points ahead of the Minutemen in conference standings last season and the Huskies knocked UMass out of Hockey East championship contention with an overtime victory in the semifinals of the tournament.

The Minutemen will conclude their regular season with an away series against Maine.

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

Junior James Marcou tries to escape the Boston College defense during a game last year at the Mullins Center. The Mass Attack will play the Eagles four times this year with two home-and-homes. The regular season starts Oct. 8 against Rensselaer.

Senior Brett Watson takes a shot against an opponent last season. The Minutemen will look upon his leadership this season as they take on six teams ranked nationally in the top 15.

NIU routs coyotes

FCS TOP 25 from page 10

stunned the Mountaineers, 40-35.

The field goal capped a 79-yard, 10-play drive, following a game-tying score by Appalachian State (0-2). The No. 1-ranked team in the preseason for the fourth consecutive year could not stop the Mountaineers. Kentrell Butler tackled Tavaris Cadet after Appalachian State tried helplessly to lateral in hopes of a miracle. Instead, the resulting safety sealed the win for McNeese State (2-0).

Derrick Fourroux had 341 passing yards for the Cowboys while going 25-of-34 with three touchdown passes and an interception. Cowboys receiver Todd Pendland caught 10 passes for 121 yards while rushing for 127 yards on 19 carries. Devon Moore rushed for 155 yards on 23 carries to lead Appalachian State.

With the win, McNeese State secured the biggest leap of the week in the FCS standings, as it climbed from 16th to eighth place.

This was the Mountaineers' second-straight loss in the final seconds, as they fell from the No. 2 spot to No. 10. Appalachian State will try to stop the bleeding as it takes on Samford next Saturday.

NIU BACK ON TRACK

Northern Iowa recovered from its agonizing defeat last week to stampede over South Dakota, 66-7. Pat Grace single handedly carried the Panthers to its convincing win by throwing for 445 yards and four touchdowns as well as running for three more scores.

This came a week after Northern Iowa (1-1) witnessed Jeremiha Hunter block two straight field goal attempts in the closing seconds of the Panthers' season opener against in-state rival Iowa. Panthers kicker Billy Hallgren lined up for the potential game-winning field goal with seven seconds left. Northern Iowa recovered the blocked kick with one second remaining only to have the second attempt blocked once more by the same Iowa player.

The Panthers preferred to not have this week's game come down to the wire. Receiver D.P. Lyman collected 197 yards on nine catches including a touchdown grab from Grace, who finished 24-of-32.

South Dakota receiver Ben Oberle caught six passes for 112 yards and a touchdown, coming on the Coyotes' first play of the game – a 70-yard flea flicker.

Other than the one play, Northern Iowa's defense gave its offense a boost by recovering three fumbles and intercepting two passes while holding South Dakota (1-1) to 113 rushing yards. The Panthers finished with 712 yards of total offense.

Northern Iowa received six first-place votes in the FCS poll and closed the week at No. 3.

Pete Vasquez can be reached at pvasquez@student.umass.edu.

Third-year keeper crucial to La Salle's recent success

By Herb Scribner
Collegian Correspondent

The La Salle women's soccer team got off to its best start in its 24-year history with an undefeated start in the first five games (four wins, one tie).

One of the factors behind the Explorers' success is their goalkeeper. Junior Melissa Sanger stopped 13 shots in their 0-0 draw against Lehigh on Sept. 4. This was a new career best for Sanger, who is the first player since 2005 to record 13 saves in one game. The record was previously set by alumni Lauren Malizia.

Despite La Salle's (5-3-1) defense early on, it struggled recently, giving up five goals to Penn before losing its second game of the season to Albany.

But those problems were short-lived as the Explorers picked their winning ways back up, dropping a 3-1 decision over Vermont.

SPIDERS SPIN JMU

Richmond earned its first victory over a ranked opponent since 2004, when it downed No. 25 James Madison, 3-0, on Aug. 22.

Forward Natalie LeClair scored her first of two goals in the 26th minute of play.

A-10 Women's Soccer

Goalkeeper Andrea Young contributed to the effort with her defense in net. She tallied five of the Dukes' 19 shots and prevented them from scoring a goal.

Despite the victory, the Spiders (2-4-1) are still struggling in their non-conference schedule, with their last win coming Sept. 6 against Coastal Carolina in the Longwood Tournament.

FLYERS BREAK SEATING RECORD

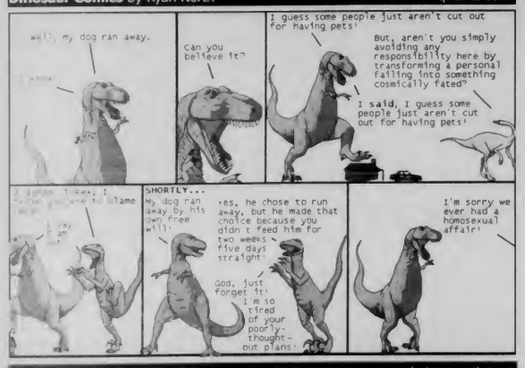
Dayton, last year's Atlantic 10 runner-ups, put on an offensive showcase for a record crowd on Sept. 11 with four goals in its shutout over Ball State. The Flyers (3-0-3) played in front of 1,584 fans and controlled the game the entire way.

They finished with 29 shots while holding the Cardinals to five.

Dayton also dominated on the corner of the pitch, as it had a total of 10 corner kicks and prevented Ball State from getting more than one opportunity.

The victory, which was followed by a 0-0 draw against Wright, preserved Dayton's seven-game winning streak.

Four of Dayton's last seven games have all gone into double overtime, but have yet to win with extended time.



Herb Scribner can be reached at hscribne@student.umass.edu.

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!
Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

COMICS

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North — qwantz.com

Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub — chainsawsuit.com

Wondermark by David Malki! — wondermark.com

SUDOKU

			8					1
		2			9	6
	9						2	8
							7
			3	5			9
			7	9		5
		3						7
	2	7		3			8
1					2		4

R.I.P. PATRICK SWAYZE:
YOUR ABS WILL BE MISSED

Opiate of the People by Emily Regan

Robbie and Bobby by Jason Poland — robbieandbobby.com

My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees — mnftiu.cc

Mr. Gnu by Travis Dandro — weepstrip.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
"Girlfriend" does not rhyme with "sock-block."

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Studies show early spankings make for aggressive toddlers. At least now you know why you're crabby.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
You will have an awful day because you won't save money on your car insurance.

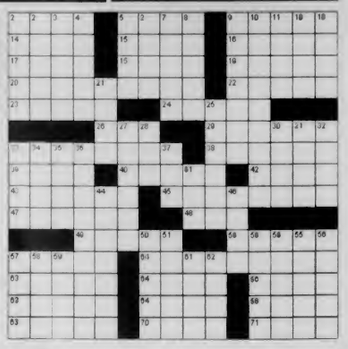
taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Don't be like Green Day – take an active role in the things you believe in.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
In about five minutes, you will be the vessel of every comic nerds' cries due to Disney buying Marvel.

cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
Stay away from satanic communication like "Gossip Girl" and "Everyone Loves Raymond."

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
Yes, there should totally be a holiday where you receive presents from the Jigga-man.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Bad people do not go to hell – they work for a company called TMZ.



libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
Spielberg is about to unveil his masterpiece: "Indiana Jones and the Secret to Strong, Lush Hair."

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
Your nightmares are true. Nancy Pelosi does eat children for brunch.

sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
If you get stuck on homework, ask yourself: what would Batman do?

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
Anything is possible now that Benjamin Watson wins football games.

CROSS-WORD

ACROSS

1. As well
5. Donations
9. Showers
14. Doozy
15. Violent disturbance
16. Endow
17. Colored part of an eye
18. Novice
19. Robbed
20. Taking office
22. Blabs
23. Carapace
24. A synthetic fabric
26. American Medical Association
29. Soothsayer
33. Shamefaced
38. Take into confinement
39. Cobs of corn
40. Informal language
42. Matured
43. Vestiges
45. Reckless
47. Benni
48. Before
49. Enumerates
52. Ancient Assyrian city
57. Moon of Saturn
60. Well timed
63. Winged
64. Frog
65. Picnic insects
66. Cantaloupe or honeydew
67. Coastal raptor
68. Make a sweater
69. Bring to bear
70. Untidyness
71. Visual organs

DOWN

1. Assumed name
2. Stagger
3. Piece of cake
4. European blackbird
5. Products of human creativity
6. Fifty-three in Roman numerals
7. Fool
8. Expressionless
9. Fix up
10. Existing before birth
11. Graven image
12. Void
13. Views
21. Smack
25. Boarder
27. Omits
28. American Sign Language
30. Hamster's home
31. Untruths
32. Concludes
33. Adjusts
34. Rabbit
35. Historical periods
36. Moving stairway
37. An exclamation of suspicion
41. Born
44. Distinguished
46. Honey
50. ___ pole
51. Fern-to-be
53. Impale
54. Not cloudy
55. Unfasten
56. Relaxes
57. Not wild
58. Holly
59. Story
61. Skillets
62. Lyric poems

CLASSIFIEDS

CREDIT INTERNSHIP OPPORTUNITY
3 credit hour internship. Internet marketing and branding on bus line/ University Drive. Must be proficient with social networking sites. Call 413-549-4971 ask about internship opportunity.

EMPLOYMENT
Calzone Transport Technician (Drivers) and Calzone Production Engineers (kitchen help) wanted. Apply at DP Dough, downtown Amherst.

EMPLOYMENT
Rent us your ears! $10/ hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

SPRING BREAK 2010
Spring Break 2010 sell trips, earn cash, and go free! Call for group discounts. Best prices guaranteed! Info/reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

EMPLOYMENT
Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162

FOR RENT
Rt. 9 Hadley. 5 bedroom house. $2000/mo & utilities. 2 car garag. 1 & a qtr miles to campus. No beds. Large Lot. Music room. Skibiski Real Estate. 586-1827.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 2009

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Clegg drafted to minor leagues

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Six months ago, amid rumors of their program getting cut, Mitchell Clegg and the rest of the Massachusetts baseball team didn't know what their future entailed.

After the administration decided to cut the skiing team from the athletic department, the Minutemen, with Clegg as their No. 1 starter, finished with a 27-26 overall record while making a strong push for an Atlantic 10 title in May.

"There was some speculation, but at the same time, I always knew that if I performed at my highest level and was given the opportunity to play, it would work out. At the same time, [I] ultimately [wanted to] help UMass reach the top of the [A-10] tournament," Clegg said.

Now, with the team still part of the athletic program, the former Minuteman has taken his game to the next level as a member of the Vermont Lake Monsters, the Class A short-season affiliate of the Washington Nationals.

The Nationals selected the left-hander from Woburn, Mass., with the first pick in the 21st round of this June's amateur draft.

"It was an exciting thing, but it was also a relief," Klegg said of being drafted.

Clegg quickly found a spot in the starting rotation after getting his first victory coming out of the bullpen twice, but has four losses in nine starts.

In 11 appearances with the Lake Monsters, Clegg has one complete game and posts an ERA of 2.47, surrendering one home run, 10 walks and 23 strikeouts.

On August 18, Clegg was selected to represent the National League and the Lake Monsters in the New York-Penn League All-Star Game, held in State College, Pa.

"It's definitely an honor to be looked at as one of the main players at least at the All-Star level around the league, but a lot of it has to do with the guys you play with," Clegg said.

Clegg pitched a scoreless third inning, facing four batters while giving up one single, walking a batter and striking out another.

Prior to beginning his professional career, Clegg finished 7-1 with a 4.15 ERA, including a team-high 81 strikeouts in 91 innings pitched in 2009. He also held opposing hitters to a .251 batting average.

After transferring from Maine to play in Amherst, Clegg finished his two-year career at UMass 11-6 with a 4.33 ERA, which included an opponent batting average of .257.

Clegg feels that the biggest difference between professional and collegiate baseball is that everyone has talent and the ability to get to the next level.

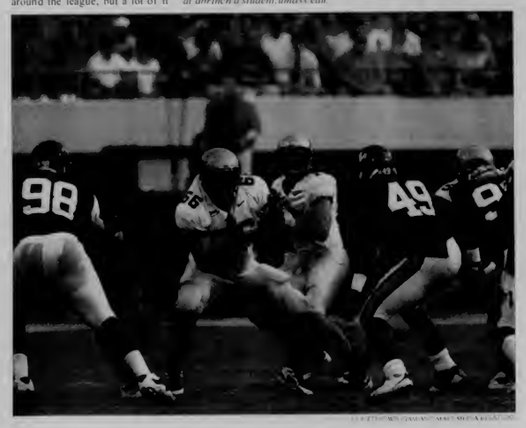
"The biggest difference is that everybody at this level can play," Clegg said. "Whether it's a pitcher, or even the guys, [batting] five, six, seventh, in a lineup or the pitching rotation have all been the top one, two or even three players at their schools, in terms of their ability at that level, whether high school or college."

Regardless of where Clegg ends up, he will always look back at his days as a member of the Minutemen fondly.

"I think the biggest thing I will take from playing at UMass is the camaraderie and the group of guys I played with," Clegg said.

"Especially last season, with the talk of the program getting cut, and I think there was really a turning point where the leadership of the seniors took over because we knew what it took to win."

He may not be a big-time major league prospect, but Clegg likes his chances of one day pitching in the major leagues.



"There's nothing else I'd rather be doing than playing baseball right now, and hopefully I can make it a career and can do it until I am no longer able to play."

David Brinch can be reached at dbrinch@student.umass.edu.

FILE/UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Former UMass pitcher Mitchell Clegg throws a pitch for the Minutemen in a game last season. After being the team's No. 1 starter, the Washington Nationals drafted him with the 21st pick in the 2008 MLB draft. He currently plays for the Single A Vermont Lake Monsters.

FILE/UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

William and Mary quarterback R. J. Archer looks to make a pass during the game against Virginia on Sept. 5. The Pride are 2-0 after their latest win over Central Connecticut State.

William and Mary improves in standings

Tribe off to 2-0 start after routing Central Connecticut State at home, move into top five

BY PETE VASQUEZ
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The William and Mary football team continued its surprising start to the Football Championship Subdivision by defeating Central Connecticut State, 33-14, this past Saturday night in Williamsburg, Va.

The Tribe (2-0) carried on with their steady rise to the top of the FCS standings, settling into the top five during an off-week after being ranked 14th in the preseason.

Following their stunning upset over Virginia last week, when they forced seven turnovers and pressured the Cavaliers to use all three of their quarterbacks, the Tribe's defense continued to dominate.

Their blitzing resulted in negative rushing yards for the Blue Devils (1-1) after one quarter in stark contrast to William and Mary's 108 yards on the ground. Running back Jonathan Grimes became the first player in Tribe history to reach 1,000 career rushing yards in 13 games.

Quarterback R.J. Archer threw two touchdown passes besides rushing for another score as the Tribe scored on 4-of-5 first-half possessions. He finished 9-of-16 for 129 yards and one interception.

William and Mary will try for its first 3-0 start since 1998 when it takes on Norfolk next week.

FCS Football Top 25

Appalachian State's stumble invigorates cowboys

Appalachian State added to its troubles after its loss to McNeese State in the final seconds. Josh Lewis kicked an 18-yard field goal with four seconds remaining as the McNeese State Cowboys

See FCS TOP 25 on page 5

Explorers earn A-10 honors

BY JUAN PACHECO
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The La Salle field hockey team has the honor of having both Atlantic 10 Player and Rookie of the Week honors, heading into the fourth week of the season.

Midfielder Beth Carey and Massachusetts goalkeeper Alesha Widdall earned co-Player of the Week honors. Carey scored two goals and assisted on three of her teammates' in the past week. The honor marks the first time in over two years that an Explorer (3-4) was named Player of the Week.

Carey leads the Explorers in goals (four), assists (three) and points (11). She is also one of the A-10's top three leaders in those categories.

Midfielder Rebecca Chylack earned A-10 Rookie of the Week honors for the first time in her career after scoring two goals and picking up two assists this past week. She helped the Explorers win their games against Longwood and Siena. Chylack scored with less than a minute in regulation, forcing overtime as well as scoring the game-winning goal against the Lancers.

Having an Explorer pick up both honors marks a turnaround. After losing their first three games of the season, La Salle bounced back to win three of their next four. Its next game is Friday against Bucknell.

A-10 Field Hockey

RAMS SUFFER FIRST LOSS

West Chester is no longer undefeated after its first loss of the season to No. 2 North Carolina. The Tar Heels shut-out the Golden Rams, 6-0.

West Chester's defense did little to stop the Tar Heels (6-0) as both of its goalkeepers totaled one save.

Despite the loss, the Golden Rams (5-1) are off to one of their best starts in program history, the best in over 20 years. They look to regain their winning momentum Friday as they host Towson.

In previous games, the West Chester goalkeepers were more productive, shutting out Lehigh, 6-0, as well as keeping Saint Francis and Appalachian State to one goal in both games.

HAWKS KEEPS STRUGGLING

Saint Joseph's woes continue as it opened up the season as the A-10's worst team.

Drexel downed the Hawks, 8-0, giving them their worst loss of the season.

Losing has not been part of the program's recent history as St. Joseph's (0-5) has won at least 10 games in the past five seasons, a trend that will end if it does not turn around its season.

St. Joe's lost a few seniors from last year's team due to graduation, including forward Krista Bordogna, who tallied career highs in goals, assists and points.

The Hawks' struggle can also be attributed to their tough schedule early in the season. Their opponents include No. 11 Duke and the No. 14 Dragons. St. Joe's combined opponents' record is 17-7 as well as being outscored 22-7.

The Hawks will head out on the road this season to Evanston, Ill., to face Missouri State this Saturday.

Juan Pacheco can be reached at jcpachec@student.umass.edu.

COURTESY/LA SALLE MEDIA RELATIONS

A La Salle field hockey player runs upfield during a game against Siena on Sunday. The Explorers also beat Longwood this past weekend.

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY

COLLEGIAN

SUNNY — HIGH: 68 LOW: 46 — www.DailyCollegian.com — THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 2009

Sierra Club ranks greenest schools

UMass not among 135 most environmentally-friendly colleges

BY SAM BUTTERFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

While the University of Massachusetts Amherst may pride itself on being an environmentally sustainable institution, emphasizing conservation, recycling, and local produce, one influential organization begs to differ.

The Sierra Club released its annual rankings of "Cool Schools," in the September and October edition of Sierra Magazine, listing 135 institutions of higher learning as schools leading the way in environmental friendliness. UMass was nowhere to be found.

Leading the way was the University of Colorado, with the University of Washington, Middlebury College, the University of Vermont, and College of the Atlantic rounding out the top five.

Students are more eco-conscious than ever, recent polls suggest, as one Princeton Review survey found that two thirds of students said a school's environmental stance would be a factor in whether they would enroll.

Locally, Williams College placed 52, Amherst College 71, and Hampshire College 75.

Other New England schools on the list included Harvard at 11, University of New Hampshire at 12, Yale at 14, Bates at 16, Tufts at 22, Bowdoin at 28, Green Mountain College at 35, Brown at 64, Fairfield at 80, Marlboro at 106, Champlain at 118, and Lasell at 122.

Students at schools with high rankings had mixed feelings about the list.

University of New Hampshire junior Jack Crowley said he was unsurprised UNH was ranked where it was.

"They channel the gas from the Durham landfill and use that for heat, they're redoing a chemistry building trying to make it more eco-friendly, there's an apartment complex going up, they're making it very green, the asphalt they're using is some kind of special material, even yesterday was "University Day," a fall picnic, and they had these stations set up where there was trash, and bottles, and paper, and these big signs that say 'drop it here,'" Crowley said, listing off the university's environmental efforts. "It's the green thing, there's some really committed people, the administration is really pushing it," he said.

Hampshire junior Tina Oza said she was surprised the small liberal arts school in South Amherst was not ranked higher.

"It's kind of surprising, we should be higher up; it's pretty weird how they rank those things," she said.

UMass students involved in environmental planning were upset by being left off the list.

Junior globalization studies major Peter Merzbacher said he believes there is ample activism fermenting on campus and believes the university should be ranked.

"I think the fact that we're not on the list is pretty messed up," he said, "Student leaders here are trying to make the campus kind of a flagship sustainable university."

"People view UC Berkeley or UVM as environmentally friendly campuses, but they don't think of UMass on the same level, but there are a bunch of groups on campus trying to change that and we're in the process of writing a sustainability master plan that will coordinate a bunch of departments around campus including physical plant and different organizations to get everyone involved," he said.

Sam Butterfield can be reached at sbutterfield@dailycollegian.com

COURTESY/SIERRA MAGAZINE

The new central heating plant was an attempt to make UMass more sustainable, the school was not among 135 listed as most environmentally conscious.

TOP ENVIRONMENTAL SCHOOLS

NATIONALLY

1. University of Colorado
2. University of Washington
3. Middlebury College
4. University of Vermont
5. College of the Atlantic

NEW ENGLAND

1. Middlebury College
2. University of Vermont
3. College of the Atlantic
4. Harvard University
5. University of New Hampshire

COURTESY/SIERRA MAGAZINE

House debates loans

Changes could save $86.8 billion

BY DAVID LIGHTMAN
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

WASHINGTON – The House of Representatives is expected this week to back overhauling – and simplifying – how college students receive financial aid.

The rules for awarding and repaying loans would remain unchanged, but the government would make all loans itself, ending the practice of subsidizing loans made by private lenders.

The Obama administration, which has made revamping the student loan system a major domestic priority, has hailed the bill as historic.

"This is a big, big deal," Education Secretary Arne Duncan said Tuesday at a news conference. He called the measure "the largest investment in higher education since the GI Bill" first passed in 1944 to help World War II veterans.

House Education and Labor Committee Chairman George Miller, D-Calif., vowed that the legislation would help students at "no cost to taxpayers."

That depends on how one interprets budget data, however. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office found that the loan program changes should save the government $86.8 billion over the next 10 years.

It also noted in its official July report on the bill, however, that it would include spending all but $7.8 billion of that on aid to students and higher education. In an update last week, the CBO said economic changes could boost spending overall by $10.5 billion, meaning that the bill could add to the deficit.

"The truth is, no one really knows how much this plan will cost," said Rep. John Kline, R-Minn., the senior Education and Labor Committee Republican.

Independent analysts agreed. Changes in the loan program will "save a big chunk of money," said Marc Goldwein, the policy director for the Committee for a Responsible Federal Budget, a watchdog group. "Will it be the right amount to offset the new spending? The obvious answer is we don't know."

Goldwein warned that the new system's fiscal outlook would be "particularly uncertain" because it would depend on economy-related factors such as default rates, need-based aid and other factors.

The bill would scrap much of the current student loan system, which critics say is too costly and too complicated.

Currently, the federal government provides loans through two different programs. It lends directly to students, and it administers the guaranteed loan program, in which students get funds from private lenders, with most of the loan guaranteed by the government against default.

Under one such loan, the government pays the interest while the student is in school. The student then begins repaying six months after graduation. If he or she defaults, the government makes the payment.

Until 2006, rates were variable but capped at 8.25 percent; after that they were fixed at 6.8 percent, with bipartisan support. Some rates then were lowered, but they're scheduled to go back up to 6.8 percent in 2012.

The bill would end the guaranteed loan program after next summer; then the government would make all loans directly.

That frightens some members of Congress.

"The U.S. Department of Education would become a behemoth federal bank," Kline said. "Democrats have had their sights set on a government takeover of student lending for more than a decade, and they're capitalizing on the market downturn to make it happen."

He sees parallels to the health care debate. Obama has urged creating a government-run health insurance program, or public option, to compete with the private sector.

"The legislation (on student aid) we're about to bring up ... eliminates the private option and leaves only the public option," Kline said. "It kind of makes you wonder, doesn't it, about the designs on the future of the public option in health care."

The new program would create big savings, the CBO figures. It would save money because of changes in subsidy rates, the CBO said. Some savings could be achieved with lower interest rates; the bill would set a new rate based on the price of 91-day Treasury bills plus 2.5 percentage points. The rate would be adjusted annually.

At the same time, though, the measure would expand the cost of the Pell Grant program, which helps lower-income students. Currently, the maximum annual award is $5,350. Under the bill, that would grow to $6,900 by 2019. The CBO estimated in July that the changes would cost the

See LOANS on page 2

Iraqi national baseball team finally gets gear

BY LAITH HAMMOUDI
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

BAGHDAD – Smiles broke out earlier this week as members of the Iraqi national baseball team tore into boxes filled with brand-new uniforms, courtesy of a Seattle-based company that donated the gear after a profile of the fledgling team by McClatchy Newspapers and a national appeal by MSNBC.

Six of the team members examined every detail of their new Ebbets Field Flannels duds Tuesday, blue caps printed with Iraqi flags, custom-made jerseys with "Iraq" on the backs, gray pants and old-school stirrup socks.

"I never dreamed we'd have something like this," said Bashar al-Salah, the team's captain. "Now we're a real baseball team."

The 20 uniforms were part of an outpouring of donations that followed a McClatchy news report July 13 that described the struggles of the start-up team, which at the time shared a single softball bat, a few old balls and some worn-out gloves.

Uniforms were only a dream. Since the report, which gained a wider audience when MSNBC's Rachel Maddow picked it up and appealed for help, the team has received cleats, baseballs, gloves, hats, helmets and an official rule book.

AP

Members of the Iraqi national baseball team pose with their new apparel, donated by a Seattle company after July coverage of their situation.

While the players, coaches and sports officials were thrilled with the donations, the head of the baseball federation balked at what he called charity and held up the handover of the goods.

Players suspect that he was jealous of the attention, which also exposed how ill-prepared Iraqi teams are despite government funds that are meant to equip them.

"We heard that some people from the federation bought baseball uniforms for us, and that's all I know. All we got in four years are words and promises, but nothing real," al-Salah said. "This is the first time we have real baseball uniforms."

Corruption is rampant in the new Iraq, with millions of dollars siphoned from government ministries with little or no accountability.

Players and coaches feared that the donated uniforms would disappear if they were delivered directly to the federation.

Once a tentative agreement was reached between the team and the federation, McClatchy handed over the uniforms to a delegation of six players. The team was adamant about making sure the donations reached the right hands.

"On behalf of the whole team, I would like to thank all the donors for everything they've done for the team," coach Hamza Madlool said. "This will have a big effect on the players. They feel like

See BASEBALL on page 2

ARTS&LIVING

'MOON' WALK DOWN THE RED CARPET

A stroll down the red carpet at the VMAs shows Lee Taylor a darker side of the acclaimed awards show, but a brief chat with Jimmy Fallon has him seeing stars.

SEE PAGE 4

SPORTS

UMASS LOOKS AHEAD TO RHODE ISLAND

The Massachusetts football team will look to defensive linemen Brandon Collier and Kyle C. Harrington when it takes on Rhode Island Saturday at 3:30 p.m.

SEE PAGE 8

EDITORIAL&OPINION

IT'S HARD BEING FRESH

Elie Feinstein explores the positives and negatives of freshman-only housing.

SEE PAGE 3

DailyCollegian.com

TAKING A SPIN (FOR CHARITY)

Collegian writer Chris Shores shares a video documenting this year's Hillel House "Ride to Provide"

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIX
ISSUE 8

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF William McGuinness
MANAGING EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
BUSINESS MANAGER Daniel Jette
PRODUCTION MANAGER Michael Sarkes
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Kirsten Swenson
ADVERTISING MANAGER Michael Tortorici
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Max Detmer
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Shayna Murphy
COPIES EDITOR Annie Keithline
EDITORIAL EDITOR Nick O'Malley
NEWS EDITOR Nick Bush
SPORTS EDITOR Jeffres R. Larnard
WEB EDITOR Brian Wood
PHOTO EDITOR Matthew Harrison
IT MANAGER Victor Jaeck
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Matt Zolnierz
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Jacinto
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Norman Provost
CLASSIFIED MANAGER Katelyn Tamilio
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Justin Gagnon
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Elise Horowitz
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Cal Scannell
ASSISTANT COPIES Andrew Witts
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Michael Phillis
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Hannah Nelson
ASSISTANT NEWS Samuel Butterfield
ASSISTANT NEWS Alyssa Creamer
ASSISTANT NEWS Jenn Heshion
ASSISTANT SPORTS David Brinch
ASSISTANT SPORTS Mike Gillmeister
ASSISTANT SPORTS Adam Miller
ASSISTANT PHOTO Maxwell Sparr
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA Sara Cods
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA Chris Shores

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS FALL AND SPRING SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY OWNED, OPERATING ON NON-PROFIT REVENUES. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ABOUT LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE BI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN WAS REINCORPORATED SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL BETWEEN 9 A.M. TO 5 P.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nick Bush

COPY EDITOR
Chelsea Dugan

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Guarino

Cash for school

Debate over new student aid rages in the halls of Congress government at least $39.4 billion over that period.

LOANS from page 1

Members of the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators are divided on the bill's merits. Justin Draeger, the organization's vice president of public policy, likes the Pell Grant provisions.

"Any investment we can make in Pell Grants is money well spent. There's been irrefutable evidence that providing low-income families with these dollars year after year increases access to education," he said.

Most activists and lawmakers agree on at least one point: The application process needs to be streamlined. The bill promises to "dramatically cut down the number of questions on the form," partly by allowing students and families to apply for aid using data from their tax returns.

The Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee hasn't yet considered the legislation but is expected to do so soon. The committee is considered sympathetic to changing the loan program, but its new chairman, Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, has said he wants to examine the spending proposals closely.

President Obama addresses Congress this summer. The House is expected to debate whether to make direct gwernment loans to students.

Tokyo PD: Keep hands to self

Sites tell readers where to fondle

BY YOMIURI SHIMBUN
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

TOKYO — A recent spate of gropings apparently directed and inspired by Web sites dedicated to providing tips about how to commit such crimes has prompted the Metropolitan Police Department in Tokyo to launch a crackdown on the sites and similar bulletin boards.

The MPD will urge operators of the sites to shut them down and starting this week will deploy more officers on trains mentioned as easy hunting grounds on the sites. A 23-year-old company employee arrested in April on suspicion of indecently touching the lower body of a high school girl on a JR Saikyo Line train in Tokyo had traveled all the way from Shizuoka Prefecture specifically to target a train cited as easy pickings on one such site.

When asked by police why he groped the girl on the rush hour train between Akabane and Jujo stations, he reportedly said he "had viewed a Web site that detailed how and when to grope people and wanted to confirm" if the hints offered actually worked.

The man was arrested in April on suspicion of violating the Tokyo nuisance prevention ordinance.

According to the MPD, between 1,500 and 1,800 arrests have been made each year for groping over the past few years, with 708 cases already established in the first half of this year.

The police have been alarmed that many of the suspects caught this year - including two men arrested in two separate cases on suspicion of groping women on the Saikyo Line - said they had been inspired by Web sites with sexual molestation themes.

The men - a 33-year-old company employee arrested in May and another company employee, 50, arrested in June - said they became curious about groping after browsing Web sites featuring molestation. They did not commute on the line.

More than 100 Web sites allow people to exchange groping-related information for particular railway lines, with some sites reportedly specifying times and train cars to target, the MPD said.

The MPD also plans to deploy more police officers - including members of mobile police units and officers normally in charge of pickpocket cases - on nine railway lines that are frequently targeted by gropers, including the JR Saikyo, Chuo and Sobu lines and the Keio Line.

The National Police Agency likely will establish an expert study panel as early as next year to consider measures to stamp out the groping scourge, according to sources.

The panel of university professors, railway business operators and groups supporting groping victims will survey students at all-girl middle and high schools in Tokyo. The group will dissect past cases and conduct experiments on trains to devise preventive measures.

In August, the NPA instructed prefectural police headquarters in the Tokyo metropolitan area and Kinki region to take stronger countermeasures against sexual molestation. The Chiba prefectural police have since launched an e-mail consultation service for victims.

"Many victims are reluctant to come forward as they feel too embarrassed," a senior official of the prefectural police said. "We'll concentrate our investigators on especially heinous cases."

Commuters ride a Tokyo subway, where police are puzzled by a recent spate of men groping female riders. Some sites offer tips on the best trains for fondling.

A slice of Americana in the Middle East: Baseball comes to Iraq

BASEBALL from page 1

a real baseball team, and this will push them to practice very hard."

The Iraqi national team didn't have formal uniforms because there's no supplier in Iraq and the game is new, imported by two Iraqi-American students who visited relatives here after the fall of the former regime in 2003.

Now, team members said, they just need to build up experience by playing other more established teams in the region.

They'd received an invitation to play in Afghanistan - one player joked that the balls would be hand grenades – but the baseball federation canceled the trip without giving a reason.

The players haven't given up hope, however.

There's talk of the team competing soon in Qatar and Malaysia.

"I wish we could've worn the new uniforms in Afghanistan, but we'll just have to keep them home until we get an invitation for a new championship," Madlool said.

Members of the Iraqi national baseball team study the rules of the game. The team was recently given its first uniforms by a Seattle company.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 2009

"FREEDOM OF SPEECH IS OF NO USE TO A MAN WHO HAS NOTHING TO SAY ..." - FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A black mark for all

Nick Milano

If you have visited the center of Amherst in the last couple of weeks, you might have noticed a large cardboard sign outside the front of the American Legion on Amity Street. It reads, "Thank you for stealing our flags, from the veterans at American Legion Post 148."

Just four days before the eighth anniversary of the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, someone stole two flags off the Legion's flagpole. Three Busch Light cans were found on the ground near the flags, pretty much ample evidence that some students must be guilty of pulling the prank. Like stealing an American flag and a POW-MIA flag is ever a joke.

The manager of the post, a Navy vet, said that he was surprised to come to work and find the flags missing from the pole. This has not been the first time; he said that the same thing happened about eight years ago. This time the post is getting a brand new pole and flags.

There are two initial reactions that one has when learning of such a shocking incident. Some people might come to the conclusion that it was just some drunken college kids who made a silly decision. They might say we should move on and forget it - that is what happens when you live in a college town.

Or you can decide to say that this incident can be traced back to the fact that there is a disconnect between those who serve in the military and those who are sheltered from it. They say that the sacrifices of the tiny percentage who serve are either ignored or go unknown by the too many of Americans, particularly college kids.

Obviously, there must be a little of both at play. In a nation where everyone carries a bit of the burden or at least is made aware of the substantial burden that just a few are carrying, such incidents would not happen. The way to celebrate the return of the college school year would not be to steal two cherished flags from the American Legion.

The theft of the flags is not just a bad deal for the American Legion, but for all students in Amherst.

Remember, this is an organization with over three million members and whose website has several pages dedicated to the flag. As the manager said, the veterans were upset by it and it was a slap in the face.

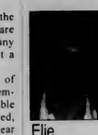
The theft of the flags is not just a bad deal for the American Legion, but for all students in Amherst.

If such disrespectful decisions are made by students so early in the year, you have to wonder what is going to happen in the months to come. It is these kinds of actions that belittle the contributions made by students.

Do you think those at the American Legion are going to remember students who go on to serve their country in a variety of ways from the military to public service? Do you think people in Amherst are going to remember the students who came to pitch in at non-profits in the area? Do you think they are going to remember the many students who worked to elect a new president last year?

Most likely, the residents of this area are going to remember, fairly or not, the despicable actions of the few who decided, on one drunken night, to tear down the most treasured symbol this country has – the one piece of fabric likely recognized by everyone around the world.

Such actions speak to a variety of truths. Too many of us are separated from those who put their lives on the line, day after day and year after year.



Alcohol leads people to make stupid decisions, but it can never be used as a crutch to explain a mistake. Students in the Five Colleges bring much to the table. We boost the local economy, we contribute to the betterment of Amherst and its surrounding communities and we have helped Amherst become the top ranked college town in the country.

Such positives can be wiped out by a single dark mark, like what happened the night of Sept. 6. Perhaps it is best to carry oneself as my high school headmaster once advised: People know you go to this high school, don't do stupid things that will reflect badly upon us. The same can be applied to students in the area. You're likely to be regarded as a typical college kid – don't act like it.

As for the American Legion, the same thing happened a few years ago: flags were stolen, but were eventually returned, thankfully due to someone's guilt. Maybe the same thing will happen again.

Nick Milano is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at nmilano@student.umass.edu

It's hard being fresh

Elie Feinstein

As a Resident Assistant, it is in my nature to be somewhat of a psychologist. I can't help it. It's just who I am.

With the advent of first-year/mixed-year housing, I am reminded of my experience in the English Talent Advanced Program (TAP). The glory days: the days when everyone was as clueless and insecure as you, the days when cliques formed faster than planets in a big-bang flipbook. I am reminded of many things, but most of all I am reminded of what happens when you put a bunch of freshmen together – by themselves.

But we're not talking about hallways. We're talking about halls, about towers. And as much as there is the increased risk of rioting, and of the brand-new renovations having to be re-renovated, the biggest problem with this new housing arrangement is that it diminishes the first-year living experience.

If freshmen are living with each other and taking classes with each other, then when do they have the opportunity to interact with upperclassmen? When do they have the opportunity to talk to people who know the layout of the campus, who aren't checking their online profiles religiously, who have actually gotten through a semester and turned the "freshman 15" into muscle? They don't.

Wait. I lied. If they weren't dropped too many times when they were little, they might notice the four seniors carrying 30-racks on their shoulders. And if they can muster up enough courage before the screen door slams shut, then maybe, just maybe, they could stick it to the man.

But honestly, are we to believe that first-year housing will deter underage drinking? I'd personally like to give freshmen some credit. They are people after all.

Let me be clear, I'm not here to condone drinking. However, if 18-year-olds can no longer figure out how to get their hands on a handle of vodka, we're most certainly going to be in another recession when they're running our country.

In the end it's up to you. Do you want to be an individual or do you want your face to be obscured, effaced, and forgotten?

And yes, they will be running our country, as will the rest of us. This will probably sound cliché, but we don't have the option of being leaders – we already are.

Sometimes you simply have to turn around to see who's following you. But if you're a freshman living in a first-year hall and everyone's following someone else, you'll forget that you're an individual and you'll mistake college for an expensive version of high school.

Unfortunately, Residential Life (Res Life) has forgotten that it is not here to educate us but to foster an environment conducive to education. The new CORE class has shifted our growth as leaders from the dormitory into the classroom.

Rather than actually enable our maturation in residence halls by surrounding us with a mélange of perspectives and experiences, Res Life has departmentalized the student body. And rather than actually allowing freshmen the opportunity to develop into true individuals, the department has made personal growth something distant and ethereal.

So, in the end it's up to you. Do you want to be an individual or do you want your face to be obscured, effaced, and forgotten?

You don't have to walk in droves. You don't have to drink the beer your friend hands you or go to the dining commons when you're not hungry. You don't even have to pretend that you know who you are if you don't. Eventually the sun is going to set and when you take your shades off we'll all know what's in your eyes.

But if you're brave enough to be honest with yourself and you realize that home isn't on the map – it's inside you – then you'll find your time here so much more rewarding.

This is a great university, and there's never been a better time to be a freshman, despite the housing debacle. Southwest is looking less and less like it was made in communist Russia. The Recreation Center is scheduled to open later this month. And the administration's consistent message of perseverance and excellence is empowering.

So milk these four years for what they're worth, and don't wait for anyone to teach you anything. You're going to learn a lot on your own.

Welcome to UMass Amherst.

Elie Feinstein is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at efeinste@student.umass.edu

Despite faults, Palin still has potential for presidency

"Sarah Palin has lowered public discourse with her linguistic (to say nothing of moral) incoherence." - lit prof.

This comment, left on a NYTimes.com blog, seems a little harsh on Palin.

Chris Russell

She may not be able to explain policy or even construct complex sentences, but that doesn't mean she is "linguistically incoherent." Maybe she just gets nervous speaking in public. I know I do.

I also know I would be pissed if some holier-than-thou literature professor called me linguistically incoherent, which makes me relate to Palin, even if I don't agree with her politics.

Palin relates to others as well, as 45 percent of people surveyed in a June 2009 Pew Research poll had a favorable opinion of her, including 48 percent of people without a college education and 70 percent of Republicans. This makes lit professor seem out of touch with mainstream America, perhaps unaware that most people don't speak like a lit professor.

Palin has started to exploit this popularity, her biggest – and only – strength, as her Political Action Committee raised over $700,000 in the first half of 2009. This isn't that impressive (Mitt Romney raised twice as much over the same time), but 60 percent of Palin's donations were under $200, according to the political analysis website FiveThirtyEight.com.

For perspective, only nine percent of contributions to Romney's 2008 campaign were under $200, indicating that Palin has a significant amount of grassroots support, essential to be a viable candidate for any political office.

Grassroots support is important, but money is the largest factor in politics, as exemplified by Barack Obama he outspent John McCain by $397 million, which helped him win 53 percent of the vote to McCain's 46 percent. Today, what politicians say isn't as important as how many times people hear them say it.

If Palin combined her popularity with enough money, she could be a viable presidential candidate, which is scary considering she based her foreign policy experience on being close to Russia, and recently claimed heath care reform would create death panels to euthanize the elderly.

With enough money, Palin could construct any storyline, including that she represents working class Americans, even though she made triple figures as governor

Pandering to ignorance and misconceptions could again be successful for Palin like it was in the 2008 campaign, as many people believed her when she claimed Obama was a socialist who threatened their savings, job and cultural heritage. Credit Obama, he took the high road and refrained from calling Palin a fascist, which would have been justified under the circumstances.

With enough money, Palin could construct any storyline, including that she represents working class Americans, even though she made triple figures as governor, or that she is a fiscal conservative who vociferously opposes wasting any money, even though she was an early supporter of "the bridge to nowhere."

Even if Palin is able to raise massive amount of funds, Derek Khanna, President of the University of Massachusetts Republican Club, noted that money doesn't necessarily result in electoral success.

"For someone who has already defined themselves in a negative light to a large segment of the population, its hard to change that even with a lot of money," he said, and offered former Senator Edward Kennedy as an example. Kennedy was widely considered to be a prime presidential candidate until he drove his car off a bridge on Chappaquiddick Island, near Martha's Vineyard, causing his passenger, one of his brother Robert's campaign staff, to drown.

Khanna believes Palin did comparable damage to her political ambitions during last year's campaign.

"I think to a lot of independents she exacerbates the negative stereotypes often associated with Republicans, manifested most prominently by the Bush administration," Khanna said.

Palin's future is currently impossible to predict. She is probably the most popular politician after Obama and has clear fundraising potential, but she may be too divisive to succeed on the national stage.

The same poll that said 45 percent of respondents viewed her favorably also reported that 44 percent had an unfavorable impression of the former Governor. Only time will tell whether Palin will resemble Richard Nixon, who famously claimed his political career was over after losing the 1962 California gubernatorial race only to be elected President in 1968, or Kennedy, who was doomed to leave his political ambitions unrealized.

Chris Russell is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at crussell@student.umass.edu

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

AMHERST SECOND TO LOWELL?

Dear Editor,

Is UMass Amherst second to UMass Lowell? Amherst is the flagship university, a place I'm proud to have graduated from way back in '86. Lowell is a fine school, with a decent engineering program, but is it better than Amherst? Professor John W. Walkinshaw seems to think so.

At issue is a young man who, 13 years ago, escaped from post-revolutionary Iran with his mother and two young sisters. Knowing no English and having no skills, the family landed in New Hampshire and began the long process of first surviving in, and later adopting, their new country.

Today, Shahin Khyamian is a United States citizen, a member of the Army National Guard, and (nearly) a graduate of UMass Lowell with a degree in chemical engineering. He also was scheduled to begin a new job as a civilian nuclear engineer with the U.S. Navy later in July.

Why "nearly" a graduate? Well, that's where Professor John W. Walkinshaw appears in the story. At the Lowell campus, undergraduate chemistry engineers must complete a group project (like a senior project, if you will) in order to graduate. No one fails this course. Students who perform below the B level are allowed to spend extra time on the project, perform additional work, etc. until their grade rises to the 'appropriate' level. Professor John W. Walkinshaw teaches this course.

Now, Shahin found himself in the position where he did not have all the prerequisites satisfied by the spring of his senior year, and Walkinshaw denied him admission to the class. He later petitioned the department to allow him to take the course in fall '08 at UMass Amherst, knowing that, in January '08, he entered basic training and could not stand to wait out the extra time necessary to satisfy his graduation requirement. In the mean time, he applied for and was accepted into a position with the Navy's civilian engineering corps beginning this July. The stipulation was that he must receive his college degree. Lowell agreed to let Shahin transfer the credits from Amherst. This is where things get interesting.

The project, as previously stated, is a group project. All members of the group receive the same grade, regardless of individual performance. Shahin's team received a "C."

According to the professor at Amherst, there were no plus/minus grades awarded. A "C" is a passing grade, and acceptable by Lowell for transfer of credit. However, Professor John W. Walkinshaw unilaterally decided, after Shahin received permission to attend Amherst, that he would accept nothing less than a C+, regardless of what the two universities' policies are. So, now, Shahin is in limbo trying to scramble to reach some accord in time to save his job. Time is running out.

Is a "C" from Amherst inferior to a "C" from Lowell? Should a single professor be entitled to overrule university policy and deny a student's transfer credits? Should a professor be entitled to change an agreement between a student and the department after the agreement is made?

For Shahin it may be too late. Letters from his professor at Amherst, his advisor at Lowell, and from Lowell's student grievance officer have so far failed to show John W. Walkinshaw the error of his ways. I don't know what you think about all this. I think it's a shame. But more than that, I feel quite strongly that Amherst is in no way inferior to Lowell in any program of study, which to me seems to be the opinion of John W. Walkinshaw: Lowell trumps Amherst.

Fletch Wason

HEALTHCARE HELL

Dear Editor,

With The Health Care bill before Congress, are we in a battle of words between two parts of humanity, some who want to follow Abel in his love of God and care for fellowman, and in contrast, some, following Cain who succumb to evil desires rejecting God's laws?

When Constitutional lawyers study this bill, why do they find unexplained additions that give greater power to the Executive branch? Such a transfer of power nullifies the Constitution's most prominent provision of balance of government, and many of the peoples' rights.But why do we have such a fast drive to destroy the U.S. Constitution?

We must keep in mind that the American colonists following Abel's philosophy inserted into our Constitution the power of Congress to create the money for the nation. If put into practice, this would stop all government borrowing and clear all debts with 100 percent legal money. The bankers could borrow this Treasury money to reloan if needed, and pay interest on it. There would be no private fiat money.

We must get Congress to rewrite the Health Care bill in accord with God's Laws and Abel lawyers.

Al Schmitz

Letters to the editor should be no longer than 550 words and can be sent to editorial@dailycollegian.com or submitted online at dailycollegian.com. We regret that, due to space constraints, not all letters will be printed.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 2009 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Self-proclaimed college dropout Kanye West stirred up controversy with his negative remarks towards Taylor Swift, who made history as the first country-pop singer to collect an award for Best Female Video at MTV's long-running Video Music Awards (VMAs). West later apologized to Swift, but his actions underscore the growing "anything-goes" approach of the show.

The darker side of the 'Moon' Man: An inside glimpse at this year's VMAs

BY LEE TAYLOR

L.L. Cool J put it best back in 1991 when he said - "Momma said knock you out!" Those were simpler times, back when rock still kicked it on the charts and country and hip-hop were still up and coming in the mainstream world of MTV. If you didn't own Metallica's "Black Album," your own mother may have actually knocked you out. Flash forward to the new millennium and this year's Video Music Awards and things look a lot different.

Everything looked different from my angle, a University of Massachusetts senior and music fanatic standing beside nationwide media to represent our school instead of viewing it from a basement television in Massachusetts. Approximately five minutes after signing in and receiving my press credentials is when the line between fan and insider blurred. Members of Death Cab for Cutie briskly passed me by as I was watching the crew members set up the red carpet on the corner of West 51st Street and 6th Avenue, keeping on the move to evade the several young fans who noticed my pass and asked if I could get them in to the show.

The first moment that clicked everything into the weird orbit of red carpet arrivals began when veteran VJ Mark Goodman walked the carpet, leaving me to wonder, "Who is that guy?"

Having access - as I did - to only the arrivals portion of the strange parade that is the VMAs is like setting up a circus with an all-boozed crew. You know something bad is going to happen, or at least something very strange.

The hierarchy of the guest list in New York City on Sunday night was that of a royal dinner. Everyone is there but you have to put in extreme effort to make contact beyond the B- and C-list celebrities.

Some of the biggest stars of the night seemed to cause a stir not for their work, but for their seniority in the business. Jake, for instance, the chorus of teen screams and self-made journalists shouting for a comment from the likes of Sean "Puffy" Combs, who, although he has not released an album in several years, received the royal treatment on the red carpet. His name is his business.

Jackson family patriarch Joe Jackson arrived with some of his late son Michael's siblings for an off-setting tribute to the recently deceased King of Pop. Madonna almost wrapped with the line, "Michael Jackson is a human being." How touching.

One of the night's brighter notes came thanks to "Late Night" newbie Jimmy Fallon, who graciously chatted with as many people as possible on his way down the red carpet. Fallon, who performed in Northampton in April, told me how he "flipped out because they were DJing 45s" at the Basement, where he was spotted getting down with the locals. With his love of 45rpm records, Fallon represents old-school America. He also knows how to party with grace.

With fifteen minutes until show time, self-proclaimed college dropout Kanye West and his posse arrived with a Hennessy bottle in hand. Media people thought it was funny, passing chuckles at the expense of the self-parodying partier. How can you top that besides robbing a teenage girl of her first Moon Man?

It's a sign of the times - the past, present and the future that is. The past suggests that drinking may bring out your worst. From late Senator Ted Kennedy's incident at Chappaquiddick to Mel Gibson's twisted, anti-semitic tirade, the lessons are clear. In the present, a country-pop singer, Taylor Swift, wins Best Female Video for the first time. Kanye should have sat back and accepted the fact that we live in an evolving world of pop culture. If he was truly ashamed to see Beyoncé lose to a teenaged white girl from Middle America, then the idea of this award show has lost all of its relevance in its effort to commend what the masses recognize as talent.

Kanye West has made three public apologies since Sunday, so, touching on the incident may be nearing obscurity by the time this article goes to print. But, the anything-goes attitude of the Video Music Awards may already be something of the past. There is speculation that drinking may be banned from the award show in the future. If anything should get the boot, it should be Kanye himself, or at least celebrity blogger Perez Hilton. Lose one or the other and you can count on the VMAs gaining almost as much credibility as the Grammy Awards.

Lee Taylor can be reached at ltaylor@student.umass.edu

Author/LGBT activist ready to rattle cages

BY CHRISTIANA MCDOUGAL

Self-proclaimed Marxist and Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgendered (LGBT) civil rights activist Sherry Wolf will be speaking at Bowker Auditorium tonight, to discuss her latest book, "Sexuality and Socialism: The Struggle for LGBT Liberation." In the past, her work has focused primarily on the oppression of lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered people, as well as on theories on how to stop such oppression.

A strong advocate of LGBT rights for many years, Wolf is a member of the International Socialist Organization and is an associate editor for the International Socialist Review. "Sexuality and Socialism: the Struggle for LGBT Liberation" is an all encompassing assessment of this injustice in society.

According to Wolf, she became a socialist after a variety of experiences exposing societal injustice left her asking, "Why? Why is our society organized this way?"

Wolf has sought not only to understand why and how American society is arranged in the way that it is, but to change it for the better. Her goal is to achieve total equality for members of the LGBT community through social action and coordination.

Wolf stresses the need for a grassroots organization to take charge and demand LGBT rights across the country without any exceptions. "We [the LGBT community and its supporters] no longer find it sustainable that we don't have civil rights. It's outrageous and we have to stop fighting...state by state for this little issue and that little issue. It's not just small tweaks," she said.

Wolf will also be promoting the National Equality March, which will be held in Washington D.C. on October 11. "That's what the [Oct. 11] March for Equality is all about. We want full civil rights and we want them now."

During a time when socialism seems to be the last thing most people want to accept as a possible political system for this country, Wolf embraces it.

"You look at the absurd wealth of a tiny minority and the vast hunger and environmental and social construction as a result of that and you have to say there is something profoundly wrong with that," said Wolf.

She explained that the nuclear family is both "an incubator of gender norms" and a social construct that Wolf claims became common during the Industrial Revolution (alongside the evolution of capitalism in the United States). This helped set the traditional tones for roles for members of the family, with the father's role becoming that of the breadwinner and wage-earner.

The mother, in turn, became the homemaker and sole caregiver of the children, who would go on to work and attend school, all the while replicating such rigid family dynamics with their own progeny.

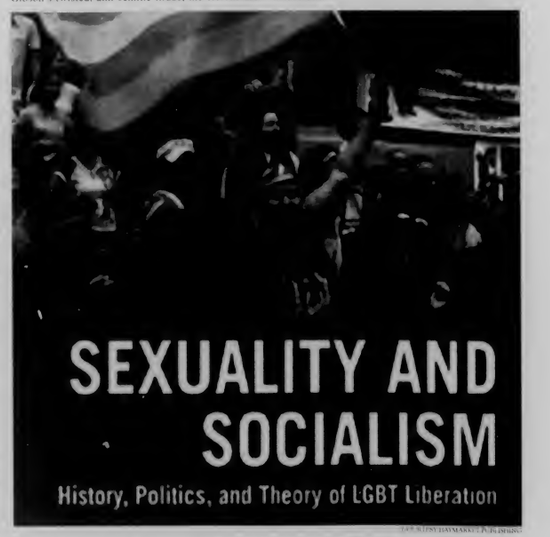
This precedent accounts for the cautious perception of a modern family made up, for example, of a homosexual couple and their children. It is seen as not having a place in the realm of the nuclear family.

Wolf emphasizes the idea that sexual orientation is nothing but a social construct and that to try and fit each and every person's sexual preferences into defined and suffocating categories doesn't make any sense when taking into account the broad and varying inclinations of all people.

"A family does not have to look a certain way or act in a certain way family is a modern inclination in its current form," said Wolf.

The belief that it is right for men to be attracted only to women and women only to men is precisely the ideology that Wolf hopes to do away with. In its place, she hopes with "Sexuality and Socialism" to champion the idea that a family can be constructed of whatever its member choose.

Wolf argues that the idea of family is not - and should not - be confined to a set system, but rather one that can change with the ebb and flow of both society and the specific makeup of each family unit.



Perhaps one of the most integral points that her book touches on is that, "What humans have constructed they can tear down." This statement can only reassure those who wish to break stigmas about sexuality within American society and to reevaluate the way in which it functions.

Wolf's commitment and fervor to the cause of LGBT equality shines through in each and every article she has written, which have been featured in MR/zine and Counterpunch magazine.

Her reformist's fervor highlights much of what she does, lending a sense of purpose and passion to each of her endeavors. This is a perfect recipe for a moving discussion that Wolf hopes will challenge and influence the public's thoughts on a subject that has the capacity to evolve into one of the main points of interest for our generation.

The Northampton branch of the ISO will be gathering a group of people planning on attending the National Equality March on October 11th. For $60, attendees can arrive via buses leaving from Amherst and Northampton. More information on the local mobilization can be found at www.equalitywmass.blogspot.com.

Christiana McDougal can be reached at cmcdouga@student.umass.edu

COURTESY HAYMARKET BOOKS

Staunch LGBT activist Sherry Wolf will read from her latest book,"Sexuality and Socialism: The Struggle for LGBT Liberation," tonight at Bowker Auditorium at 7:30 p.m.

Putting 'crafty' spins on Do-It-Yourself styles

BY ELLIE RULON-MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Tatiana Escobar may be the most fascinating person I have met so far this semester.

The first time we met, I was in my friend's room when she came in wearing her pajamas, accessorized with an utterly fabulous feathered headband. She said that she made it, and immediately I was overwhelmed with curiosity: what else can this girl do? I immediately asked her if she would like to be interviewed and possibly featured in the first article of my column.

Our interview a few days after this first encounter flowed more like a conversation than anything else. I went to her room, the walls of which were plastered with pages from fashion magazines. She showed me a few other things she had made - the headband, along with another, and a beautiful ring made of supplies from the craft center. I asked about her past as a crafter.

"I've always liked doing crafty things. I started doing crafts with the intention to use [them]... in college," said Escobar. This was about two and a half years ago.

Aside from making accessories, Escobar refashions vintage clothes into current trends or anything else that fits her personal style. She is what has recently been referred to as a "recessionista," or the economically smart version of a "fashionista." She is hyperaware of both current trends and what will be popular in six months, and is capable of achieving the same level of chic on a much smaller budget.

Escobar watches runway shows every season. They show what will be in style several months from when the shows happen; she takes that time to peruse Salvation Army and other vintage shops for things that resemble what she saw in the shows, and alter them as needed to make them chic and more wearable. She is justifiably proud of the fact that her creations are eco-friendly.

She even dabbles in concocting her own makeup, buying cheap supplies and combining the colors she chooses to create a personalized look for a fraction of the cost of department store makeup.

While we're talking, she doesn't hesitate to drop names of high-fashion designers. Her collaboration of high-fashion trends with the do-it-yourself aesthetic in her own style makes for some impressive creations. She's knowledgeable of new and old high-fashion runway collections, as well as street style.

She reveals that she is also well-travelled. A Japanese major, Escobar has made the trek to Japan twice and has seen the street style that the country is so notoriously known for. Japan has "the most ridiculous yet amazing fashion," she said.

This is because the Japanese people, in school and at work, are in uniforms which do not allow for very much individual style.

When they're not in school or working, they go all out, she says, wearing elaborate outfits and costumes, most of which are nowhere near cheap.

Escobar draws further inspiration from DIY websites and blogs. There are several which she has bookmarked that she frequents. Some offer tutorials and others supply patterns for making clothes.

Making headbands like hers are easy. All you need is a hot glue gun (or a similar, strong adhesive), headband of your choice, preferably one that is at least half an inch wide, a small swatch of felt and a couple of feathers. First, cut your felt into an oval just big enough to support the feathers. You don't want it to be visible when you glue your feathers onto it, but for it to be just behind them. Next, carefully arrange the feathers on the felt in the way you want them and, carefully again, glue them onto the felt. For all practical purposes, it's best to use the kind of glue that will dry clearly. Once that dries, glue the felt with the feathers onto the headband. Escobar's were on the side and would land just above an ear when she put it on.

Tatiana Escobar isn't the only person I've met in the last two weeks who is into DIY fashions. In my dorm last year it was difficult to come by a person who shared the same passion as me; this year, in my dorm alone I have met at least half a dozen people who share the same passion for do-it-yourself living as me.

The mere fact that the thrifty life is getting more popular and more widely accepted is inspiration enough to, at the very least, consume less and create more.

If you're feeling super crafty, you can experiment with items other than feathers. Two of my personal favorite additions to almost any piece of clothing are the stud and the grommet.

They are prominent embellishments in my wardrobe, in my shoes and sweatshirts and bags. You can buy them at most craft stores. A great place to buy studs in bulk online is angryyoungandpoor.com.

Don't be afraid to step away from the norm in fall fashion this season and put your own personal touch, whatever it may be, into the things you wear.

It's easier than you could possibly imagine and a lot cheaper and more creative than buying the same clothes that all of your friends have.

Ellie Rulon-Miller can be reached at erulonmi@student.umass.edu

UMass student Tatiana Escobar's unique accessories can help serve as a guide for fashion novices, showing that every day objects like glue and felt can be used to create your own style.

Local cinema to host online journal's leap to the big screen

BY LISA LINSLEY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Amherst Cinema has a history of featuring innovative films, films that challenge contemporary morays and occasionally turn them on their sides. Tonight, Amherst Cinema will try its hand at a new form of innovation, playing host to "When You Think of It," a film that features people reading poems from many unexpected places.

"When You Think of It" will be presented by "Notnostrums," an online poetry journal. Twenty-three poets participated in the film, including Christian Hawkey, Lori Shine and James Tate. Tate, who won the Pulitzer Prize for his work, "Selected Poems," has been a professor at the University of Massachusetts since 1971.

The film is part of the Going Public Contemporary Lit Series, a project heralded by the UMass Juniper Initiative. The Juniper Initiative for Literary Arts and Action is a program for a hub of readings, summer writing workshops, forums and literary programming. In addition, the MFA Program for Poets and Writers, as well as the Fine Arts Center, is involved in the hosting of "When You Think of It."

In advertising, the film has made the most of its unusual and unique content, accentuating its singular purpose as a film about poetry. The film is not a "movie" in the traditional sense, or as its slogans brazenly suggest - "Not about the loneliness of the long distance runner." Viewers expecting a twist ending, akin to that of "The Crying Game," are better advised to leave their expectations at home. Those pining for the slapstick comedy of "Blazing Saddles," or for the poignancy of "All That Heaven Allows," are in for a rude awakening. Quite simply, the film is about people reading poems in various places. The appeal lies in the content of those poems.

Emily Pettit, Guy Pettit and Luke Bloomfield were on hand to help edit the film, which is the first that the group has produced.

According to Lisa Olestin, associate director for the MFA Program for Poets and Writers, as well as for the Juniper Initiative, "By definition a film provides a different context for poetry than usual." Olestin noted that the filmmakers had the poets come up with unusual places to read their work, including "the middle of a river to a tattoo parlor, to a front porch [and] a subway station."

"[The varying locations] bring poetry out into the world, into different settings, into daily life," said Olestin. "It allows the poems to bump up against interesting contexts and associations and it probably reveals some of our not very useful presumptions about what, where, and when poetry can occur. From what I've seen, the film is beautiful and startling and full of good humor."

"When You Think of It" is the first of three events in the Going Public Lit Series. On October 15, the series presents the Western Massachusetts launch of the statewide Massachusetts Poetry Festival. James Tate, along with Ellen Watson and James Haug, will participate in the festival at Amherst Cinema. In 2010, the series will also co-sponsor the 10th annual Juniper Literary Festival with readings, addresses, roundtables and a small press fair held in the Fine Arts Center and at the Amherst Cinema.

General admission to "When You Think of It" is $5. Tickets can be purchased at the Amherst Cinemas Box office.

Lisa Linsley can be reached at llinsley@student.umass.edu

COURTESY AMHERST CINEMA

Amherst Cinema will host "When You Think of It," a film based on an online poetry journal. Twenty-three poets, including UMass professor James Tate, participated in the project.

this is your store.

Jack Frye
7 jeans
Free People
Miss Me
Madden Girl
Sky Thru Soul
Vintage Havana
Report
Vera

Women's clothing, shoes and accessories downtown Amherst

MOVINGON?
Rent a Truck or Cargo Van
Starting at $19.95
Special Reduced Rates Monday to Thursday

POTTER'S
AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
- Round Trip Rentals to and from Boston, New York & New Jersey
- One Way Rentals
- Hand Trucks & Furniture Pads Available for Rent
- Boxes & Moving Accessories Available for Sale

The Economical Way To Move
549-RENT (7368)
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
www.pottersauto.com

Celebrate Community Heroes
Friday, September 18th
Join us in Amherst! 2-5pm
Meet UMass and Amherst police officers!
Mounted police, K-9 division, and bike patrol
Visit with Amherst firefighters!
Tour a fire truck, meet the crew and ask questions
Enjoy free refreshments!
While supplies last
GREENFIELD SAVINGS BANK
6 University Drive • Amherst • 413-549-3660 Member FDIC Member DIF

Harrington and Co. leading by example his two more interceptions including interceptions in each of his last three games, dating back to last season.

DEFENSE from page 8

"We just want to keep playing hard," Holmes said. "The CAA is tough so we just have to keep turning it up, and it all starts this week with Rhode Island."

With four senior defensive linemen, all with plenty of playing experience at UMass, the Minutemen have played more downs with four linemen. With the experienced group of Collier, Kyle Harrington, Michael Hanson and Anthony Monette up front, it has allowed the line to do more, and the rest of the defense to only have to worry about their jobs.

"I feel like we're the leaders of the defense, [and] just us four up front have a lot of playing experience," Collier said. "We're just trying to lead by example and on the field, we're just trying to be physical and get to the passer."

That physicality has paid off in the form of turnovers and has given the Minutemen plenty of lift with a near upset of Kansas State. On offense, the turnovers have turned into points on five of the eight takeaways. Three of those times, UMass converted the turnover into a touchdown, as the other two went for field goals.

Against Rhode Island (1-0), turnovers could play a large role. The Rams last played on Sept. 5 and came away with a 41-28 over Fordham. In the win, URI protected the ball, not giving it away once while grabbing four fumble recoveries and an interception.

For Morris, he's not sure if Collier's words are ringing in the ears of the Rams, or if the defense has sent a message to the rest of the conference, but he does hope his team makes a strong statement this weekend.

"Well I think every game you go out onto the field you send a message, good, bad or indifferent, you're out making some type of statement as to who you are as a football team," Morris said. "So if that is the way teams want to take how we're playing, [that's] fantastic."

Jeffrey R. Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com

Goalkeeper job still unclear

Curran-Hays, Piekos continue to split time in early season

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch thought he had his goalkeeper situation figured out.

After Zack Simmons graduated, the job would belong to Shane Curran-Hays, who spent the first part of his career on the bench.

The redshirt sophomore was sure to have his chance in 2009, but a knee injury during the summer opened up the battle to last year's third-stringer, Chris Piekos.

The junior transferred after one year at Rivier College and doesn't exactly have the soccer pedigree of most of his teammates. Piekos has no club soccer experience, and spent his off-seasons playing golf, baseball and lacrosse.

But what Piekos lacks in his soccer background, he makes up for in life experience.

Piekos, 25, spent time with the Marine Special Forces in Iraq prior to starting his collegiate career, and earned a Bronze star during his two deployments.

Since the competition opened up, his experience has helped him make an impression on Koch.

Curran-Hays, 20, grew up with soccer. His father, Michael, played at UNC-Greensboro, and his brother, Connor, is currently playing at Robert Morris.

In high school, Curran-Hays was a three-time all-conference selection and registered 14 shut-outs in 22 games during his senior year, while leading his club team to a national championship. He received several scholarship offers from other Division I schools, but ultimately decided to compete with Simmons for the goalkeeper job.

Curran-Hays would suit up most games, but only to help Simmons stay warm or to be available if he ever got injured.

Gaining the experience of being under the wing of one of the nation's best keepers has its benefits, however.

Curran-Hays is now more accustomed to being a part of the Minutemen's system in his third year, despite never starting a game. Curran-Hays has the experience of watching Simmons lead UMass to two NCAA Tournament bids, including a College Cup.

The differences between the two keepers are just one of many reasons why Koch has yet to make up his mind.

The cancelled scrimmage against No. 12 Connecticut took away a game that would have helped Koch's assessment. The Connecticut game would have likely given Curran-Hays one pre-season start, while Piekos started the first exhibition match against Adelphi.

Piekos played in the home-opener against No. 24 Boston University and Friday against New Hampshire, while Curran-Hays started in the Hartford and Vermont matches.

So far, Piekos has put up better statistics (one goal, .933 save percentage) compared to Curran-Hays (three goals, .769 save percentage), but the competition extends beyond the numbers.

Matthew R. Harris/Collegian

Redshirt junior Shane Curran-Hays warms up before a game last year. Curran-Hays has faced heavy competition from junior Chris Piekos.

"Shane [Curran-Hays] has paid his dues and sat behind Zack [Simmons] for a number of years so Shane [Curran-Hays] deserves to get games," Koch said. "But Piekos is proving that he also deserves to get games."

Koch praises Curran-Hays as a communicator because of his soccer experience and his close relationship with Simmons during his first two seasons. Curran-Hays also has a strong comfort level with the team, making it easier for him to control the defense.

Curran-Hays does a better job at coming out for crosses, which have limited opponents to 33 shots, compared to Piekos' 35 shots.

Piekos, on the other hand, is more of a shot-blocker, which partially explains his numbers.

Although both certainly have their strengths, Koch knows that he can't go all season rotating keepers. He plans to make a decision shortly after UMass plays Siena on Sept. 26, but he said even that date isn't definite.

"Both of them have done outstanding jobs," Koch said. "The goalkeeper situation is a great problem to have and they continue to battle."

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill@student.umass.edu.

UM head to Northeastern, returns home for exhibition

M.SOCCER from page 8

"We created some great chances against Vermont, and we're going to create more chances against Northeastern, and the goals are going to come," Koch said. "They might not come on Saturday, but they will come if we keep doing what we're doing."

Junior Ben Arikian along with senior Mark DeSantis will look to generate more offense against the Huskies on Saturday.

The Minutemen are 9-2-0 all-time against the Huskies, with their last meeting coming in 2007. UMass snapped a three-game losing streak with a 2-0 win, the team's first shutout of the season in the Minutemen's home opener of that year.

UMass will play another exhibition on Sunday against Winstars, their first home game since Sept. 1.

"We are much more comfortable at home," Koch said. "We would much rather play at home, but in conference, we have to play on the road."

Koch expects more from his young team, including finishing games in regulation and playing fundamental soccer in order to return to the College Cup.

"I'm not disappointed," Koch said, "but I'm not satisfied."

David Brinch can be reached at dbrinch@student.umass.edu.

Matthew R. Harris/Collegian

Junior midfielder Stuart Amick takes on an opponent last season. Amick and the rest of the Minutemen travel to Boston to take on Northeastern this Saturday.

Minutewomen still waiting for offense to show itself

W SOCCER from page 8

"They are very equal, and they each have their strengths and their weaknesses, so, we know that whoever we have in net, we know what to expect," Napoli said.

However, the Minutewomen's defensive efforts will go unnoticed unless its offense starts to produce. In a tie with New Hampshire, the Minutewomen tried to improve their offensive gameplan, raising their season-high in shots for the third consecutive game (23 attempts).

Forward Sydney Stoll seems poised to lead the Minutewomen after missing all of last season and part of 2007 with an injury. The redshirt junior leads the team in shots with eight and is tied for second with two shots on goal. If she returns to her pre-injury form (she notched six goals and three assists in 11 games in 2007), Stoll could prove to be just the offensive threat UMass needs.

"Every time we step out there it feels like we add another piece to the puzzle," Napoli said. "We all feel it is just a matter of time (before we score)."

Along with Stoll, the Minutewomen will also need Therese Smith, the team's second leading scorer from a year ago, to help guide the team out of its scoring slump. Smith has attempted seven shots thus far, two of which have been on goal.

The Minutewomen have several young athletes who could prove to be contributors down the stretch. Lauren Yelinek, a sophomore transfer from Texas Tech, proved in her freshman season that she can be a very effective passer by notching six assists in 13 games.

Freshmen Meredith Fox and Jess Howe have started all five games this season, with Fox attempting three shots and Howe contributing on defense.

Tonight's game is scheduled for 6 p.m. at the Yousuf Al-Marzook Athletic Field in West Hartford, CT.

Mike Mastone can be reached at mmastone@student.umass.edu.

Want to write for sports?
Contact Jeffrey R. Larnard at sports@dailycollegian.com

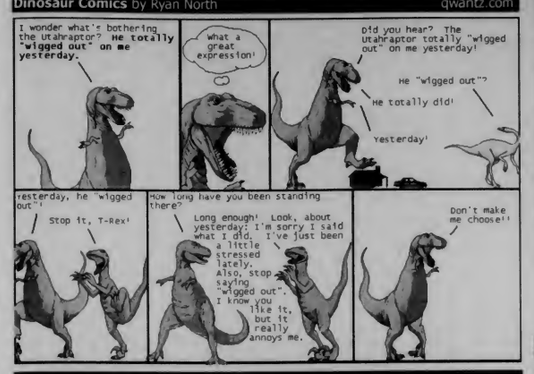
555 deal
Three Medium One-Topping Pizzas
$5.55 Each!
Domino's Pizza
413 - 256 - 8911
OPEN LATE NIGHT TILL 4 AM!



Attention: Students
Hospice Shop of the Fisher Home
has got a sale for you...
Come in anytime during September and October and show your student ID to buy one item and get a free item of equal or lesser value!
The place for gently worn name brand & vintage clothing, shoes & accessories as well as housewares, art and books.
55 University Drive, right next to the Hanger
Monday 10-7, Tuesday through Saturday 10-4
(413) 549-8800

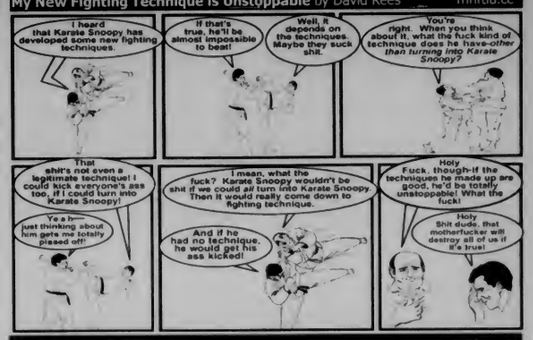
Four Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
BUY 6 BOTTLES OF WINE WITH YOUR REUSABLE FOUR SEASON WINE BAG AND RECEIVE 10% OFF
LIQUOR SPECIALS
ORONOCO RESERVA RUM 1.75 liter $59.99
TEQUILLA TIERRAS REPOSADO 750 ml $39.99
HENNESSY BLACK COGNAC 750 ml $38.99
GRAND MARNIER CORDON ROUGE 750 ml $34.99
TANQUERAY GIN 1.75 liter $34.99
BUSHMILLS BLACK BUSH 750 ml $34.99
GLENMORANGIE 10 YR 750 ml $34.99
CHOPIN POLISH VODKA 750 ml $32.99
HENNESSY COGNAC V.S. 750 ml $30.99
J&B SCOTCH 1.75 liter $29.99
CIROC SNAP FROST VODKA 750 ml $29.99
NUVO L'ESPRIT DE PARIS 750 ml $27.99
10 CANE RUM 750 ml $26.99
ABSINTHE ORDINAIRE 750 ml $24.99
V-ONE VODKA 750 ml $23.99
PALLINI LIMONCELLO 750 ml $23.99
PARROT BAY KEY LIME RUM 1.0 liter $20.99
MEYERS PLATINUM RUM 1.75 liter $19.99
PINNACLE VODKA 1.75 liter $19.99
KILO KAI SPICED RUM 750 ml $18.99
JAGERMEISTER 750 ml $18.99
SMIRNOFF RTS COCKTAILS 1.75 liter $18.99
JEREMIAH WEED RTS HALF & HALF 1.75 liter $18.99
CAPT. MORGAN RTS LONG ISLAND ICE TEA 1.75 liter $18.99
BORU IRISH VODKA 1.75 liter $17.99
FECKIN IRISH WHISKEY 750 ml $16.99
JEREMIAH WEED SWEET TEA VODKA* 750 ml $16.99
*Including Original Peach and Bourbon
SMIRNOFF TWIST PINEAPPLE FLAVORED VODKA 750 ml $13.99
SMIRNOFF TWIST PEAR FLAVORED VODKA 750 ml $12.99
BURNETT'S FLAVORED VODKA 750 ml $8.29
SALE 9/17 - 9/20
333 Russell St., Rte. 9, Hadley, MA
584-8174 • Mon.-Sat. 9AM-11PM • Sun. Noon-11PM

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!
Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

COMICS

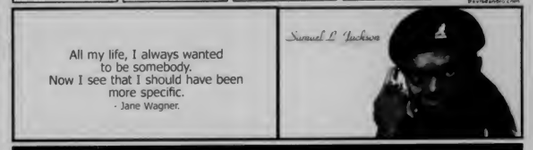
Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North — qwantz.com

Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub — chainsawsuit.com



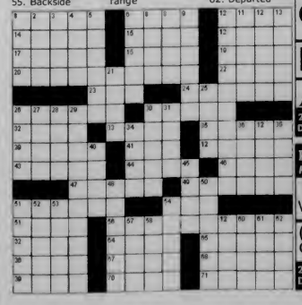
Wondermark by David Malki! — wondermark.com

Labrat by Richard Martelly



My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees — mnftiu.cc

Mr. Gnu by Travis Dandro — weepstrip.com



Hits Now 94.3 FM
The Valley's Hit Music Now in HD on 99.3 HD2
www.hits943.com

SUDOKU

			2		9		6
1			4		5
		7			4
	9	8		3			5
3			1
				9
		1			3	8	7
4			9		6			3
					7

CROSSWORD

ACROSS
1. Not tall
6. Broth
10. History
14. Cyphers
15. Sea eagle
16. Sword
17. Put up with something
18. Close
19. Gosh!
20. Humdrum
22. Therefore
23. Resort
24. Marine mollusk
26. Setting
30. Agile Old World viverrine
32. Biblical garden
33. Cold-shoulder
35. Betel palm
39. A writing tablet
41. Old age
42. Equestrian
43. Serf
44. As well
46. Anagram of "Sail"
47. Vigorously passionate
49. Soft
51. Even though
54. Donation
55. Backside
56. Mating closely related individuals
63. Indian music
64. Former vice-president Al
65. Cowboy sport
66. Roasting appliance
67. Protective ditch
68. Gather
69. Whip mark
70. ___ meridiem
71. Cheer up

DOWN
1. Con game
2. Vagabond
3. Chief Norse god
4. Start over
5. Spreads sleeping sickness
6. Ringworm bush
7. Chocolate cookie
8. A Central American sloth
9. A human being
10. Walker
11. Not together
12. Twilled fabric
13. Male singing range
21. Creative work
25. 365 days
26. Net
27. Doing nothing
28. Loyal
29. Narrow-minded
30. Wadi
31. Concludes
34. Warmth
36. Modify written material
37. A prisoner's room
38. Backside
40. Decorative case
45. Gawk at
48. A symbol of disgrace or infamy
50. Come forth
51. It's shot from a bow
52. Depart
53. Deli item
54. Mountain crest
57. Midday
58. A very troublesome child
59. A girl's toy
60. Bright thought
61. Tidy
62. Departed

T Shirts & Sweatshirts in 1-3 Days!
sunraise printing
Custom Printed Tees
Student Discounts
586-7133
sunraiseprinting.com
Hadley, MA 01035

amherst cinema
Fri Sep 18 - Thu Sep 24
TETRO 1:45 4:30 7:00 9:30 +11:15am Sat & Sun
Cold Souls 2:30 5:00 7:30 10:00 +12:00pm Sat & Sun
PONYO 2:00 4:15 7:15 +11:30am Sat & Sun
ADAM 9:15
28 Amity St. Downtown Amherst www.amherstcinema.org (413) 253-2547
PLEASANT STREET THEATER
Fri Sep 18 - Thu Sep 24
TAKING WOODSTOCK 5:00 7:30 10:00 +2:30 Sat & Sun +10:30am 2:30 Wed
(500) DAYS OF SUMMER 5:15 7:15 9:30 +2:00 Sat & Sun +10:00am 2:00 Wed
27 Pleasant St. Downtown Northampton www.pleasantstheater.org (413) 584-5848

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Wondering why some of your friends have put on weight? It's 'cuz all the cool kids are hibernating this year.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Early to bed, early to rise, makes a man sexy with rock-hard thighs.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You find pleasure in the harmony created by every-day objects.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Your professor told me he likes to get wedgied. Take advantage of that information.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
There'

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Lend me some sugar! I am your neighbor!

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Chronic has nothing to do with chronic glaucoma.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Arguments are ended quickly by peanut butter and jelly sandwiches.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Life's good when you snore like Darth Vader.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
It's sad when you go from Noopawtes to 27's and it's a step in the right direction.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Okay, Sagittarius, I'm really happy for you. And ima let you finish. But Pisces has the best horoscope OF ALL TIME.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Get your own damn fries.

MIKESMAZE DARWIN!
FOOD, FUN, SPUDZOOKAS!
Weekends & Holidays 10am-5pm thru Nov 1
S. Main Street Rt. 47 Sunderland
www.mikesmaze.com
413-665-8331

CLASSIFIEDS

CREDIT INTERNSHIP OPPORTUNITY
3 credit hour internship. Internet marketing and branding on bus line/ University Drive. Must be proficient with social networking sites. Call 413-549-4971 ask about internship opportunity.

EMPLOYMENT
Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162

EMPLOYMENT
Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

EMPLOYMENT
Calzone Transport Technician (Drivers) and Calzone Production Engineers (kitchen help) wanted. Apply at DP Dough, downtown Amherst

FOR RENT
Rt. 9 Hadley. 5 bedroom house. $2000/mo & utilities. 2 car garag. 1 & a qtr miles to campus. No beds. Large Lot. Music room. Skibiski Real Estate. 586-1827.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 2009 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen to host Rhode Island in conference opener

Defense to have hands full with QB Chris Paul-Etienne

Wide receiver Victor Cruz and quarterback Kyle Havens will need to generate offense early to outplay Chris Paul-Etienne and the Rams.

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Fresh off a convincing 44-7 win over Albany, the No. 17 Massachusetts football team takes on its first conference opponent, Rhode Island, this Friday.

The Minutemen, (1-1) have gotten off to a strong start with an impressive showing against Kansas State, along with its win against the Great Danes.

But in the first game against a Colonial Athletic Association opponent, UMass coach Kevin Morris and his team are forgetting their past performances and focusing on URI. The Rams (1-0) are coming off of a bye week following their 41-28 win in their season opener against Fordham.

"They had a really convincing win over a good Fordham team in their opener, and then they had two weeks to get ready for us. So we really have to be ready to go," Morris said during the weekly CAA conference call. "Every game has an angle, and the angle on this one is that it is the first league game against a very good team."

Looking to bounce back from a 3-9 record and a 49-0 loss to the Minutemen last year, the Rams feature an influx of talent in the form of four transfers from Rutgers. In the transfer class are tight end Tom Lang, wide receiver Robenson Alexis, defensive back Rob Cervini, and most importantly, the Rams' new starting quarterback, Chris Paul-Etienne.

Paul-Etienne, a junior, is a dual-threat quarterback who outshines all of the signal-callers the UMass defense has faced this season. Against Fordham, Paul-Etienne led the Rams in passing and rushing, putting up 245 yards of total offense (81 rushing and 164 passing), including three total touchdowns.

"He moves well in the pocket and can really deliver the ball in the air," Morris said of the Rams QB during the conference call. "As much of a running that threat he is, he can really throw the ball. We really have to give him a bunch of different looks."

For the Minutemen, things are looking up for the passing game. New starter Kyle Havens had a breakout performance in last week's game with 284 yards and two touchdowns through the air. Havens was also able to take advantage of a defense that focused on senior tailback Tony Nelson, who averaged only 3.7 yards per carry.

Although Havens has hooked up with 10 different receivers so far this season, he has selected All-Conference wideout Victor Cruz as the go-to weapon in the passing game. Cruz's 165 receiving yards through two games is good for second in the conference.

On the other side of the ball, the UMass defense has been firing on all cylinders, forcing seven turnovers while giving up just 28 points in two games, including no points given up in the second half.

Much of UMass' success on defense has to do with many new starters stepping into new roles and performing well, including former wideout Ke'Mon Bailey and linebacker Tyler Holmes. But with many new starters throughout the linebacking corps and secondary, the Minutemen have been leaning heavily on a defensive line that features four senior starters.

"The four of us have a lot of playing experience, Kyle [Harrington], and Mike Hanson, and myself," senior defensive tackle Brandon Collier said. "I've started for four years and they've started for three years, and [Anthony] Monette, he's a veteran, he's played a lot in four years here."

After being removed from the game against Albany, the status of senior wide receiver Jeremy Horne and redshirt junior John Ihne is still uncertain. According to Morris, both players are "probable" players in Saturday's game.

Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu.

Defense, turnovers keys for victory

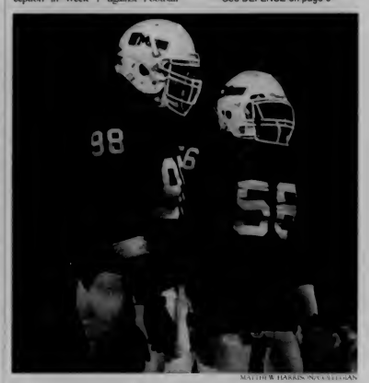
BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

If Albany's coach Bob Ford knew how many times his team would have turned the ball over prior to the Massachusetts football team's 44-7 route on Saturday, he may not have bothered bringing his team to Amherst.

"I talk to [my team] all the time about the statistics," Ford said after the loss. "If you turn the ball over one more time than your opponent, they win 67 percent of the time, two more times, they win 74 percent, and three more times, they win 91 percent."

According to Ford's calculations, The Minutemen (1-1) had a better chance of winning with their plus-four turnover ratio on the night – they had three interceptions and two fumble recoveries compared to the Great Danes' one interception.

Now, the game isn't played with percentages, but by those numbers the UMass defense feels pretty good about heading into the second game of a three-game home stand against Rhode Island this Saturday, the Minutemen's first Colonial Athletic Association game of the year.



Through two games, UMass has been a turnover machine. With two fumble recoveries and an interception in Week 1 against Football Bowl Subdivision Kansas State, the Minutemen have now forced eight turnovers compared to the three they have had previously – all interceptions.

"It's a big morale builder and it is their mission," UMass coach Kevin Morris said. "Their mission is to get the ball with relentless pursuit of the ball and we've been doing a great job of that the last two weeks."

Against Albany, UMass' defense set the tone on the Great Danes first play from scrimmage, when defensive tackle Brandon Collier got to Vinny Esposito, forcing a fumble and later recovering it. Collier would go on to warn the rest of the CAA after the game that the UMass defense was back. With the way they have played so far, it is hard to argue.

One player that has helped send that message is sophomore Tyler Holmes. Last season, as a true freshman, Holmes played in six games recording 23 tackles in his only start, the last game of the season. In that game, a 28-14 win against Hofstra, Holmes grabbed his first career interception. Now, with two more starts to his resume in 2009, Holmes has nearly as many tackles as in 2008 with 20 – best on the team and fourth best per game in the CAA. Holmes now

See DEFENSE on page 6

Brandon Collier (right) and Kyle Harrington (left) man the trenches for the Minutemen, who hope to stop the run on Saturday.

MATTHEW HARRIS/COLLEGIAN

UM still looks for win

BY MIKE MASTONE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team will travel to Hartford tonight in hopes of jump-starting their stagnant offense and giving Angela Napoli her first victory as head coach of the Minutewomen.

"I think our morale is still high" UMass coach Jessica Napoli said. "Every game we play better and better and get better opportunities."

The Hawks (3-3), coming off a 5-2 win over rival Central Connecticut, feature an offensive that can explode at the drop of a dime.

In wins over Iona and Central Connecticut, Hartford scored all nine of their goals in the second half.

The Hawks feature the talented quartet of redshirts, senior Laura Guigli, junior Mary Beth, sophomore Breanna Robinson and freshman Alex Uscilla. Uscilla has had a breakout rookie campaign, leading the Hawks with eight points on three goals and two assists, while Hamilton has already surpassed her totals form last season, scoring two goals and three assists.

Robinson, an America East All-Conference Second Team and All-Rookie Team selection last season, is arguably the best player remaining from last year's squad. In six games, she has chipped in one goal and two assists. Guigli is also off to a solid start in her final season, tallying six points on two goals and two assists.

Despite what their record may indicate, UMass (0-4-1) has been playing very well on the defensive end. The goalkeeping duo of senior Lauren Luckey and freshman Emily Cota has been stepped up during the team's offensive woes, combining for 36 saves while allowing just six goals on 14 attempts.

See W.SOCCER on page 6

Christine Adams (left), Lauren Yelinek (center), and Sydney Stoll (right) construct a wall in order to stop an opponent. While the defense has played well, the offense will need a spark in order to beat Hartford.

MATTHEW HARRIS/COLLEGIAN

UMass to start strong on offense, travel to face Huskies in Boston

Redshirt junior Shane Curran-Hays warms up before a game last year. Curran-Hays waited patiently for two years behind Zach Simmons, and still doesn't know if he will be the full-time starter.

MATTHEW HARRIS/COLLEGIAN

Look to DeSantis, Arikian to jump start stagnant offense

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The last time the Massachusetts men's soccer team started its season with three draws in its first four games was in 1983.

The 1983 Minutemen squad coached by Jeff Getler finished 3-12-4, one of the most disappointing seasons in program history.

UMass (0-1-3), along with men's soccer coach Sam Koch, hopes not to follow such history, attempting to get its first victory of 2009 when they take on Northeastern Saturday evening in Boston.

"A tie means you didn't win the game, it means you didn't lose the game, but you didn't win the game," UMass coach Sam Koch said.

"There's a time that we need to start winning games instead of tying games, and that starts, I think, this weekend."

The Minutemen played extra time in both contests of the Smith Barney Classic last weekend, tying Vermont Saturday, 1-1, after a scoreless tie with New Hampshire on Friday.

"Against UNH, the conditions were tough and again, I thought we had opportunities to win the game, missing the penalty kick, or having the penalty kick saved," Koch said.

Midway through the first half, sophomore forward Chris Roswess was fouled in the box and junior midfielder Matt Hess was unable to find the back of the net.

"You can spin it anyway you want, [but] bottom line, I thought the UNH game, we had opportunities to win, it was our game to take and we just didn't do it."

In a mostly defensive-minded contest, junior goalkeeper Chris Piekos made seven saves, while the Minutemen backfield faced 16 shots from the Wildcats, including eight in the first half.

It was more of the same on Saturday, but senior Mark DeSantis scored the lone goal for UMass against the Catamounts after UVM went ahead early in the first half.

Redshirt junior Shane Curran-Hays made five saves in the contest, as the Catamounts outshot the Minutemen 15-10.

"We wanted to win these games, but our objective is to get better, and I think definitely over the weekend we improved," Koch said. "We played on fields that were hard to play on, and we accomplished our goal pretty well, we just didn't get the result."

The Huskies are currently in the midst of a three-game losing streak after winning their first contest, an overtime 1-0 victory over Albany. In defeats against No. 10 Dartmouth, Providence and Holy Cross, NU has been outscored 3-2, while surrendering an average of 13.2 shots per game.

See M.SOCCER on page 6

the daily collegian

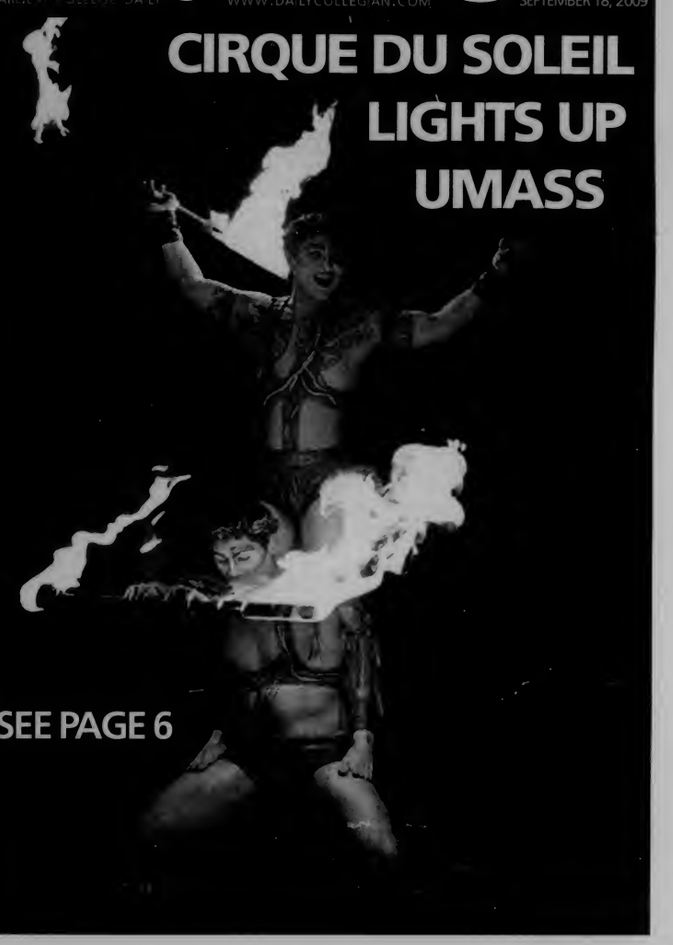
NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM SEPTEMBER 18, 2009

inside this issue:

SPORTS

SEE PAGE 12

ARTS&LIVING



SEE PAGE 9

NEWS

SEE PAGE 2

CIRQUE DU SOLEIL LIGHTS UP UMASS

SEE PAGE 6

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN

CXVIX
ISSUE 9

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief William McGuinness
Managing Editor S.P. Sullivan
Business Manager Daniel Jette
Production Manager Michael Sarkes
Night Supervisor Kirsten Swenson
Advertising Manager Michael Tortorici
Advertising Production Max Detmer
Arts & Living Editor Shayna Murphy
Comics Editor Annie Keithline
Editorial Editor Nick O'Malley
News Editor Nick Bush
Sports Editor Jeffrey R. Larnard
Web Editor Brian Wood
Photo Editor Matthew Harrison
IT Manager Victor Jacek
Asst. Business Manager Matt Zolneirz
Assistant Advertising Nicole Jacinto
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Distribution Manager Norman Provost
Classified Manager Katelyn Tamilio
Asst. Arts & Living Justin Gagnon
Asst. Arts & Living Elyse Horowitz
Asst. Arts & Living Cal Scannell
Assistant Comics Andrew Witts
Assistant Editorial Michael Phillis
Assistant Editorial Hannah Nelson
Assistant News Samuel Butterfield
Assistant News Alyssa Creamer
Assistant News Jenn Heshion
Assistant Sports David Brinch
Assistant Sports Mike Gillmeister
Assistant Sports Adam Miller
Assistant Photo Maxwell Sparr
Assistant Multimedia Sara Cody
Assistant Multimedia Chris Shores

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
ON STAFF TODAY

NIGHT EDITOR
S.P. SULLIVAN
COPY EDITOR
HANNAH MCGOLDRICK
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
MICHAEL SARKES

Bill sets out to aid students

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

In one of the greatest federal investments in higher education in American history, the United States House of Representatives voted 253 to 171 in favor of the Student Aid and Fiscal Responsibility Act (SAFRA) on Thursday.

The bill, which is yet to pass the Senate, would surpass both the Higher Education Act and the G.I. Bill in the amount of funding promised to students in the form of need-based aid.

The new piece of legislation aims to reform the student loan industry, whose business practices have been quite profitable over recent years, but have led to many young Americans becoming increasingly weighed down by debt before even joining the workforce. SAFRA will eliminate all federal subsidies to private banks, and will then redirects the nearly one hundred billion dollars in savings towards need-based programs to aid students directly.

"I'm ecstatic," said UMass senior Jelisa Difo, who travelled to Washington D.C. this week to support the legislation with a number of other students and alumni. "I'm very happy it went through the House so quickly."

Difo, a member of the United States Student Association (USSA), spoke at a press conference Monday with House leaders George Miller and Nancy Pelosi, as well as U.S. Secretary of Education Arne Duncan.

"This won't affect me, or any of us that are seniors, but it will simplify the FAFSA process and allow students to get more financial aid through Pell grants rather than private loans," said Difo. "It's something students should be aware of."

"On behalf of the USSA's 4.5 million student members at over 400 campuses, we thank Members of the House of Representatives for their diligent work on passing SAFRA," said USSA President Gregory Cendana in a statement yesterday. "Students today are taking on insurmountable amounts of debt to pay for college, essentially mortgaging their futures with convoluted loan plans from private banks. SAFRA will reform this broken system by increasing federal, need-based aid that will help bring President Obama's goal to lead the world in college graduations to fruition."

It remains to be seen if President Barack Obama will get an opportunity to sign into law the significant changes to financial aid that the U.S. House has suggested, the Senate will be voting on its own version of the reform bill in late September.

Nick Bush can be reached at nbush@student.umass.edu.

S.P. Sullivan contributed to this report.

UM professor tops Forbes annual power list as the most powerful woman in the nation

By Matthew M. Robare
Collegian Staff

The most powerful woman in America, according to Forbes Magazine, is a Professor at the University of Massachusetts's Isenberg School of Management.

Sheila Bair is the chairwoman of FDIC.

Sheila Bair, Chairwoman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, was Professor of Regulatory Policy at UMass before going on leave after she was appointed in 2006 by President George W. Bush to her current office.

The annual Forbes list was assembled by combining the number of press mentions with the size of the organization or nation the candidate heads.

"I think they're trying to sell magazines," said Professor Thomas O'Brien, Dean of the Isenberg School of Management from 1987 to 2006. "I don't think the power of the FDIC is as great as they describe."

Due to the economic crisis, Bair, and the FDIC, have achieved greater prominence than usual. She has sought greater powers from Congress to deal with the economic crisis more efficiently. These actions have brought her into direct conflict with Treasury Secretary Timothy Geitner and Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke.

The FDIC insures consumer deposits and regulates state-chartered banks which are not part of the Federal Reserve System. As of September 12, 2009, 116 banks have failed under Bair's tenure, according the the insurance corporation's official website. Nevertheless, she has great confidence in the American banking system.

In a press release from the Quarterly Banking Profile Press Conference dated August 27, Blair said, "Your insured deposits are safe. And again, no insured depositor has ever lost a penny of insured deposits — and no one ever will."

However, during the Savings & Loan crisis of the 1980's, the Federal Savings & Loan Insurance Corporation became extremely insolvent and thus had to be abolished. The remaining insured deposits were paid by Congress, which appropriated $154 billion.

Also on the Forbes list was German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who was named the most powerful woman in the world for the fourth consecutive year. On the international list, Bair ranked second.

"I'm looking forward to her returning one day," O'Brien added. "She's a terrific lady."

Matthew M. Robare can be reached at mrobare@student.umass.edu

Iraqi journalist is free after Bush insult

By Hannah Allam
McClatchy Newspapers

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The Iraqi journalist who threw his shoes at then-President George W. Bush last year was freed from prison Tuesday, expressing no remorse for hurling what he called a "flower to the occupier."

Muntathar al Zaidi received a hero's welcome at the offices of his employer, al Baghdadiya television station, where his colleagues slaughtered sheep and danced in celebration of his release. Originally a three-year term for assaulting a head of state, Zaidi's sentence was reduced and he was released early because he had no criminal record.

Sporting a dark suit and a scarf printed with the Iraqi flag, a paler and thinner Zaidi told a news conference that Iraqi guards tortured him with whippings and electric shocks during his nine-month detention. He was missing at least one front tooth.

The focus of Zaidi's speech Tuesday wasn't his own ordeal, however, but the death and destruction that Iraqis have experienced since the U.S.-led invasion of 2003.

"After six years of humiliation, of indignity, of killing and violations of sanctity and desecrations of houses of worship, the killer comes, boasting and bragging about victory and democracy. He came to say goodbye to his victims and wanted flowers in response," Zaidi said. "Put simply, that was my flower to the occupier, and to all those who are in league with him."

Zaidi said the years of witnessing war's brutalities as a journalist built up inside him and exploded last Dec. 14, when Bush gave a farewell news conference alongside Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki in Baghdad. Zaidi interrupted Bush's remarks by throwing his shoes at the president, shouting the words that earned him admiration and notoriety around the globe: "This is a farewell kiss, you dog. This is from the widows, the orphans and those who were killed in Iraq."

Bush ducked the flying shoes, and the episode quickly went viral via YouTube, spawning online shoe-throwing games, parodies, folk songs and poetry. A wealthy Saudi reportedly offered millions for the shoes, Arab women have written love letters to Zaidi and a statue of a giant shoe was erected in Saddam Hussein's hometown before the Iraqi government ordered it removed.

Harvard incites outrage after news ad denies Holocaust

The Crimson has received backlash from the Jewish community due to ad

By Michelle Williams
Collegian Staff

On September 8, the community of Harvard University opened their newspaper with a unanimous sense of horror. Within The Crimson, Harvard's daily newspaper, was an advertisement for the Committee for the Open Debate on the Holocaust, a group that questions the existence of the Holocaust.

In said advertisement, faculty and students are asked, "can you provide, with proof, the name of one person killed in a gas chamber at Auschwitz?"

After the ad appeared, The Crimson received emails from community members, students and a petition signed by numerous editors of The Crimson. The Harvard Hillel requested that the newspaper print an apology letter. President Jason Child published "A Letter to Crimson Readers." The letter addresses the sensitivity of this particular issue. Child also said in the letter that the newspaper does not support such views. Despite The Crimson printing this article to apologize, never is an apology directly stated, rather the newspaper blamed the advertisement being printed as a miscommunication amongst the newspaper's staff members.

The Crimson has stated that this was an accident, a communication error which occurred during a three-week break allowing this advertisement to print. After a discussion among editors, it was decided that the ad would not be published.

Child cites the reason as to why this advertisement was printed as a failure to communicate to the entire staff the decision not to run the ad. Yet with the hours spent on layout, editing and formatting a newspaper it is hard to believe that no one would catch an anti-Semitic advertisement on page 7.

When asked for comment on the apology letter, James F. Young the chair of the Department of Judaic & Near Eastern Studies at University of Massachusetts stated, "The editor should not be apologizing for an "accident" but for his own incompetence as an editor, whose job is to know the difference between informed observation and propaganda."

Michelle Williams can be reached at mnwilli@student.umass.edu

The advertisement questions the existence of the Holocaust, which is remembered by the U.S. in the Memorial Holocaust Museum, Washington.

Student debts are on the rise as need for loans grow

By Michelle Williams
Collegian Staff

Students across America are borrowing more than ever before, a trend that will likely have long-term affects for an entire generation.

With some colleges and universities costing over $50,000 a year, families and students are pressured to take out loans to pay for the rapidly growing expenses. The total amount borrowed by students and families in the 2008-2009 year reached $75.1 billion, which is up more than 25% in the last year. Though more than expected, the rise in student debt has been growing for more than a decade.

These numbers just further show how common it has become for students to rely on loans to help pay for education. With two-thirds of college students borrowing to pay for college, the average debt loan has reached $23,186 by the time they graduate.

The types of loans taken out by college attendees are one of two choices; federal direct loans or private loans.

Federal direct loans are those provided by the Department of Education. Acting as a lender, the federal government provides funds through Stafford loans and PLUS loans. These loans allow the student to choose which school and choice of study is most appropriate.

Private loans are loans provided by loan lenders such as Sallie Mae and My Rich Uncle. These loans can be used not only to pay for tuition but also for living fees. These loans also come with higher interest fees and are less available after the financial crisis.

Living in a sunken economy, many are unsure as to how they will pay for college. Some feel pressured to turn to high interest rate, risky private loans. In effort to prevent this, President Obama's Administration has raised the Stafford loans limit to $31,000, which happens to be $8,000 more than the previous year. While this may prevent students from graduating because of the burden of risky loans, this generation is still facing thousands of dollars worth of debt to pay off.

Ashley Allen, a junior and creative writing major at Hollins University has over $52,000 in loans to pay off after graduation and worries about the job market.

"It's hard enough to find a job in this economy, let alone a job that will allow me pay for rent, food and my loans plus interest," Allen said.

With so much debt students face long-term choices. Whether to attend Graduate School, fulfill a lifelong dream of traveling Europe, when to get married and start a family.

INTERESTED IN WRITING FOR NEWS?
CONTACT NICK BUSH AT news@dailycollegian.com

Poll says U.S. ignores obesity

Fatty foods have become a staple of the American diet, contributing to obesity issue.

By William Douglas
McClatchy Newspapers

WASHINGTON — Despite government data that show a dramatic increase in obesity in the United States over the past 20 years, most Americans don't think they have much of a weight problem, according to a new McClatchy-Ipsos poll.

The survey found that only 17 percent of those surveyed thought that obesity was a major problem for their families and themselves, while 33 percent said it was a minor problem and 49 percent said it was no problem at all.

Two-thirds judged themselves at healthy weights, and while 30 percent acknowledged that they were overweight, only 4 percent said they were very overweight.

That's not how the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention sees the problem. Last year, the CDC reports, only one state — Colorado — had a prevalence of obesity of less than 20 percent. Thirty-two states had prevalences of 25 percent or greater, and six of those states — Alabama, Mississippi, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee and West Virginia — had prevalences of obesity of 30 percent or more.

The latest Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System survey data show that obesity in the U.S. is getting worse, said Liping Pan, a CDC epidemiologist and the lead author of the CDC's obesity report. "If this trend continues we will likely see increases in health care costs for obesity-related diseases."

Dr. William Dietz, the director of the CDC's Division of Nutrition, Physical Activity and Obesity, said obesity was a major risk factor for several chronic ailments such as heart disease and diabetes.

"As obesity increases among all age groups, we are seeing chronic diseases in much younger adults compared to a few decades ago," Dietz said. "For example, we now see young adults who suffer from heart-disease risk factors and other conditions such as Type 2 diabetes that were unheard of in the past."

The McClatchy-Ipsos survey found that 75 percent of Americans think the most effective way to combat obesity is through education about the importance of exercise and a healthy diet, but so far, apparently, the CDC's education efforts are falling short.

editorial&opinion

"FREE SPEECH IS THE WHOLE THING. THE WHOLE BALL GAME. FREE SPEECH IS LIFE ITSELF" - SIR SALMAN RUSHDIE

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Rumbling stomachs a sign of the times

Evan Haddad

The Dining Commons are economizing. Administrative master chefs spent the summer cooking up and rolling out new energy and cost efficient policies for the fiscal year 2010; and as a result, DC hamburgers are helplessly shrinking to the sizes of quarters, and four-plate, three-drink eaters must cope with life as a tray-less, balancing existence.

But are there are more changes baking in the oven?

Although our generation and the one which governs us tugs slowly toward a healthy, Green approach to campus dining, I almost shudder to imagine how the University of Massachusetts Amherst might try and trump its cookery in coming decades. At this point, who could claim astonishment at the said "master chefs of administration", whose pots of policy and food experiments are ceaselessly on the boil? What further plans aim to churn out students of sounder mind and stomach?

Keep your eyes peeled for mysterious trucks and little men in jumpsuits: Oompa Loompas, Swashbuzzlers and vicious Knids may be lurking in here yet.

Much to our chagrin, most changes in state colleges, most of all in dining, are rooted in some sort of economical convenience. While higher-ups may term certain changes "Green friendly," or whatever else, let's not beat around the bush. Even though some changes mark positive progress, there is often a degree of marketing trickery, and what we are sold on is often something quite else.

Let's review a couple of past attempts by other institutions' dining programs, per example.

Take the 70s Cinna-bus: a creation once hailed as the future's economically brilliant connection between both school and gruel; and yet, a perfectly delicious complement to any students' plate. At once a cinnamon bun and a syllabus, it's frosted crown of melted sonnets and chopped pecans made this savory a favorite among struggling English students.

> Who knows what the fate of our own campus food shall be in this ever changing world of economy and social food-ism.

But it doesn't end there.

Take your average plate of scrambled eggs. Flip it upside-down, pepper it with vodka and a few wisps of beard or mustache (whichever you prefer), and there you've got it: Eggs-Essential. Once a popular dish in Soviet institutions of the late 50s, it has now fallen in competition to the latest food craze, Putin-Pudding.

The point is this: who knows what the fate of our own campus food shall be in this ever changing world of economy and social food-ism. Science has not yet guaranteed that the DC's healthy and veggie foods are even safe for a homo sapiens to digest.

I believe the "Green friendly" approach to cooking healthier foods, coupled with indigestion, could, over an indefinite period of time, dictate an eventual evolution of our species. A species which would no longer thrive on slathered bagels and cheese fries, but on almond butter and tofurkey alone; and what a most frightening reality that would be.

If nothing else, think of the complications involved with forgoing meat in mass dining; the numbers of sheep and chickens which would run unchecked, which could break out from the Hampshire college hen houses and pens; unused cows who could storm the factory gates of meat farms and stampede the roadways.

Yet thank heavens, like evolution, our beloved DC's change little from one semester to another. What some would analogize as the primitive "Neanderthal hair" of our beefy menu, I call the last frontier of a once prosperous and necessary industry. What nobler vision could be than mountains of saucy "nbwiches" and buffalo chicken wraps sprawling over steamy steel dishes like the steppes of Patagonia? Or pizza slices revolving like silent sausage bespattered moons under the warm auspices of cafeteria gods?

Thank heavens that campus wide, students can still enjoy a well balanced meal of pasta a la sauce barbecue and chocolate ice cream with extra-jimmies. I recently met one student who was so bold as to have dessert before dinner because the lines for entrees were too long. You see, the current combinations are endless and there are no policies prohibiting indulgence.

And we can see retaliatory strikes to this Green craze mounting and even rooting themselves abroad. A former student situated in Cairo wrote a most compelling and passionate condemnation of the local cuisine. Yes, it was a heartfelt plea, a reaching out and a desire for the plastic gloved hand of that which is known as "buffet dining."

So next time you look at those sad, shrinking hamburgers wallowing at the pan's bottom, do not think upon days of yore when hamburgers were normal size. No. As we UMass students endorse the melodious phrase in times of uncertainty, "Let's do it for our country," I say, "Let's eat it for our country." Because face it: our country wants us to.

Evan Haddad is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at ehaddad@student.umass.edu.

Dictate death panels by life choices

Ben Moriarty

Despite being a journalism major, I hardly looked up any news while spending my summer in Guatemala. Nor did I read any news from there. It became news to me I don't really care about news. I even found out that Michael Jackson died days after he died. And then I cried for days on end.

I didn't know the sales tax went up until near the end of August, and I still have hardly any idea what exactly the Cash for Clunkers program did considering all of our auto industry is bankrupt.

Then I came back and the great Ted Kennedy, who helped introduce the Edward M. Kennedy Serve America Act of 2009, died. So it goes, God bless his Catholic soul.

So now, being back, all the news, of course, is on the healthcare debacle.

Yippee!

But then I heard about "death panels," and I became, naturally, very intrigued about them - hoping there was some sort of campaign I could join. And then, much to my displeasure, I found out that the death panels didn't actually exist like I had envisioned in my mind. No lobbyists in Washington D.C., no people in mustaches, no guillotines.

Which truly is a shame.

On a more pleasant note, we did get to hear "we are becoming socialists" or whatever it is Republicans say about anything the Democratic Party tries to do. As well as people worrying that their sick parents, their dying children, or, as Sarah Palin said, "my baby with Down syndrome," wouldn't receive health care because of their illnesses.

Old people and babies with Down syndrome aside, a panel of people who would decide who would get healthcare and treatment would be the most objective and best way to decide who receives it. This is, of course, if everyone can't have it.

It is, I believe, since it happened in "300", how the Spartans used to do it. Palin should just be grateful her baby wasn't thrown off a cliff like it would have been had she lived in panelist Sparta or my household.

> If you want to get to the nitty gritty, we already have death panels – which are really just things or people you need to get past to get treatment.

If you want to get to the nitty gritty, we already have death panels – which are really just things or people you need to get past to get treatment. Don't have the money, don't have coverage? Then sing us a sad song little birdies.

I watch a lot of "House," and, taking that for reality because it is a television show about a snide doctor and a dean of medicine with nice cleavage, the sort of picking and choosing that people are worried about already happens. If there is one heart, you aren't going to give it to the obese fat guy who doesn't exercise and drinks every night – you are going to give it to the normal American: only slightly obese, who also doesn't exercise.

We see it happen, and it only makes sense that we give to those who will gain the most and who have and will act properly and healthily. If everyone cannot have health care, it should be given firstly to those who have worked to take preventative measures in their health and have been put in unfortunate consequences.

Last month, a study by the Center for Disease Control and Prevention and RTI International showed obesity costs the U.S. $147 billion. Smoking, according to the Center for Disease Control, costs America $193 billion dollars a year, with nearly a hundred billion of it being for medical and health-care costs.

If people are going to do things regarding their health that cost the country more money, there should be consequences. If you know that when you get older you won't receive treatment if you continue to smoke or not exercise, and you keep smoking or can't put the burger down, then you deserve either no treatment or treatment at a very high cost. Because, hell, if you don't care about your health when you're healthy, why should it change when you aren't?

And I hope in the future when we actually do have death panels, they will agree.

Of course, this is only if we have the inability to cover everyone or the inability to hold insurance companies to a slightly non-abominable position in a capitalist fueled economy.

Sadly, for some, we do have the ability to cover everyone in some form. But then that might mean we don't live in a completely laissez-faire economy with no government involvement (even though we've had a national bank for almost centuries). Or that money might be coming from somewhere in their pockets. Or that we will become Socialists or Communists or Muslims or homosexuals or whatever it is the opposition hates this year.

So bring on the death panels so we can decide who gets treatment, who lives and who dies in a logical manner. We have a population problem as people are living far too long anyways, wreaking havoc on Social Security and Medicare. We need a better method besides who has money for who gets to live or die.

And we have it. It's based on how you live.

Ben Moriarty is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at bmoriart@student.umass.edu.

POINT-COUNTER-POINT

"Freedom rings where opinions clash." - Adlai E. Stevenson

Can UMass handle swine flu?

Students in safe hands

Matt Sullivan

With the heart of flu season approaching, University Health Services (UHS) is readily preparing for what is predicted to be among the strongest strains within the last thirty years. The swine flu, or H1N1, is significantly more difficult to treat than seasonal flu and has resulted in at least twenty-seven reported deaths around the U.S. Two cases of the Swine were confirmed locally at Amherst College last year. And already this semester there have been over 1,600 cases across the nation's campuses.

In the face of this, do Student Health Services have the resources or the experience to handle H1N1 at the University of Massachusetts Amherst? Most of the student body when asked would just scoff and say that nothing can be done. If one person gets it, three more people are going to get it, and so on. It's simple multiplication. That doesn't mean that Health Services isn't going to take every means necessary to limit the volume of illnesses on campus.

> Will slackers like me use this as an excuse to blow off class for days at a time? Yes. Is this the best way to prevent the spread of flu? Absolutely it is.

Health Services will be closely cooperating with Amherst College down the road, where there will be quarantine dorms. Yes, the word quarantine is scary. No one wants to be quarantined. But it is an excellent solution by UHS in halting the spread of the H1N1 virus. Imagine your roommate hacking up a lung in the bunk above you, praying to God that you won't be infected, and then you'll be thankful for UHS having quarantine dorms this year.

But realistically speaking, Health Services is advising that students take the typical precautions for preventing respiratory born illnesses. These methods are listed on the UHS website, along with other useful information. In addition, the UHS's Triage Advice Nurse is available from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m.

Further, UHS is advising students to make sound judgment when attending class if they show any of the listed symptoms. Many of the school's professors are even going as far as to flat out tell students feeling a bit under the weather, to stay home and avoid contact with others. Will slackers like me use this as an excuse to blow off class for days at a time? Yes. Is this the best way to prevent the spread of flu? Absolutely it is. No one wants infectious mucus sneezed on them from the kid wiping snots on his sleeve sitting one seat over.

A shot for seasonal flu will be readily available to students, as it always is. The seasonal flu vaccinations are being scheduled for every Thursday afternoon, 1p.m. to 4 p.m., through December 17th. Although as of today, there is no vaccine to protect against the H1N1 virus, but one is currently in production and expected for fall distribution. When this vaccine becomes available, UHS will conduct campus clinics.

I may have no credentials as a public health expert, but I can say that I put my trust in Health Services. Although they are by no means the Center for Disease Control, they are made up of a highly qualified staff of professionals who know how to do their job. If they didn't, well, they would be replaced, because this is America. They are employed by the state; their orders on crisis management are therefore coming from the government, the Massachusetts Department of Public Health.

However, if H1N1 were to mutate and hit UMass with cases by the hundreds, perhaps the thousand, then, we might have a problem. But unless swines fly, most likely this fall isn't going to be some apocalyptic Stephen King horror story, so Health Services will do just fine. We're not living "The Stand," people, and this strain isn't the Spanish Flu of 1918 that killed 100 million.

Matt Sullivan is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mdsul0@student.umass.edu.

Don't agree? Send us letters. editorial@dailycollegian.com

Scare tactics abound

Brian Benson

The World Health Organization (WHO) no longer finds it appropriate to track cases of the swine influenza. In fact, WHO announced that it would stop actively documenting information about them months ago, in July. Oddly enough, it said nothing about the recent hysteria flu which has purportedly given thousands of school children time off.

When Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome (SARS) caught attention in 2002, it was projected to kill thousands, hundreds of thousands or millions of people. There were 774 confirmed deaths. Again, in 2004, when the avian influenza was reported in humans, media outlets tolled the same warning bell. It has killed 262 people over approximately five years. Now, swine flu is the latest chapter in socially induced hysteria. This is the third notable viral outbreak in very recent history to raise pandemic concerns.

> We have clearly not learned the lessons of history when our knees jerk to something that is demonstrably a non-threat, especially when we do so thrice in less than ten years' time.

In the past decade, WHO and the Center for Disease Control (CDC) have batted 0.000 in accurately predicting these outcomes. Reasonable people are skeptical. Even the worst flu pandemic, in 1918, happened so long ago that the kinds of statistics are almost inapplicable to the present day. At the time, pathogenic theories of medicine had only been developed decades earlier and were poorly understood in the general population. This is especially evident when relatively few people attended institutions of higher learning and most people did not keep hand sanitizers in their back pockets.

To be fair, I imagine it is safe to assume the majority of people reading this either always were or at least currently are aware of the absurdity before them. It seems to be widely known that the seasonal flu kills some 36,000 people in the United States every year. This dwarfs the 429 deaths across 122 countries according to the latest and final report by WHO on the matter.

But I'm not here to plainly throw around numbers. The point is this: we have clearly not learned the lessons of history when our knees jerk to something that is demonstrably a non-threat, especially when we do so thrice in less than ten years' time. The problem, though, is not the fear in the population. The worst of it is more symbolic – that people expect or encourage policy change because of it.

Hundreds of primary and secondary schools have closed, costing townships millions in dollars. Colleges have quarantined students. Airports and immigration and customs agencies have managed to make an already embarrassingly inefficient system more cluttered. At this point, these kinds of measures do absolutely no long-term good and do plenty of short-term harm.

Did the schools actually think that by keeping a group of a few hundred children home for a week would halt an international pandemic already independently existing in over a hundred countries? Did they really believe that? Or were these schools simply reacting to the demands of upset parents that expect public entities to enforce these kinds of rules? I suspect the latter. For no good reason whatever, people have passed responsibilities off to boards of town officials, who will make these kinds of decisions even if for no reason other than to protect their own reputations.

One can imagine what it would look like if an angry mob of parents tore into the few people who thought the issue a non-crisis when the delicate innocence of school children is threatened by an unpleasant viral infection. Basically, officials do not want to take blame for things that can go wrong, so they will do as the people demand to later deflect accountability if need be, regardless of cost, regardless of rational warrant. So, it can be said that the problem with the panic is more representational than tangible.

So, I would like to say not to worry, but, as I said, I suspect most people already are not. Instead, I say be vocal about the dynamic of unduly concerned people emotionally blackmailing institutions to act hastily. It is critical our representatives work to benefit us for that sake alone, and not because they wish to play it safe.

That said, remember to wash your hands properly for fifteen to twenty seconds and to sneeze into your elbow – seriously, sneezing into your hands is absolutely repulsive. Stop doing that, all of you. You know who you are. If nothing else, you might prevent a few people from getting the sniffles, and you will make the people sitting next to you feel less terrified of the plague.

Brian Benson is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at bbenson@student.umass.edu.

arts&living

YOUR WEEKEND GUIDE TO ART, MUSIC, FILM & CULTURE — ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'Alegria' for all

Cirque du Soleil pleases crowds of all ages at the Mullins Center

By Alissa Mesibov
Collegian Correspondent

In Spanish, "Alegria!" means joy, but that barely begins to describe the Cirque du Soleil show that is playing at the Mullins Center through Sunday.

The performance falls somewhere between circus and theater with its impressive acrobatics and implied themes. There is something for everyone in this one-of-a-kind performance.

Before the show begins, there is a pre-show, of sorts, as the last of the audience enters in. Clowns wander around the stage doing simple tasks.

The absurdity of clowns dusting or having a wordless conversation is enough to entertain those who are early, and at the same time encourages the arriving audience members to find their seats, so that the show can begin.

There are ten different acts in "Alegria." In tribute to the traditional circus, a ringmaster introduces a petite girl who swings, flips, and twirls on a trapeze that seems to go out into the audience, who soon become part of the show.

Let the front row be warned: there is a great deal of audience interaction. The clowns, who provide comic relief through parodies of the elegant and exciting acts, pull audience members to dance or to assist them in performing their version of tricks. Everyone gets a chance to get in on the action when the two main clowns divide the audience for a brief shouting competition.

One of my few complaints is that the best act, the Powertrack, comes too soon in the show. Gymnasts tumble on an "X" shaped trampoline with power and grace. One after another, they flip by with inhuman height and speed. The most impressive sequence had four performers flip in place with mind-boggling speed, appearing as though they were tumbling on a giant treadmill.

Another reason ofor fPowertrack's excellence is that it is the only place when one can see the over-arching theme and plot of the show.

"The difference between the circus and Cirque is that we have a story," Sheryl-Lynn Valensky, assistant artistic director of "Alegria" said in an interview Wednesday.

This didn't seem to be the case, however. During Powertrack, the Old Birds, who are supposed to represent aristocracy and tradition, perform a beautiful balletic routine, only to have the space taken over by the youthful angels. This theme of old versus new is applied beautifully in the one scene, but fails to make a clear comeback.

Even aerial high bar artist (and West Springfield, Mass. native) Steven Gaudette, admitted, "I wouldn't know the themes if I were just watching."

Luckily this is one of only a few significant

See CIRQUE on page 8

MATTHEW HARRISON-COLLEGIAN'S

"Cirque du Soleil: Alegria" will be playing through Sunday at the Mullins Center.

Farmers bring fresh flavor to community

By Cal Scannell
Collegian Staff

Swarms of people dart in and out of the stalls on the Amherst Common, which displays anything from glistening eggplants, plump tomatoes, bright white cheeses and organic meats to homemade soaps, wildflowers and a variety of handicrafts. A sign reading Amherst Farmers' Market beckons townspeople and students alike to the quaint display of a vibrant local economy.

In the 36 years since its founding, the weekly farmers' market has served as the epicenter for the local farming community, as well as a gathering place for Valley residents at large from May to November.

While at its core, the marketplace provides consumers the opportunity to peruse and purchase farm fresh and often organic foodstuffs, the pervading sense of community engagement and excitement about food astonishes visitors.

Initially organized to allow farmers to access a unified, locally based consumer group to sell their crops, the market lives on today to delight foodies from all walks of life.

Throughout the course of its existence, the market has also played an instrumental role in the development of the local food movement by allowing consumers to opt out of the industrial farming supermarket system. Lately, the "buy local" phenomenon has gained visibility as a trend in reaction to global food production.

As it stands, the average carrot travels 1,838 miles, passes through countless hands and spends most of its time ripening in a truck on its journey to your stomach, according to sustainabletable.org. Under this model, 82 cents of every dollar spent in a supermarket goes to various middlemen while just 18 cents of that dollar goes to the grower, according to localharvest.org.

Max Breiteneicher, the manager of the Amherst Farmers' Market explains that the gargantuan industrial food supply chain compromises "quality of freshness, that's huge with vegetables, but also quality of care."

"When things pass through the distribution system to the A&P, or the Big Y, the integrity of the food is lost because it's disconnected from where it was grown and the people that grew it… and that for me is a quality issue."

See MARKET on page 8

the source

PLANNING YOUR WEEKEND SO YOU'LL DON'T HAVE TO.

FRIDAY

COURTESY THE ETTES

THE ETTES

SELF-PROCLAIMED ROCK-AND-ROLL GYPSIES THE ETTES WILL PLAY AT PEARL STREET IN NORTHAMPTON THIS FRIDAY. THEY HAVE OPENED FOR BANDS SUCH AS BLACK EYED PEAS AND KINGS OF LEON.

VENUE: PEARL STREET
DOORS: 9:00 PM
PRICE: A: $15 D: $18

SATURDAY

COURTESY KATHLEEN MADIGAN

KATHLEEN MADIGAN

JAY LENO CALLS HER "ONE OF AMERICA'S FUNNIEST FEMALE COMICS" AND YOU CAN SEE HER LIVE AT THE CALVIN THEATER IN NORTHAMPTON ON SATURDAY NIGHT.

VENUE: CALVIN THEATER
DOORS: 8:00 PM
PRICE: $25 - $35

FBI agent's story on the big screen in 'The Informant!'

By Robert W. Butler
McClatchy Newspapers

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — There's reality. And then there's Hollywood reality.

The difference was only too clear to FBI Special Agent Bob Herndon as he settled into his seat at an Olathe, Kansas, movie theater the other day to watch "The Informant!," the new Matt Damon film directed by Oscar-winner Steven Soderbergh.

This was more than a movie to Herndon. It was his story.

And he was concerned about what Hollywood had done to it.

In the early '90s, Herndon — portrayed in the movie by comic Joel McHale — was one of two FBI agents who handled Mark Whitacre, an executive for agribusiness giant Archer Daniels Midland who volunteered to help the feds convict his co-workers of price fixing.

Whitacre, whom Damon plays with comic abandon, turned out to be much more than a whistle-blower. He wore an FBI wire into closed-door sessions with his ADM bosses, but even while providing evidence that would end up convicting several of his firm's executives, Whitacre was involved in scams of his own. He lied to the feds, he lied to his bosses, and, while working with the FBI, he embezzled more than $9 million.

The informant would end up spending more time in prison than the co-workers he turned in.

The convoluted case was laid out in minute detail in "The Informer," Kurt Eichenwald's nonfiction book published in 2000. Herndon had the FBI's permission to talk numerous times with the author.

Now it was Hollywood's turn. Unlike the book, the movie was made with almost no input from Herndon.

All Herndon could hope for was that the film would spread a message about corporate fraud and greed.

But as the lights went down and his wife, Raelene, took his hand, the FBI agent prepared himself for the possibility that his big-screen portrait might not be all that flattering.

"A Secret Service agent attended my church," Herndon, 46, recalls of his boyhood in Kansas. "An FBI agent lived a few doors down. I always dreamed of joining the FBI."

After graduating from high school, he studied accounting at the University of Kansas and joined a CPA firm. But in 1986 he applied to the bureau, then looking for numbers crunchers to handle white-collar crime, and was accepted.

Herndon's first posting was in New Orleans, where he was part of a team that brought down a corrupt jurist. "It was the first time the FBI wired the courtroom of a federal judge," he said.

He was working in the Springfield, Illinois, office when he became part of the ADM investigation. He worked closely with agent Brian Shepard (played by Scott Bakula) who had first been contacted by Whitacre.

For several years Herndon and Shepard directed Whitacre's efforts, making sound or video recordings of almost 200 conversations between their informant and targets.

They were yanked from the case after ADM's attorneys aired an anonymous accusation — Herndon thinks it was from Whitacre himself — that among other things the agents had appropriated some of Whitacre's embezzled money.

"That caused an internal investigation," Herndon said. "After that Mark named us in a lawsuit claiming we hit him with a briefcase, but the details were so unbelievable we were laughing about it."

Still, the agents resented not being able to complete their investigation. Vindication finally came with the conviction of the ADM officials.

"One after another the guilty verdicts came in. Brian and I felt validated. The jurors were affirming that we weren't some bad guys, that we'd done our job."

Herndon is a straight arrow. Father of three. Highly religious. And, of course, he's with the FBI.

He doesn't have much in common with the type of people who make movies. Or at least that's what he thought.

Several things have happened over the last couple of years to change that perception.

Two years ago his son Matthew, then 11, was diagnosed with a life-threatening brain aneurysm. While the family gathered in a Dallas hotel room on the eve of Matthew's big surgery, the phone rang.

It was Matt Damon. He wanted to talk to Matthew.

At that point filming on "The Informant!" hadn't begun. But Damon had been cast and knew all about Herndon. Somehow he'd heard about the family's crisis.

"Matthew is talking on the phone and at one point he puts his hand over the receiver and asks, 'Who's Matt Damon?'" Herndon recalled with a laugh. "After his successful surgery he watched the 'Bourne' movies, and of course now he's a Damon fan."

Then, while "The Informant!" was in production last summer in Los Angeles, Herndon was invited to bring his family for a day on the set.

"Matt Damon spent about an hour and a half with us," he said. "He talked about possibly moving to Dallas or Kansas City, getting away from Miami and finding a different sort of place to raise his kids."

Herndon also got to know the actor who was portraying him.

"Joel told me he played the part straight up. No comedy. I asked him, 'Are you sure you're playing me as a good, boring FBI agent?' And he said he was.

"We've been in contact off and on ever since," Herndon said. "Joel came here last February for a comedy event and invited my friends and family backstage. He's a really top-notch guy. Good family values. Spent most of the time talking about his kids and wife."

As the lights came up after the "Informant!" screening, Herndon sat for a moment deep in thought.

So what did he think?

"Mostly, I think they got it right," he said. "I never felt like they took a cheap shot."

Several scenes, in fact, used dialogue taken directly from the surveillance tapes Herndon and Shepard had made.

The film is played for farcical effect, but the agent said that was a valid approach, especially since the real-life Whitacre had so many idiosyncrasies.

"During the investigation we always thought we were a day away from seeing the case ruined," Herndon said. "It's always that way when you're working with informants. They can decide at any moment they don't want to do it anymore."

The agent says he thinks Whitacre suffered from a mental ailment and had told so many lies that he no longer knew what was true and what wasn't.

The film also finds much comic mileage in Whitacre's luxurious head of hair.

"We agents would have discussions about whether that was really Mark's hair or a rug," Herndon said.

They got their answer when they attended Whitacre's sentencing. The convicted embezzler was bald.

"Brian always claimed it wasn't a wig. So I leaned over and said 'I win.' "

After the conclusion of the ADM and Whitacre cases, Herndon returned to his hometown. Among the cases he has worked since then was that of Robert R. Courtney, the pharmacist convicted of giving patients diluted cancer drugs.

Herndon and his wife left Kansas City International Airport Monday evening to join the "Informant!" cast at the film's New York premiere.

"This time I can just relax and enjoy the movie," the agent said. "And we're going to a party afterward. George Clooney is an executive producer, and we're hoping he shows up."

Matt Damon collaborates with Steven Soderbergh once again in his latest film, "The Informant!" The comedic thriller releases in theaters across the country tonight.

DESSERT'S ON US.

FREE CHOCOLATE LAVA CRUNCH CAKE

WITH EVERY Domino's Bread Bowl PASTA

Get a FREE Domino's Chocolate Lava Crunch Cake for every Domino's BreadBowl Pasta ordered at menu price until 9/30/09.

ORDER Domino's Pizza ONLINE

LATE NITE Domino's Pizza

Amherst/Hadley
Hours: Sun.-Wed. 11am - 3am
Thurs. - Sat. 11am-4am
413-256-8911

Cirque returns to Amherst

MATTHEW HARRISON/COLLEGIAN

While quite aesthetically pleasing, the music was a bit too cliché for the crowd's liking. The unique show pays homage to the traditional circus while telling stories with its maginificant visuals.

CIRQUE from page 6

faults of "Alegria."

Throughout the show, there are several other outstanding routines, such as a routine in which a man fits in a hoop, much resembling DaVinci's Vitruvian Man. He glides and twirls across the sloped stage, much like an ice skater.

Later on, a group of three performers flip and leap on flexible planks, as if they were on a balance beam. These balance beams are moving around, carried by other performers.

Among the solo acts, the act two opener was not only one of the most impressive feats, it is also one of the most emotional ones.

The Flying Man, Aleksandr Dobrynin, has bungee cords wrapped around his wrists. As he is first raised into the air, his arms are extended out, much like a crucifix. The heart wrenching and desperate music plays as he sweeps and flies around the stage. The Catholic imagery is proven in the next scene when the clowns cross their hearts before giving their mocking attempt at an act.

The finale, the Aerial High Bar, was just right for the last act. It was beautiful, it exemplified the strength of the athletic performers, and was death defying. For that reason, a net is set up during a pre-act dance to prevent injury, should someone fall, like one performer did opening night at the Mullins Center.

"It happens," Gaudette said. "We fall, and just go back up."

The performers went on as if nothing had happened, and concluded the show with grace and elegance.

"Alegria" has a few featured characters. One is a singer, Nancy Arnoud, who has a throaty alto voice that is not perfect, but is versatile. That flexibility is just as important in this show, which has musical styles ranging from tango to opera.

While most of Rene Dupere's musical compositions are beautiful, none sound completely original. Each melody is generic. To be fair, anything less than prodigious would be upstaged by the feats of the performers. Dupere's worst musical choice is apparent when he relies on the cliché of a South East Asian flute piece for the contortionist act. As the world's most famous circus, such cliché music should have been avoided.

The design elements of the show, however, are faultless. A sloped part of the stage looks as though it were a mirror, creating a surreal effect when the performers step on to the flat, front section.

The green lights that remain on the stage throughout the performance create a forest-like mood.

The costumes rely heavily on historical theater. The pale colors and use of golden rope is reminiscent of ancient Greece, while the Shakespearean masks bring up images of 17th century European theater.

The musicians in the production deserve much credit. They first march around the audience before taking their place on stage to play the score, which covers numerous musical genres.

Despite the faults of the writer and composer, the rest of the cast, crew, and artistic team put on a wonderful, unique show that will delight anyone.

"Alegria" delivers on its promise to bring joy to the audience. The androgynous performers in the acrobatic pieces are incredible to the avid performing arts lover of any age. The clowns and their comical subplots will entertain the younger audience members. It is the children who smile, wide-eyed, taking it all in, and dancing in the leftover tissue paper snowflakes who embody the joy that the show is all about.

Alissa Mositbo is a Collegian correspondent. She can be reached at amositbo@student.umass.edu.

Latest Nelly Furtado album has Latin kick

By Jordan Levin
McClatchy Newspapers

MIAMI — Nelly Furtado's musical career has been filled with drastic changes. She started as a funky hip-hop / fusion phenomenon, soaring to success with her 2000 debut "Whoa, Nelly" and its Grammy-winning hit "Fly Like a Bird," then veered into a Brazilian-tinged world-beat detour. She returned to the mainstream in 2006 with the bestselling, sexy pop hip-hop of "Loose."

Now Furtado is back with a new sound and a new identity — Latin songstress. Her latest album, "Mi plan," a pop-rock record filled with famous Latino guest stars, comes out this week. It's an idea that's been brewing for some time. The Canadian-born daughter of Portuguese immigrants, Furtado performed Portuguese songs as a child. She recorded a hit duet in Spanish, "Fotografia," with the Colombian rock star Juanes in 2002, and he returned the favor by guesting on one of two Spanish songs on "Loose." (Furtado's husband is a Cuban-American sound engineer she met while recording "Loose" at North Miami's Hit Factory Criteria studios.)

"Mi plan" looks like a smartly calculated entry into the Latin music market. The first single, "Manos al aire (Hands in the Air)," released in early August, recently hit No. 1 on Billboard's Latin radio chart. The album's guest list includes Dominican pop-bachata idol Juan Luis Guerra, Mexican regional music heartthrob Alejandro Fernandez, Mexican singer-songwriter Julieta Venegas, Spanish rapper Mala Rodriguez, and her countrywoman, flamenco-jazz singer Buika.

But Furtado, a thoughtful musician who writes her own songs, found that working in Spanish invigorated her creatively, opening up a more personal and emotional style of songwriting.

"All these songs were inspired by me just living my life, taking two years off after the crazy schedule I had before," says Furtado, sitting in a tiny vocal recording studio at Criteria, where she recorded key tracks on "Mi plan." "And being surrounded by the people that mean the most to you, your family. And then my music, which wasn't giving me inspiration in English, but then I turned to Spanish and I am so inspired now."

Contrary to what the name implies, Furtado says "Mi plan" was anything but planned. "My plan is really not to have a plan," Furtado says. "As I get more life experience, I remember the real challenge is you can have plans, but they can change in a moment. A lot of little moments inspired this album."

The first moment, like many, came by chance. Furtado was home in Toronto after an exhausting stint promoting and touring "Loose," enjoying time with her daughter Nevis, 5, and her new husband, Demacio Castellon. But the music she was writing with her guitarist James Bryan wasn't exciting either of them. They talked about bringing in another singer, but didn't do anything about it. Then Furtado's percussionist gave her a CD by Alex Cuba, a Cuban bassist and songwriter living in Northern Canada. The CD rattled around Furtado's car for a couple of months until she finally played it and said, "Wow, I love it."

Around the same time, she recalls, Bryan called and said, "Hey, you know we were talking about using another singer? What about a Spanish singer — Alex Cuba is coming to town."

Initially, Cuba was skeptical: A jazz and blues lover whose own music is a virtuoso mix of Cuban, rock, jazz and Caribbean styles, he wasn't a big fan of Furtado's commercial pop. And Furtado had only had four years of high school Spanish. "He was very aloof — which I loved, of course," Furtado says.

But the two of them clicked musically, writing four of the songs on "Mi plan" within the first four days. "I'd say to Alex, you know, I was feeling kind of sad the other night — and he'd say, let's write a song about it."

Instead of the elaborate production of "Loose," helmed by master hip-hop producer Timbaland, Furtado went back to basics. "'Loose' was 90 percent written with a beat first, and then I'd write my melodies and songs to the beat," she says. "'Mi plan' was written with guitar and voice, so it was really about the songs, and what I was feeling at that point."

If the songs and videos — and Furtado's persona — on "Loose" were sexy and exuberant, coming off her divorce from Nevis' father, the tone on "Mi plan" is intimate, thoughtful, roman-

See FURTADO on page 9

Farmer's Market gives locals taste of community

MARKET from page 6

The farmers' market on the other hand helps to keep profits in the pockets of farmers, and in so doing promote the continued circulation of that money in the local economy. At the same time, it allows locals to connect to their food and where it comes from.

Call it old fashioned, because in fact, it is, especially in a region where farming traditionally has fed the livelihoods of area residents.

Feeding Hills based farmer John Spineti explains that the local food phenomenon took root in the fertile soil of the Pioneer Valley in the late '60s and early '70s.

"There has always been a drive for local food" here, but lately it has drawn "more of an emphasis because it's safer and doesn't consume as much energy to transport."

"Amherst and Northampton have been ahead of the curve in that respect because we essentially established organic food practices with safety in mind for the consumers, for the producers and the environment."

In addition to preserving the community by supporting local agriculture and voting with your dollar, buying local presents many other advantages to the consumer.

Maya Cramer, a Hampshire College freshman from New York City, exclaims, "farmers' markets make me happy!"

"Everything is so fresh and it's nice to know it's from close by and right out of the ground. Everything just tastes better when it's right out of the ground." True to her words, none of the produce is waxed or stickered, but rather still dusty with dirt.

But eclipsing the fact that the market provides the freshest and highest quality produce available in the area, the pervasive sense of community that dominates the small patch of pavement on Saturday mornings offers townsfolk an intangible commodity.

The market "has this social element and as a result we get this enormous strata of people... from tenured professors to homeless people. It creates a cohesion to the town that doesn't exist otherwise," Breiteneicher says.

"These people across the board tend to be thoughtful and dedicated and when you have that experience it sort of ensouls the food in a way."

Spineti echoes that feeling of community as well. Despite having received two advanced science degrees from the University of Massachusetts, he recalls feeling more connected to the student community through the farmers' market than he did as a graduate student.

"I see more students than ever, now that I'm wearing a different hat, literally," he jokes.

In the coming weeks Spineti hopes students come down to enjoy the harvest and perfect fall weather and offers the inside scoop on what to look for this Saturday.

He advises food lovers to keep their eyes peeled for juicy peppers, eggplants and potatoes, which have fared very well this season despite the heavy June rain. People can also look forward to healthy late crops such as broccoli, cauliflower, squash, beans, radishes and all kinds of greens including spinach, kale, mustard greens and all types of lettuce.

Local food enthusiasts should also mark their calendars for upcoming festivals including the 100 year Celebration at Cook Farm, the North Hadley Sugar Shack Open House at Boisvert Farm and the Fourth Annual Harvest Festival at Simple Gifts Farm and Amherst Community Farm, all taking place this Sunday.

Cal Scannell can be reached at cescannell@student.umass.edu

CAL SCANNELL/COLLEGIAN

The Amherst Farmer's Market allows local farmers to sell their goods every Saturday from May to Nov. 8:00am to 1:30pm in the Amherst Common.

JACKET

Nelly Furtado's latest album, "Mi plan," is a pop-rock record in which she collaborates with a variety of famous Latin artists.

Furtado goes Latino

FURTADO from page 8

tic. Instead of long nights in the studio, Furtado and her songwriting partners Cuba and Bryan would start early in the morning, then head off mid-afternoon to pick up their kids from school.

The songs reflect that quieter mood. "Feliz cumpleanos" was inspired by Furtado's melancholy over turning 30. "Suficiente (Enough)" is about the working mother's dilemma of "not having enough time in the day. You wake up — and yes I do live in a messy apartment — and you have to get breakfast, and yes, sometimes I don't have groceries in my fridge ... and you don't have enough time for a date, you don't have enough time to focus on love."

In "Manos al aire," she tamps down her anger to preserve her relationship. "My rule in love is always being the first to say you're sorry," Furtado says. "It's all right and healthy to argue, but at the same time you have to know when to put down your armas (weapons)."

It was a sentiment, like so many on "Mi plan," that she found easier to express in Spanish. "That's obviously a very personal thought, and one which I don't think I could express in English the right way," Furtado says. "I think I can get away with more in Spanish. I think you can be a lot more passionate. On this album it's about what are these really intimate things close to my heart that I really can't say in English."

That emotionally open attitude left Furtado free to enjoy moments like the ones on "Bajo otra luz (Under Another Light)," recorded at Criteria with Venegas and Rodriguez. The song features a giggling freestyle romp by these very different artists.

"Julieta said we were like tres brujas — three witches around the microphone," Furtado says. "I always record with guys. But this song, recording with three girls the energy was amazing. We really had a good time."

BYU aims for BCS Title, awaits FSU

By Bud Withers
The Seattle Times

SEATTLE — We might not need to remind you that 2009 marks the silver anniversary of a pretty significant event in college football.

In 1984, unbeaten Brigham Young won the national championship, though its final declaration was a one-touchdown Holiday Bowl victory over a Michigan team that finished 6-6. Washington, which went 11-1 and foiled second-ranked Oklahoma in the Orange Bowl, was the jilted runner-up.

Of course, since then, we've had a Bowl Alliance and a Bowl Coalition and a BCS, and all sorts of perceived slights and injustices and cater-wauling from just about every corner of the country, except maybe Maine.

A quarter-century later, and, what do you know, here's BYU, rapping on the door of the privileged class, stumping for change in the system it was instrumental in bringing about.

The irony isn't lost on BYU coach Bronco Mendenhall, whose seventh-ranked team has a benchmark moment Saturday at home against Florida State. Said Mendenhall this week, "I think the current system might be in place because of what you just alluded to (the '84 title)."

Cue the BCS-buster music. And flash the Mountain West Conference logo. A year after the conference pantsed the Pac-10, going 6-2 head to head, the league is at it again, primed for more credibility.

It's a safe assumption that never has a non-BCS conference set itself up this well this early. Not only is BYU No. 7, TCU is 15th and Utah 18th, with a key date Saturday at Oregon.

You get a sense that however incremental its progress might be, the Mountain West is getting there. While it's snow-capped counterpart, the WAC, still has to fend off valid criticism that Boise State can exhale through most of its schedule, there's a lot more quicksand in the MWC.

Beyond the top three, UNLV pretty much reversed Arizona State's season last year with an upset, and led Oregon State until the final seconds last week. Colorado State won its bowl game in 2008 and already sent Colorado spinning in its opener.

None of it surprises TCU coach Gary Patterson, who says, "I told people before the Oklahoma game: Do not be surprised if BYU plays them tough, or possibly wins it."

Last spring, MWC Commissioner Craig Thompson was part of a delegation appearing before Congress, armed with a plan that would turn the four BCS bowls into a quarterfinal round for an eight-team playoff.

Not a lot came of it, and what an upset that is in Congress. But, says Thompson, "Minimally, we've raised consciousness of the Mountain West nationally."

What can it do now? "The best thing is, we keep winning," Thompson says. "There's no substitute."

Thompson referenced a little-discussed mechanism in the BCS by which, in a four-year stretch from 2008-2011, the league could join the six on the inside if it performs well in a formula including highest finisher in the final BCS standings, composite finish by its members in them, and number of teams in the BCS top 25 each year.

As usual, September is a dreamy month for would-be BCS-crashers [you do remember East Carolina last year?]. Not only is Boise State No. 10 [playing at Fresno State on Friday night], but Houston (No. 21) aims to be the first from Conference USA to break through.

Lighten up, Urban

Saturday is the day of reckoning for Urban Meyer of Florida and Lane Kiffin, the lippy one from Tennessee. In the wide verbal swath Kiffin cut in the offseason, he wrongly accused Meyer of a recruiting violation, and said he would sing "Rocky Top" all night long after the Vols beat the Gators this year.

Kiffin has admitted most of his salvos were for effect, simply to bring attention to the program. He's been so over-the-top, he's been hard to take seriously.

Rest assured, though, Meyer will. Here's what Meyer says in his book about an indiscretion by Georgia a couple of years ago: "It will forever be in the mind of Urban Meyer and in the mind of our football team. We'll handle it, and it's going to be a big deal."

What did Georgia do? Burn down the Florida athletic complex? Slash the tires of the entire Gators' two-deep?

Not quite. Georgia choreographed an early team celebration penalty after a touchdown, and Meyer retaliated last year by calling last-minute timeouts in a Florida blowout.

He reacts like a medieval king upon hearing that a knave spoke ill of the queen. Saturday, he summons Kiffin to the guillotine.

And what's more . . .

One reason fortunes have flipped in the Bluegrass State is Kentucky has been beating Louisville, and it's favored to make it three straight in Lexington. The Cardinals are trying to patch it together with six new assistant coaches.

The bloom-off-the-rose game is Michigan State at Notre Dame, each coming off punch-in-the-gut losses. A defeat wouldn't be good for Irish coach Charlie Weis.

At Iowa this week, Arizona hopes to run a lot behind tackle Adam Grant of Puyallup, once a committed player to Washington. Grant, bothered much of his career by knee injuries, "is playing awfully well," says UA coach Mike Stoops. "He's the player now we always thought he'd be."

Last time Oregon State hosted a ranked non-league opponent? Try 1977, when 13th-ranked BYU left a loser to Craig Fertig's second OSU team.

Quarterback Max Hall drops back and passes in BYU's 14-13 victory over then-No. 3 Oklahoma. The Cougars are currently No. 7 in the nation and are eyeing the BCS Title.

(MCT)

In BYU's upset over Oklahoma, the Cougars put a huge dent in the Sooners hopes of a return to the BCS Championship. Not only did the Cougars come up with the upset, but they also took out Oklahoma's quarterback Sam Bradford with a shoulder injury.

(MCT)

CINEMARK
For advance tickets & showtimes visit
cinemark.com
or call 1-800-FANDANGO + Exp Code 1118#
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL
FIRST MATINEE SHOWTIME (7 DAYS A WEEK) $5.00
ADULT MATINEE BEFORE 6PM $6.25 • STUDENT $7.00 (WITH ID)

◆ CLOUDY WITH A CHANCE OF MEATBALLS - REAL D 3D ($2.75 SURCHARGE) [PG] 205 425 645 900
◆ CLOUDY WITH A CHANCE OF MEATBALLS - 2D [PG] 250 510 730 950
◆ JENNIFER'S BODY [R] ① 140 445 735 1020
◆ LOVE HAPPENS [PG13] 115 430 705 945
◆ THE INFORMANT! [R] ① 125 420 710 1000
◆ SORORITY ROW [R] ① 150 440 750 1030
◆ TYLER PERRY'S I CAN DO BAD ALL BY MYSELF [PG13] 110 410 700 1005
◆ WHITEOUT [R] ① 120 740
FINAL DESTINATION: DEATH TRIP - 2D [R] ① 450 1015
DISTRICT 9 [R] ① 155 720
EXTRACT [R] ① 435 1010
JULIE & JULIA [PG13] 105 400 725 1025

CinéArts
◆ 9 [PG13] 100 310 520 745 955
INGLOURIOUS BASTERDS [R] ① 135 455 820

◆ NO PASSES-NO CLASSIC SUPERSAVERS

UMass to host five teams in Amherst

UMass and Andrew McCann will host its lone home meet of 2009 this weekend.

Photography Intern Mitsa Rilakkan

By Jeffrey Engmann
Collegian Staff

It usually happens just once a year, and both the Massachusetts men's and women's cross country teams hope to take full advantage of it.

On Saturday both teams will host five-team meets, as they will race in their only home meet of the season. The men's team is looking to win for the fourth consecutive year. UMass men's coach Ken O'Brien would like to believe that similar to other team sports, there is a home-field advantage that contributes to their success.

"When you have the chance to have a home contest, just like any team sport you hope some type of home-court advantage," O'Brien said. "With running, it still applies. The [runners] are used to training and running on [these] facilities."

The men's team will face off against in-town rival Amherst College, as well as Vermont, UConn, and Maine. The team is coming off a strong second-place finish in the Dartmouth Invitational last weekend, as four members were able to record top 10 finishes.

The strong showing placed them ahead of schools like Boston College and Quinnipiac. Seniors Jonathan Pierce and Andrew Mulvaney picked up right where they left off last season, as they both were able to turn in very strong performances. Pierce finished fourth overall in the 8K race, with a time of 26 minutes, 2.9 seconds, whereas Mulvaney came in seventh. The team also received top 10 finishes from sophomores Jeffrey Hill, and Zachary Gordon.

O'Brien is confident the team will put forth a strong effort this weekend, and furthermore is looking for a first-place-finish in tomorrow's race. His high hopes are based upon to the team's overall experience and camaraderie.

"This team is a fairly deep and older team," he explained. "I'm fortunate with this year's team. We have a close group of runners. They have a tendency to push each other in the race. They just don't want to let the other guy down."

The Minutewomen are also set to host their five-way meet this weekend, as they will compete against Amherst, Maine, Vermont and Boston College. In last year's event, junior Shiyi Zan ran past all the competition, as she finished first overall in the race.

The team is coming off of a third-place finish in the Fairfield Invitational in Connecticut last weekend. Junior co-captain Lauren Stocker led the way last weekend, finishing eighth overall. Sophomores Claire Petit and Karen Rea were able to make significant contributions, as they both were top-15 finishers. Gina Perno was also able to place in the top 15 as well.

The men's race starts at approximately 11 a.m. The women's event will kick off shortly after, at 11:30 a.m. The UMass cross-country course is located behind the Wysocki House which is on the north side of campus.

Jeffrey Engmann can be reached via email at jengmann@student.umass.edu.

PSU leans on Odrick on defensive line in 2009

By Joe Juliano
The Philadelphia Inquirer

Penn State has spent much of its first two games creating questions such as: When will the offensive line come together? Can the running game progress to where it will take pressure off the passing game? And when will the kicking game, especially on field goals and kickoff coverage, come around?

Amid all these questions, the lack of uncertainty or drama in the front four thus far has to be helping coach Joe Paterno sleep a little better at night.

Anchored by 300-pound all-American candidate Jared Odrick at tackle, the defensive line has shut down the first two opponents, Akron and Syracuse. With the linemen controlling the trenches, the linebackers can swoop in, sometimes unimpeded, and make the tackles.

"I think they've been huge for us," senior linebacker Sean Lee said. "They've helped us, not only the linebackers but the whole defense in general.

"They're getting off the ball and they've had control of the line of scrimmage. They hold up two linemen at a time, and that makes our life easier and helps us make plays."

It's the way the defensive coaches have drawn it up. Lee and fellow linebackers Nathan Stupar and Josh Hull rank 1-2-3 in tackles in the two games, combining for 52.

With Odrick and tackle Ollie Ogbu plus ends Jack Crawford and Eric Latimore handling things up front, the defense appears frequently in this week's NCAA rankings.

The Nittany Lions are 10th against the rush, yielding 46.5 yards per game. They are tied for 12th in yards allowed, with an average of 193.0, and tied for ninth in points given up, with 7.0 per game.

The unit has had 19 tackles behind the line of scrimmage. While Lee has a team high of five, sidekicks Odrick and Ogbu, a 6-foot-1, a 285-pound junior, have hammered their way into opposing backfields for five stops for losses between them.

One would expect that from Odrick, who considered entering the NFL draft before returning for his senior season. But Ogbu, who split time with two other defensive tackles last season, has played well in the early going.

"He's come to the front," Paterno said of Ogbu. "Obviously, he's had to step into some big shoes, but he's done a good job. Odrick is the one that runs that show for him."

Ogbu said it doesn't bother him to pave the way for teammates to make the tackles.

"Not at all," he said. "I play a position that's not as noticed as linebacker. We're doing all the dirty work and that's fine. It's not like I'm a glamour guy wanting to be on TV. I just want to make plays."

He might have a chance to make more if Odrick can sustain his level of play, which will most likely result in double-team blocking against him.

Crawford and Latimore, both sophomores, also had a huge responsibility taking over at end for Aaron Maybin, Josh Gaines, and Maurice Evans, all of whom spent the summer in NFL training camps. They have shown promise early.

Crawford, a native of England who came to Penn State from St. Augustine Prep in South Jersey after just two years of organized football, has a sack and another tackle for a loss among his six stops. He continues to improve, and his coaches feel he'll keep getting better, given his work ethic and athleticism.

The ends are tall, too, with Crawford standing 6-5 and Latimore 6-6. When combined with the 6-5 Odrick, the trio could create a total eclipse of an opposing quarterback trying to locate an open receiver.

Still, Paterno would like his pass rushers, and the rest of his defense, to work harder at forcing turnovers. The Nittany Lions have just three, all interceptions.

Ogbu said defensive line coach Larry Johnson was working with the front four to create turnovers.

"That comes with practice," Ogbu said. "Coach Johnson works with us on stripping the ball, coming off the corners trying to force the ball out when we're trying to sack the quarterback. We practice that a lot. We know we have to create more turnovers."

Penn State coach Joe Paterno may have to face the question marks around his offensive line, but when it comes to the defensive line, he just has to point to the 300-pound tackle, Jared Odrick.

(MCT)

Minutewomen look to extend streak

Northeastern, BC travel to Amherst

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

Returning home after having a successful first road trip, the Massachusetts field hockey team faces another difficult weekend with two non-conference opponents in Northeastern and Boston College.

The Minutewomen (4-1) are continuing to rise in the Kookaburra/NFHCA Division I National Coaches Poll, debuting at No. 11 this week after posting a pair of 1-0 shutout victories on the road last weekend.

This is the highest UMass has been ranked since reaching No. 8 in the Nov. 7, 2000 poll.

The results of this season have not surprised coach Justine Sowry, who feels that her team is prepared to face any opponent in any game.

"It all started with having a belief a couple years ago and along with that belief it's a lot of hard work and determination," Sowry said. "We prepare the team well from what we actually do with the ball to what the opponent is potentially going to bring against us."

This weekend, both opponents will bring a lot to the table when they square off against the Minutewomen.

Northeastern enters Saturday's game with four consecutive victories after beginning its season with two losses. One of the four wins for the Huskies came against Boston University, the only team that tripped up UMass for a loss this season.

Northeastern will look for redemption after the Minutewomen were able to break a seven-game drought against the Huskies with a 2-1 win in their only meeting last season.

Though Northeastern is first on the schedule, a matchup with Boston College looms large on Sunday. The Eagles will be the second No. 9 ranked opponent UMass faces this season, with a 4-3 win coming against then-No 9 Iowa.

Boston College has had a little trouble thus far, trouncing opponents to achieve a 6-0 record. The Eagles' offense has been high-scoring this season, averaging over five goals a game and tallying seven goals on two different occasions.

For UMass, the defense will have to continue being sharp and sophomore goalkeeper Alesha Widdall will need to build off the success she's had this season if the Minutewomen plan on slowing down the Eagles.

"We've been keeping composed and keeping the ball out of net and all of the players have played very mature and impressive the last couple games," Sowry said. "If you look how the games went last weekend, we absorbed a tremendous amount of pressure in terms of statistics. Defending against 34 corner shots says a lot about our defense right now."

Though this is arguably the biggest game of the season for UMass, Boston College has their own test in Maryland this Saturday.

Undoubtedly, the Eagles will have had Maryland circled on their schedules as they are the defending national champions and No. 1 ranked team.

Sowry knows that there's potential for the Eagles to have a letdown after being fired up for the most important game of their season, but isn't counting on it.

"It would be nice if Maryland took [BC] to overtime, but we still have to take care of business on our end of things," Sowry said. "It's the old cliché, one game at a time, and we're focused on Northeastern right now."

Regardless of which team the Minutewomen will play first, these two matchups promise to provide both a high level of play and excitement. Sowry was able to sum up the expectations for this weekend in only six words.

"It's going to be a barnburner."

Jay Asser can be reached at jasser@student.umass.edu.

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

Jaime Bourazeris shields a defender from the ball in a game last season. The junior has scored two goals this season including the game winner against then-No. 9 Iowa.

MAXWELL SPARR/COLLEGIAN

Senior Cher King chases after a ball in a contest last fall. The forward currently leads the Minutewomen in points (5) with one goal and three assists through five games.

Rule changes being felt by UMass

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team faces a lot of changes in 2009. Not only do the Minutewomen have numerous freshmen on the team but the International Hockey Federation (FIH) – field hockey's national governing body – has implemented the new "self-hit rule" in an effort to increase the overall speed of games.

In conjunction with the new rule, free hits inside the 23-meter mark cannot be played directly into the striking circle. This rule was changed to prevent dangerous play from a strong hit towards the cage at close range.

No. 11 UMass (4-1) has already experienced the effects of the rule change. In Game 1 of the UMass Invitational, Boston University (1-5) consistently sped the ball up-field and into the Minutewomen scoring zone and frequently earned penalty corners. The Terriers held a 13-9 advantage in penalty corners, including three in overtime.

This showed a surefire way of getting scoring advantages on an opponent. Current penalty corner leaders in their respective conferences in the three major Division 1 field hockey conferences (Atlantic Coast, Big 10 and Big East) are also atop conference standings. The same is also true for the Atlantic 10 and America East conferences.

As far as the Minutewomen go, UMass coach Justine Sowry thinks that the new free-hit rule benefits the team by creating more scoring opportunities and forcing players to play a stouter defense.

"I think we've gone individual," Sowry said. "It has to be a total team effort defensively. On the flip side, the new rule is fantastic because more [scoring] opportunities are going to be opening up if you can create the spaces to form the [2-on-1] matchups and attack the circle."

Leading by example are backs Makaela Potts and Jaime Bourazeris. Along with junior captain Katie Kelly, the two defenders are tied for the team-lead in goals with two. Potts in particular is vital to the new team-dynamic. A former midfielder, Potts made the switch to defense because Sowry valued Potts' immense knowledge of the game and tenacious defense.

Polar opposites

The Minutewomen have given up 59 penalty corners this season but Sowry doesn't attribute this to the new rule change. Instead, Sowry feels that the team needs to play smarter defense. The learning curve for some of the younger players on the team doesn't seem to be affecting their playing time, either.

Against No. 13 James Madison (3-2) Sowry started four freshmen, including forward Kara Charochak, who is the only freshman on the team to record a goal. Fellow forward Kim Young leads all freshmen with six shots, one on goal.

Charochak's goal came against a nationally-ranked Iowa (1-5) team that pushed UMass even higher up in the rankings. Her score was the first of the game and by all accounts jump-started the Minutewomen offense that looked to rebound after being upset by the Terriers.

While no freshmen start in the backfield, Potts' transition to defense made space for the younger players to thrive.

While in the backfield, Potts can still be seen directing younger players who seem lost on defensive plays.

Productive backfield

Potts and Bourazeris have certainly seen plenty of scoring opportunities while in the backfield this season. Neither back is afraid to take the ball up-field if they find a break in the defense. Bourazeris' two goals are one-shy of her goal total of last season while Potts – as she did last season – continues to lead UMass in shots. The luxury of having one defender take the ball up-field while still having another strong defender remaining in the backfield is a luxury that both Sowry and the younger forwards can enjoy.

"Most of their goals are still coming from penalty corners," Sowry said of the defense. "That essentially hasn't changed [since last season]. They're our stroke power in the circle. However with our [younger] players developing, we're certainly looking for our backfield to overlap and get involved in the front-field attack."

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

Ruggles scores tying goal on 21st birthday

UM tallies first goal of season

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team finally put its scoreless drought to rest as senior Katie Ruggles punched in a game-tying free kick on her birthday en route to the team's second consecutive double-overtime tie.

UMass	1
Hartford	1

Following a foul on Hartford, Ruggles attempted a free kick from the left side. The shot deflected off Hartford goalkeeper Lauren Brodeur's hands into the net at the 51 minute, 28 second mark, tying the game and ending a season-starting five game scoreless streak.

"It feels great to say it's done," UMass coach Angela Napoli said referring to the team's fist goal. "We all feel relieved."

Hartford held UMass (0-4-2) to only three shots in a sloppy first half, while only attempting seven of its own. Redshirt junior Meghan Gould attempted the first shot of the game, missing a header wide at the 12:24 mark. At the same time UMass committed its first of five fouls within a 10 minute period. Over that same period the Hawks got off three shots, two of which were by redshirt freshman Alex Uscilla.

Hartford (3-3-1) was able to strike first, with senior Laura Guigli scoring on an assist from Breeanna Robinson a little after the midway point of the first half following a corner kick. The UMass defense immediately responded, allowing only three more shot attempts the rest of the half. All three shots were saved by Lauren Lucky. Sydney Stoll and Therese Smith countered with shots of their own, but were unable to get them by Brodeur.

"Our defenders, our entire team, worked hard to get back into it in the second half," said Napoli. "The 22 shots (in the first half from Hartford) made it seem like a tougher game than it really was. Only three of them were really threatening."

The story of the second half was the Minutewomen's first goal of the season and the continued strong play of freshman goalie Emily Cota, who shut down the Hawks in the second half and the two overtime periods.

After Ruggle's goal the Minutewomen offense came to a screeching halt, with redshirt junior Meredith Fox attempting the teams only other shot (which was saved by Brodeur) in the second half. In a 19:28 second period leading up to the half's final minutes, the Hawks had six unsuccessful scoring chances. Cota made one save while the other five went wide.

In the final 2:21 of regulation the Hawks were unsuccessful in four tries to keep the game from going into overtime. Cota saved shots from Robinson and sophomore Amber Smyth, while junior Mary Beth Hamilton was wide on her two attempts.

UMass' offensive struggles continued in the overtime periods. Fox attempted the team's only shot of the first overtime period. The Hawks attempted three shots, with Cota making her forth save and the other two being high and wide. In the second overtime the Minutewomen attacked early with a header by Gould 10 seconds into the 111th minute. Hartford had one last attempt on a header by Robinson with 54 seconds remaining, but the shot was wide.

"I'm proud of how [the team] came out in the second half," said Napoli. "It was ugly in the first half and we could have packed it in. We battled hard and worked hard in the second half and overtimes and seemed to have a lot more energy than Hartford. Unfortunately, it did not go our way."

UMass will resume its quest for victory number one on Sunday afternoon as the Minutewomen play host to St. Peter's. The Peahens (2-4-0) are coming off a home loss to Monmouth (3-2-0) and will be in action tonight against Bryant (1-4-0). Minus a 5-2 loss to St. Joseph's (2-3-1), their defense has been superb thus far. In their other five games the team has allowed an average of one goal per game.

Sophomore Courtney Sundstrom has been the Peahen's most effective player and leads the team in goals (two), points (four), shots (10) and shots on goal (seven). Senior Katelyn Matousek, sophomore Dana Grimes, and the freshmen duo of Jamie Lisanti and Chloe Zmolek have also chipped in goals for St. Peter's. Sophomore Brianna DeStefano leads the team with two assists.

The match is scheduled for a 3:30 p.m. and will be UMass' third home game of the season.

Mike Mastone can be reached at mmastone@student.umass.edu

MATTHEW HARRISON/COLLEGIAN

Katie Ruggles defends a Providence player early this season at Rudd Field. The senior scored the tying goal in the second half against Hartford, the first goal of the season for UMass.

BRIAN TEDDER/COLLEGIAN

Meghan Collins settles the ball against Holy Cross last season. The sophomore was the only freshman to register any points last season with her two assists.

BRIAN TEDDER/COLLEGIAN

Kelsey Anderson attempts to get past a Holy Cross defender in a match last season. The junior was fourth on the team with five shots prior to the teams contest with Hartford.

comics

JORNALISM AT ITS FINEST

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Megan Fox claims her power over men is supernatural. All evidence points to succubus.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
No one asks to pack a bowl of cereal.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Your mind is like a camera with the lens cap still on.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
If college is a precursor to the real world, then where are the bail-outs?

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Sometimes widows dress in white.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
The pen is certainly not mightier than a lightsaber.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Anything with the label "turbo" must be approved by Vin Diesel.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You don't remember your horoscope from yesterday... remember?

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
CNN's abuzz: Obama has promoted Kanye to be the new symbol for Democrats.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
I know you ate mah cheetos! Look at yo fingaz – they orange!

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
The sky is falling, and pollution is our last line of defense.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Are you bored? You must own a Playstation 3.

COLLEGIAN CLASSIFIEDS

CREDIT INTERNSHIP OPPORTUNITY

3 credit hour internship. Internet marketing and branding on bus line/ University Drive. Must be proficient with social networking sites. Call 413-549-4971 ask about internship opportunity.

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

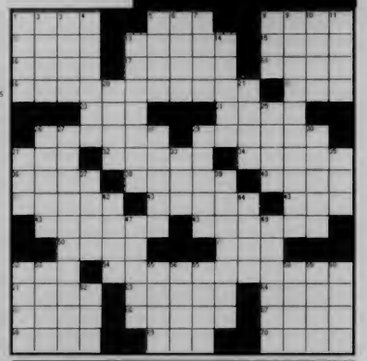
EMPLOYMENT

Calzone Transport Technician (Drivers) and Calzone Production Engineers (kitchen help) wanted. Apply at DP Dough, downtown Amherst

FOR RENT

Rt. 9 Hadley. 5 bedroom house. $2000/mo & utilities. 2 car garag. 1 & a qtr miles to campus. No beds. Large Lot. Music room. Skibiski Real Estate. 586-1827.

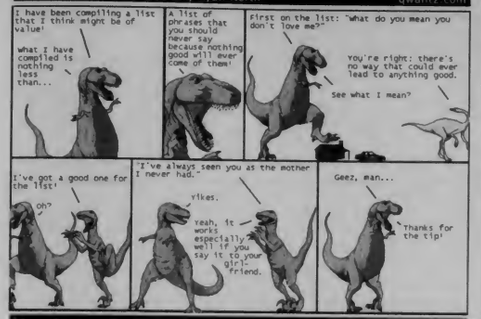
SPRING BREAK 2010



Spring Break 2010 sell trips, earn cash, and go free! Call for group discounts. Best prices guranteed! Info/ reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

CROSSWORD

ACROSS
1. Cancel
5. Not her
8. Location
12. Lion sound
13. Pentateuch
15. Break
16. Bit
17. Hemorrhagic fever
18. Decorative case
19. An artifact that belongs to another time
22. And so on
23. A scientific workplace
24. Faucets
26. Vinegary
29. Emissary
31. Nigerian tribesman
32. Sullen or moody
34. Ancient Roman magistrate
36. Dispatched
38. Wavelike design
40. Cozy
41. A woman of refinement
43. Move stealthily
45. Bother
46. Down in the dumps
48. Suppress
50. Weaving machine
51. Famous boxer
52. Blvd.
54. Similarity in appearance
61. Declare untrue
63. Licit
64. Not long now
65. Numbered cubes
66. Banal
67. Coagulated milk
68. Killed
69. East southeast
70. I I I I



DOWN
1. Murres
2. Midday
3. Information
4. Soothsayer
5. Vagabond
6. Weightlifters pump this
7. French Sudan
8. 180° from NNW
9. Pertaining to the bowels
10. Tight
11. Very imposing or impressive
13. A metallic element with the symbol Tb
14. Undue speed
20. Stetsons and derbies
21. Magician
25. Mats
26. Perpendicular to the keel
27. An expression of sympathy
28. Not open
27. An expression of sympathy
28. Not open
30. Avoid
31. Any doctrine
33. Family
35. Bigheadedness
37. Tropical root
39. Comestible
42. Drop anchor
44. Slay
47. Refine, as metal
49. Debacle
52. Tallies
53. Obscure
55. Arid
56. Auspices
57. Engage in sexual intercourse
58. Person, place or thing
59. Center
60. Concludes
62. A type of evergreen shrub

SUDOKU

	1			6		2	4
5							1
2		6		1	4		9
		7		5			2
	6		3		7
						5		4
8					1
6						9	5
			2	7

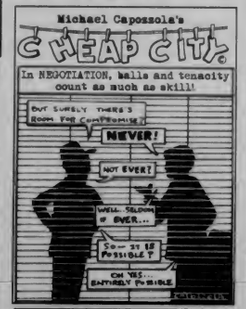
Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North — qwantz.com

Mr. Gnu by Travis Dandro — travisdandro.com

Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub — chainsawsuit.com

Wondermark by David Malki! — wondermark.com

Opiate of the People by Emily Regan



My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees — mnftiu.cc

Labrat by Richard Martelly

Cheap City by Michael Capozzola

Getting out of jury duty is easy. The trick is to say you're prejudiced against all races.
- Homer J. Simpson

WE WANT YOUR COMICS

Put your comics in front of thousands of readers!

EMAIL:

comics@dailycollegian.com

Or friend us on facebook: "Collegian Comix"

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY
COLLEGIAN

HIGH: 79 LOW: 54 www.DailyCollegian.com MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 2009

New Developments aim to benefit students seeking financial aid

A new system will limit monthly payments on merit-based loans

By Davin Surin
Collegian Staff

A loan, the bane of existence for many students, has always been an option to assist in the cost of higher education. Then thre' is also financial aid in the form of grants, scholarships, and work study, which are offered to soften the blow of loans. For many years, the college financial aid system was complicated, and seemingly tortuous for most students and their families.

Recently, long overdue developments in the system have been implemented.

Sandy Baum, a professor of economics at Skidmore College in New York, detailed the following developments in financial aid.

Baum mentioned income-based repayment for federal student loans. In simpler terms, the new system will limit monthly payments on federal student loans to a percentage based on the borrower's income.

However, Baum stated that, "this system is not perfect, as while the government will pay the interest for some borrowers whose payments don't cover it, others will see their debts grow as interest accrues."

Any time the federal government increases gift aid programs, students benefit. The Pell Grant is awarded on a financial need formula and the maximum is set yearly by the U.S. Congress. The amount of the Pel Ggrant increased to $5350 from $4731 in 2008-2009 for students with zero Expected Family Contribution (EFC).

In addition, the EFC range was extended from $4110 to $4617. According to Ed Blaguszewski of the University of Massachusetts Office of News and Media Relations, more students will be eligible.

Now, there is no escape from loans. But these recent developments in the repayment and source of loans are a welcmed change.

Other notable changes including the sources of college loans, such as switching of the Direct Lending program from the Federal Family Education Loan Program (FFEL).

"UMass Amherst participates in the Direct Lending program, so the proposed change to eliminate lenders for the Federal Family Education Loan Program will have no negative impacts on our students," Blaguszewski said. "There will not be the need for all students to complete any additional paperwork, which would occur on a campus that has to switch from FFELP to Direct Lending."

Lastly, the Department of Education continues to work on ways to streamline the Free Application for Federal Student Aid (FAFSA). In the past, the FAFSA has been a complicated application process. Fortunately, the new application will significantly minimize the number of questions, especially specific questions that do not pertain to a student's circumstances.

Blaguszewski acknowledged that in 2008-2009, more tha 75% percent of Uerst's full-time undergraduates completed the FAFSA. This compares with abou 45% percent of all public colleges and universities in Massachusetts.

Even with the improvements in financial aid system, some UMass students were still skeptical about how significant the changes would be.

"These changes are good, but I feel many students are still going to need all the financial aid they can gts," said Eduardo Manta, a sophomore student majoring in mechanical engineering. "We go to college to reap riches. What's the point of college if we have to pay back endless loans afterwardith But with the rising tuition and living cost, other students were more appreciaveed of loans.

"I can't complain about financial aid," said Danny Weng, a sophomore transfer student. "Even though I dislike loans, they have enabled me to fulfill my dream for a college education."

Davin Surin can be reached at dsurin@student.umass.edu

UMass rams URI see page 8

Kyle Havens makes his changes at the line of scrimmage in UMass' 30-10 victory over Rhode Island on Saturday. The win was the Minutemen's first confrence win of the season.

The Massachusetts Lieutenant Governor lectured students last Friday, Sept. 18 on civic engagement and youth activism urging them to get involved in the political system.

UMass democrats play host to Massachusetts Lt. Gov. Tim Murray

Murray lectured students on the importance of political activism starting at a young age

By S.P. Sullivan
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts Lieutenant Governor Tim Murray delivered a lecture on civic engagement and youth activism at the University of Massachusetts last Friday, Sept. 18.

Murray, who was invited by the UMass Democrats (UDems), told the modest crowd that political activism at a young age can be an educational experience that opens doors, but made clear that real-world politics is more than circulating petitions.

"One of my favorite quotes, from [former New York governor] Mario Cuomo, is that, 'There's the poetry of the campaign, and then there's the hard prose of governing,'" Murray said. "That's making decisions, that's counting votes, it's trying to build consensus."

Murray, who spent 10 years prior to his term as lieutenant governor at the town lever, first as a Worcester, Mass. city councilor and later as the city's mayor, also spoke to the old idiom that all politics is local.

"Let me make a pitch for local government ... Oftentimes, there is a penchant from all of us who have an interest in government and politics to look at

See Murray on page 3

'Powerhouse' speaker Jarrett delivers lecture on solar power

By Sam Hayes
Collegian Staff

Christopher Jarrett, director of the School of Architecture at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte spoke on solar power in an open lecture last Thursday at the University of Massachusetts.

The speech took place in the campus center and was part of a lecture series given by Environmental Institute. Titled "Powerhouse," Jarrett saw more than 60 students, faculty and others come to Room 163 for a discussion on the paradox of lightness and energy conservation.

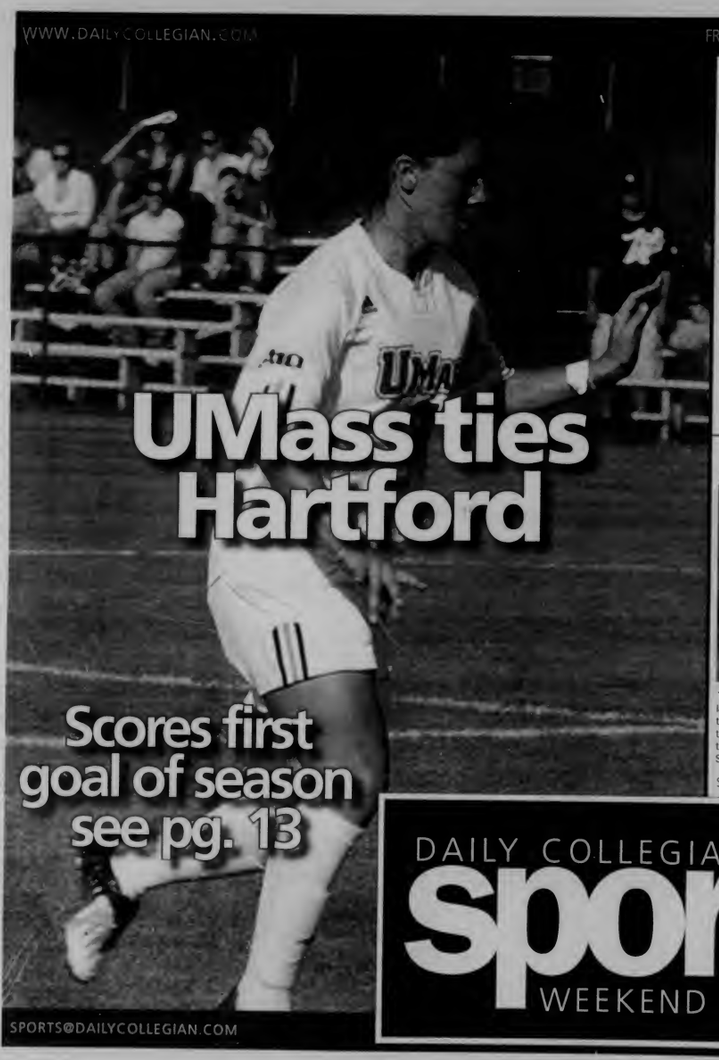
The award-winning professor took the stage and introduced the topic of discussion: Georgia Tech's entry into the 2007 Solar Decathlon, a competition on the National Mall in Washington, D.C. Every two years, 20 universities from around the globe compete to build a solar energy powered single-family home in the event.

UMass is looking to enter the competition in the coming years and is consulting with Jarrett, who was the manager for Georgia Tech's 2007 entry.

The project led to true interdisciplinary partnership, unprecedented on the Georgia Tech campus, Jarrett explained. He said that the interactions were so great that, eventually, the deans of each of the university's colleges were writing checks to one another for the project.

Collaborators ranged from architectural graduate students to undergraduate biology majors. They worked together from the early stages of design to construction and fundraising all the way to students traveling and fixing the popping tires on the way to Washington, D.C. for the competition. Jarrett said that two students even chose to postpone graduation in order to finish the competition.

The Solar Decathlon was unlike most other school work, Jarrett said, calling it "a collaborative research, not just design." It led to highly com-



See Solar on page 2

Arts&Living
"When You Think Of"
Late Thursday evening, the "Notnostrums," an online poetry group, performed "When You Think Of," at Amherst Cinema.
SEE PAGE 5

Sports
Minutewomen fall to No. 9 BC
After cruising past Northeastern on Saturday, UMass hit a bum in the road on Sunday when the fell to the Eagles, 2-1 in overtime.
SEE PAGE 8

Editorial&Opinion
A taste of Israeli cuisine
A surprising strength of Israel is its food markets. The United States could learn from their model says Collegian columnist Eli Gottlieb.
SEE PAGE 4

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 2009

UMass ties Hartford

Scores first goal of season see pg. 13

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

FIELD HOCKEY

The Minutewomen have won three straight games this season against ranked opponents and currently have a three-game winning streak. They hope to extend both of those when they face Northeastern and No. 9 BC this weekend.

SEE PAGE 12

CROSS COUNTRY

The Minutemen hope to improve on last week's second-place finish and the Minutewomen hope to better their third-place showing when they both host five-team meets this Saturday.

SEE PAGE 11

DAILY COLLEGIAN
sports
WEEKEND EDITION

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
CXVIX
Issue 10

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief William McGuinness
Managing Editor S.P. Sullivan
Business Manager Daniel Jette
Production Manager Michael Sarkes
Night Supervisor Kirsten Swenson
Advertising Manager Michael Tortorici
Advertising Production Max Deimer
Arts & Living Editor Shauna Murphy
Comics Editor Annie Keithline
Editorial Editor Nick O'Malley
News Editor Nick Bush
Sports Editor Jeffrey R. Larriard
Web Editor Brian Wood
Photo Editor Matthew Harrison
IT Manager Victor Jacek
Asst. Business Manager Matt Zolnierz
Assistant Advertising Nicole Jacinto
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Distribution Manager Norman Provost
Classified Manager Katelyn Tamilio
Asst. Arts & Living Justin Gagnon
Asst. Arts & Living Elise Horowitz
Asst. Arts & Living Cal Scannell
Assistant Comics Andrew Witts
Assistant Editorial Michael Phillis
Assistant Editorial Hannah Nelson
Assistant News Samuel Butterfield
Assistant News Alissa Creamer
Assistant News Jenn Heshion
Assistant Sports David Brinch
Assistant Sports Mike Gillmeister
Assistant Sports Adam Miller
Assistant Photo Maxwell Sparr
Assistant Multimedia Sara Cody
Assistant Multimedia Chris Shores

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenues. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Bi-Weekly Collegian in 1956. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nick O'Malley

COPY EDITOR
Caitlyn Quinn

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Guanno

Lecturer tells students about solar research

Jarrett, director of the School of Architecture at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte spoke on solar power last Thursday.

Solar from page 1

plex work that usually occurred in practice rather than education.

Jarrett showed a series of diagrams explaining the processes involved, laying the groundwork for a UMass entry into the Department of Energy-run competition.

Jarrett also briefly discussed what he called the politics of solar energy, explaining a concise history of solar power.

According to Jarrett, if the U.S. filled 100 square miles with solar panels, it would fulfill all energy needs for the entire country.

After finishing his presentation, he fielded questions from the audience. Questions focused on the competition, regulations, team camaraderie and nanotechnology in photovoltaic solar paneling.

Sam Hayes can be reached at sdhayes@student.umass.edu

To-do list:
1) Go to dentist
2) Write for the Daily Collegian
3) Become local folk hero
4) Call Mom

WRITE FOR THE COLLEGIAN
Contact Nick Bush
News@dailycollegian.com

Former associate to Dillinger, Capone and Nelson recollects his past behind prison bars

By Pete Kendall
Cleburne Times-Review, Texas

John Paul Chase was a loyal associate of criminals Baby Face Nelson and John Dillinger before transitioning to longtime guest of the federal prison system at Alcatraz and Leavenworth.

FBI director J. Edgar Hoover once referred to Chase as "a rat with a patriotic sounding name."

Tom Craig, on the other hand, remembered Chase as "a great guy with a lot of interesting stories about Dillinger, but I could tell he was a hardened criminal."

Craig, who recently retired at 73 as chief deputy at Johnson County Law Enforcement Center, and Chase crossed paths in 1963 when Alcatraz, the infamous San Francisco Bay prison, was being mothballed because of its spiraling maintenance costs and decrepit condition.

Chase also served time at Leavenworth.

"Chase didn't share a lot of information with me," Craig said. "It was one of those deals where you wanted to sit down and spend time with him because he was interesting. He didn't cause us any problems when he was incarcerated. He was anxious for the move [from Alcatraz to Leavenworth]. All the inmates were."

Craig also had contact at Alcatraz with hoodlum Lefty Egan, another inmate with a heavily checkered past that included an association with Al Capone.

"They called him Lefty because he was paralyzed on his right side," Craig said.

In his book, "Escape from Alcatraz," author J. Campbell Bruce indicated Egan must have been on fairly good terms with the Alcatraz hierarchy.

Egan fell from a scaffold one day while painting and was saved by an assistant warden named Miller after a guard was unable to assist.

"He grabs at the rope with his crippled right hand," according to Bruce's account. "but it's no good. The guard's an older fellow with a bad heart. He can't help. Just then [assistant warden] Miller comes by. He runs up and catches Lefty. It knocks the wind out of him, and he staggers and goes down, Lefty on top of him. Lefty told me later if Miller hadn't risked my own neck, he'd have been a goner, sure as hell."

Alcatraz had little in common with your neighborhood Sheraton, Hilton or multicell clink.

"I was one of a group of five people chosen to help in the closing," Craig said. "I was there four and a half months. It was scary. You're riding in that boat across the water to get to the facility, and you think, 'What if something goes wrong once I get there.' It had deteriorated badly. The walls were saturated with rust. Just the upkeep was unbelievable. It really was time to move the prisoners out of there."

Besides Alcatraz and Leavenworth, Craig worked at federal prisons at La Tuna, near El Paso; Chicago, Seattle and Portland, Ore.

His job partly entailed finding adequate housing for paroled inmates and helping set up drug treatment centers.

He turned down a prison job in New York.

Prison work was challenging, he said. Occasional contact with celebrity inmates broke any monotony.

"The fertilizer guy, Billie Sol Estes, was my clerk at Leavenworth," Craig said.

Estes, long released and now a resident of Granbury, is known to pass out business cards that say, "Let's Make A Deal. Billie Sol Estes. King of the Wheeler Dealers."

"If I saw him on the street today, I'd say, 'Hey, Billie, how is it going?' It would be an affable conversation on my part," Craig said. "He should remember me. He sat at my desk, and we talked many times. He never denied what he did to get sent to prison."

Along with the colorful Estes, Mafia don Vito Genovese did time at Leavenworth.

"I knew Genovese was there," Craig said, "but I never had any contact with him."

Craig became a certified peace officer in 1973 while serving as warden of the Dallas County jail under Sheriff Clarence Jones.

"I was detention supervisor from 1973-76," Craig said. "Then Clarence lost an election, and I was told by the new sheriff that there wasn't room for me. The new guy had been fired by Clarence. He had told Clarence, 'I'm going to come back and haunt you.'" He did.

"I did consulting work after that in Texas, Mississippi, Arkansas and Oklahoma. I worked for Concept Incorporated and became their director at the facility in Bridgeport. I did a short stint with the parole board. Then I was contacted by [former Johnson County Sheriff] Eddy Boggs to see if I'd be interested in helping him write policy and procedures. I came on board at the old county jail. I helped with the jail operation."

Through his association with Boggs Craig met Sheriff Bob Alford, who was then head of the Johnson County TASK force. Craig and Alford were not close at the time.

They were brought together by Darrell McCravey, a former sheriff's deputy Craig had hired at the jail.

When Alford was elected in 1997 and began looking for someone to run the jail, McCravey told him, "I know the man for the job." Alford contacted Craig, and a long partnership and friendship was born.

"I felt he was very sincere about wanting to get the jail straightened out," Craig said. "He had me sold. I thought, 'This guy is going to be solid.' There were ups and downs. At the same time, he was gung ho and wanted to get things squared away. He's done a magnificent job."

Renovating the facility wasn't a snap, Craig learned.

"The first thing we had to do was fix the intercom system," Craig said. "That was a life-safety issue. An inmate has to be able to press a button if he has a problem or sees a problem. The inmates had torn up the system. It took three weeks to repair. The next thing we had to do was clean the place. Then we had to get the showers and toilets all working. There was human waste in some of the toilets. We had to change out 80 percent of the lights. The officers didn't have enough light to check cells."

Alford retained Ann Brown as Craig's assistant, Craig said.

"We had good staff and inmate labor," he added. "We found inmates who had plumbing and electrical experience and put them to work. They were supervised, of course. We found painters. I got the female inmates paint rollers and showed them how to paint."

Jails are never happy, but this one was happier, Craig said.

"The facility had been decertified by the state in 1996. During the recertification tour in early '97, I walked the jail with [state inspector] Traci Dollar. She said, 'This is not the same jail.' The inmates were voicing their opinions that living conditions were much better. A lot of work had to be done, but it was very rewarding. I enjoyed my job."

Now he will enjoy private life.

"One of the first things I want to do is get my left knee replaced," Craig said. "I had the right one done two years ago. After that, I'll probably do some traveling."

John Paul Chase was a mob informant who was also a longtime guest at the notorious Alcatraz prison located in San Francisco Bay.

Public Health & Health Sciences Career & Internship Fair

Thinking about a career in public health and health sciences?

Want an internship or a community service project?

Wondering what kind of jobs you could get with a degree in public health and health sciences?

Learn about careers and internships in public health and network with public health professionals. Over 25 health organizations from Western Massachusetts attending!

For: Undergraduate and graduate students
Where: UMass Campus Center Auditorium
When: Thursday September 24, 2009
Time: 10:00am - 2:00pm
Refreshments and light lunch will be served.
Special performance by the Not Ready for Bedtime Players.

FREE and Open to the Public.
Come for any or all of the time.

Please contact risa@schoolph.umass.edu or call 545-2529 for more information.

SPHS School of Public Health and Health Sciences

Funding was provided by a cooperative agreement between the Association of Schools of Public Health and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

UMASS AMHERST

BE THE FIRST
REGISTRATION

$35 fee, only the first 70 contestants will be accepted

Who can register:
16 - adult

For more information or to register, either call 413-259-3065 or visit www.lsse.org

Amherst Idol

Where:
Regional Middle School Auditorium

When:
Friday October 25th 6:30 pm: General Audition Night
Saturday November 26th 7:00 pm: Top 25 perform
Friday October 2nd 7:00 pm: Top 10 perform
Saturday October 10th 7:30 pm: Top 5 perform

FINALS

Got it All! Daily Hampshire Gazette | 98.3 WHAI | Amherst Leisure Services Community Theater | Hits Now 94.1 | Dining Star Karaoke www.TenMoves.com

This is not a student sponsored program

Lt. Gov. Murray urges students to become engaged in politics the statehouse or maybe to Washington, D.C. as being the place of action. But in all 351 cities and towns [in Mass.], there's a real opportunity for you to get involved."

Murray from page 1

Murray went on to say that he experienced firsthand the power of youth involvement in politics during his run for office with Governor Deval Patrick. "I saw – when Governor Patrick got elected in 2006 – a level of involvement among young people in a gubernatorial campaign that I had never seen before," he said.

"Please don't underestimate the importance [of the role] you guys play and the doors that it opens up in terms of résumé and contacts and the people you meet. By engaging in the process you are being good citizens, responsible Americans, and doing what some of your peers are dying for, in Iraq or Afghanistan," Charlie Felder, president of the UDems, said in an interview after Murray's lecture that they invited the lieutenant governor as an early-semester reminder that college is the best time to get involved.

"The idea was that he was to highlight the importance of staying involved, canvassing, phone banking, going to town hall meetings as a young member of society," Felder said. "Because we have just as much invested in the legislation and the bills that are being passed through Congress at this time, and it's really up to us to convince our peers – that are let's face it, busy or just not as tuned in to what's going on – that everybody has a stake in it."

"The lieutenant governor is just our standard example of a Commonwealth citizen who was able to work his way through the system," added Guy McGuinn, press director, "He was on the board of the public library in Worcester, and worked his way up to the city council, to the mayor's and then to the lieutenant governor's office. And that shows the power of politics in Massachusetts."

S.P. Sullivan can be reached at spsulliv@dailycollegian.com.

Experts say many scams against college students are done online

By Gene Trainor
McClatchy Newspapers

FORT WORTH, Texas — Phil Banker said he "freaked out" when he saw his bank account balance after buying a $100 cell phone with his debit card. The receipt showed that $1,919 was missing from his checking account.

The money was spent in the Baltimore area – a place he had never visited.

Banker, then a University of North Texas senior, called Wells Fargo Bank, the company that issued his debit card. He suspects that his debit card information was stolen after he bought a textbook over the Internet in February 2008 from a company he didn't completely trust.

"They were selling this textbook at a radical discount from anywhere else," Banker said. "So I took a chance, and I got burned for it."

Identity theft and scam investigators say they hear stories like this all the time. College-age Americans are not the most likely age group to become victims of fraud – those ages 25 to 44 are, according to a 2004 Federal Trade Commission report. But college students' love affair with technology, and sometimes their naiveté, makes them vulnerable to some types of identity theft, experts say.

Colleges and universities add to the problem by issuing student identification cards that double as debit cards or allowing credit card companies to market their products on campus, some say. And credit card companies are expected to scramble this fall to sign up college students before a new federal law takes effect in February that will restrict their practices.

Experts urge students to take precautions as the new school year gets under way. A little cynicism usually helps, said Denise Owens, Comerica Bank's Texas fraud and identity theft investigator.

"If it seems too good to be true, it is," Owens said.

Many scams against college students are hatched online, experts said. Students often fall victim to work-from-home, Internet sales and identification scams, said Owens, who has investigated scams and identity theft for 18 years. These crimes tend to involve wiring or sending money overseas or to other parts of the country.

"Because they're on the Internet so often, and they do so much of their stuff online, I do see them fall victim to a lot of the Internet fraud scams," Owens said.

Sometimes criminals posing as promoters persuade fraternities or sports clubs to sign students up for credit cards. No cards exist – the goal is to open fraudulent accounts using the students' addresses, Social Security numbers and birthdates from the so-called applications, said Betsy Broder, assistant director of the Federal Trade Commission's division of privacy and identity protection.

Some thieves don't go to that trouble. College students reveal all sorts of information about themselves on social-networking sites, experts said. It all comes down to being too trusting.

"If someone were to call them and ask them for personal information, they just provide that information," Owens said. "Unless they initiated the contact or they can verify whom they're speaking with, they shouldn't give out personal information. And financial institutions and credit card companies will never ask them for their PIN number or the security code on the back of their card."

Students' mailboxes will likely be stuffed with credit card offers because of the federal Credit Card Accountability, Responsibility and Disclosure Act of 2009. Effective Feb. 22, the law prevents credit card companies from giving students gifts in exchange for credit card applications and from sending offers unless the student agreed to have them sent, according to Consumers Union, publisher of Consumers Report magazine. The law also requires colleges to publicly disclose any marketing contracts made with credit card companies.

"This is the last season that credit card companies are going to be able to actively market on campus, giving away free T-shirts and all the other freebies," said Lauren Bowne, a Consumers Union attorney.

The University of North Texas and the University of Texas at Arlington both have agreements with Wells Fargo to issue identification cards that students can choose to activate as debit cards.

At Texas Christian, Texas Wesleyan and Texas Woman's universities, student ID cards can be used for meal plans, access to rooms and bookstore purchases. But they can't be used off campus – except in the case of TCU, where they can be used at some nearby restaurants.

Banks and credit card companies pay schools to issue student ID/debit cards and in some cases to solicit students during certain times, such as orientation. To some colleges, that adds up to millions of dollars a year, said Lawrence Wilson, president of the Plano, Texas-based ID Theft Victims Support Group of North America.

At UT-Arlington, every ID card issued has a Wells Fargo logo, said Kristin Sullivan, assistant vice president for media relations. The university receives 75 cents per card, along with additional payments if people link their cards to a Wells Fargo account. Under this agreement, UT-Arlington received $7,876 last fiscal year and $15,369 during the 2006-07 year. About 2,000 of the school's 30,000 cardholders have linked their cards to a Wells Fargo account, she said.

As part of UNT's debit card agreement, Wells Fargo contributes $15,000 annually to the school's Regents Scholarship Fund.

To Wilson, such debit cards open students to identity theft. Thieves could access students' bank accounts if they hack into some school computer systems, or if students lose their cards. "It basically paints a target on the backs of our college students," Wilson said.

Universities only recently got away from using Social Security numbers throughout campus, said Mary Monahan, managing partner and research director at Javelin Strategy & Research, a California-based financial services research company. "I don't think it's a good idea to use ID cards as debit cards," she said.

But the FTC's Broder said university debit cards are as safe as any other debit card. She was not alarmed if security precautions get taken. Wells Fargo has identity theft prevention, detection and mitigation programs, but the company did not want to provide details to protect security. Sullivan said UT-Arlington has had no major problems with the cards and has no access to bank account information.

In Banker's case, he said Wells Fargo cut access to his account, replaced his cash and sent him a new card with a new account number within a few days. A cousin in the financial industry ran a search through Banker's credit history to see whether any other blips popped up. So far nothing abnormal has occurred, he said.

Corey Graves, 20, of Fort Worth said he has no idea how his identity was stolen. All he knows is that on June 24 he received a call from his bank informing him that a woman in South Texas had used his Social Security number to try to get a mortgage.

He said he lost his wallet in the eighth grade, but it didn't have his Social Security card.

"Other than that, I've never lost anything with any valuable information, as far as bank numbers or anything like that," said Graves, a junior at Sam Houston State University. "I shred all that stuff."

He now wonders what will happen if he applies for a mortgage.

If students fall victim to identity theft or scams, they should notify police, their banks and credit card companies, said Debra Geister, director of fraud prevention and compliance solutions at LexisNexis. They also should contact credit bureaus and have them issue fraud alerts and credit freezes on their accounts.

And they should file an identity theft affidavit with the Federal Trade Commission, which they can do online or through the mail, she added. By Nov. 1, the federal Red Flags Rule requires that nonbank organizations that extend credit, including colleges and universities, have an identity theft prevention program, Geister said. Banks had to comply last year.

Primarily, students need to give out as little personal information as possible.

"We all tend to be trusting as human beings," Geister said. "When our radar should go off, sometimes it doesn't."

Preventing ID theft

College students can take several steps to stop identification theft:

1. Campus computers and Wi-Fi hot spots aren't always secure. Use encryption (i.e. anti-keylogging software, or password protection) to scramble communications over the network.

2. Change passwords frequently. Keep your anti-virus and anti-spyware software up-to-date with the latest releases. If you use your laptop around campus, always take it with you to ensure that your hard drive isn't compromised.

3. Reveal little personal information on social-networking sites, especially family name, address, phone numbers and date of birth.

4. Don't carry your Social Security number with you. If your college uses Social Security numbers for student IDs, request that the college generate a random number instead.

5. Buy a cross-cut shredder and properly dispose of all personal and financial materials. Credit card offers, bank statements and tax documents should be shredded or stored in a secure spot. A dorm room is usually not a secure spot.

6. If you shop online look for "https" in the URL. Check with sites' privacy policies so you know what they may be doing with your personal information, or whether they've attached cookies to your computer, enabling them to track your viewing and usage patterns.

7. Routinely review your credit report. Under a federal law, you have the right to receive a free copy of your credit report once every 12 months from each of the three nationwide credit reporting companies. To request your free annual report under that law, visit www.annualreport.com.

9. If you use peer-to-peer file sharing programs, be sure to configure the files securely so personal information is not accessible to others.

10. Physically remove the hard drive before you throw out that old computer. Erasing data just enables the computer to write over that space again; it doesn't eliminate the original bits and bytes.

11. Never check "remember me" to log into Web sites. The harder you make it for hackers to follow your trail into an online store or bank account, the better.

12. Make photocopies of your driver's license, credit cards, insurance cards, all of it – front and back. Should your wallet be lost or stolen, you won't be left wondering what was taken, and you can quickly notify the appropriate agencies about a theft.

The Republican party has cited politics as the major source of conflict with President Barack Obama. The party members have denounced controversial claims that racism has been the cause of recent disputes.

Republicans swear it is just politics

By Robin Abcarian and Peter Wallsten
Tribune Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON — Stung by accusations from some Democrats that bigotry underlies opposition to President Barack Obama and wary of further setbacks among minority voters, some Republicans are pushing back with a new mantra: We are not racists.

That theme was on display this weekend at an annual rally for conservative voters where several of the GOP's potential 2012 challengers to Obama began laying out their arguments to unseat him.

Republicans are walking an aggressive but delicate line as they try to assure voters that their profound displeasure with the president is based on his policies, not his race.

Some Democrats, such as former President Jimmy Carter, have alleged that the rise in opposition to Obama this summer came about because he is black.

"It's important that we robustly reject any charges that we're racist," said Gary Bauer, president of the social conservative group American Values. He brought activists to their feet on Friday with a speech arguing that conservatives would gladly support any minority candidate for president who embraced their "pro-family, pro-life" values.

"There's a reason that partisans are quick to throw the racist charge out there, because they know that, unresponded to and undefended, it not only damages Republican chances with minority voters.

But it also damages the party with millions of white suburban voters who, like most of us, desperately want racial reconciliation and believe that is what the country has to do to survive long term," Bauer said later.

At least two prominent conservative African-Americans were featured in the program of the "Values Voter Summit" — author Star Parker, a former self-admitted welfare cheat who now rails against big government and entitlement programs, and former Ohio secretary of state Ken Blackwell.

The debate over race poses dangers for both parties.

Obama, not wanting to alienate whites, has tried to distance himself from any allegations of racism against conservatives.

Even civil rights activist Al Sharpton told CNN that Carter's remarks had been blown out of proportion.

All of the potential Republican presidential candidates who appeared at the weekend meetings — including Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney — avoided the subject of race.

A spate of racial incidents has not helped the GOP's image.

This spring in Tennessee, an assistant to a Republican state senator sent an e-mail titled "Historical Keepsake Photo" that featured thumbnail portraits of all 44 American presidents — Obama's image was two white googly eyes against a black background.

In California, the Republican mayor of Los Alamitos sent an e-mail depicting the White House lawn as a watermelon patch, with the caption "No Easter egg hunt this year."

Bauer said Republicans need to find the right balance, telling "what I believe is a dwindling number of racists in America that conservatism is not a home for them," while assuring minority voters that conservatives share their pride in the historic nature of Obama's election even as they fight his agenda.

Massachusetts
HARVEST
FOR STUDENTS Week

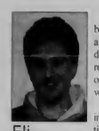
- Meet John Ash, nationally renowned wine/food educator, restaurateur, and cookbook author of From the EARTH to the TABLE, Wednesday and Thursday 7pm
- Meet local farmers, artisan cheese makers, and bee keepers
- Sample fresh from the garden produce

MONDAY 9/21 · HAMPSHIRE DC
TUESDAY, 9/22 · FRANKLIN DC
WEDNESDAY, 9/23 · BERKSHIRE DC
THURSDAY, 9/24 · WORCESTER DC

September 21–24
All DCs from 5–9 pm

Local Hero | Restaurants & Institutions Ivy | UMass Amherst | UMass Dining UMassAmherst umassdining.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN



EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 21ST, 2009

"FREEDOM OF SPEECH IS OF NO USE TO A MAN WHO HAS NOTHING TO SAY..." - FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Israelies and their cuisine

Eli Gottlieb

By now, I've been in Israel for a month and I've developed some reasonably strong opinions about the work I'm doing.

This isn't an international politics perspective, though, so you're not going to hear about that. You're going to hear about things I think will interest you. First, however, I'd like to say that I desperately miss the University of Massachusetts Computer Science Department and Humans vs. Zombies. I'm writing some code for open-source release in my copious free time, but it just doesn't seem the same. Next semester should come quickly.

For now, though, I could tell everyone just about anything about this crazy little (it's both crazy and little) country. I could write about my temporary home city, about the politics, about the transportation system, about the language, anything. However, I have a hard time figuring out what to write week-by-week because things seem very normal here.

I honestly think that America should try to adjust its food production system to create a consumer market closer to that of Israel for reasons of both health and taste.

Many glaring differences exist between Israel and America, but I don't feel as though I've walked into a different world. To wit, the public transportation system here works on buses rather than giant sandworms, and the only life-changing difference from home to here is that everyone has universal health insurance.

So this week, I'd like to tell everyone about one of the biggest, most noticeable differences between living here in Israel and living in America: the food. I honestly think that America should try to adjust its food production system to create a consumer market closer to that of Israel for reasons of both health and taste.

Meat is expensive here; about a kilogram of chicken breast costs close to 35 shequlim (one shequlim is worth about 1.5 dollars). On the other hand, a kilogram of peppers costs seven shequlim, and peppers are the most expensive of vegetables.

As a result, vegetables, fruits, legumes and other plants compose most of the local diet. Even that famously Israeli, famously delicious street food, the shwarma (shavings of slow-roasted, marinated lamb or dark-meat turkey) in a pita pocket or lafah wrap, actually contains more vegetable bits to accompany the meat than meat itself.

Things also come in smaller portions here, with a small glidah (ice cream or gelato) cup coming so tiny that no self-respecting American soft-serve stand would call it even one scoop. Lastly, in a true miracle of the Holy Land, cottage cheese here tastes awesome.

As a result, my body has readjusted to a healthier diet and I'm losing weight by the week. When Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, came around and everyone started trotting out sugary treats for a "sweet new year" I felt nastily overloaded with sugar in a way that I hadn't remembered at any point since being a small child – when my parents had fed me a diet not unlike the one available here.

We don't buy all these nice things in the supermarket, either. We buy meat, dairy and other processed foods at a supermarket or corner store, but we buy our vegetables, spices and for some reason small candies at the weekly shuk – an open-air bazaar-type market frequented by farmers, shopkeepers and sellers of pirated video games.

Everything there comes dead cheap, to the point that you really shouldn't trust anything but the fowls and that the Chinese-branded polo shirts actually come from where they say it do.

We do actually have reasons for these differences. Despite America possessing a whole continent of some of the best farmland on Earth, it uses agricultural subsidies to encourage the growth of only one major crop on much of that land: corn. Thus, in America we buy corn-fed meat, get dairy from corn-fed cows (sheep and goat dairy is quite common here), eat sweets made from corn syrup and pay more for vegetables that don't receive government money.

My point? That we ought to end corn subsidies and let the markets decide fairly between farmers and consumers what grows out of American soil. We actually have the warm-climate and desert areas for growing most of what grows in the Mediterranean Holy Land, but we just have to employ the right technology and to decide to grow more of things like parsley, cardamom and chickpeas rather than corn, wheat and potatoes that can grow just fine in the colder areas.

Also, if anyone wants to start a shuk to replace the Amherst farmers' market so that I could buy video games with my Massachusetts scones and onions, I'll explain how the whole thing works.

Eli Gottlieb is a Collegian Columnist. He can be reached at egottlie@student.umass.edu

Fed/Up? Ed/Op.

editorial@dailycollegian.com

Prioritizing personal dangers

Lauren Rockoff

There are a million things to fear and avoid on the Univeristy of Massachusetts campus and in the greater world beyond.

A year ago, most of us were obsessing about the Bisphenol A (BPA) and phthalates or whatever in the plastic of our water bottles.

A small minority – mostly hippy and eco-loving types – did something about it, and began using stainless steal water bottles probably filled with water from their plastic Brita water filters.

You may remember how years ago, people actually cared about the dangers of too much computer use.

They had infomercials for a special protective screen you could put over your computer monitor to protect your brain and other soft muscles from attack by radioactive stuff and other dangerous materials. Not to mention, the risks of looking at a screen all day was thought to be detrimental to the health of the eyes.

Then there was all that business about soy. First it was advised that women include large helpings of it in their diets, but then questions of its links to breast and uterine cancers began popping up and the noise died down.

Headphones. Back in the days before iPods, people still considered the damaging effects of headphone use on hearing.

Now with the rampant use of headphones by much of the world – specifically the tiny little ear buds that actually get inserted in the ear – fear of ear damage has become a thing of the past.

Maybe the science disproving all these health risks was so definitive that the world had no choice but to let all their worries about things disappear. But it's much more likely that something else has brought about the carefree attitudes we've adopted.

Like, for instance, the fact that we just want to use the products and technologies we've come to enjoy using, without having to consider for a minute that we might be hurting ourselves in the long run.

And we certainly don't want to spend all of our time paranoid about the tiny little ways we may be endangering ourselves.

Still, I've talked to many a friend who has expressed worry about the fact that they carry their cell phones conveniently in their coat or pants pocket or lie in bed with their laptops placed directly over their ovaries.

Whether we want to believe it or not, these wonderful technologies are having some sort of effect on our bodies. And though we may not be able to see the damage right now, do we really want to take that risk?

But, it's much more likely that something else has brought about the carefree attitudes we've adopted.

So for those who have these thoughts, who read the explosive "Time" articles about the safety of toys made in other countries or cell phones pressed up against our ears or stowed dangerously close to our reproductive organs, two coping mechanisms appear to be most effective.

The first is a combination of denial and/or avoidance.

Unwilling to expose ourselves to information which might transform us into obsessive compulsive hand-sanitizers, land-line-only-users or naturopaths, many of us choose to remain aloof. Ignorant of the many hazards in our midst, life is kept almost manageable. Life's already complicated enough, we say, why make it any more confusing or scary?

Second, we have the jokers.

Everybody's a comedian. Like last night, for instance, I was on the phone with a close friend. After about an hour, she jokingly sighed and asked, "So, you think all of us are going to end up with brain tumors because of cell phones, one day?"

"Yep," I answer, briefly considering the thought of hanging up my cell and calling her landline from my house phone.

The thought passed, though, and our conversation continued, unfettered by the potential damage we were inflicting on our persons as we spoke.

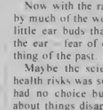
That one's probably a combination of the joking and the denial.

The fact is, we actually have to choose what we're going to spend our time worrying about. Though a particular worry may enter our brains, with all kinds of evidence to back it up, we still have the completely acceptable option to just ignore it. We can just let it go, and move on.

Or we can randomly pick a few, and be viewed as hypocrites or clean freaks or paranoid types.

I've heard them all. But right now, for no incredibly clear reason, I have chosen to focus on the following three safety worries, myself: water bottles, aluminum cans, and dryer sheets.

I won't bore you with the inception of these three fears. However, I will tell you, that whenever possible, I try to use my UMass dining water bottle (filled with water from a plastic Brita pitcher), choose glass containers over aluminum cans, and avoid dryer sheets like the plague.



The fact of the matter is that we can't avoid the dangers of everything in our environments.

We live in a built-up world, swimming with concealed uncovered manholes, and there's really not a ton we can do about it without sacrificing our sanity.

Still, as I write this, my left arm pulses with the muscle pain of the flu shot I just got. And I highly recommend you get one too.

Lauren Rockoff is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at lrockoff@student.umass.edu

America's need for a healthy Afghanistan

Meghan Boesch

At the start of Operation Iraqi Freedom, my high school classmates and I gathered around a computer to watch clip after clip of YouTube-esqe media surrounding this historic decision. One amateur video we found was a seven minute concert of explosions, firepower and destruction all tuned to the musical talent of System of a Down.

The message of the video? Saddam, his Baathist cronies and Iraq in general better duck and cover, because the American military is on its way to burn your terrorist-harboring country into the ground.

In fact, the message was not implicit, it was intermittently flashed on the screen between explosions and missile launches. This clip was in no way endorsed by the federal government or military, and was most likely an artistic creation of "Joe the Plumber" #7472. However, the idea that military might alone can bring countries to their knees is by no means new.

This ideology was employed in Vietnam, and has proven to be ineffective in controlling large expanses of undeveloped, sparsely populated land. After 16 years and tremendous casualty counts on both sides, we decided to turn in our chips and call it a day.

Massive firepower and traditional military strategy could not break the resilient Vietnamese. With every mine we set, with every village we scorched with sulfur, with every field we blanketed in Agent Orange, we filled the ranks of the Vietcong with new recruits.

The Vietnam War is over, but the type of conflict, one that merits a counter-insurgent strategy, is reborn anew four decades later in Afghanistan. Every time we bomb a village or kill innocent civilians we create new Taliban insurgents. We can dehumanize these people and call them evil, inhuman creatures that kill innocents, but Afghanistan is a country pushed to extremes.

With the highest infant mortality rate in the world (163 out 1000), a per capita income of roughly $800, an infrastructure destroyed by Cold War rivalries and an economy based almost entirely on poppy seeds, Afghanistan is no longer the beautiful, vibrant country it was before the Soviet Union invasion of 1979.

The Vietnam War is over, but the type of conflict, one that merits a counter-insurgent strategy, is reborn anew four decades later in Afghanistan

If you put a man in desperate circumstances, he is bound to make desperate decisions.

There is an entire sector of psychology dedicated to the study of group violence, with insurgency and terrorism comprising an even smaller branch of this research. Membership in such groups is derived, for example, by a need for national identity, security or social support. These groups often control access to scarce resources.

Basic human needs must be satisfied, and often times, extremist groups provide stability in destitute circumstances.

At the risk of sounding like a bleeding-heart liberal, I argue that the key to victory and peace in Afghanistan is a humanitarian-based strategy that puts the safety of civilians before military strategy. Defense Secretary Robert Gates tapped General Stanley McChrystal with this very philosophy in mind.

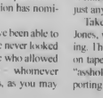
A brilliant man, well-respected and adored alike, McChrystal has ordered officers to keep civilian casualties low, and has made moves to stop broad-based bombing of sites that could contain innocent men, women and children. The military must go village to village, providing the same security and moral support that extremist groups monopolize. The officer must be both social worker and warrior.

In some cases, caution has allowed insurgents to escape, a strategy referred to by Marines as "tactical patience." Inevitably, the American military will meet those same insurgents once again. However, if a community member is lost, the next generation will grow up to learn he or she does not have a mother or father because the American military was sloppy.

Many will argue that Afghanis should recognize that we want to build a healthy, peaceful democracy free of extremism and oppression. As a neo-liberal, I do believe that democracy is the ideal form of government which all are entitled to, even if it is a form of representation that does not directly emulate western democratic models.

But, let's be reasonable. How would the average American feel if Norway invaded the United States to establish public universal healthcare?

As evidenced by the Great Wall of Mexico, we don't like foreigners, and unfortunately, an unsettling percentage of the population believes Barack Obama to be the Antichrist simply because of the color of his skin. We don't like foreigners, never mind occupiers who kill large amounts of our friends and relatives, so let's not pretend that we would welcome a militaristic, alien culture of reformers with open arms.



Afghanis don't simply "hate our freedom."

So what does the future of Afghanistan look like and what will be the United States' role in it? We are going to be in Afghanistan for a very long time. It is not a question of eliminating the Taliban, but rebuilding the basics of a functioning society so that the country does not implode soon after the last Marine leaves.

These include rebuilding healthcare, education, electricity, water and sewer, roads and the legal system, as well as economic diversification. As of 2008, 45 percent of the Afghan population is under the age of 15. This means that the world has an amazing opportunity to influence this young political activism down a positive road. If we allow Afghanistan to fall apart, we abandon a new generation to a life of radicalism and poverty.

Meghan Boesch is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at mboesch@student.umass.edu.

Socialist radicals among Obama's key advisors

Alex Perry

I hate to say us Republicans told you so, but as much as it pains me I will just come out and say it. We told you so.

People were tired of hearing about Barack Obama's radical associations throughout the summer and fall. Some said, "What do Reverend Wright and Bill Ayers have to do with Barack Obama?" Republicans warned voters that when judging someone, it is fair to some degree to judge them by the company they keep.

It wasn't that Obama knew the anti-American Reverend Wright or started his political career with Bill Ayers – a known terrorist – it was the fact that over and over, Obama was found to be connected with despicable members of our society. Many of you didn't see it that way. In fact, many of you thought it was a joke that people were even talking about it. Obama even scoffed at John McCain during the third presidential debate for daring to bring it up. "I think the fact that this has become such an important part of your campaign, Senator McCain, says more about your campaign than it says about me," he said.

Well keep on scoffing liberal know-it-all's because it hasn't even been a full year for the president and more radical associations are being exposed in the Obama administration by the day. Just take a look at some of Obama's closest advisors, his "czars" as they've come to be known. For those of you who don't know about the czars, they are essentially advisors to Obama that manage various tasks such as the closure of the Guantanamo Bay detention facility or generating "green" jobs. By some estimates, Obama has as many as a few dozen "czars" who advise him.

But there is a major problem with these "czars." First off, approximately two-thirds of them were not approved by Congress to take the positions granted to them by the president. Normal procedure for a secretary to claim his or her position requires a confirmation hearing from Congress. This is the time when Congress is able to examine the candidates' resume and determine if they are qualified to take the position the administration has nominated them for.

But many of these "czars" have been able to skip over that process. They were never looked into by anyone except the people who allowed them into Obama's inner circle – whomever those people happen to be. This, as you may imagine, is a recipe for disaster. But the fact that Obama's administration is using devious and potentially unconstitutional moves to get people into government is probably the least of the administration's problems at this point.

Take, for instance, "green" jobs czar Van Jones, who was recently pressured into resigning. The man is an admitted communist.

That's because it is obvious that some of these people advising the president of the United States are just straight up communists, socialists, 9/11 "truthers," anti-capitalists or just any other form of flat-out radical.

Take, for instance, "green" jobs czar Van Jones, who was recently pressured into resigning. The man is an admitted communist. He is on tape earlier in the year calling republicans "assholes." In 2004, he signed a petition supporting the "9/11 truther" movement, which suggested that the terrorist attacks of 9/11 on both the World Trade Center and the Pentagon were carried out not by terrorists, but by our own government.

This is astonishing. There are people dumb enough to believe the government is responsible for 9/11. It is incredible that someone that foolish is allowed to speak to, let alone advise, our president. Not to mention he is a self-admitted communist and he is advising the president on job creation. What's next? Al Davis advising Bill Belichick on how to run a football franchise? To me, this nonsense just raises a lot more questions. One of which, is why on earth is the president of the United States listening to a communist radical about anything at all? It's insane, but it doesn't stop with Van Jones.

John Holdren, the science "czar," has proposed things in his book, "Ecoscience: Population, Resources, Environment" such as, "forced sterilization for women after they gave birth to a designated number of children," and just good old fashion abortion as a method for "population control."

I don't remember Obama mentioning that at all during his campaign.

How about Carol Browner? According to Fox News' Glenn Beck, she is the "global warming 'czar,'" and was part of Socialist International. Why is there a socialist advising the president?

Then there's Ezekiel Emmanuel. According to Beck, he is a health care adviser that is a proponent of a system which puts values on lives based on age and health.

Basically, that's a way of saying the government should be the ones determining who is fit for health care and who isn't. Should these people be a part of health care reform?

These are just a few examples of Obama's current startling associations. If Obama trusts and listens to them it is, at best, an extremely worrisome situation. Clearly, this is no longer a couple of random people in Obama's life but instead a scary trend that makes it clear Obama wants these people around him. He must agree with their philosophies and ideas to some degree, otherwise why keep them around? It makes me wonder what Obama really envisions when he talks about "change" for America. But most of all, it just makes me wonder what people were thinking when they voted for him.

Alex Perry is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at aperry@student.umass.edu.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 21 , 2009

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Cinema triumphs with new medium

Vibrant local settings and renowned poets make online journal's big screen debut soar

By Lisa Linsley
Collegian Staff

Late Thursday evening, the "Notnostrums," an online poetry group, performed "When You Think Of," at Amherst Cinema. A variety of places flashed across the screen, as the editors of the film, Guy Pettit, Emily Pettit and Luke Bloomfield pulled from these myriad places to create a unique montage of footage.

Set, alternatively, by a river behind Smith College and the Pioneer Valley, the areas provided a scenic backdrop to the poetry read aloud by the film's several contributors. Scenes were also recorded in New York City, N.Y., Iowa City, Iowa, Kansas City, Mo., Philadelphia, Pa. and on Coney Island.

In total, 24 poets contributed to the film from the Notnostrums group. These poets come from all over the country and many have published works, are teachers or editors or have received awards for their publications. For instance, Lisa Olstein, who performed "Species At Rest" and "Dreamy Little Savage" is also the author of "Lost Alphabet" and "Radio Crackling, Radio Gone" and is the recipient of the Hayden Carruth Emerging Poets Award. Christian Hawkey, who performed "Urban Anarchists" is also the author of "The Book of Funnels," which won the Kate Tufts Discovery Award.

The film featured contemporary poems read by each of the contributors in a location of their choice. Some locations were spontaneous, like poet Francesca Chabrier, who performed "There is Forever A Place" under an umbrella in an open elevator. Heather Christle performed "Variations on An Animal Kingdom" while walking through a residential area during the daytime. When Emily Toder performed "The Problem with Water," she was – appropriately – swimming in a river while reciting the poem.

The poems could be classically contributed to the genre of contemporary poetry, which is classified as post-1920s poetry that typically uses metaphors to make comparisons between images. "Images" is an umbrella term that, in this case, would mean anything visual, auditory or sense of a perceived snapshot. These poems were not heavy with explicit emotion. Many of these poems had a theme and a message one could analyze, and in addition were easy to read and follow while on screen. Many of the poems were derived from simple ideas or objects, yet were developed into a more complex thought by virtue of the talent of each poet.

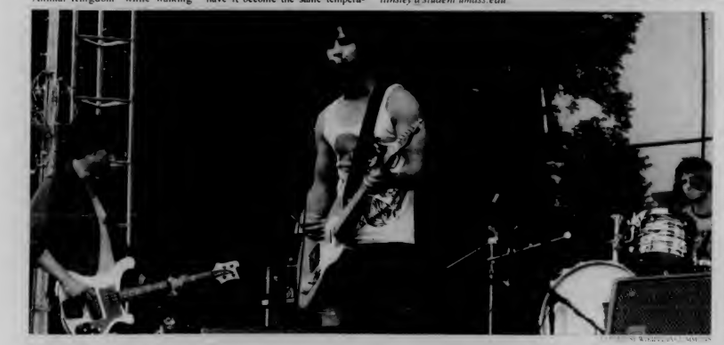
Emily Toder's "The Problem with Water" best exemplified this effect. She begins her poem by stating, "The problem with water is that it's odorless. Water is not sensed until it is too late. You think you are alright and then water." Toder's poem goes right along with the title, discussing the issues with water. For starters, Toder believes the second problem of water is that it is tempting for people to give birth in it.

Although these poems were simple to follow and were not oversaturated with emotions, deep ideas and messages were present to analyze in each. Ben Estes' poem, "Cactuses," questions the abstract nature of touch. According to Estes on Notnostrums, "There is only one vanishing point in this poem, making this poem very easy to draw. Start with whatever object is closest to you and hold it in your hand and have it become the same temperature. But not if the closest object is a cactus." The poem is written in two columns, to be recited as a conversation. Estes says, "Obviously one of them thinks it is more important than the other one."

James Tate performed "The Blob," one of the most unique and intriguing poems of the night. The poem consists of the re-telling of a conversation. James Tate is a professor of English at the University of Massachusetts, as well as a recipient of the Pulitzer Prize.

The music selection for "When You Think of It," included eclectic indie music, which was appropriate at each scene change. Music contributors to the film include Red Hunter, an indie-folk musician from Austin, Texas who is lead singer of Peter & The Wolf. Originally local hip hop. According to film editor Luke Bloomfield, "We've been loving their music for almost a decade."

Overall, "When You Think of It," took about six months to complete. What is interesting about the film is that it didn't actually start off as a "poetry film."



"The original idea was to film our contributors, then periodically post their readings to Notnostrums. But word got around we were doing this and Amherst Cinema asked to screen it. We said yes, and then linked the footage we'd taken to make a feature film and added music and animation," said Bloomfield.

"When You Think Of It" is the first performance in the Going Public Contemporary Lit Series. Other events in the series include The Massachusetts Poetry Festival: Western Massachusetts Launch, which will take place Thursday, Oct. 15 at 7 p.m.

Lisa Linsley can be reached at llinsley@student.umass.edu.

James Tate was one of 24 poets featured in the recent film foronline journal "Notnostrums," "When You Think of It." Tate, an English professor at the University of Massachusetts, performed "The Blob."

Acclaimed musician Sam Roberts heads to Northampton tonight in promotion of his latest album, "Love at the End of the World." Roberts, who won three Juno awards in 2004 for his work "We Were Born in Flames," is known for his magnetic on-stage persona.

Canadian-based musician heads south, set to bring 'Love' to NoHo's Iron Horse

By Angela Stasiowski
Collegian Staff

Tonight, our musical neighbors up north will export the exceptionally talented singer-songwriter Sam Roberts to Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall for an evening of good, old-fashioned rock 'n' roll.

The 7 p.m. performance features Canadian-born Roberts and his supporting band honing their craft in honor of their latest release, "Love at the End of the World."

Opening the evening will be The True Jacqueline, a well-established Northampton collective of quirky harmonies and guitar eccentricities. Collectively, the band promises to diversify the evening.

Whether his name is easily recognizable in the United States or not, Roberts is no newcomer to the music business. The 35-year-old singer, songwriter and guitarist has been one of Canada's biggest independent artists since his debut in 2001.

"The Inhuman Condition," his 2001 EP, captured the nation's attention, establishing the musician as a fresh talent.

He followed up his lauded premiere with the full length, "We Were Born In Flames" in 2003. "Flames" featured the breakout hit "Brother Down."

As the first single off of the album, the track has all the features of an all-rock triumph: percussive acoustic guitars, introspective lyrics and the essential addition of beachy bongos. The single was met with tremendous success in Canada, as well as the U.S. in later years.

With the catchy riffs of "Brother Down" and "Don't Walk Away Eileen," "We Were Born in Flames," caught fire immediately, rocketing Roberts to the frontlines of Canada's music charts.

The album also earned him three Juno Awards in 2004, including for Best Artist and Best Album of the year.

However, that was not the end of Roberts' success, as 2008 brought the anticipated release of "Love at the End of the World," his most recent album. Featuring a full band and a greater disparity of instrumentation, the record was a sure sign of innovation for the musician.

To label the album as nostalgic would not do it justice. Tracks like "Detroit '67" have a fun, throwback feel, as implied by the title. The bluesy instrumentation topped with Roberts' laidback vocals hearkens back to the early days of rock without attempting to imitate it shamelessly.

"Stripmall Religion" preaches a similar message to "Brother Down," commenting on the materialistic nature of humanity and the need for change. More guitar driven than the rest of the album, the song more closely resembles his previous work.

"Love at the End of the World" earned him another round of awards including Artist of the Year and Rock Album of the Year at the 2009 Juno Awards.

The album is characterized with Robert's flare for riff-filled modern rock, sprinkled with the best of old-world influences. His music maintains the breezy feel of surf rock with the driving instrumentation of classic rock.

Roberts covers everything from rock n' roll to folk to psychedelic with room to spare. Where old meets new on this album, there is magic to be had.

While the majority of his shows in this part of the continent have been performed at smaller venues like the Iron Horse, Roberts has also held his own at Lollapalooza, Live 8 and has opened for rock legends such as the Eagles. Even in these larger of venues, his sincerity and love of the art are unmistakable.

Roberts exudes energy. Everything from the vocals to the guitar to his on-stage persona is filled to the brim with life. It's no wonder Canada has found their musical salvation in Roberts.

To his loyal fans, tonight will be an evening of classic alterative tunes, but to the newcomer it could just be their musical awakening of the decade.

Sam Roberts will be performing at Iron Horse Music Hall Monday, Sept. 21 at 7 p.m. Tickets are $8 in advance or $10 at the door.

Angela Stasiowski can be reached at astasiow@student.umass.edu

Uncovering a real cover girl

Famed fashion editor exposed in rousing new documentary

By Steven Rea
The Philadelphia Inquirer

Before R.J. Cutler started on "The September Issue" – his brilliant behind-the-scenes look at Vogue and its mighty monarch of an editor, Anna Wintour – the documentary filmmaker would have been hard-pressed to tell you much of anything about the world of couture.

"I could not have named three of the world's most important designers," he says.

"I certainly couldn't have told you that Karl Lagerfeld designed for Chanel ... I could list for hours the things I didn't know then that I do know now."

But one thing Cutler did know, of course, was who Wintour was.

"Who hasn't heard of her?" says the Emmy- and Peabody-winning producer of "The War Room." "She's caricatured everywhere you look. There are two of her in "Ugly Betty."

There was the animated Anna Wintour in "The Incredibles" – I'm told that the costume designer character was based on her.

And of course at that point you couldn't help but hear about the book "The Devil Wears Prada" – the movie was more than a year away."

In "The September Issue," which chronicles the seven-month-long process of creating the phonebook-size fall 2007 issue of Vogue, Cutler and his crew track Wintour as she scans the runways of Paris and New York, attends meetings with designers and retailers, sips her Starbucks, and issues orders with a withering glare.

And there's another figure vital to the film – and to Vogue, the most important publication in all of the fashion biz. That would be Grace Coddington, the magazine's creative director.

Like Wintour, Coddington is a Brit, but unlike her boss, this woman with the long, red hair and the lazy gait – a former model who orchestrates Vogue's elaborate photo shoots – appears quiet and modest, deliberately removed from the power circle that is Wintour's milieu.

Wintour, close to 60, and Coddington, close to 70, have worked together for decades; it's a relationship of give and take, of demands met and demands ignored, and it's a relationship that is at the very core of the magazine's aesthetic.

But finally, Coddington relented and granted Cutler an hour to talk – off camera.

Wintour may have said something, too, because in the end Coddington let Cutler and crew follow her around, resulting in some of the movie's most prized, and surprising, moments.

"If I wanted to tell a story about who Anna Wintour was, what Vogue was, I needed to tell the story of who Grace Coddington was," the filmmaker says.

"I believe it is the defining relationship ... And she is so wonderful to watch work."

And in a culture and an industry that is all about youth, "The September Issue" offers a portrait of two exceptional women who could easily be grandmothers to the twiggy models in Vogue's pages.

"I love that this is a movie about these two women of a certain age who are so mighty and powerful and going strong and ruling the world and brawling with each other and caring so much," Cutler says.

Minutemen earn first CAA victory

FOOTBALL from page 8

felt like I backed up just enough where that guy wasn't going to be on my upper body at all and I just feel like my arm is strong enough where I can get that ball in there without using my legs."

URI responded with a strong opening drive of its own, with Paul-Etienne going 4-of-4 for 63 yards, taking the Rams to the UMass 3-yard line.

But just when it seemed when the Rams were going to match the Minutemen drive-for-drive to open up the game, Paul-Etienne's pass was deflected in the endzone by linebacker Tyler Holmes and intercepted by linebacker Kurt Filler. From that point on, URI was never able to mount another successful offensive drive in the half.

"Tyler made a great play in the endzone and popped it up to me and I happened to be in the right spot," Filler said of the play.

UMass would then score two unanswered touchdowns, going into the half with a 21-0 lead on URI. Paul-Etienne, who had been successful in picking apart the Minuteman secondary was harassed in the second quarter as the UMass pass rush gave him little time in the pocket.

In the second half, the Rams would go on to break the shutout midway through the third quarter when running back Jonathan Hernandez was stripped at the line. URI linebacker Rob Damon knocked it loose while safety Jarrod Williams returned the ensuing fumble 68 yards untouched for the defensive touchdown.

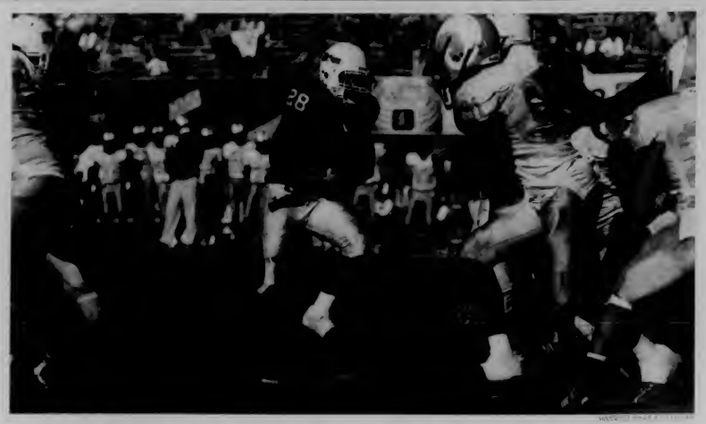
The touchdown was the first time all season that the Minutemen have let the opposing team score in the second half and ended a 96 minute, 8 second scoreless streak against the Rams.

Following the score, the Rams attempted an onside kick, which went straight towards the recently stripped Hernandez. Making up for his earlier mistake, Hernandez caught the dribbling kick and secured the ball. On the first play of the next drive, Havens hit senior Joe Sanford downfield for a 42-yard completion, which set up a 22-yard field goal from Armando Cuko to make it 24-7 UMass.

Early on in the fourth quarter, after the Rams added a field goal in the third quarter, Cruz was stripped on a punt return, which gave the Rams great field position and a late chance to get back in the game. During the drive, the Rams had their first major success against the Minuteman defense since the first half, slashing the opposing front with their running game to inside the 10-yard line.

But on a third and short, Holmes and safety Jeromy Miles made a key stop on a run up the middle, forcing a fourth down. On the next play, Paul-Etienne fumbled the snap and was forced to fall on it, spoiling the scoring opportunity.

Following the stop, the Minutemen drove down the field on a seven play, 67-yard drive, featuring a 51-yard reception by Victor Cruz in which the senior split the defense on a post route and cut to the outside for another 20 yards before getting pushed out of bounds. Cuko capped off the drive with a 37-yard field goal, putting UMass up by three scores and the game out of reach for the Rams.



The Rams got the ball back with plenty of time to score and save face, but the drive faltered around midfield, giving UMass the ball back with 6:30 left. The Minutemen then looked to their Nelson to carry the load and bleed the rest of the clock. Nelson, who had 161 yards on the game, went 50 yards on 6 rushes on the drive, which ended in a 42-yard field goal by Cuko.

"It's certainly our game offensively to get a lead in the fourth quarter and pound the rock, kill the clock," Morris said. "If Tony's pounding on you and pounding on you, pretty soon you're going to break a little bit and Tony did a great job of just continuing to drive, get the first downs and be able to put the game away.

Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu

Senior Anthony Monette wraps up URI tailback Avo Isijola. The defensive end had three tackles in the victor including one for a loss.

Tailback Tony Nelson wraps up the ball as he prepares to break a run in UMass' 30-10 victory over Rhode Island. The senior rushed for his sixth-career 150-yard game and second 100-yard game of the 2009 season.

Nelson, UMass run out clock

THIRD DOWNS from page 8 down. "If we just come out and everyone does their assignment, I read the play right, the wide receivers run the right routes, the O-line is blocking like they did tonight, there is no reason we shouldn't be 100 percent on third down."

Clockwork

Not only did converting all seven third downs in the first half help keep the chains moving, it also helped UMass swallow up clock time and keep its defense rested on the sidelines.

In the first half, the Minutemen dominated the time of possession as they held the clock for a total of 20 minutes, 14 seconds. The offense ate up so much time by mixing up the play calls with a balance of runs and passes and executing them just as planned. Even when passing, the clock rarely stopped as Havens went 15-of-17 throwing in the half.

The real benefits came in the second half where the Rams controlled the clock. With the defense having to only play 9:46 in the first half, it was well rested when called upon in the second half.

"The reason they were able to stay true to form and able to stay playing was because they weren't tired out in the first half," Morris said. "We were fortunate enough to come back strong in the second half to say 'hey we need you now D'."

Three-fourths perfect

UMass' defense has been an all-around impressive unit to watch this season, but looking at the numbers makes them seem even more so.

In all three games this season, the Minutemen defense has played shutout ball for three quarters. UMass gave up 21 points in the second quarter to Kansas State and seven in Week 2 to Albany, shutting both teams out in the first quarter and second halves, and only gave up 10 points in the third quarter this weekend to URI, seven of which were scored on a fumble recovery.

On the other hand, UMass's offense has scored in 11-of-12 quarters this season.

Against the Rams, the defense allowed just three points on a field goal, making it 10 quarters without giving up an offensive touchdown. URI threatened to end the streak as well as the Minutemen's perfect first quarter streak but linebacker Kurt Filler ended it when he intercepted the Ram's Chris Paul-Etienne pass in the endzone.

Morris credits the success of his defense on them playing together and everyone doing their job.

"It's a team effort and it is 11 guys on every play," Morris said. "I've tried to create that mentality here."

Jeffrey R. Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com

UM takes second OT loss

F. HOCKEY from page 8

Five minutes into the extra period, Janna Ancil provided the heroics with a goal that gave the Eagles the 2-1 win and put the dagger into the hearts of the Minutewomen.

The player of the game was undoubtedly the Eagles' goalkeeper, Kristine Stigas, who stood as a brick wall in goal and fended off nine penalty corners as well as 26 shots.

After the game, one word summed up the loss for the Minutewomen: frustrating.

"It's very frustrating, we put in a lot of time and effort preparing for this weekend," Sowry said. "That's the game, you can outplay an opponent and not come away with the victory."

"It was a really frustrating game but I think we handled ourselves very well," Cordero said. "It's a hard loss but you always learn from it."

Sowry was upset with how the team preformed under duress towards the end of the game and felt they wandered from the game plan.

"We have to win as a team and lose as a team. When the pressure was on us, I think we became a little individual rather than sticking together as a team. We have to stick to what we've been working on in practice and not let an opponent dictate what we do."

Though the loss could be considered a moral victory for the Minutewomen, Makaela Potts was not letting her team off the hook.

"We need to go back to our basics and play better hockey," she said. With the loss, Boston College moves to 7-1 while UMass falls to 5-2 for the season with both losses coming in overtime games.

The Minutewomen will be back on the field this weekend when they begin another road trip on Saturday in Vermont.

Jay Asser can be reached at jasser@student.umass.edu

Forward Katie Kelly looks to create an opportunity near the Eagles' net in Saturday's 2-1 overtime loss. The junior totaled five shots in the loss.

Offense finding some rhythm

W. SOCCER from page 8

have not let up more than two goals in a single match this season.

"Everybody on the field defended hard – from our forwards, mids, to our backs," Napoli said. "We had a couple of players who came up lame during the game but everyone just kept on fighting so it was a great defensive effort across the board."

The second period showed an increased effort offensively from St. Peter's, when it forced its first two corner kicks in the match, the latter resulting in a goal from Alex Keddie. Fortunately for the Minutewomen, no more goals would come against them in the remaining 20-plus minutes, awarding them their first victory of the year and adding to their three-game unbeaten streak.

"It feels really good and it is definitely a step in the right direction," Stoll said. "We were struggling to score goals and this win is just another step forward towards the [Atlantic 10 schedule]."

After being shut out in their first five matches, Stoll knows how the team can further improve.

"There's always room for improvement," she said. "Maybe the next step for us is to record our own shutout, which would be nice," Stoll said, grinning.

UMass' offensive opportunities sparkled, while the defense continued to limit offensive chances.

"From here we just have to continue moving forward and working on the things we've been working on," Napoli said.

The Minutewomen will look to continue its three-game unbeaten streak on Friday, when they host St. Joseph's in the first match of the A-10 schedule.

Steve Levine can be reached at slevine@student.umass.edu

Three Minutewomen build a wall to defend a free kick by Providence early this season. UMass' earned its first win of the season on Sunday.

Piekos strong vs. Northeastern

M. SOCCER from page 8

It was his second career shutout, as his goals against average (0.29) decreased while his save percentage (.947) increased in his three games played.

"He did a real good job in that he didn't have to make a good save," Koch said.

Sophomore goalkeeper Shane Curran-Hays, who will start against Siena this Saturday, played the first half in the Minutemen's exhibition against Winstar Academy on Sunday, but did not face many challenges in the 3-0 win at Rudd Field. Piekos played the second half, but also did not see much action.

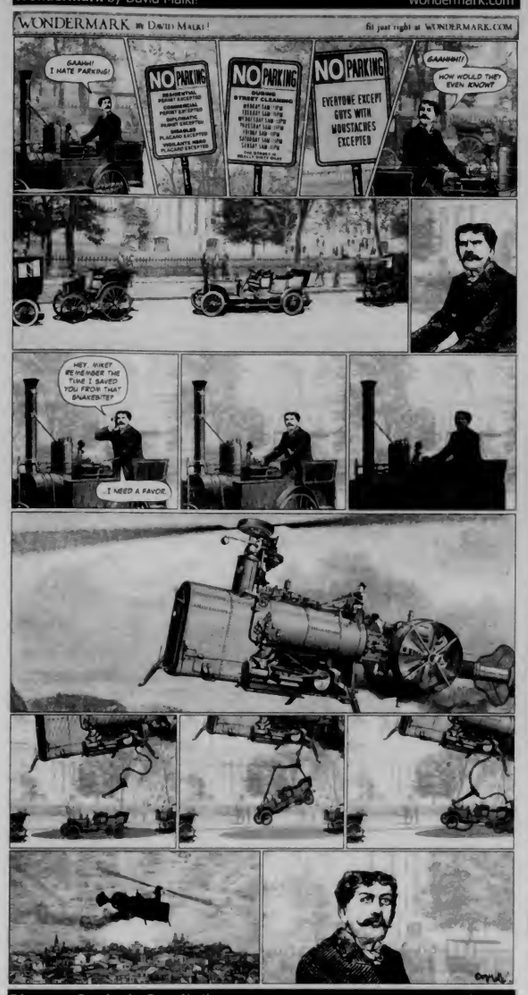
Behind a pair of goals from Roswess, a goal from sophomore forward Scott Strycharz and two assists from Arkisan, UMass used the exhibition as a way to fine tune some of their game plan in order to prepare for Siena.

The Minutemen dominated in shots, 23-to-7 along with corner kicks, 4-to-1.

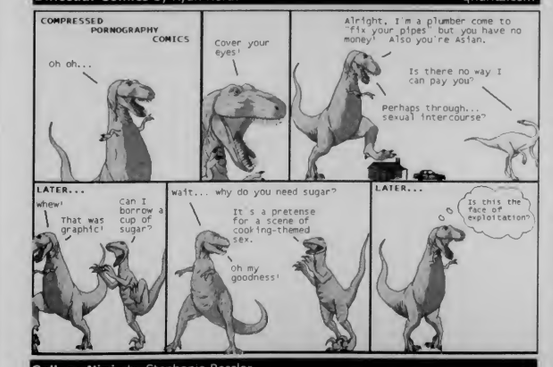
UMass will travel to face the Saints Saturday before returning to Rudd Field for their final non-conference game against Colgate Sept. 29.

"We've got two good contests to see were we are before we play against Fordham, and I'm looking forward to the contests," Koch said.

David Britch can be reached at dbritch@student.umass.edu



If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
POTTER'S AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.pottersauto.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)



UMASS INTERNATIONAL PROGRAMS OFFICE
Education Abroad Fair
Monday, September 21
4:00 - 6:00 p.m.
Campus Center Auditorium
Find out how YOU can study abroad!
International Programs Office
Education Abroad
455 Hills South
413-545-5247
abroad@ipo.umass.edu
www.ipo.umass.edu

COMICS

Wondermark by David Malki! wondermark.com

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North qwantz.com

College Ninja by Stephanie Ressler

USA Today has come out with a new survey:
Apparently, three out of four people make up 75 percent of the population.
- David Letterman.

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!
Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You may want to baby-proof your finances.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
If the Patriots won't practice tackling, then maybe we all should.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Perhaps you need someone to enforce your bedtime.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Yarr, stop celebrating Talk Like a Pirate Day me hearties. For alas, there will be no booty!

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Things don't look so bad while you're watching Rocko's Modern Life.

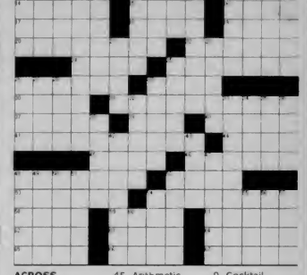
cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Explore your dream to become the fourth Hanson Brothers member. MMMbop.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
They should change the highlights to the my-lights.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
When you ride the PVTA, pretend you're in the movie Speed.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Darts is the original First Person Shooter.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
If your feet could talk, they would have bad breath.



sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Why be confrontational in person when you can tweet them online?

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Screw stairs! Go to your third floor class Adam West Batman-style.

SUDOKU

		2			8		4
1
				6			8	5
		2			7			6
5								4
	3					1
	4		7		2
8			3	1				9
					6	3

CROSS WORD

ACROSS
1. Intends
6. Flower stalk
10. Narrow opening
14. Monastery head
15. Corn Belt state
16. Formally surrender
17. A wingless parasitic insect
18. Level
19. Roasting appliance
20. The distance between
22. Menace
24. Ale or lager
25. The Queen of the jungle?
26. Leopardlike cat
29. List of choices
30. Feint
31. Conceiver
37. Anagram of "Sneer"
39. Historical period
40. Pilot a car
41. Dutifully
44. Breakfast or supper
45. Arithmetic
46. In a zealous manner
48. Physicians
52. Colored part of an eye
53. A short trip to do a task
54. Footnote
58. Tells untruths
59. Govern
61. Delineated
62. Sleeveless garment
63. Utilizer
64. Outer or exterior
65. Otherwise
66. Encounter
67. Cantankerous

DOWN
1. A landlocked republic in NW Africa
2. Black, in poetry
3. Adjoin
4. Epistaxis
5. Record player
6. A stringed instrument of India
7. Hard work
8. Female sheep
9. Cocktail
10. Disdain
11. Embankment
12. Notions
13. Canvas dwellings
21. Disallow
23. A type of dog
25. Licit
26. Chocolate cookie
27. Curtail
28. Slave
29. Glee
32. Leases
33. Cease-fire
34. Fastened
35. Elliptical
36. Count upon
38. Apostle Peter
42. Tympanum
43. Tall story
47. Purple
48. Dig
49. Bay window
50. Pepperwort
51. Flavor
52. Lifeless
54. Away from the wind
55. Picnic Insects
56. Nipple
57. Swirl
60. Consume

CLASSIFIEDS

EMPLOYMENT
Part- time personal care attendant. About 10-12 hours/week. Flexible hours. Please call Patrick: (413)-275-7928.

SPRING BREAK 2010
Spring Break 2010 sell trips, earn cash, and go free! Call for group discounts. Best prices guaranteed! Info/reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

EMPLOYMENT
Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics.lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

FOR RENT
Rt. 9 Hadley. 5 bedroom house. $2000/mo & utilities. 2 car garag. 1 & a qtr miles to campus. No beds. Large Lot. Music room. Skibiski Real Estate. 586-1827.

EMPLOYMENT
Calzone Transport Technician (Drivers) and Calzone Production Engineers (kitchen help) wanted. Apply at DP Dough, downtown Amherst.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 2009 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass gives URI full Nelson

Havens throws for 300 yards, Nelson has sixth 150-yard game

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

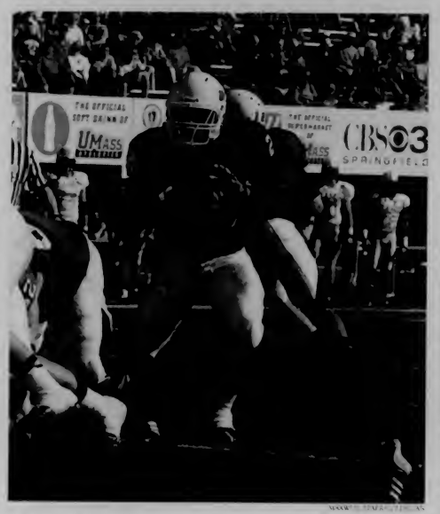
Kyle Havens had his first career 300-yard passing game while Tony Nelson had his sixth career 150-yard rushing performance as the Massachusetts football team won its conference opener against Rhode Island, 30-10.

The offensive fireworks were another step forward for first-year starter Havens who started his first game against a Colonial Athletic Association opponent. Against the Rams, Havens was 22-for-30 for 329 yards with two touchdowns and an interception, but truly excelled in the first half.

The Minutemen (2-1, 1-0 CAA), were 7-for-7 on third down conversions in the first half, allowing them to keep the Rams offense off the field. URI (1-1, 0-1 CAA) was limited to just under 10 minutes of possession and had only four offensive possessions in the first half.

While holding onto the ball led to points for UMass on offense in the first half, it also led to a rested defense in the second half.

"You'd like to go a full 60 minutes without your defense playing a whole lot of football," UMass coach Kevin Morris said. "That means you're winning a lot of ball games."



On defense, the Minutemen were given the task of containing URI dual threat quarterback Chris Paul-Hitchene. After leading the team in rushing and passing two weeks ago against Fordham, the Rams quarterback did not have a positive rushing play in the first half and gained 23 yards on six carries in the second half.

UMass	30
URI	10

The Minutemen opened the first quarter with an impressive 12-play, 68-yard drive in which junior quarterback Kyle Havens picked up where he left off after his breakout performance last week. Havens capped off the scoring drive with a four-yard completion to fullback Chris Zardas, completing the pass while being driven into the ground by URI defender Steve Whedon.

"You just can't ever give up on a play," Havens said. "But at the same time you have to be smart and know when to take the sack. On that particular play, I

See FOOTBALL on page 6

Senior Tony Nelson looks to hit a hole created for him by his offensive line. The tailback ran for 161 yards and a touchdown on 29 carries in UMass' 30-10 victory over URI.

Offense perfect in first half on third downs

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Rhode Island had just two ways to get the ball on offense in the first half of Saturday's 30-10 loss to the Massachusetts football team. The Rams could have allowed UMass to score or it could have forced a turnover, because the Minutemen were perfect on third downs, going seven-for-seven in the first half.

Punter Caleb Violette was able to watch the entire first half from the bench, as Kyle Havens and Tony Nelson ran UMass' offense to perfection on third downs. On UMass' (2-1, 1-0 Colonial Athletic Association) first possession, the offense put together a 12-play, 67-yard scoring drive in which Havens completed a third-and-four, Nelson rushed for 11 yards on a long third-and-seven to keep the drive going and then Havens finished the drive with a four-yard touchdown pass on third-and-goal.

"It certainly made a difference in the ballgame in that first half. [On third downs], we have a goal to be over 50 percent if you want to be in the top of the league," UMass coach Kevin Morris said. "Obviously going 100 percent at that point in the game makes a big difference."

The next drive was more of a challenge as the Minutemen faced third downs of 14 and 13 yards, respectively. On the first, Havens found Jeremy Horne for 19 yards and followed up with a 23-yard completion to Joe Sandford on the third-and-13.

Nelson would later convert a third-and-one into a 20-yard rush and Havens would convert on another third-and-one in UMass' third scoring drive of the half, giving the Minutemen a 21-0 advantage.

"We just executed like we've been talking about since Kansas State," Havens said of the team's play on third

See THIRDS DOWNS on page 6

Minutewomen beat Northeastern, fall to No. 9 Boston College

BY JAY ASSER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After a strong showing against Northeastern, the Massachusetts field hockey team was unable to pull off another upset win and suffered a heartbreaking overtime loss to Boston College on Sunday.

Before taking on the No. 9 Eagles in a much anticipated game, the No. 11 Minutewomen had to take care of business against a good Northeastern team Saturday.

The defense, which has proven to be the strength of this UMass team, played well once again and limited the opportunities for the Huskies' offense. Despite being outshot, 17-13, and giving up 12 penalty corners, goalkeeper Alesha Widdall was able to stop a season-high 10 shots and record her third consecutive shutout as the Minutewomen went on to win 4-0.

After the game, UMass coach Justine Sowry expressed her satisfaction for the play of the defense.

"We're definitely playing as a solid defensive unit. Overall, we're happy with our performance," she said.

Scoring for the Minutewomen was spread around as four different players were able to notch a goal. Makaela Potts led the offense by tallying a score and two assists while Jaime Bourazeris, Katie Kelly and Jill Powers all added goals.

The loss halted the Huskies' four-game winning streak and moved their record to 4-3.

On Sunday, UMass faced BC coming off of its worst performance of the season the day before against No. 1 Maryland. The Terrapins (8-0) handed the Eagles their first loss while remaining undefeated on their campaign to defend their national championship.

The loss seemed to affect Boston College as they looked flat for most of the game. The Minutewomen had a few opportunities in the first half to take the lead but fell just short, presenting a theme that would continue throughout the game.

Finally, with 19 minutes, 46 seconds remaining in the second half, UMass broke through with a goal scored by freshman Nicole Cordero, the first of her career. Fellow freshman Kate Heineman also picked up her first career assist on the score. Cordero was eager as well as relieved after the game to have at last gotten the big moment out of the way.

"It was really exciting," Cordero said. "I couldn't have asked for a better opponent to have my first goal against."

The goal gave the Minutewomen the lead but didn't change their aggressive play. UMass kept attacking and looked as if it would add another goal which would have all but put the game out of reach for Boston College at that point.

However, the Eagles finally woke up and connected for a goal by Chelsey Feole with less than eight minutes left in the game to break Widdall's shutout streak.

Right as regulation was about to end, the Minutewomen put in an apparent winning goal on a penalty corner as time expired, but had it waved off for a push to force overtime.

BC	2
UMass	1
UMass	4
NU	0

See F. HOCKEY on page 6

Junior Makaela Potts fights for the ball with a Boston College player in Sunday's loss.

Junior Ben Arikian scored in the 84th minute to lift the Minutemen to their first victory of the year on Saturday.

Arikian lifts offense, Minutemen to win

Earn first win of season at NU, crush Winstars in exhibition

BY DAVID BIRSCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The last thing Massachusetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch wanted was another tie.

The Minutemen had three of their past four contests end in draws, with UMass still not yet earning a victory in 2009.

"We tied three games, and I think the last thing we wanted was another tie, and we talked about it knowing that we had to get a result," Koch said.

It seems like Ben Arikian was listening.

The junior midfielder scored the lone goal in the 84th minute of the Minutemen's 1-0 win over Northeastern Saturday night as UMass (1-1-3) went on to get its first win of the season.

After a long cross from sophomore defender David Key, sophomore forward Chris Roswess got the ball into the box, but a NU defender attempted to get the ball out of the box.

The ball was redirected to Arikian, who was wide open and one-timed the ball into the side of the goal past NU goalkeeper Michael Gallagher.

"In all honesty, we were on the road, playing on a tough field, and they could've easily beaten us. They could have had a couple goals in the first half, and it could have been a bad result, and in the second half they had some good opportunities. Defensively we got the job done, and I was glad to get out of there with a result," Koch said.

The Huskies got off to a quick start offensively, registering seven shots in the first half and just one corner kick, but a combined defensive effort behind goalkeeper Chris Piekos was effective, as Piekos made just one save in the first period.

UMass	3
Winstars	0
UMass	4
NU	0

"It reminded me of Hartford, and the difference between the two games was that we didn't come out of it in the second half against Hartford, and we did against Northeastern," Koch said.

The Minutemen fell to the Hawks, 2-0, on Sept. 5th after keeping Hartford scoreless in the first half. But the breaks and offensive opportunities were not there for UMass.

A week and a half later, Koch and the rest of the Minutemen seemed to have found some answers to some underlying questions like the goalkeeper situation, scoring consistently and playing team defense.

"I think we have answered some more questions in the past couple of games," Koch said.

Piekos made two key stops on shots on goal after Arikian's tally to preserve the lead, finishing the day with four saves.

See M. SOCCER on page 6

Napoli, UM earn first win

BY STEVE LEVINE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After starting the season scoreless in its first five games, the Massachusetts women's soccer team is suddenly able to find the back of the net.

On Sunday, the Minutewomen scored a season-high two goals to defeat St. Peter's College, 2-1, at home on Rudd Field. The match represented both the first win of the season, as well as coach Napoli's first career victory.

"This is a big relief. We've been working so hard and it really is a just a nice reward. It's more for the [players] than for me – they've been working their tails off from day one," Napoli said. "We really were looking for this win and once we got the lead I knew we weren't going to let it go. We've been playing better every game and for us to finally get the win shows that hard work pays off."

The Minutewomen came out determined in the first period, outshooting the Peahens, 13-2. The first big chance came three minutes into the contest, when Christina Adams' shot from a cross was turned away by the goalkeeper. Four minutes later, a pressing UMass offense registered its first goal off the foot of redshirt junior Sydney Stoll.

"I checked in and made eye contact with Therese Smith who then found my feet," Stoll said. "Then I cut inside, the goalie stepped up towards me, and I was able to find the opposite side of the net."

Stoll wasn't finished yet; 29 minutes into the match, she forced a turnover which quickly turned into a breakaway opportunity. However, the Peahen goalkeeper aggressively came out and deflected Stoll's shot away from the net.

UMass	2
St. Peters	1

The remainder of the period was characterized by clean defense and a goal from Therese Smith, which proved to be the game-winner. The goal was assisted by junior Ashley Hamel, who coach Napoli believed was a decisive player in the match.

"She is usually our left sided midfielder but injuries forced us to move Ashley into the center of the midfield," Napoli said. "She went in there, figured it out quickly, didn't complain and just worked hard."

Eighteen minutes into the second period, it was Therese Smith again who nearly added to UMass' lead. Smith found herself with some space and ripped a shot on goal, which was stopped by a diving effort from the goalkeeper.

Although the match represented UMass' first offensive outburst, the defense was also strong. The Peahens were limited to six shots, while the Minutewomen registered 22. Although owning an undesirable record to this point, the Minutewomen

See W. SOCCER on page 6

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY

COLLEGIAN

Pt. SUNNY | HIGH: 78 LOW: 59 www.DailyCollegian.com TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 2009

UMass wins 8 Fulbrights

Eight students receiving scholarship, three more than ever before

BY SAM BUTTERFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts saw eight students win Fulbright scholarships this year, three more than any previous year.

The eight students are Nicholas Balascio, a Ph.D. student in geosciences who will travel to Norway; Russell Boutelle, an English major who will teach English in Argentina; Caitlyn Burns, a history major who will teach English in South Korea; Amalia Etedgee, a music major who will study in Israel; Devin Fitzgerald, a master's student who will do research in China; Niall Stephens, a Ph.D. student who will do a project in Chile; Anissa Talantikite, a political science major who will travel to Morocco to work on women's rights, and Evan Torner, a graduate student who will study in Germany.

Fulbright program advisor Susan Whitbourne said she and her faculty committee, which evaluates the applicants' proposals, were extremely pleased with this year's results.

"We were very excited that we had a record year for the Fulbrights," she said. "The sheer number of applicants was outstanding. We had 19. We had a particularly competitive group this year, and they did a wonderful job on their applications."We were very pleased that so many people applied and that so many won," she added.

Whitbourne explained that she and her committee evaluate the students' proposals on their "validity and feasibility," stating that the committee attempts to determine if the proposals are a suitable fit for where and what they will be studying and if the proposals are realistic candidates to win the scholarship.

"We rate their ability to represent the U.S. as ambassadors to other countries," Whitbourne said, "and we also look at their maturity and adaptability to foreign cultures."

From the UMass committee, proposals that are selected go to a national panel, then, if successful, to the national panel of the country where the applicant wishes to study. Whitbourne said that interested students don't need a perfect academic portfolio to be realistic candidates, and explained that often a stellar proposal can vastly outweigh near perfect grades.

"I'd hate to discourage anyone with middling grades from applying, because a strong proposal and something that fits with the country and study can really work for a student," she said."It could be a 3.2. It could be a 3.9. Some particular countries are super competitive," she elaborated, "a lot of our students have had foreign experience, and that helps a lot. They have shown that they have the life skills to live in that country."

Whitbourne has been involved with the Fulbright selections for 11 years, serving as the program advisor for the last 10. She said that this year she had hoped the University would have 10 winners, but said that the results were actually fairly close, as UMass had eight winners, one alternate and one student selected for a different scholarship.

The alternate is undergraduate Ashley Sherry, who will study public policy in Mexico. Renu Singh, an undergraduate microbiology and political science major, will study in Germany, winning a German Academic Exchange Service award.

The scholarships are for one year and are fully funded by the U.S. Department of State, Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs. Since its inception in 1946, the program has given approximately 111,000 American students the chance to study or research abroad in more than 155 countries worldwide.

The winning students were thrilled at the opportunities afforded by their prestigious selection.

Russell Boutelle, an English major from Gardner, Mass., who will teach English in Argentina, called his selection a "great honor."

"I think it's particularly gratifying for me, as a first-generation college student and as someone whose parents have never left the country," he said.

"I'm incredibly excited to be returning to Argentina, a country where I spent a week as part of the Latin American Studies department's Alternative Spring Break trip in 2008. That experience was really the catalyst for my application to the fellowship."

Boutelle said he was eager to share not only American English with Argentina, but also Massachusetts' own brand of the language.

"I'm eager to share my experiences with the English language as an American, and our 'wicked' unique dialect here in New England and our generation's incredibly complicated, ever-evolving slang," he said.

Caitlyn Burns, a history major from Groveland, Mass., will live in Cheonju, South Korea, a city an hour and a half south of Seoul. She will teach English at an all-girls middle school and stay with

See FULBRIGHTS on page 2

University of Massachusetts students will be studying in Mexico, Argentina, Chile, Germany, Israel, Norway, South Korea, China and Morocco.

Vehicle in crash may be black 90s Geo Prizm

Pictured is a 1995 Geo Prizm, similar to the one authorities believe may have killed former UMass student Blake Goodman and injured his friend.

While the vehicle responsible for the accident which killed former University of Massachusetts Amherst student Blake Goodman and injured his friend John Deary remains at large, investigators have determined what they believe to be the make and model.

A September 17 press release from Amherst Police Department Lieutenant Ronald Young states that investigators have determined the vehicle is a black Geo Prizm from the late 1990s. Initial reports stated the vehicle was thought to be a black Ford sedan.

The vehicle should have sustained heavy damage to the front passenger side and may be missing a passenger side mirror, damage to the passenger side panels and possibly a cracked windshield.

The Massachusetts State Police lab has been involved in analyzing the evidence recovered from the scene, and the Amherst police release calls the lab "instrumental" in examining the physical evidence.

Investigators believe that more witnesses may have been in the area around the accident, which took place on Montague Road in Amherst, at the time, around 10:30 p.m. on September 12. Anyone with information pertinent to the case is asked to call the Amherst Police at (413) 259-3000 or the CRIMELIP line at (413) 259-3344.

–Collegian Staff

Former SBS dean honored

Rifkin receives award for career in conflict resolution

BY SAM BUTTERFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Professor Janet Rifkin will be honored in October by the Association for Conflict Resolution (ACR) for her work on alternative dispute resolution, assessment of flaws in the field of conflict resolution's theories and for her leadership in conflict resolution studies.

The ACR will give Rifkin the Mary Parker Follett Award at its annual conference, held this year in Atlanta from October 7 to 10. The award is presented to an individual who has shown a passion and a willingness to take risks, is tackling a contemporary problem or opportunity in the field of dispute resolution, has used innovative and experimental techniques and draws on the talents and ideas of all persons involved, according to the ACR web site.

Parker Follett was an early advocate of resolving conflict by encouraging parties to integrate interests into negotiations, also according to the ACR. Later, Parker Follett became a business advisor, teaching business owners how to manage all facets of their organizations.

Rifkin grew up in New York, went to Sarah Lawrence College and New York University Law School, and has been a University of Massachusetts faculty member since 1974, serving as associate dean of the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences from 1995 to 1997, chair of the legal studies department from 1997 to 2002 and Dean of the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences from 2002 to May 2009. She has been co-director of the Center for Information Technology and Dispute Resolution within the legal sciences department since 1997.

She was an ombudsperson from 1991 to 1995, and has been director of the University Mediation Project since 1980. She is also co-founder of the National Association of Mediation in Education, an advisor to the American Bar Association Committee on Dispute Resolution and a member of the board of the National Association of Community Justice.

Rifkin said winning the award underscores how UMass' legal studies department has been an innovator in the field of conflict resolution and mediation. She further explained that she and some colleagues started the first campus-based mediation program in the country in the early 1980s, called the UMass Mediation Project, and that UMass was, for some years, the headquarters of the National Association for Mediation in Education (NAME), stating that "we held several important conferences here," and that "we were recipients of a number of important grants from prominent organizations."

Rifkin stated that UMass has become a leader in the field of Online Dispute Resolution (ODR), "and continues to be doing cutting edge work in this area."

Professor Janet Rifkin has won the Mary Parker Follett award, which is selected each year by the Association for Conflict Resolution.

She said winning the award reflects the quality of the legal studies department at UMass.

"I think the award I am getting says as much about the legal studies department, my colleagues and the University more generally, as it does about me."

Rifkin said she believes her inquisitive nature helped her receive this recognition.

"I have always liked to ask questions and challenge assumptions and that has informed what I have done in the field of alternative dispute resolution," she said. "One of the things I have enjoyed the most, by the way, is teaching courses to undergraduate and graduate students in conflict resolution."

The Association for Conflict Resolution is a professional organization, which attempts to enhance the practice and public understanding of conflict resolution. The group represents more than 6,000 mediators, arbitrators, facilitators, educators and others involved in conflict resolution and collaborative decision-making.

The field of alternative dispute resolution attempts to find ways better than violence or court to solve disagreements between parties.

Forms of conflict resolution often involve negotiation, mediation,

See RIFKIN on page 2

Two injured in fight on Sunset

Officers were dispatched to 213 Sunset Ave. on Friday night, September 18 at 1:05 a.m. to respond to what an Amherst Police Department release described as a "large scale disturbance."

Upon arrival, officers determined that two young men had been assaulted there. It has not yet been determined what prompted the incident, according to the release.

One of the men had cuts and bruises. The second man sustained severe facial injuries and is undergoing treatment presently for what the release describes as injuries that are not life threatening. The release does not say where the man is being treated, and does not name the men because it is an ongoing investigation. The men are University of Massachusetts students.

The suspect in the incident is described as a college-aged white male with a brown Mohawk haircut.

The investigation is being handled by both the Amherst Police Department and the University of Massachusetts Police Department. Anyone who may have witnessed the assault is advised to call the Amherst Police at (413) 259-3000 or the TIPLINE at (413) 259-3344.

–Collegian Staff

ARTS&LIVING

JEN'S PIECES A MIXED 'BODY' BAG

Megan Fox ditches the Tonka trucks and vamps it up as a demon hungry for teen flesh in Diablo Cody's underwhelming new horror-comedy flick, "Jennifer's Body."

SEE PAGE 5

SPORTS

MINUTEMEN FINISH FIRST IN LONE HOME MEET

In their only home meet of the season, the men's cross country squad finished first out of five teams.

SEE PAGE 10

EDITORIAL&OPINION

AMHERST'S FOUNDING IDEALS

According to Eric Magarti, modern society could take a few pointers from Amherst's founders.

SEE PAGE 4

DailyCollegian.com

CIRQUE DU SOLEIL SLIDESHOW

See the circus through Collegian photographer Matthew Harrison's lens in an exclusive slideshow of the Cirque de Soleil performance at the Mullins Center.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIX
ISSUE II

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF William McGuinness
MANAGING EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
BUSINESS MANAGER Daniel Jette
PRODUCTION MANAGER Michael Sarkes
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Kirsten Swenson
ADVERTISING MANAGER Michael Tortorici
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Max Deimer
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Shayna Murphy
COPIES EDITOR Annie Kenthline
EDITORIAL EDITOR Nick O'Malley
NEWS EDITOR Nick Bush
SPORTS EDITOR Jeffrey R. Larnard
WEB EDITOR Brian Wood
PHOTO EDITOR Matthew Harrison
IT MANAGER Victor Jaerk
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Matt Zolnierz
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Jacinto
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Norman Provost
CLASSIFIED MANAGER Katelyn Tomillo
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Justin Gagnon
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Elyse Horowitz
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Cal Scannell
ASSISTANT COPIES Andrew Witts
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Michael Phillis
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Hannah Nelson
ASSISTANT NEWS Samuel Butterfield
ASSISTANT NEWS Alyssa Creamer
ASSISTANT NEWS Jenn Heshion
ASSISTANT SPORTS David Brinch
ASSISTANT SPORTS Mike Gillmeister
ASSISTANT SPORTS Adam Miller
ASSISTANT PHOTO Maxwell Sparr
ASSISTANT PHOTO Samantha Webber
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA Sara Cody
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA Chris Shores

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY OWNED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER HAS, AS MARY LEE, BECOME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1934 AND THE DAILY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 413-545-3500 BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Will McGuinness

COPY EDITOR
Chelsea Whitton

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Dan Centola

Rifkin wins conflict resolution award for work in field which involves an impartial third party facilitator, arbitration, where a third party mediator renders a decision for two groups, mediation-arbitration, essentially a hybrid of the two, early neutral evaluation, which entails having a court ordered attorney review a case and encouraging the parties to find a resolution based on what they feel would happen at trial, community conferencing, negotiated rulemaking and peer mediation.

RIFKIN from page 1

Sam Butterfield can be reached at shutterfield@dailycollegian.com.

Janet Rifkin will be honored in October by the Association for Conflict Resolution for her work on alternative dispute resolution.

Eight receive Fulbrights

UMass sends students around the world

South Korea is one of the many places UMass students will be traveling for their Fulbright scholarships. Pictured is a palace in Seoul.

FULBRIGHTS from page 1

a host family, serving, in her own words, as an ambassador of American culture by leading activities at the school on American culture and representing America to her host family.

Burns said that as a Korean-American, she finds the experience particularly rewarding, as she is seeing a country about which she has always wondered.

"As a Korean-American, I have always been interested in what life is like in Korea, and that definitely influenced my decision to apply," she said.

Burns credited her selection to some of her experiences at UMass.

"I think my previous experience working and volunteering with children and the leadership opportunities that I had at UMass, where I was a peer advisor for the Commonwealth College and also chaired the Commonwealth College Peer Advisory Board, helped a lot," she said.

Niall Stephens, a Ph.D student in communications from Boston, will travel to Chile to investigate the effects of globalization on poplar politics.

Stephens said the selection "feels great," and will allow him to "do the research I've been hoping to do for my Ph.D."

He explained that he hopes to analyze how globalization has affected protest and alternate visions, in addition to how the spread of capitalism has affected living conditions and the environment.

"When people think globalization, they frequently think of the expansion of capitalism into every corner of the planet, but what about the globalization of protest and alternate visions?" he said.

He said there is often a rift between environmentalists and locals, and his goal is to "help them overcome those differences."Anissa Talantikite, a political science major from Salem, Mass., will study women's rights and economic development in Morocco. She said the experience has already shown her "how lucky I am."She said the Moroccan American Commission for Educational and Cultural Exchange "does a wonderful job facilitating our immersion into Moroccan society – which is a bit more challenging to do during the holy month of Ramadan.

Talantikite is presently studying Arabic at the Arabic Language Institute in Fes and described learning Arabic as tough. Her research will focus on how women's labor can be incorporated into the Moroccan market, and she will focus on a cooperative group called Targanine that makes and sells argan oil.

"There's a vibrant community of women's activist groups that I'm eager to learn more about and work with," she said. "I'm hoping to use my case-study research to imagine ways to expand global gender equality through greater economic freedom," she said.

Sam Butterfield can reached at shutterfield@dailycollegian.com

RAs train for suicide prevention

Health Services describes warning signs

BY ALYSSA CREAMER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Mental health services psychologist Kerry Morrison addresses a crowd of residence life staff on the topic of suicide prevention.

The week of Sept. 21, presents some grim but informative training on suicide prevention for resident assistants at the University of Massachusetts.

UMass' mental health services received a college suicide prevention grant in 2006 to last until 2009. The grant has been used to create workshops to train faculty at UMass about the various ways in which suicide can be prevented.

Because of the close proximity resident life staff has from living in close quarters to the student body on-campus, resident assistants [RAs] and resident directors are considered by mental health services to be "first responders" to suicide cases. As such, the University requires the suicide prevention training mandatory for its resident life staff.

Kerry Morrison, a licensed psychologist working at mental health services and the coordinator of the suicide prevention program, oversaw the workshop in room 917 of the Campus Center Monday night and will be continuing to do so for the rest of the week.

She began her seminar by explaining that suicide among teenagers can be prevented if proper measures to are taken to help those at risk.

"Suicide is a permanent solution to a temporary problem," said Morrison. "Suicide is not a choice. It happens when the pain a person is experiencing exceeds that person's resources to cope with that pain."

Morrison stressed the importance of suicide prevention training by listing off statistics to RAs about the gravity and commonality of the issue.

According to a report in 2004 with data taken from the 2000 census and information collected by the American Association of suicidology, suicide is the third leading cause of death among adolescents. It is the second leading cause of death in college students and is second to motor vehicle accidents.

The following statistics, due to the necessity of gaining statistics from and ten-year census, may be slightly outdated. Morrison represented the thoughts of mental health services stating that "the numbers are actually probably higher."

That data she presented said that every year about 5,000 young adults complete suicide. That figure excludes the number of students who attempt suicide but are unable for various reasons to end their lives. That is to say 14 young adults every day complete suicide; that is one young adult every hour and half. Of these 5,000 yearly suicides, some 1,100 are college students.

According to Morrison, a national survey reported that 10 percent of young adults identify that they have had suicide ideation or thoughts of suicide.

"I thought the statistics were very eye-opening. Just hearing that it was the second leading cause of death in college students was very unnerving," said junior hospitality and tourism management major and resident assistant Nick Ciardi.

A sheet of paper outlining guidelines for how to seek or get others help was handed out to a group of this year's new RAs. It explained in that in emergency situation it is important to call 9-1-1 or find immediate help from a mental health provider when one hears or sees someone exhibiting the common signs of suicide.

For example, if someone is threatening to hurt or kill his or herself, Morrison stressed that is a situation in which that person should be referred to mental health services.

As Morrison put it, "there are red flags" that should go up in an RAs mind when they discover that someone might be hurting themselves through cutting or attempting to hurt themselves by trying to find access to pills or weapons that could potentially end his life.

Other behaviors RAs were told to watch out for as signs of suicidal thoughts are residents who display feelings of hopelessness, rage, anger, vengeance, recklessness, excessive risk-taking, being trapped, anxiety, agitation or purposelessness. Additionally, the suicide prevention training also explained to those in training that if a student does any of the following – increases alcohol or drug use, withdraws from friends, family or society, suffers from insomnia or can be found sleeping all the time, has dramatic changes in his or her mood or proclaims he or she has no reason for living – these are all messages that that person is in need of help.

There was a consensus of fear between many RAs that someone who might be contemplating suicide might only be sending out messages that are too cryptic for them to notice in time to refer that person to right resources.

Morrison attempted to quell common myths about suicide such as that "people who talk about suicide won't really do it," citing that research that she finds reliable has shown that "almost everyone who attempts suicide has given some clue or warning." Also, the program claimed that in studies done about suicide victims, over

See TRAINING on page 3

Public Health & Health Sciences Career & Internship Fair

Thinking about a career in public health and health sciences?

Want an internship or a community service project?

Wondering what kind of jobs you could get with a degree in public health and health sciences?

Learn about careers and internships in public health and network with public health professionals. Over 25 health organizations from Western Massachusetts attending!

For: Undergraduate and graduate students
Where: UMass Campus Center Auditorium
When: Thursday September 24, 2009
Time: 10:00am - 2:00pm
Refreshments and light lunch will be served.
Special performance by the Not Ready for Bedtime Players.

FREE and Open to the Public.
Come for any or all of the time.

Please contact risa@schoolph.umass.edu or call 545-2529 for more information.

SPHS School of Public Health and Health Sciences

Funding was provided by a cooperative agreement between the Association of Schools of Public Health and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention

UMASS AMHERST

Preemptive prevention:

Residence Life trained to watch for suicide risks

TRAINING from page 2

half of them sought professional help within six months of their suicide. This proves the idea that those with suicidal thoughts do not have any interest in seeing a therapist invalid.

Another myth that Morrison's handouts debased was "if a person is going to attempt suicide, nothing is going to stop them." Morrison explained that most individuals who attempt suicide "remain uncertain of their decision until the final moment. Most suicidal people do not wish for death; they wish for the pain to stop."

Some of the people attending this suicide prevention program believed there was an element of truth to the statement that "Talking about suicide may give someone the idea." However, the lecture insisted that a person does not give a person suicidal thoughts by talking about suicide. Instead, it suggests that "bringing up the subject and discussing it is one of the most helpful things [a person] can do, as it helps a suicidal person feel understood and demonstrates that [someone] understands the amount of suffering the person is experiencing.

"RAs are not therapists," said Morrison told the RAs. "Don't bear the burden of knowing someone needs help alone. Share with your fellow RAs and staff."

She also explained that it is important to encourage students showing signs of suicidal thoughts to talk with others such as friends, peers, and family members.

Morrison did stress that while RAs are not therapists and need to take care of their own mental health, that just by exhibiting human compassion and taking the time to show concern for others could help prevent someone from committing suicide.

"If a person feels like they can talk to you about suicide, they probably feel like they can talk to you about anything" said Morrison.

She also discussed what to do if it seems as though a person is attempting to conceal his pain or thoughts of suicide.

"Trust your gut," said Morrison. "After 25 years of school and training, it is really my gut that leads me. People can say all the right things to try to get you to believe that nothing is wrong, but if your gut is telling you something's up, follow it. Just sincerely asking [that person] 'what is really going on?' usually works."

Morrison told a story about one of the 14 individuals who attempted to commit suicide by jumping off the Golden Gate Bridge and plummeting into the San Francisco Bay. His story exemplifies the importance of human connections and not ignoring signs of pain in someone else.

"The man said that as soon as he jumped, he regretted it," said Morrison. "A German woman asked him to take his picture, while he stood there looking extremely scared and upset. He took her picture and jumped over the edge. He said that if she had just acknowledged that something was wrong with him, he probably would not have jumped."

"I thought the training was extremely interesting," said junior anthropology major and resident assistant Carrie Swain. "It was helpful to go over suicide prevention methods again because we did receive some briefing during our summer training."

The lecture ended with a role-playing session in which the RAs were encouraged to shout out advice to Morrison as she pretended to be a fictional sophomore student who blamed herself for her sisters death and was contemplating suicide.

"I did not find it that difficult to talk about suicide prevention," said sophomore psychology and neuroscience major and resident assistant Mary Donhoffner. "I liked the role-playing at the end because it felt very realistic. It is good to have experience with conversations about suicide before we are exposed to it as RAs."

Alyssa Creamer can be reached at acreamer@dailycollegian.com

Dorm digs get glam:

Schools build posh pads

BY SARA OLKON
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

WEST LAFAYETTE, Ind.- Inside this pricey new residence hall, Purdue University students enjoy maid service and private bathrooms. Each room has its own climate-control panel, and students don't even have to confer about the settings. There are no roommates.

The communal lounges - there are two on every floor - have 47-inch flat-screen TVs, entertainment centers custom-designed by Amish carpenters, free Wi-Fi and kitchenettes with ceramic tile.

For these amenities and more, students or their parents pay a premium of $5,000 per year above typical room and board costs. Yet in the depths of a recession, the 356 spots at First Street Towers residential hall sold out in two days, in part because of generational changes in parenting and in young adults' expectations about privacy and privation.

Increasingly, colleges are building their own luxury accommodations to keep students on campus, said James Baumann, a spokesman for the Association of College and University Housing Officers-International.

For the millennial generation - born between 1982 and 2003 - sharing space doesn't always come easy. Privacy isn't negotiable.

"They didn't grow up sharing a bedroom, maybe even sharing a bathroom," Baumann said. "When it comes time for college, they anticipate a continuation of that."

Ashley Hendzell, 19, a sophomore, takes advantage of her autonomy at First Street Towers by liberally spritzing her room with the eau de cologne Ralph Hot, keeping 30 pairs of shoes at the ready and jamming the bookshelf with every episode of "The O.C." and "Dawson's Creek."

"I've never had to worry about anyone else," said Hendzell, whose two siblings are several years older. "I've always been alone."

Tom Cheesman, architect of Purdue's $52 million First Street Towers, said the residence hall is "essentially a hotel." He said it is especially attractive to "helicopter parents who want to send their son or daughter to college campus but give them all the luxuries of home."

The demand for more posh undergraduate housing is growing across college campuses, contradicting general economic trends toward simplifying and cutting back.

This fall, Boston University unveiled a 960-bed luxury dorm overlooking the Charles River that comes with walk-in closets, large private bathrooms, washers and dryers programmed to alert students via computer when their sheets are dry. Rooms in the elegant tower also run about $5,000 more than a traditional room.

"Students want beauty, and they should have beauty," Kenneth Elmore, BU's dean of students, told the Boston Globe.

At Arizona State University, non-freshmen can apply for a spot at Vista Del Sol, an on-campus, 1,841-bed facility run in partnership with a private developer. Billed as a first-class resort, the complex has a heated pool, a hot tub, a sand volleyball court and four tanning booths. Units come with "lavishly appointed" kitchens, washer and dryers, cable and Internet access. Rent for a one-person efficiency is about $1,000 a month and requires a 12-month lease - well above the $6,500 per academic year for a traditional one-bedroom on campus.

"Schools recognize that (nicer) residence halls are part of the recruitment process," Baumann said. "This led to what we call, tongue-in-cheek, 'the amenities war,'" he said. "'Dorm' is a four-letter word."

Hotel living comes at a price. At First Street Towers, the rooms start around $13,800 per academic year, including at least 10 dining-hall meals a week. The same room-and-board arrangement in a standard double room is about $5,000 less.

"You are going to be in debt anyway, might as well enjoy," Hendzell said, explaining her decision to upgrade.

Tom Paczolt, the tower's general manager, conceded that the concept "may seem like coddling," but the market demand is clear.

"Boomers really want it better for their kids," he said.

Purdue senior Rob Michalski said he'd had it with roommates, including those who smelled "so horrible."

Before classes began, the 22-year-old hauled his own wall-to-wall carpeting to First Street Towers and installed a 32-inch plasma TV.

Boston University's new Student Village dorms offer luxury and skyline views, and cost $5,000 more than other dorms. Many schools are offering better housing.

Waking and entering: Hamlin burglarized

UMass Police are looking for two individuals in conjunction with a Sunday morning burglary at Hamlin Hall in Northeast.

At 3:50 a.m. Sunday morning, an unidentified Hamlin Hall resident called police after waking up to an intruder in his dorm room. The resident reported that the man was trying to steal his laptop computer, and that upon scanning the room, he noticed his roommate's laptop had been stolen. He yelled at the man and apparently scared him away, and then called police.

After viewing security camera recordings, police were able to capture an image of the suspects and are looking for the men pictured. Anyone with information in the case should call the UMass Police Department at 413-545-2121 or the UMPD Detective Bureau at 413-545-0893, or provide an anonymous tip by calling 413-577-8477.

Banging the beats at Campus Center

Outside the Campus Center auditorium are (from L to R) adjust music professor Jeremy Cohen, senior Chris Sartori, and senior Mike Thacker, banging drums they brought from their trip to Ghana.

Massachusetts
HARVEST FOR STUDENTS Week

- Meet John Ash, nationally renowned wine/food educator, restaurateur, and cookbook author of From the EARTH to the TABLE, Wednesday and Thursday 7pm
- Meet local farmers, artisan cheese makers, and bee keepers
- Sample fresh from the garden produce

MONDAY 9/21 · HAMPSHIRE DC
TUESDAY, 9/22 · FRANKLIN DC
WEDNESDAY, 9/23 · BERKSHIRE DC
THURSDAY, 9/24 · WORCESTER DC

September 21–24
All DCs from 5–9 pm

LOCAL HERO buy locally grown
RESTAURANT ivy
UMASS DINING UMassAmherst
umassdining.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 2009

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
- Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Revisiting the final frontier

Matt Kushi

Have you ever just stood outside on a clear night and looked out at the moon and the stars? Have you ever wondered about space exploration and if there is life somewhere out there, far beyond the depths of what we can imagine?

For the past 40 years, space exploration has been one of the ongoing missions in the scientific world. We have visited the moon and attempted to look into Mars. With the Space Shuttle nearing retirement, it is time for new technology to lead the way into space once again. The first destination of the future, other than our attempts to explore Mars through robotic capsules, has been designated as the moon. This was declared a goal in a speech that President Bush gave in 2004.

Why do we need to revisit the moon? Haven't we accomplished all that needs to be accomplished there? Isn't it a waste of resources and money to go back?

The moon is necessary as a testing ground and a stabilizer for further and better space explorations.

"We choose to go to the moon in this decade and do the other things, not because they are easy, but because they are hard, because that goal will serve to organize and measure the best of our energies and skills, because that challenge is one that we are willing to accept, one we are unwilling to postpone, and one which we intend to win, and the others, too."

These were words spoken 47 years ago, on September 12, 1962, by President John F. Kennedy in a speech at Rice University. This speech became known as the formal declaration of the United States into the "space race," and it was deemed that the United States would join in the adventure of exploring what was called the last frontier.

As a nation, the United States always had a frontier that filled its inhabitant's lust for adventure. The idea the unexplored has helped keep the driving ambition alive, which has defined America. Space became the newest frontier.

We found out it wasn't that easy. Unlike our early days of exploring, when we believed the world had an end in one manner or another, space has no limit. As far as we are concerned, space is infinite.

As we well know, the moon was visited many times from 1969 to 1972 with the Apollo missions. It was determined that the moon was not a suitable place for human life. So why do we seek to go back?

Some of the answers that we seek can be found by talking to members of the Astronomy Department at the University of Massachusetts Amherst. Rob Gutermuth, a Five College Post Doctoral Fellow, gave some insight to the reason behind the Moon.

"Yes, we have been to the moon before" says Gutermuth. "But that was 35 to 40 years ago. Technology has changed since them. A reason why we are likely looking to go back to the moon is to see what new technology has to offer [in terms of future space travels]."

Another reason why we may be going to the moon is to make sure that the spacecraft being built is suitable for more risky missions, Mr. Gutermuth pointed out. "It wouldn't be good if we sent guys to Mars and found out that, because we didn't test anything, that we had just sent these guys on a one way trip to Mars."

We must also make sure the technology is up to date. Mars is further away than the moon, so we need technology that is able to endure a longer voyage to a distant planet.

For many, the moon is history. However, a testing ground makes sense.

To add on to that idea, one thing that NASA could do is test the new spacecraft and technology on the moon. On that same trip, do an analysis and see if we are ready to inhabit the moon with new technology. Of course, barring any release of classified files or a miraculous break-through in technological advancements, we will not have that technology anytime in the near future. It may come along sometime, but we do not currently have it. However, if there comes a time when we are able to support life on the moon, we should reinvestigate the matter with further missions.

In order for the Moon to be a successful area to live, we would need to supply our own water, food, supplies and air. We do not have the technology for a foreign planet.

Since we are destined to return to the moon, what needs to be done is do several test runs with spacecraft and tweak it to perfection with modern technology on these moon trips. From there, we need to move on. There are greater and more expansive frontiers to explore. The moon is necessary as a testing ground and a stabilizer for further and better space explorations. At this point in time, it should not be any more than that. There are other frontiers waiting.

Matt Kushi is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mkushi@student.umass.edu.

Amherst's founding ideals

Eric Magazu

This Sunday at 1p.m. there will be a parade starting at Amherst College and ending at the Haigis Mall, on the University of Massachusetts campus. The parade will run through the center of Amherst.

The purpose is to commemorate the 250th anniversary of the city that hosts our University. Through our involvement with the University, as residents of Amherst, we might endeavor to learn about the history of the people among whom we live.

According to "The Handbook of Amherst, Massachusetts" published in 1894 by Frederick Hitchcock, the migration of settlers to the various parts of western Massachusetts was largely motivated by "divergent theories of government." This is to say that it was not for economic need or economic exploitation that our ancestors moved, but they were motivated by fundamental principles of government and theories concerning the nature of liberty and freedom.

The settlers of our particular area first travelled from eastern Massachusetts to Hartford, Conn., then traveled up the Connecticut River towards our portion of the Commonwealth. According to the same handbook, the friends of Rev. John Hooker, a prominent church leader at the time, were motivated to move up from Hartford to attain a larger degree of personal liberty.

Rev. Hooker's first public lecture at Hartford is often cited as laying the foundation for the truths enshrined in both our Massachusetts and Federal Constitutions.

In his first lecture, Rev. Hooker expounded the foundation of government upon Deuteronomy 1:13, which according to modern translations is rendered, "Choose for your tribes wise, understanding and experienced men, and I will appoint them as your heads." Moses refers back to an earlier event where he delegates some of his authority to judge the people to "wise, understanding and experienced men," whom the people themselves will choose.

Without some form of shared ideals, we end up placing ourselves in a precarious position as a community and a nation.

Upon this basis, Rev. Hooker derived three principles directly from the law of God. They can be summarized as follows. The people have the right to choose their own leaders; the people must choose their leaders based on the law of God and not their own fancies; and the people have a right to limit the scope of the power delegated to these leaders. He went on to provide reasons for these principles. First that authority is only legitimate when it is through the free consent of the people themselves. Secondly, the ability to give their free consent results in an increased likelihood that they would submit to this authority.

It is not difficult to see where we find the basis of representative democracy, federalism and local control in teachings of our forefathers. The surprise is that educated men would conclude these truths from the Bible. After all, who would have thought such a thing? In America generally, and certainly in Massachusetts, we still hold to these principles very strongly, perhaps with the exception of Rev. Hooker's second principle. This is an essential ideal that should be discussed more often. Upon which criteria do we choose our political leaders?

This is critically important because without some form of shared ideals, we end up placing ourselves in a precarious position as a community and a nation. Tolerance of deviant behaviors is appropriate insofar as it permits people to live in harmony and peace, but when it challenges the very foundations of society, these behaviors should be exposed as immoral and contrary to God's law. It will lead us to the same place where things had gotten out of hand in Israel. Judges 17:6 teaches, "In those days there was no king in Israel. Everyone did what was right in his own eyes."

Under modern sensibilities, we may feel that the ideal is that each person should be able to do what is right in his own view and that truth is up to each individual beholder. This is not the case. We already know that we have certain shared values that people are expected to uphold in community, and certain behaviors are simply deemed inappropriate in public or private.

Therefore the debate really rests within which philosophy we shall acquire our principles. The risk in all man-made philosophical and legal systems is that they are not eternal. People can challenge, modify or even breakaway from the main tenets, and there is nothing to deny that these positions are legitimate and sincere. On the Bible is a strong foundation of law, since on its basis there exists a fixed understanding of reality, received from God, where we can find assurance of our human rights.

The selection of our political leaders, therefore, ought to be rooted in Rev. John Hooker's second principle. The eighteenth article of the Declaration of Rights of the Massachusetts Constitution reaffirms this position, which begins by stating, "A frequent recurrence to the fundamental principles of the constitution and a constant adherence to those of piety, justice, moderation, temperance, industry and frugality, are absolutely necessary to preserve the advantages of liberty and to maintain a free government."

Eric Magazu is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at emagazu@student.umass.edu

DON'T LIKE WHAT WE HAVE TO SAY?

DON'T LET US GET AWAY WITH IT...

TELL US

SEND LETTERS TO THE EDITOR TO:

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Paying the price for an obese nation

Over several passed, months we've heard about the problems plaguing our current health care system. We've heard about the millions of uninsured Americans, the inefficiency of our current system, and we've heard different ideas about how to go about fixing it. But when are we going to address an equally important issue in this larger dilemma: what we are eating?

Dan Rahrig

Our obesity epidemic and the rise of diabetes in this country – two of the biggest (and most expensive) health problems we face today – didn't come about overnight. Clearly there is something wrong with our lifestyles, more specifically in the way we eat.

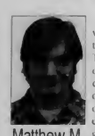
It seems that the White House is becoming increasingly aware of this dilemma, and controversial ideas were proposed regarding how to solve it. Recently there has been talk in Washington about putting a "sin tax" on soda and other sugary beverages, an idea that has already been proposed in states such as New York and California. President Obama does not seem opposed to the tax, acknowledging in an interview with Men's Health magazine that the sin tax is "an idea we should be exploring."

If we think health insurance is a problem now, imagine a third of the U.S. population seeking treatment for diabetes.

This notion is met with much criticism, especially from the soda companies (obviously) and from Republicans, who say that such a tax would go against Obama's campaign promise not to raise taxes on families making under $250,000 a year. But while the idea of a soda tax may at first seem outrageous – why penalize people for drinking what they want to? – but such a tax may be warranted.

Obesity and diabetes rates register at all-time highs in America, and they're only expected to get higher. As food politics expert Michael Pollan points out in his book, "The Omnivore's Dilemma," one out of every three people born after the year 2000 are projected to develop diabetes – a staggering figure that has implications not only for our health but also for our economy. If we think health insurance is a problem now, imagine a third of the U.S. population seeking treatment for diabetes. Then add the various medical complications that will arise from what the U.S. Surgeon General has deemed an obesity epidemic. We're looking at a gargantuan problem for an already struggling health care system.

So where does soda come into play? As Obama stated in an interview, "Every study that's been done about obesity shows that there is as high a correlation between increased soda consumption and obesity as just about anything else. Obviously it's not the only factor, but it is a major factor." This correlation has a lot to do with the large amount of high-fructose corn syrup (HFCS) in these beverages – the food industry's sweetener of choice for just about everything. It certainly can't be a coincidence that the rise in HFCS use has coincided with the steady rise of obesity and diabetes since its introduction to our diets in the 1980s. Though soda is not the only unhealthy culprit of using such unhealthy sweeteners, it's definitely a major contributor to our health problems.



There is no doubt that soda is bad for us, and we certainly drink a lot of it – the University of California Los Angeles (UCLA) Center for Health Policy Research and the California Center for Public Health Advocacy find that 62 percent of children aged 12 to 17 and 41 percent of children aged two to 11, drink at least one sugar-sweetened beverage a day. If a tax on sugary drinks were implemented, this would almost certainly cause us to cut our consumption of them. In fact, U.S. Center for Disease Control Director Tom Friedan has stated that a penny-per-ounce excise tax, for example, could curb our soda consumption by 10 percent. And the benefits of a sin tax go beyond the obvious – the Congressional Budget Office estimates that just a three cent tax on sugary drinks would generate $24 billion over the next four years.

But there are those who argue that a tax on soda goes against our right to choose – that it is not the government's place to tell people what to eat or drink. Maybe so, but something has to be done to stop the rise of obesity and diabetes in America, and reducing soda consumption by hitting consumers in the wallet could be a very effective way of doing so.

After months of intense and passionate health care debate, it is good to see that the issue of our diets and its role in our health care crisis is finally getting some legitimate attention. If we don't start making some serious changes to what we are eating and drinking, we are going to pay a heavy price, both financially and in terms of our health. But we don't tend to think about what we're consuming and how it will affect us over time – so maybe it's time for the government to remind us. A sin tax could prove to be an important first step in fixing our very serious health problems – problems that we literally can't afford to ignore any longer.

Dan Rahrig is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at drahrig@student.umass.edu.

Dissecting the many faces of war

Matthew M. Robare

We have a war on everything these days. There's a war on poverty, on drugs, on terror, on Christmas, on science, on crime and illegal immigration. In fact, it seems like the only thing we don't have a war on is premature ejaculation.

But I hear one's coming very quickly.

In any event, I'm very disturbed by all these wars, not least since they most often seem to make whatever problem they are supposed to be ending worse. A 2007 article published in Mother Jones by Peter Bergen and Paul Cruickshank, research fellows at New York University, says that the War on Terrorism had resulted in seven times the number of terrorist attacks world-wide.

The War on Drugs has meant that instead of being cheap and quality-controlled, drugs are expensive and cut with other, sometimes more deadly substances. Drugs have become a big business, rewarding the most violently ruthless and paranoid criminals with millions of dollars. No one is murdered over cigarettes. Military operations with dozens of dead – are fought over opiates. In the 1920s and 1930s, Prohibition and its "War on Alcohol" contributed to the power and wealth of gangsters like Al Capone.

According to the Census Bureau, by the time War on Poverty programs began in 1964, the poverty rate had fallen from 23 percent to 15 percent.

Since then, the percentage declined to about 12 percent in the mid-1970s and remained there while the actual number of people declined to about 25 million in the 1970s but then back up to 35 million in 2005. Now, correlation does not imply causation, but it does seem that the War on Poverty has been ineffective for 30 years.

Both left and right love traditional war: war against nations and peoples. It would appear that the United States is at war with the world – perpetual, impossible to end war.

Specific examples aside, my whole attitude towards war was shaped very early on by the classic television show "M*A*S*H." Set in an Army hospital during the Korean War. In one episode the central character, a surgeon nicknamed Hawkeye, declares that "War is war and Hell is Hell and of the two, war is worse," explaining that there are no innocent bystanders in Hell, while war is full of them. Marijuana prohibition is the best example of this. Stoners are harmless, but they used to get arrested, thrown in jail, and beat up by cops. William Randolph Hearst and Harry Anslinger used to make up stories of violent murders and the seduction of white women by black men because of "a narcotic known to America as marijuana."

In a similar vein, there are no longer any commissions or research groups. Now we have think-tanks and task forces. In the last presidential campaign, much was made of Obama's qualification or lack thereof to be commander-in-chief, and McCain even said he was running for commander-in-chief.

Militarism is everywhere in America nowadays. Both the left and the right take part in it whole hog. The far left has it's "vanguard of the revolution," and the mainstream has wars on inequality and oppression, in addition to the War on Poverty. The right has wars on terror and drugs and sees leftist wars on "traditional values." Both left and right love traditional war: war against nations and peoples. It would appear that the United States is at war with the world – perpetual, impossible to end war. How can we end a war on a concept or tactic when the words no longer exist in our lexicon?

Why is war so popular? There are two reasons, I think. One is historical. American mythology and popular history portray this country as having a special destiny to lead, if not rule, the world. The idea of Manifest Destiny, the City on a Hill, is a notion of being chosen. America was chosen by God or history to free the world from sin or oppression.

The earliest settlers launched a crusade against evil; we have inherited that crusade and must see it through to Utopia. Only instead of the Kingdom of God the Puritans sought, we seek to establish the Republic of God. That is our consciousness of why we fight, our justification and expiation. It was worth the deaths of the tens of thousands of civilians in Hiroshima and Nagasaki, Dresden, Tokyo and the 500,000 Iraqi children who died of starvation after the first Gulf War. It was worth because we were fighting evil foreign gooks, not other human beings.

The second reason, and the real reason, is power. Only governments declare war (not that they even do that anymore), only they have the monopoly on force that can enslave millions to be soldiers. That, ultimately, is the goal of government and all its allies, like big business and big labor.

They don't want free, independent, thinking people. They want good, unquestioning, totally obedient soldiers. Look at education. There are official views promulgated and encouraged, logic is no longer taught, homeschooling is depicted as the province of nut jobs and cultists. In the name of freedom and democracy, no independent thought will be tolerated. Question authority, but never government authority. As Lord Acton said, "power corrupts."

Matt Robare is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mrobare@student.umass.edu.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 2009

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Jen's in pieces, in a mixed 'Body' bag

Fox, Seyfried show off hidden assets but can't salvage Cody's awkward screenplay

By Haley Navarro
Collegian Correspondent

Let's get something straight: Diablo Cody is a comedy writer. Best known for her Oscar-winning script for "Juno," its evident that Cody is sharp, witty and up on her culture. "Jennifer's Body," released in theaters on September 18, does not succeed as a horror movie. However, it passes every test with flying colors in the comedy department.

You can't really blame it on the actors either. The title character, Jennifer Check, is played by Megan Fox, who despite all evidence to the contrary, can actually act. (You'd never know from the "Transformers" movies. Director Michael Bay's leering long shots of Fox draped over motorcycles make one feel like they've accidentally intruded on a peep show.)

"Big Love" actress Amanda Seyfried gives off a plucky presence as Jennifer's best friend, Anita "Needy" Lesnicky. Both actresses fit their roles perfectly, with Fox doing an impeccable job filling Diablo Cody's vision of a crazy, flesh-eating high school girl. Seyfried fills the role of said girl's less-attractive, dorky best friend with aplomb. Even Chip (Johnny Simmons), Needy's slightly nebbish-looking boyfriend, is an example of perfect casting.

The reasons why "Jennifer's Body" doesn't exactly excel in the genre is a result of the way the movie was put together. The plot is simple: indie-rock band sacrifices beautiful girl to the devil in order to gain a record contract. But their plans go alarmingly awry when Jennifer, who isn't a virgin as the ritual requires - becomes the host of a demon, who requires human flesh to survive. Needy, the unlikely hero, has to stop Jennifer to save the lives of the people in their small town.

Since the plot is so simple, it seems obvious that Cody had to figure out a way for the movie to not be overbearing but to also not leave the audience wanting more. This, it seems, was a difficult task for the celebrated screenwriter.

As mentioned, the writing is pristine. Very few writers can come close to the sarcasm that Cody executes effortlessly. Each joke is so obvious that you'd think you could write it yourself, and therein lies her talent. Yet Cody inserts the jokes silently into the scene, so as to not take away from the plot developments.

After becoming possessed by a demon, Jennifer discovers that regular food no longer works for her. We know this because at the beginning of the movie, Jennifer is shown throwing up black bile after trying to eat chicken.

The weird question that's raised as the movie goes on is thus: how does the demon inhabit Jennifer's body without completely controlling her? Jennifer is still the same conceited man-eating girl she always was. The punch line is, this time she's actually devouring her conquests whole. It's shown that her moods change according to if she needs to feed or not, but she is still the same person. More loose strings continue to plague the script, such as the question of why the townspeople seem so completely ignorant to what's happening, even as the body count continues to pile up.

Typically in a host scenario, the host is completely enveloped by its parasite. It seems odd that Cody would opt to have Jennifer's charm still emit from a demon, but maybe that was her intent. If the demon didn't say funny things before she kissed and ate boys, maybe it wouldn't have worked. (Key line: "Nice hardware, Ace.")

Another disappointing aspect of "Jennifer's Body" is its awkward scenes, of which there is no shortage. When Jennifer first becomes a demon, she goes directly to Needy's house. Looking like she just got hit by a car, she sneaks into Needy's house and proceeds to smile awkwardly for about 30 seconds without saying anything, exposing a set of truly disgusting prosthetic teeth.

"Jennifer's Body" could've also done without the immensely awkward sex scene between Needy and Chip; perhaps still smarting from the absence of such an awkward scene in "Juno" between Michael Cera and Ellen Page, Cody felt the need to unnecessarily insert one here. Though it was filtered with a scene of Jennifer devouring a boy, it was still unbearable to watch. The plot wouldn't have suffered if the audience just saw Jennifer in the process of chowing down on the boy. After the awkward sex scene, Jennifer is then shown drinking the blood of her latest victim where his stomach used to be. It's evident why it was placed there – to show exactly how Jennifer feeds – but again: AWKWARD. She cups her hands as if drinking out of her kitchen sink and repeats the process a few too many times, the effect never ceasing to repulse. The award for the most embarrassing, awkwardly-written and unnecessary scene goes to the (superfluous) lesbian kiss between Jennifer and Needy. Utterly overwritten and over-publicized, the kiss is about a minute long and ends abruptly, without explanation.

Megan Fox is probably what's going to get the movie to earn back its budget. She's a sex symbol, and teenage boys (well, all boys for that matter) seem to love her. Fox completely emulates something that is at once so beautiful, yet so evil. However, it must be said that Amanda Seyfried is the actress worth watching. Her performance (marked mostly by screaming and crying) was the most believable out of everyone, even Fox. Seyfried really was given a moment to shine in "Jennifer's Body." If anything, this was her movie.

"Jennifer's Body" has that certain edginess and quirkiness that I was up for it not really being that scary. If it were marketed more as a dark comedy, instead of in the same manner as 2007's "Disturbia" (which starred Fox's "Transformer's co-star Shia LaBoeuf), it would've been more successful. According to www.boxofficemojo.com, the movie made $6.8 million this past weekend, and was set at a budget of $16 million. Let's repeat: not a horror, but a comedy. People probably don't need to be running to the theater for this one, but it's not a bad way to spend a Sunday afternoon.

Haley Navarro can be reached at hnavarro@student.umass.edu

Sexy screen siren Megan Fox stars as the titular villain in Diablo Cody's latest film, "Jennifer's Body." Although better known for her looks than her acting abilities, Fox proves her detractors wrong.

Blood spills and emotions run high between long-time best friends Jennifer (Fox) and Needy (Seyfried) after Jennifer becomes the unwitting host of a voracious demon that begins feeding on the boys who frequent their high school.

Willis pledges but 'Sorority' misses the cut

By Kate MacDonald
Collegian Correspondent

It starts with an accidental death, followed by threats, gory deaths and a disguised killer. Sound familiar? These traits can be attributed to countless horror films made in the last two decades. Yet Stewart Hendler's "Sorority Row" brings a few new elements into the mix, namely comedic timing and a strong (if unknown) female cast.

While many college students can understand the implications of a drunken prank gone wrong, it becomes a living nightmare for the sisters of Theta Pi. After a party, they aid their sister Megan (Audrina Patridge) in planning a prank on her cheating boyfriend, who ends up stabbing her, thinking she was already dead. Rather than risking prison, broken reputations and disappointed family members, the rest of group plans to cover up the gory act. They get away with the crime for months, until they start getting text messages from Megan's phone. Hendler caters to his college-age audience, featuring numerous scenes of half-naked women, drugs, sex and heavy alcohol consumption. Upon further examination, maybe "Sorority Row" isn't just another brainless horror movie filled with cheap and often cringe-worthy tricks.

The cast is comprised of gorgeous young women and equally attractive male counterparts. The main characters are well-developed and easy to pick out in a typical campus setting. There's Ellie (Rumer Willis), the weak nerd; Claire (Jamie Chung), the ditzy follower; Chugs (Margo Harshman), the hard partier and Cassidy (Briana Evigan), the good girl. One by one, the sisters are murdered in exceedingly gruesome circumstances. It's up to the remaining girls to band together to protect one another's reputations, relationships and lives. This must be accomplished while upholding Theta Pi's values of "Trust, respect, honor, secrecy and solidarity," creating a very potent sense of female empowerment.

Carrie Fisher, of "Star Wars" fame, also stars as the housemother, an equally strong woman in her own right who gets her chance to protect her girls from the hooded killer. Fisher undoubtedly hands the title of "scream queen" over to Willis, who offers a constant soundtrack of grating, blood-curdling screams. Willis, as the offspring of former Hollywood power couple Bruce Willis and Demi Moore, doesn't have much to offer in the thespian realm, but her sniveling character provides a worthy foil for the film's de facto villain, Jessica (Leah Pipes).

Along with Evigan, Pipes steals

See SORORITY on page 6

Acclaimed director turns predictable in '80s slasher remake

SORORITY from page 5

the show. She provides a critical comedic element that helps set "Sorority Row" apart from its peers. Her cutting remarks and witticisms drift from the genre's often dark and humorless overtones. Whether humor is a coping mechanism or something even darker on her part, Jessica succeeds in making light of the situation at hand. Throughout, she's always looking for number one – a trait indicative of her status as the typical shrewish sorority girl.

Contrasting with Pipes is Evigan, who is depicted – more or less – as the group's moral compass. She shows tenacity as her character struggles with the situation and takes on the role as the group's level-headed leader. Cassidy must put others ahead of herself and grapple with the consequences of her actions, a trait that everyone must someday come to acquire.

Overall, "Sorority Row" is predictable. As a remake of the 1983 gorefest "House on Sorority Row," the film follows in the trend of other remakes from the golden age of slashers, such as 2008's "Prom Night." It becomes evident quickly which of the characters are the "good guys" and which are not. Otherwise, Hendler (whose 2003 film, "One," captured plenty of audience acclaim at the Sundance Film Festival) keeps the audience guessing about the identity of the killer until the very end. At alternating moments in the film, many of the characters are implicated in the horrendous slayings.

The plot of "Sorority Row" is not hard to follow, nor is it very deep; at times (especially in the opening scenes) the camera work even seems downright shoddy. But, it is at least an entertaining movie and one that's not overly serious.

The banter between the sisters keeps the movie flowing comfortably and makes it easy to relate to. Hendler tells a story that could happen to anyone, anywhere (within reason). There are many aspects of "Sorority Row" that, if further expanded on, could have added depth to the sisters' individual story archs. However, there are too many subplots at once or some smaller plots left without resolution to lend "Sorority Row" any reassuring measure of dramatic catharsis.

As it is, "Sorority Row" is not a serious contender for the title of world's greatest horror film, but, if truly considered, it is a movie that shows both the weaknesses and redeeming qualities of human character. If all else fails, it's also a flick with just enough gore and comedy to keep its audience fairly entertained for just under two hours.

Kate MacDonald can be reached at kaitlynm@student.umass.edu

LEW WEBSTER/SUMMIT PICTURES

Based on the 1983 gorefest "House on Sorority Row," director Stewart Hendler's latest outing features a cast of aspiring young starlets, including Rumer Willis and Audrina Patridge. Although enjoyable, "Sorority Row" quickly turns predictable.

Celebrated songwriter Eddie Vedder lets his guard down lyrically on Pearl Jam's ninth studio album, "Backspacer," tackling relationship woes and sexual frustrations.

Angsty Vedder gets personal, looks inward on 'Backspacer'

BY EVAN SAWDEY
POPMATTERS.COM

You've heard the rumors, and the rumors are true: Pearl Jam has finally released a "pop" album.

Yet the phrase "pop" doesn't mean what you think it does in the world of Pearl Jam. For certain purists, "pop" is just another way of saying that Pearl Jam has "sold out," a theory that's only furthered by the fact that "Backspacer" – the group's ninth studio album – is getting its physical release only through corporate retailer Target, a sure sign that the group is now chasing the Almighty Dollar instead of its values, lurching forward as if its infamous battle with Ticketmaster never even happened.

As if that isn't enough, there are some that gladly point to lead single "The Fixer" as undeniable evidence that the grunge pioneers have shed their white-knuckle trademark rock sound for something infinitely more accessible and upbeat, as if Eddie Vedder & Co. are now desperate for a gigantic radio hit.

To which the following response is generated: So what?

When Pearl Jam released its iconic debut album "Ten" in 1991, few would have guessed that the group would become unintentional godfathers of the '90s grunge explosion, entering the gigantic world of mainstream rock radio before Kurt Cobain even had a chance to let the door shut behind him (which is ironic given that "Ten" came out a whole month before Nirvana's "Nevermind" did). Though Pearl Jam soldiered on – racking up No. 1 albums and radio hits in equal measure – things began winding down as the millennium came to a close, and the 2000 release "Binaural" was arguably the moment when the group hit rock bottom, having finally released a disc that tried to sound like what the group thought people wanted to hear in a Pearl Jam album, instead of making the record that the band actually wanted to make. That's a theory that gains traction when you look at the rejected songs from the "Binaural" sessions that wound up on the 2003 rarities compilation "Lost Dogs" – tracks like "Sad" and "Hitchhiker" that proved to be some of the poppiest songs Pearl Jam had penned in years.

Yet it seems that Pearl Jam was very conscious of the fan reaction to "Binaural," and it is from this point onward that the group began getting a bit looser with its legacy, starting with the release of 72 "official" live bootlegs from its corresponding European and U.S. tours from that same year. In 2002, the group released "Riot Act," a solid if not truly spectacular album, failing to reach the heights of "Ten" or "Vs.," but still showing the group taking steps in the right direction, opening up its sound a bit more instead of letting itself get weighed down by its own legacy. This was soon followed by a contribution to the "Big Fish" soundtrack, a two-disc career retrospective called "rearviewmirror," the aforementioned "Lost Dogs" rarities set, and two more rounds of live bootlegs. It's as if Pearl Jam's members had finally embraced who they were, and were doing nothing but celebrating that discovery.

As such, their 2006 record – simply titled "Pearl Jam" – was nothing short of a revelation. For the first time in their career, guitarist Mike McCready was the principal sonic architect, and McCready made his intentions clear: He wanted to reconnect with the band's early sound, penning powerful rockers that were more melodic than angst-ridden, more soulful than distortion-fueled. It was, in short, the album that patient Pearl Jam fans had been waiting for, and boy did it deliver. Shortly thereafter, Eddie Vedder released his first solo album in the form of the "Into the Wild" soundtrack, and the group's crowning achievement ("Ten") was given the deluxe reissue treatment, not only reminding everyone just how influential that record was, but also showing that group had now officially moved beyond it – as great as "Ten" was, Pearl Jam was not going to let that disc define it any longer.

Which leads us to the novel thing about "Backspacer": There isn't a single disc in the group's entire back catalog that it can even be compared to. Though individual songs can be referenced in order to give one an idea of what "Backspacer" sounds like ("Last Exit" from "Vitalogy" and "Wishlist" from "Yield" being chief among them), "Backspacer" is its own unique entity: a scrappy little rock record that barely lasts 37 minutes, making it the shortest and most upbeat album in Pearl Jam's cluttered discography. Yet, more critically than that, "Backspacer" is the sound of Pearl Jam actually having fun again, and it's hard not to picture Vedder sporting a huge goofy grin on more than a few of these tracks, here rocking out with more passion than he did during his three-song stint as the Doors' guest vocalist during the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame induction ceremony in 1993.

"Backspacer" starts off with the lurching strut of "Gonna See My Friend," a ferocious little number that sounds like it was made by a much younger band, one that worshiped at the altar of '70s album rock instead of participating in the '90s Seattle grunge scene. Though the band's love of its heroes has been apparent in just about everything it's done – ranging from the successful take on Wayne Cochran's "Last Kiss" to the cover of The Who's "Love, Reign O'er Me" from the soundtrack to the 2007 Adam Sandler movie "Reign Over Me" – never before has Pearl Jam made such a direct, deliberate homage to its influences. "Supersonic" even manages the sounds-ridiculous-on-paper feat of marrying the non-stop guitar strum of a Ramones song with a Tom Petty chorus and solo-filled bridge that would make Jimmy Page (and the makers of "Guitar Hero") proud. (It even concludes with a "yeah yeah yeah" chant.)

And that's not the only time: "Yeah" makes up for a majority of the lyrics to the chorus of "The Fixer," an unbelievably catchy rock single that even uses handclaps during its verses. No, this is not the same Pearl Jam that made "No Code" – far from it. As visceral as "Pearl Jam" was, it in no way could have prepared anyone for the radio-friendly pockets of joy that make up "Backspacer," an album that moves from one Bic-lighter stadium anthem ("Amongst the Waves") to another ("Unthought Known") without as much as batting an eye.

Sure, some songs fall back on tired rock cliches ("Force of Nature" relies on that wah-wah pedal just a bit too much, just as how "Johnny Guitar" feels like a pastiche of other, less-interesting early-Pearl Jam rockers), but these moments are often over before they even have time to register, instead allowing us to just sit back and enjoy the six-string spectacle all around. Lyrically, Vedder focuses less on worldly woes and instead tackles relationship issues, getting caught up in his own contradictory promises to his lover during the lush folk-pop ballad "Just Breathe," wanting to make things better for everyone during "The Fixer," and then suffering the pangs of sexual inadequacy during "Johnny Guitar."

In short, Vedder has become vulnerable again, and for a record that's so musically outgoing and forceful, the dichotomy between these two sides works extremely well.

Which leads us to why "Backspacer" is such a contradictory little album. Make no bones about it: This will not go down as Pearl Jam's best release by any measure, but that's because it's not supposed to be. This is Pearl Jam's "fun" record, a disc that was likely just as exciting to record as it is to listen to. Tracing things from "Riot Act" onward, it's become apparent that Vedder & Co. have truly rediscovered their passion for what they do, and even when "Backspacer" missteps, it never feels like it's going to fall: It will just steady itself and then crank the guitars back up to 11 all over again.

During the album's closing song (the aptly-titled acoustic number "The End"), Vedder warns us that "The end comes near," and as the string section swells during his declaration "I'm here," all the music suddenly drops out, and Vedder – by himself – ominously warns us "But not much longer." Then the album's over. Fans can read into this as much as they want, but if Vedder is actually telling us that Pearl Jam's days are numbered, then we truly have a tragedy on our hands here. We're about to lose a band that – after years of being lost in the alt-rock wilderness – sounds stronger than ever.

Don't make your girlfriend mad at you...
WRITE FOR ARTS!
EMAIL
arts@dailycollegian.com

H1N1 (Swine) Flu
Information for the UMass Amherst community at the University Health Services (UHS) website, www.umass.edu/uhs

Stay healthy
- Wash your hands often with soap and water or use an alcohol-based hand sanitizer.
- Cough or sneeze into a tissue or your elbow instead of into your hands. Throw used tissues into the trash.
- Avoid touching your eyes, nose or mouth.
- Don't share food, drinks, utensils and other similar items.
- If you're sick, stay home from school or work, and limit contact with others.

Know the signs
Symptoms of H1N1 flu can include:
- fever
- cough
- sore throat
- runny or stuffy nose
- body aches
- headache
- chills
- fatigue
- Nausea, vomiting and diarrhea are possible.

What to do
If you have flu-like symptoms, call your healthcare provider for advice. For UHS Triage Advice Nurse, call (413) 577-5229.

UMASS AMHERST
UNIVERSITY HEALTH SERVICES
www.umass.edu/uhs

SGA ELECTIONS

RUN
As a Write-in Candidate
BUILD CONNECTIONS.
MAKE YOUR VOICE HEARD.
BECOME A LEADER!
OR
CONTACT THE CHANCELLOR OF ELECTIONS FOR MORE INFORMATION.

VOTE
Senate, Selected House Councils & Sylvan Lt. Governor
SEPTEMBER 28 & 29
CAMPUS CENTER 11AM-4:30PM
ALL DINING COMMONS 5-9PM

CHRISTOPHER FAULKNER - CHANCELLOR OF ELECTIONS
ELECTIONSCOMMISSION@STUAF.UMASS.EDU
OFFICE HOURS: TUESDAYS 2:30-3:30, WEDNESDAYS 1:30-3:30
IN THE SGA OFFICE (420 STUDENT UNION)

THE ELECTIONS COMMISSION
STUDENT GOVERNMENT ASSOCIATION
ELECTIONSCOMMISSION@STUAF.UMASS.EDU
BLOGS.UMASS.EDU/ECSGA
UMASS AMHERST

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Brandon Collier has been an important part of the 2009 UMass defense that has helped the team to a 2–1 record. The defensive tackle is part of a defensive line that features four experienced seniors.

Defense returns to Prominence in 2009

LARNARD from page 10

In each game, there has been one common factor: the UMass defense. It resembles the defense of old, one that led the team to a 2006 National Championship Game appearance. It certainly isn't the defense that allowed teams to run over them last fall.

The questions at cornerback have been answered by converted wideout Ke'Mon Bailey and Corey Davis. Mere weeks before the season started, the positions were unsettled, but their efforts combined with safeties Miles and Shane Viveiros, have once again given UMass a secondary to fear.

Miles said, "The whole secondary came in and filled the shoes for the All-Americans who left in Sean Smalls and Courtney Robinson," of his secondary.

Now the linebacking core: Jennings is out, but replacing him is Tyler Holmes and Kurt Filler. The two lead the team in tackles and have combined for an interception in each of the first three games – one that went off Filler and into Holmes's hands against Albany and vice-versa against Rhode Island.

Helping in front is an experienced defensive line that has applied pressure on the opposition from the first play of the season. The difference between last year's defense and this group is each player's commitment to a larger role.

"It's a team effort, and it is eleven guys on every play. I've tried to create that mentality here. We're getting pressure from the front and great second level games," Morris said of his defense. "Every one is contributing."

With this mentality, the defense has shut out each of its opponents in three of four quarters and became a team with a knack for forcing turnovers.

"We practice a lot in practice stripping the ball and just making big plays," senior Brandon Collier said prior to the Rhode Island game. "Turnovers win football games so we're just out there being optimistic and just making big plays."

Let's not forget about Havens who has taken on the task of replacing Coen. While his numbers were not terrific against Kansas State – partially because of a number of dropped passes – they have improved steadily each week. His 329-yard passing game with two touchdowns against URI earned him CAA Offensive Player of the Week. He wears 12 – Coen's old number – so some people may be confused regarding who is under center if he continues to put up those kind of numbers.

The Minutemen haven't faced tough teams over the past two weeks, but they had no trouble with either. Their only loss was to a Football Bowl Subdivision team. The real test for this squad will come in the month of October when they face Delaware, UNH, Richmond and Maine, with all but the UNH contest coming on the road. Yet with what we've seen so far from the Minutemen, they'll be up for the challenge and may just surprise us and the rest of the league.

Jeffrey R. Larnard is a Collegian columnist and can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com.

William and Mary relying on defense, blanking opponents

By Dan Gigliotti
Collegian Correspondent

The No. 5 William and Mary football team has played lights-out defense in the past three weeks, including Saturday's win over Norfolk State and is being rewarded with the CAA's first nationally televised broadcast in its history.

The Tribe recorded five straight scoreless quarters stringing from the second half of last week's game against Central Connecticut State and lasting through three quarters of Saturday's game. It was their seventh quarter without giving up a point in the three games they've played this season.

CAA Football

They stymied any effort Norfolk State made to run the ball holding them to 39 yards rushing (34 in the first half). So far on the season opponents averaged 114.3 rushing yards per game.

The Tribe offense acted as a good complement to its defense making it to the red zone in the first three drives downfield and controlling the ball for almost 15 more minutes than Norfolk State. They used a two-pronged running attack to wear down the Spartan defense in Terrence Riggins and Jonathan Grimes (26 carries, 142 yards), who also caught a 10-yard touchdown pass to begin the day's scoring.

Quarterback R.J. Archer didn't misfire much when he dropped back to pass on Saturday gaining 153 yards and three scores on 15-20 passing. He favored his primary target D.J. McAulay who caught six catches for a total of 74 yards and a couple of scores.

Thanks to their stellar play, William and Mary will be featured on a national broadcast against a team in No. 2 Villanova that has played just as well. The Wildcats are undefeated as well this season coming off of a strong performance on Saturday, taking down the University of Pennsylvania 14-3.

According to an announcement made by CAA Football and the Comcast Sports Group on Monday afternoon, the game will be shown on the VERSUS channel at 3:30 p.m. est. The time of kickoff was originally slated for 7 p.m. but was moved to an earlier time in order to accommodate the viewers in the approximately 73 million homes that the channel reaches nationwide.

Delaware double

The University of Delaware and Delaware State football teams went toe-to-toe on Saturday for the first time in regular season history.

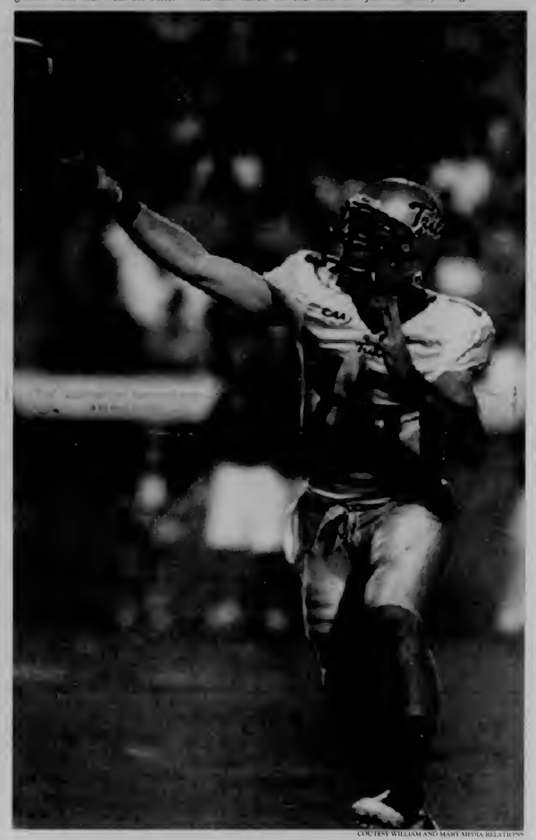
In front of over 20,000 fans, the University of Delaware outplayed the Hornets in a closely contested match. The game couldn't have been tighter, statistically, as both teams ran and threw for 343 total yards exactly. The Blue Hens had the ball for five fewer minutes than their opponents, but the Hornets turned the ball over twice. The second of those turnovers would prove to be costly, as it was converted into a touchdown with 11:00 min left in the game and gave Delaware a decisive 21-3 advantage.

Quarterback Pat Delvin did nearly everything for his team recording three touchdowns on the day (2 rush, 1 pass) and accounting for nearly 270 total yards on offense.

Football fans who claim residence in Delaware were officially forced to choose their allegiance this past Saturday as the University of Delaware and Delaware State football teams squared off at Delaware Stadium for the first inaugural First State Cup. The two football programs are the only two that are native to the state and have never met on the gridiron until the postseason in 2007 (Delaware won 44-7). The game, starting this year, will be played annually with the winner leaving the field with the all-important State Cup.

After 10,000 votes were placed online, the game got its title as the First State Cup following a contest entitled "Name It" sponsored by the Delaware News Journal. Some 4,000 submissions were made giving possible ideas for this momentous game and from there it was dwindled down to the final four.

Spiders spinning new web



The No. 1 University of Richmond Spiders played their first game at home on Saturday, marking the beginning of a year-long farewell to their 81-year-old stadium, downing Hofstra in a 47-0 rout to gain their school record 12th consecutive win.

The Spiders current win streak is the longest in the Football Championship Subdivision, and they used a strong defense to suffocate the Hofstra offense. Defense was especially prevalent in the first half, as they jumped out to a 31-0 lead at the break by way of four recovered fumbles. Defensive lineman Nick Battle contributed a strong effort on Richmond's frontline (five tackles, 2.5 tackles for a loss, one sack, two forced fumbles, one fumble recovered), one worthy of CAA Defensive Player of the Week honors, as Richmond held Hofstra to under 200 total yards of offense, including 13 on the ground.

On the other side of the ball, the Spider offense converted four first-half-fumbles into 24 points while going a perfect five-for-five in red zone opportunities (four touchdowns, 1 field goal). They did so on the legs of their running backs who ran for 213 yards, most notably Justin Forte who averaged six yards per carry (12 rush, 72 yards). Quarterback Eric Ward continued his proficient play on Saturday (12-16, 165 yards, 4 touchdowns) who now has a 150.87 efficiency rating in his three games this season. The Spider offense has now scored 31 or more points in 13 straight home games.

Richmond will retire the 81-year-old UR Stadium later this year, which was founded in 1929 – previously home to the Richmond Rebels, an Atlantic Coast Football League and Continental Football League, from 1964-1967. The stadium, which seats 21,319, is making way for a $25 million project which is slated to be the new home of the Spiders in 2010. The stadium hosted the NCAA Division I Men's Soccer Championships from 1995-1998 and also the 2008 National Champion Richmond Football Team from a year ago. The Spider football team is 1-0 at home and hope to keep a goose egg in the loss column and go out of UR Stadium untarnished as they play Virginia Military Institute on Sept. 26.

Dan Gigliotti can be reached at dgigliot@student.umass.edu.

COURTESY WILLIAM AND MARY MEDIA RELATIONS

Quarterback R.J. Archer was efficient in William and Mary's latest victory when he was 15-of-20 for 153 yards and three touchdowns. Archer and the No. 5 Tribe have gotten off to a 3-0 start this season.

Domino's Pizza
2 X Tuesday
Buy any large pizza, get second one FREE.
413-256-8911

Stenard strong for Charlotte, Conn leads A-10 in scoring

By Herb Scribner
Collegian Correspondent

The Charlotte women's soccer team had its final non-conference game on Sept. 20, shutting out North Carolina State, 1-0.

Midfielder Kirby Stenard scored the game-winning goal in the 56th minute off a corner kick from fellow midfielder Sam Huecker.

For Stenard, this was not only her third goal of the season, but also her second straight game-winning goal. The first was on Sept. 18, part of a 4-0 rout over East Tennessee.

She also fired two shots on goal, though only one made it past Wolfpack goalkeeper Kim Kern. Kern saved two of the 11 shots taken by the 49ers. The eight missed shots by Charlotte (6-2-0) included an opportunity by Stenard that went over the posts.

The 49er defense allowed five shots (one on goal) in as many shut-out matches.

This was goalkeeper Lauren Brown's fourth shutout of the season and 23rd of her career.

Atlantic 10 champions in the past three seasons, Charlotte will open up its conference schedule against Duquesne.

Atlantic 10 Soccer

A-10 conference play will start on Sept. 25 for all teams.

Temple struggling

For the first six games of the season, Temple rode sophomore Niki Conn's scoring as she led it to a 4-1-1 record. In the last two games, the midfielder's production has been low, and the Owls had no other scoring threats.

Temple (4-3-1) lost two straight matches to Niagara and Binghamton last week, marking its first losses since it lost to Villanova on August 21.

Conn's six goals lead the A-10 this season but none of those goals came in the Owls' last two games, when offensive production was at an alarming low.

The Bearcats limited Conn to one shot in the game in their 3-1 win over the Owls. Despite Conn's absence, freshman Morgyn Seigfried stepped up and scored her second goal of the season.

Sophomore Allicia Yurkovic provided the offensive effort for Temple against Niagara with a pivotal late goal.

Without Conn's impact, Temple still out-shot the Purple Eagles, 10-3.

With conference play on the horizon, the Owls hope for Conn to come back to her striking ways on Sept. 25 when they face Dayton, who is undefeated in non-conference play.

St. Joseph's tops Syracuse

Saint Joseph's junior Maggie Lupinski, landed the ball between the posts in the 79th minute to give the Hawks their only goal needed to defeat Syracuse, 1-0.

The loss is the Orange's second straight.

Midfielder Lauren Sutcliffe set up Lupinski, who only played during the second half.

Freshman goalkeeper Christine Neal finished the game with four saves.

Syracuse failed to score despite its nine shots on goal.

In its last five games, the Orange (3-4-2) had three wins and two draws going into last Friday.

The Hawks (3-3-2) will travel to Amherst on Friday to play Massachusetts.

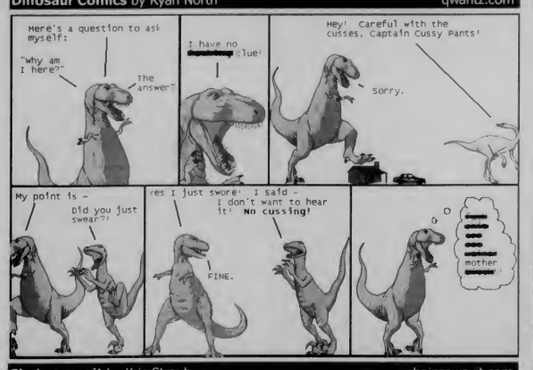
Herb Scribner can be reached at hscribne@student.umass.edu

COMICS

Money frees you from doing things you dislike. Since I dislike doing nearly everything, money is handy.
- Groucho Marx

Labrat by Richard Martelly

Wondermark by David Malki! wondermark.com



Mr. Gnu by Travis Dandro travisdandro.com

My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees mnftiu.cc

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North qwantz.com

Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub chainsawsuit.com

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!

Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Your resume causes blindness.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Appreciate the art of carry-on contraband.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You will be shamed when someone sees your most recently-visited web pages.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Let your roommate know that snoring in your vicinity will be hazardous to his or her health.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Lock your door at night – Hasselhoff's trying to find more secret drunk burger locations.

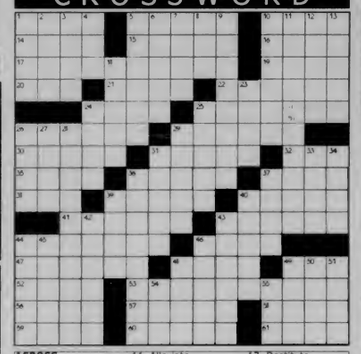
cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
A new theory on why Mars is red: you touch yourself at night.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Spire is conspiring against you! Get it?!?!?!?

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Get ready for Guitar Hero: Ukulele Edition

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Shouldn't sketchers imply that you are sketchy?

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
If only your eyelids supplied a movie that everyone could watch.



sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Lay off the tights! You don't want to be mistaken for a Power Rangers villain... or do you?

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
"When you're stupid you get your groin slapped" is not a humane philosophy.

SUDOKU

			4
					9	3
7	5					6	2
	4	7		3
8		1				2
		3	1	7	6			5
	8	5
				5		7		6
								4

CROSSWORD

ACROSS
1. Poles
5. First Greek letter
10. Gosh!
14. Chocolate cookie
15. Chocolate substitute
16. Sword
17. Shed light on
19. Brood
20. Caustic
21. Swirl
22. Elevated
24. Goddess of discord
25. Very irritable
26. A natural resin
29. Dealer
30. Belch
31. Intends
32. Egg cells
35. An utterance made by exhaling audibly
36. Minimal
37. First World War plane
38. Droop
39. Severe
40. Plant louse
41. Come forth
43. Leafy plants
44. Alleviate
46. Frog
47. Plant with stinging hairs
48. Carnival
49. Request
52. Fortitude and determination
53. Greeting
56. Passion
57. Form
58. Indolent
59. Pitcher
60. Keen
61. Let go

DOWN
1. Agitate
2. Parisian airport
3. Expunge
4. Former French coin
5. Corrosive
6. Territories
7. Beseech
8. More than warm
9. Deviant
10. End
11. A certain punctuation mark
12. Force back
13. Destitute
18. Excellence
23. Boosts
24. Carve in stone
25. Offensively bold
26. Untidyness
27. Operatic solo
28. Tending to imply
29. Razz
31. Combine
33. Conceited
34. Tallies
36. Generous gifts
37. Moved fast
39. Become well
40. Palm cockatoo
42. Grumble
43. Abnormally enlarged thyroid gland
44. This is measured in degrees
45. Short-horned goat antelope
46. Brownish gray
48. Stars and Stripes
49. Assistant
50. Dealt
51. Leg joint
54. "Eureka!"
55. Twitch

COLLEGIAN CLASSIFIEDS

EMPLOYMENT

Part-time personal care attendant. About 10-12 hours/week. Flexible Hours. Please Call Patrick (413)-275-7928

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

FOR RENT

Rt. 9 Hadley. 5 bedroom house. $2000/mo & utilities. 2 car garag. 1 & a qtr miles to campus. No beds. Large Lot. Music room. Skibiski Real Estate. 586-1827.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 2009 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Highs and lows for cross country at home

Men take first, women last in lone home meet

BY JEFFREY ENGMANN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On a sunny Saturday morning, which Massachusetts men's cross-country coach Ken O'Brien described as "perfect for our sport," the University of Massachusetts men's and women's cross country teams competed in their only home meet of the season.

In front of a spirited crowd, UMass used a total team effort to capture its first victory of the season.

The win is just another in an impressive streak as it marks the fourth consecutive year the Minutemen have pleased their home crowd with a victory.

The coach was pleased as well.

"It was the way I thought our team would compete," O'Brien said. "Each team that was there had a good piece of success. I thought the talent showed."

The five-way race included cross-town rival Amherst College with Vermont, UConn and Maine.

From the outset, the race was highly competitive, featuring eight NCAA Division I and III qualifiers. Four runners placed in the top eight overall for the Minutemen.

Junior David Johnson led the way, turning in his best run of the young season and placing third overall with a time of 25 minutes, 38 seconds.

In a span of 3 seconds, three other UMass runners crossed the finish line. Juniors Sean Duncan and Kevin Johnson finished with identical times of 25 minutes 50 seconds, which earned them fifth and sixth place, respectively. One second later, senior Nicolai Naranjo completed the quartet of top-ten runners with a time of 25 minutes, 51 seconds.

Several others made key contributions including senior Andrew McCann and sophomore Scott VanderMolen who finished 17th and 21st respectively.

Not only were the weather conditions ideal on Saturday but as coach O'Brien noted the atmosphere was also great. Featuring two local schools and three other northeastern schools, there was a strong fan base for all teams involved.

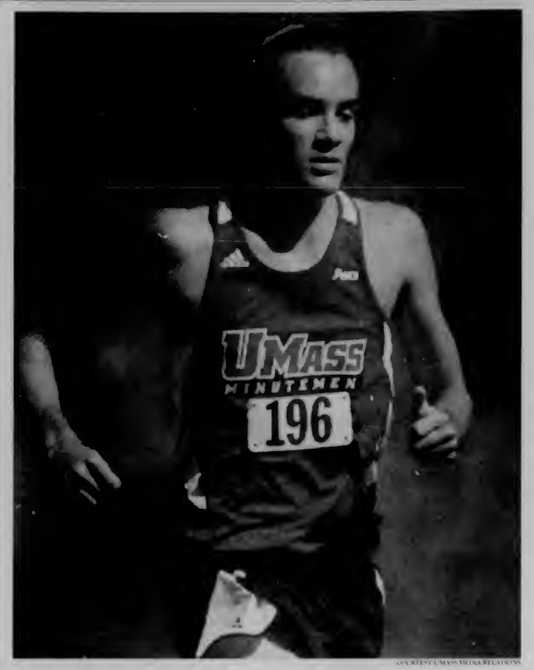
"We had a tremendous crowd. That really sparked the kids before the race and during the race," he said. "We designed the course so that the teams are brought back in front of the crowds, so spectators can see the race and be involved. And, I thought the energy from the crowd really translated onto the course."

The Minutewomen also held their annual home meet on Saturday and placed fifth overall. They received stiff competition from Boston College, Maine, Vermont and Five College rival Amherst College.

The Eagles won the meet with a score of 32 points.

Minutewoman head coach Julie LaFreniere believes her team could have performed much better if not for a slow start.

"I thought our athletes got off the line a little too slowly, and they let the race slip out of their hands in the first half and never could really catch up and run right where we belong," she said.



Sophomore Claire Petit led the Minutewomen, finishing with a time of 18 minutes and 28 seconds in the 5k, good for 16th overall. Fellow sophomore Karen Roa finished 19th overall with a time of 18 minutes and 37 seconds.

Coach LaFreniere was disappointed in her team's performance on Saturday and hopes the team can make an adjustment to garner more rewarding results in the near future.

"Our team — they are real good, hard trainers. They have to take what they do in practice and bring it to the meet. So we will be working hard," she said.

Both teams have a long layoff until their next meet, which does not take place until Friday, Oct. 2.

Jeffrey Engmann can be reached at jengmann@student.umass.edu

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Nicolai Naranjo finished seventh in the Minutemen's lone home meet this past weekend, his first race of the season. Naranjo and the rest of the men's team return to action on Oct. 2 at the Paul Short Invitational.

MATTHEW HARRISON/COLLEGIAN

Redshirt sophomore Justin Sawicki (right) and the rest of the offensive line play an integral role for the Minutemen. They keep quarterback Kyle Havens and running back Tony Nelson (left) on their feet.

Don't be surprised by these Minutemen

Quality wins give hope to program this season

Jeffrey R. Larnard

Please raise your hand if you had high expectations for the Massachusetts football team entering this season.

If your hand is raised, you might be Kevin Morris, somehow connected to UMass Athletics or you were lying to yourself prior to this season.

Three weeks into the season, I'll admit I'm surprised, and my hand is up. But before I explain my change of heart, let's discuss what "high expectations" are for No. 15 UMass, the winningest program in the Colonial Athletic Association in the past decade.

A successful season doesn't mean a second-place finish behind New Hampshire in the CAA North as predicted by the league's coaches. A successful season means making a return to the NCAA Tournament and making a run at a National Championship. The bar has been set high for this program while under Don Brown's leadership and by the arm of Liam Coen. The new tandem of Morris and Kyle Havens wouldn't aim any lower.

Anyone who had low expectations for this year's squad could point to last year's disappointing season or the losses to the roster. Brown, then the Minutemen's head coach, left to become the defensive coordinator at Maryland, and Coen, arguably the program's greatest quarterback, graduated. Additionally, a strong defense lost a tandem of cornerbacks in Sean Smalls and Courtney Robinson, which used to force opposing quarterbacks to abandon the passing game.

Coming into the season and even to this point, there were and still are questions about whether linebacker Josh Jennings — who was second in 2008 in tackles and tied for the team lead with three interceptions — would play at all.

The team has plenty of returning starters, such as safety Jeromy Miles, left tackle Vladimir Ducasse, tailback Tony Nelson and wideout Victor Cruz, but the losses to graduation combined with the sub-par year in 2008 just seemed like too much for one team to overcome in a single offseason.

Fast forward to present time and the Minutemen are 2-1 and 1-0 in the CAA. Better, they could be 3-0 if they could have pulled off the upset over Kansas State. The other two wins were against an Albany squad that looked awful two weeks ago in Amherst and a Rhode Island team that has lost 11 of its last 13 games to UMass. It's the way the Minutemen won, however, that has me convinced. The Great Danes are a better team than they showed here. I took no farther than their come-from-behind, 20-16 victory over Maine this past weekend when they trailed 16-0 at halftime.

See LARNARD on page 8

49ers capturing many awards

Charlotte already boasts two players of the week this season

BY GEENA LOMBARDI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Charlotte 49ers men's soccer team produced yet another player of the week for the Atlantic 10 conference. Sophomore Evan James became the second player of the week for the A-10 following teammate Adam Gross. James was also named to Top Drawer's National Team of the Week.

James played a large part in the 49ers' tie against Clemson on Sept. 9 when he scored the one and only goal for his team in the first ten minutes of the game. Charlotte gave up the lead in the 98th minute when Clemson scored on a header. The game went into double overtime, but neither team broke the tie, leaving the game at 1-1.

Three days later, James played an even bigger role in the 49ers' 2-1 win over Campbell. He assisted on Charlotte's first goal, by Luke Daly, bringing the team to an early 1-0 lead. Campbell tied up the game shortly after on a lucky and controversial penalty kick, which proved to be Campbell's only shot on goal the first half. However with five minutes left in the game, James scored the game-winner for Charlotte.

Atlantic 10 Soccer

Both defense and offense worked together to dominate the majority of both games this past weekend, outshooting their opponents 33-18. This win elevated Charlotte's record to 2-1.

NOONE NOW A SOMEBODY

School records were broken this weekend as Temple University beat Albany, 2-0. It was senior midfielder J.J. Noone who not only contributed to the win but also broke TU's school record for career [illegible] goals.

First minutes before halftime, Noone executed an excellent pass by an Albany defender and hooked up with freshman Tyler Wagner to take the lead, 1-0. The pass increased Noone's numbers to 21 assists, a new school record. He now ranks ahead of well-known Temple players, such as the previous record holder Tony Donatelli. He now plays for the Montreal Impact of the United Soccer League.

It took all four years for Noone to achieve this accomplishment and he commented on the Temple University website about how excited he was to have finally reached this moment.

"It took a couple games to finally get it, but I'm glad to finally have it under my belt so I can concentrate on the rest of the season," said Noone. "We made a great effort today, and I'm really happy to get the win."

Noone was not the only player to contribute to this win; another senior midfielder, Mike Pappolo, scored the final goal to ensure the Owls win. Goal keeper Bret Mollon also helped out with a shutout of seven saves in this game, keeping Albany at zero goals. This win increased Temple's record to 2-3-1.

TRANSITION BECOMING EASIER

Nick Maglasang of Saint Louis was named the A-10 Rookie of the Week in week two of play. The freshman earned this title with an assist and by scoring his first collegiate goal against Loyola Chicago.

Maglasang had a lot to live up to coming into this season. While in high school at Saint Louis University High School, he was named a National Soccer Coaches Association of America High School All-American. Coming into Saint Louis, Maglasang was part of a CollegeSoccerNews.com article on "100 freshmen to keep an eye on", as well as a pre-season A-10 All-Rookie selection.

Maglasang did not disappoint anyone after his performance against the Ramblers. He and Mike Roach were the only two to score for the Billikens. Maglasang scored his first goal in the 65th minute off of a free-kick from senior James Jaramillo. He then went on to assist Mike Roach in his second goal of the game with only one minute left to play. This 3-1 win over Loyola Chicago improved Saint Louis' record to 2-2-0.

Geena Lombardi can be reached at glombard@student.umass.edu

COURTESY CHARLOTTE MEDIA RELATIONS

Coming off a sweep at home, the 49ers boast team and personal bests. Freshman Jennings Rex was this week's Rookie of the Week.

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY

COLLEGIAN

HIGH: 81 LOW: 61 www.DailyCollegian.com WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 2009

Fall's equinox diagramed by UM sunwheel

BY MATT ROCHELEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Most college students rely on cell phones, watches, laptops or even wall calendars to keep track of the changing days and seasons, but one University of Massachusetts professor is inviting students and others from the local community to learn about one of humankind's oldest time-telling devices – the sunwheel.

Judith Young, a UMass astronomy professor, will hold the final of four informational viewings of the autumnal equinox at sunset today at 6 p.m. Previous gatherings were held at sunrise and sunset beginning on Tuesday.

The sunwheel may pale in comparison to the interactivity offered today by such programs as Google Calendar, but sunwheels have been a valuable resource for cultures dating back to 4,800 B.C. One of the most well-known examples is Stonehenge in England.

The University has hosted such gatherings for 12 years, and will celebrate 2009 as the International Year of Astronomy, according to the official website for the UMass Sunwheel, www.umass.edu/sunwheel.

A sunwheel is an outdoor stone circle. The standing stones line up with the locations on the horizon of the rising and setting sun at the times of the solstices and equinoxes.

For participants interested in learning about the sky, Young will discuss the significance of the equinoxes and solstices, the cause of the seasons and phases of the moon, and the story behind building the 130-foot diameter UMass Sunwheel, said a press release for the event.

She will also discuss other calendar sites around the world, including the ancient astronomical observatories at Stonehenge and Callanish in Scotland. In addition, there will be an explanation of the moon's 18.6-year cycle, also called the major lunar standstill, the release said.

"Bring your questions, your curiosity, and be prepared for cool temperatures when the sun is down," added the release.

Wearing waterproof footwear and insect repellent is also suggested. Gathering will last for about one hour, and a $3 suggested donation will help with the cost of additional stonework and future programs planned for the UMass Sunwheel. T-shirts and sweatshirts will be available for purchase. In the event of rain, the gathering will be cancelled.

The UMass Sunwheel is part of The Sunwheel Project, which involved the construction of sunwheels around the world, starting at UMass in 1997.

Gatherings will also be held for the winter solstice on Dec. 21 and 22 at sunrise, or around 7 a.m., and sunset, around 3:30 p.m.

The UMass Sunwheel is located south of Alumni Stadium just off Rocky Hill Road. It can be reached from the center of Amherst, following Amity Street to the west. After crossing University Drive at the light, continue on Rocky Hill Rd. for about a quarter of a mile, and make your first right onto Stadium Drive.

Matt Rocheleau can be reached at mrocheleau@dailycollegian.com

Another sundial gathering was held at UMass during last year's autumnal equinox.

Shadows stride through campus

UMass students stroll past the W.E.B. Du Bois library courtyard on foot and by bicycle to catch their classes on a sunny, Monday afternoon.

Bus tracker allows students to find arrival times online

BY NOAH STEINBERG-DI STEFANO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For students in the Five College area, peering around the corner for PVTA buses might be a thing of the past. The University of Massachusetts computer science department is experimenting with a new program that allows students to track PVTA buses en route to their destination across campus and the Five College towns.

The tracker is connected to Google Maps and allows passengers to track the path of their bus on the UMass transit services website. If a bus is running late, the tracker can provide passengers with the exact time it will be arriving at its destination. In addition to serving the Five College area, the tracking program will be able to track over 40 bus routes that cover 150 square miles.

System Administrator of Transit Services at UMass Adam Sherson says the bus tracker is not only designed to enable students to keep track of where the buses are at all times, but also to make bus schedules run more efficiently. Sherson collaborated with UMass computer scientist Brian Levine to create the software necessary to make the program run.

Over the summer, Levine facilitated the Diverse Outdoor Mobile Entertainment (DOME) project, which provided Wi-Fi Internet access to all PVTA passengers. The bus tracker, which was introduced in the first week of this year's fall semester, is still largely unknown by the majority of UMass students. Out of 40 passengers polled, 68 percent admitted they were unaware of the new program. Sherson says he expects students to utilize the program once word spreads around campus.

"We are planning to add posters to our buses, all major bus stops, as well as dorms, to let students know about the new system," said Sherson. "I think people are going to find it very convenient."

So far, those who have used the program have agreed with Sherson.

"It can really help you manage your time better if you know exactly when the bus is going to be at the stop," says Pete Tracy, a UMass senior who lives in Sunderland, Mass., and takes the bus to class every day. "I usually check in the morning before I head out the door."

All of the PVTA buses within 150 square miles of the Five College towns can be tracked using the new system developed by UMass' computer science department.

For students who have advanced smart phones, such as the iPhone or BlackBerry, programs are available on the transit services website that send e-mail and text message updates regarding bus routes to your phone.

Despite the new program, which allegedly

See PVTA on page 2

ARTS&LIVING

WARHOL ART REVEALED

An exhibition of Andy Warhol pieces, along with other artists' works, will be on display in the University Gallery through the end of the semester.

SEE PAGE 5

SPORTS

OFFENSE MAKES HAVENS' JOB EASY

Despite winning CAA Player of the Week honors, UMass quarterback Kyle Havens believes it's the rest of the offense that has been key to the team's success.

SEE PAGE 10

EDITORIAL&OPINION

INSTITUTIONALIZED RACISM

Alana Goodman makes the argument for the illegality of SGA elections and discusses the amount of seats in the SGA senate given to minority students.

SEE PAGE 4

DailyCollegian.com

CIRQUE DE SOLEIL SLIDESHOW

See the circus through Collegian photographer Matthew Harrison's lens in an exclusive slideshow of the Cirque de Soleil performance in the Mullins Center.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIX
ISSUE 12

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF William McGeehan
MANAGING EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
BUSINESS MANAGER Daniel Jette
PRODUCTION MANAGER Michael Sarkes
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Kirsten Swenson
ADVERTISING MANAGER Michael Tortorici
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Max Deitner
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Shayna Murphy
COMICS EDITOR Annie Keithline
EDITORIAL EDITOR Nick O'Malley
NEWS EDITOR Nyk Bush
SPORTS EDITOR Jeffrey R. Larrard
WEB EDITOR Brian Wood
PHOTO EDITOR Matthew Harrison
IT MANAGER Victor Jacek
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Matt Zolnarz
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Jacinto
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Norman Provost
CLASSIFIED MANAGER Katelyn Tamilio
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Justin Gagnon
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ebor Horowitz
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Cal Scannell
ASSISTANT COMICS Andrew Witts
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Michael Phillis
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Hannah Nelson
ASSISTANT NEWS Samuel Butterfield
ASSISTANT NEWS Alyssa Creamer
ASSISTANT NEWS Jenn Heshion
ASSISTANT SPORTS David Brinch
ASSISTANT SPORTS Mike Gollmeister
ASSISTANT SPORTS Adam Miller
ASSISTANT PHOTO Maxwell Sparr
ASSISTANT PHOTO Simantha Webber
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA Sara Cody
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA Chris Shores

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE FALL AND SPRING SEMESTERS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY OWNED, OPERATING ON CONTINUING REVENUE ESTABLISHED IN 1890. THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE NEWS IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TWO-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN BECAME INDEPENDENT ON JANUARY 1, 1994. FOR ADVERTISEMENT RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL ADVERTISING AT 545-3500 AND 5:00 PM.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Kirsten Swenson

COPY EDITOR
Elizabeth Tran

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Michelle Abbasciano

PVTA arrival times become predictable

PVTA from page 1

provides more up-to-the-minute bus schedules, students still regularly call the transit services hotline at 413-545-1633 to ask for bus times.

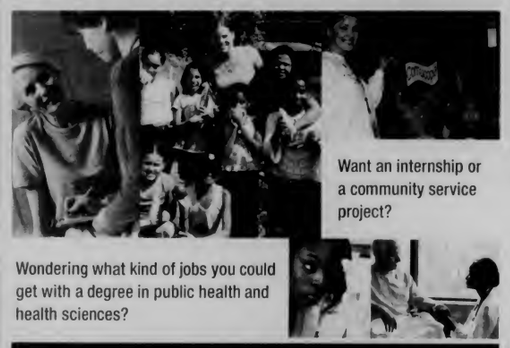
Eiman Mikhchi, a junior at Hampshire College, says he knows about the new tracking program but does not think it is necessary to get a bus.

"Most of the buses come every 15 minutes anyway," said Mikhchi. "If I need to know the exact time, I can just call the hotline. The tracker is cool, but I don't see the point."

Operators working at the PVTA hotline said they have been receiving just as many calls concerning bus times as they did before the tracker was implemented.

Sherson says he is still working with Levine and other members of the computer science department to work out some glitches in the program.

One of the common criticisms from students is that the program is prone to freezing, and can sometimes be slow.



In the future, Sherson says PVTA plans to add an Automatic Vehicle Locator (AVL) system to all of its buses, which he says will take time to be implemented but should make the tracking process much faster.

As we move closer to the winter months and it becomes less tolerable to wait at the bus stop, many believe that the program is sure to increase in popularity. This new system could mean no more wondering how many minutes until the bus arrives, and no more frantic sprints after the final bus home. With the new PVTA tracking system, students can plan their daily transit accordingly, down to the last minute.

Noah Steinberg-Di Stefano can be reached at steinber@student.umass.edu

Welcome Back
Pancake Breakfast

Start your year off with flapjacks & funnies!
Wednesday, September 23
8:30 - 10:30 am • Memorial Hall
Stop by Memorial Hall and enjoy pancakes, sausage, juice and Dean's Beans coffee while watching morning cartoons!
The first 20 students who bring their UMass Amherst Alumni Association coupon from the UMass Amherst coupon book receive a special gift
No registration required... just stop in!
The first 200 seniors will receive a class t-shirt.
Must present valid student ID.
Enter to win a UStore gift card.
Seniors can also enter to win a $1,000 cash prize from Liberty Mutual!
Drawing to be held at Commencement Ball on May 13, 2010
STUDENT ALUMNI ASSOCIATION UMASS AMHERST
ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
Visit UMassAlumni.com/students for more information

Public Health & Health Sciences Career & Internship Fair
Thinking about a career in public health and health sciences?

Want an internship or a community service project?
Wondering what kind of jobs you could get with a degree in public health and health sciences?
Learn about careers and internships in public health and network with public health professionals. Over 25 health organizations from Western Massachusetts attending!
For: Undergraduate and graduate students
Where: UMass Campus Center Auditorium
When: Thursday September 24, 2009
Time: 10:00am - 2:00pm
Refreshments and light lunch will be served.
Special performance by the Not Ready for Bedtime Players.
FREE and Open to the Public.
Come for any or all of the time.
Please contact risa@schoolph.umass.edu or call 545-2529 for more information.
SPHS School of Public Health and Health Sciences
Funding was provided by a cooperative agreement between the Association of Schools of Public Health and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention
UMASS AMHERST

Modeling prospects for UM's 'hot' populace

By Alyssa Creamer
Collegian Staff

Move over Mexico — the University of Massachusetts and the rest of the Five College community may be participating in a new version of the hot body contest.

Popular Campus Entertainment is encouraging area college students to apply for a slot in their 2010 Zoomass calendar.

According to a press release by Popular Campus Entertainment, students who think they "have what it takes to be the hottest co-ed on campus" should apply to be the calendar models in which they are to express their own personal fashion taste.

Applications can be found online at http://zoomasscalendar.com/Competition/Popular_Campus_Entertainment.html and are due by Oct. 1. Students have an online application sent in with their name, school name, two head shots and one full-body shot. There is also a $5 application fee students can pay using PayPal. Applications with photos can be sent to ZoomassCalendar@gmail.com.

Only 50 students will be selected from the online auditions to be contestants in the second audition held in Amherst. The release also stated that a panel of judges will rate each of the 50 contestants on their "personality, attitude, fashion sense and attractiveness," and choose the best 24 to continue on with the competition. Students will vote online for their favorite contestants and the 12 students with the most votes will win $100 and model in a professional photo shoot for the 2010 Zoomass calendar.

Alyssa Creamer can be reached at acreamer@student.umass.edu

U.N. officials discuss environmental crisis

By Warren P. Strobel and Renee Schoof
McClatchy-Tribune News Service

UNITED NATIONS — President Barack Obama and Hu Jintao of China — the leaders of the two countries that emit the most greenhouse gases — pledged at a United Nations summit Tuesday that their countries would take bold actions to protect the Earth's future climate from irreversible damages.

Obama and Hu listed what their countries already have done to reduce emissions of heat-trapping gases and acknowledged that much more would be needed, although they didn't specify what new steps lie ahead.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon opened the special climate session with an appeal to all countries to work toward "a common, long-term goal to limit global temperatures to safe levels consistent with science."

Negotiations for a climate agreement in Copenhagen, Denmark, in December have been bogged down as industrialized and developing countries argue about which should act first, and how much they should cut emissions. The goal in Copenhagen is for industrialized countries to set midterm and long-term limits on carbon pollution and for developing countries to declare what steps they'll take to reduce emissions, a step short of making mandatory reductions.

President Barack Obama speaks at a United Nations conference about the United States' previous actions to curtail gas emissions.

Another area of dispute is how much the world's wealthy nations will pay to help poorer ones reduce emissions and adapt to unavoidable climate change. Any general agreement probably would require more work after the Copenhagen talks to fill in details.

"Success in Copenhagen will have positive ripple effects for global cooperation on trade, energy, security and health," Ban said. "Failure to reach broad agreement in Copenhagen would be morally inexcusable, economically shortsighted and politically unwise."

Obama warned that unless the world's nations act "boldly, swiftly and together, we risk consigning future generations to an irreversible catastrophe." He added, "No nation, however large or small, wealthy or poor, can escape the impact of climate change," which includes rising seas, more frequent droughts and more powerful storms and floods.

Obama announced that at the Group of 20 meeting Thursday in Pittsburgh he'd propose phasing out fossil fuel subsidies so that money can be directed to climate protection.

The United States has been the subject of increasing complaints from Europe for not doing more to set strict limits on carbon emissions.

In his speech, Obama said that since he took office in January, "The United States has done more to promote clean energy and reduce carbon pollution in the last eight months than at any other time in our history."

Energy and climate legislation is moving slowly in Congress, however, taking a back seat to Obama's priority of health care restructuring.

China's Hu said his country would cut carbon dioxide emissions as a percentage of economic output by a "notable margin" by 2020, but he didn't specify an amount. China's overall emissions are expected to keep growing through this period.

This is a new goal and "the clearest signal yet that China is willing to take on responsibilities that are commensurate with its resources and global emissions impact," said Julian L. Wong, a senior policy analyst at the Center for American Progress, a nonpartisan research institution that supports Obama's initiatives.

Wong said that Hu's statement implicitly committed China to measure and report its emissions in a way that international observers could verify. A plan for how that would work for all countries remains to be decided.

Hu's statement followed other policy actions by China's leadership in recent years that reduce the rate of increase of the country's emissions.

"Quite frankly, China is making great strides in many areas," Energy Secretary Steven Chu said in an interview Tuesday with McClatchy Newspapers.

Chu said it was possible to keep temperatures from rising beyond 3.5 degrees Fahrenheit, the level that world leaders and scientists have agreed shouldn't be crossed.

"This goal, which is an ambitious goal, is achievable, but we'll have to work very hard to get there," he said. "Having said all that, the thing we've got to do is get started. We've got to realize the dangers of what would happen" if temperatures increase by 11 degrees Fahrenheit or more, as scientific studies have shown could happen if no limits are put on emissions.

"At all costs we want to avoid entering into that region, because it would be a very different world," Chu said.

China, India and other large developing countries have said that it's impossible for them to put a binding cap on emissions.

India announced last week that it would make voluntary emission cuts through greater efficiency and more use of renewable energy.

Hu said that China would improve energy efficiency and conservation. He repeated a Chinese promise to make non-fossil-fuel energy — renewable energy and nuclear energy — 15 percent of its electricity production by 2020. He promised that China would continue its drive to replant forests so that it would have nearly 99 million acres of forests, which absorb some greenhouse gas emissions, by 2020. He also said that China would increase research and development of clean energy.

Todd Stern, the U.S. special envoy for climate change, said Obama's proposals would mean "seismic change" in American energy policy, and he suggested that Europeans weren't giving him enough credit.

Stern acknowledged that a completed agreement is unlikely in Copenhagen and that under the best scenario, there'll be numerous details to wrap up afterward. "That's always been the understanding," he said.

INTERESTED IN WRITING FOR THE NEWS SECTION?
CONTACT NICK BUSH AT news@dailycollegian.com

Tech-savvy professors spur teaching debates

Chancellor Robert Holub uses a whiteboard during his meeting with The Collegian to discuss the budget crisis last spring.

By Robin Erb
McClatchy-Tribune News Service

DETROIT — Today's college classrooms are high-tech marvels — overhead projectors and grease pencils replaced by document cameras, handheld clickers, and interactive whiteboards.

Multimedia carts with a TV and DVD player? Relics.

Even PowerPoint has lost some of its shine.

And faculty — most of them — see technology as a way to better connect to students in their interactive, multi tasking, apps-ready world.

"Some are ... not going to change without kicking and screaming. But for the most part, even our older faculty are embracing it," said George Preisinger, Oakland University's assistant vice president for classroom support and instructional technical services.

The school recently spent $15,000 in technology upgrades in each general purpose classroom for students, Preisinger said.

In some classrooms, a professor can watch each student's computer screen simultaneously to monitor their progress on a project — or even catch them Facebooking.

A lot has changed since his first days in the tech department, Preisinger laughed: "We were the ones wheeling the old AV carts around."

Of course, technology has its limits and it still takes a skilled speaker to engage students, said Charles Parrish, political professor at Wayne State University.

Likewise, a lack of technology is far from debilitating, said Parrish, who uses the Internet and posts his notes on the university-wide Blackboard system for instant student access.

"A good professor is a good professor," he said. "Socrates sat under trees and didn't have PowerPoint."

Central Michigan University this year opened its $50-million Education and Human Services Building. Inside is 76 miles of Internet networking cable, 11 miles of phone cable, and 27 "RoomWizards" — keypads outside classrooms to allow users to reserve rooms.

Motion-sensitive cameras follow a pacing professor or link out-of-town students with the classroom. Whiteboards upload to e-mails. Elsewhere, clickers – tiny remotes in which students send answers instantly to a professor's hand held computer screen – allow professors to pop-quiz a class or take quick surveys.

At Central Michigan's education building, students can walk a treadmill while strolling through the Internet – exercises brain cells as well as leg muscles.

At Wayne State University last month, Tynise Penn , 29, was studying at the library. She finished her master's degree through classes and her laptop, finding the most up-to-date research and discussion online.

Books? She shrugged, chuckling: "No, never picked one up."

The contrast of education old vs. new is tangible at Eastern Michigan University, where an ongoing $90-million upgrade to the Mark Jefferson science complex will offer state-of-the-art, reconfigured class and lab space.

The university has set aside about $2.5 million for audiovisual and communications technology and security, Scott Storrar, head of facilities planning and construction.

Nearby is a one-room schoolhouse – much like the one where Eastern's President Sue Martin began her education in the 1950s. But just as her teacher engaged 30 students every day with no more than shelves of books and a piano, good teaching transcends time and light-speed changes in technology.

"A faculty member still has to lead the experience," Martin said.

Such gadgetry is hardly a surprise for many students.

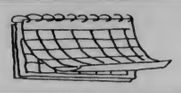
Even in the K-12 system, book reports have been replaced by interactive presentations on interactive whiteboards.

Rather than being fed information like their parents once were, students have learned to explore and research, even teach each other.

"It even changes the idea of show-and-tell," said Denise Brandt, media specialist Lone Pine Elementary School in Bloomfield Hills (Mich.) Schools, a district that has installed more than $2 million in interactive whiteboards, projectors, document cameras, sound amplification and playback equipment in every classroom.

Still, how much is too much?

A dean of Dallas-based Southern Methodist University recently stripped computers from lecture halls. Meadows School of the Arts Dean Jose Bowen challenged staff instead to "teach naked," as in, without computers in the classroom.



But technology has its place. Today's faculty should offer podcasted lectures, hyperlinks, and online study sessions to prep the students with materials before class, leaving classroom time for discussion and debate, Bowen said.

Yet all this leads to yet another pedagogical debate. If, in a wired world, knowledge is hyperlinked and answers are searchable, how do you test?

For example, should a student be able to consult with the Internet during a test to find the answer to a complex math formula? asked Jim Gilchrist, Western Michigan University 's vice provost and chief information officer.

The definition of "cheating," Gilchrist said, hinges on the definition of learning.

"Does successful learning mean you've memorized something and can bring it back without looking it up?" he asked. "Or is successful learning knowing how to find the necessary information?"

Have an event coming up?

Let the UMass community know...
Post it on The Daily Collegian's website!
massdailycollegian.com/calendar

Massachusetts
HARVEST
FOR STUDENTS Week
• Meet John Ash, nationally renowned wine/food educator, restaurateur, and cookbook author of From the EARTH to the TABLE, Wednesday and Thursday 7pm
• Meet local farmers, artisan cheese makers, and bee keepers
• Sample fresh from the garden produce
MONDAY 9/21 · HAMPSHIRE DC
TUESDAY, 9/22 · FRANKLIN DC
WEDNESDAY, 9/23 · BERKSHIRE DC
THURSDAY, 9/24 · WORCESTER DC

EARTH TABLE
September 21–24
All DCs from 5–9 pm
LOCAL HERO
RESTAURANTS ivy
UMASS DINING
UMassAmherst
umassdining.com

Woman who falsely reported gang-rape may suffer charges

By Ann Givens
McClatchy-Tribune News Service

MELVILLE, N.Y. — Prosecutors deciding whether to charge the woman who falsely reported that she was gang-raped in a Hofstra University men's room last week will have serious issues to weigh, experts said yesterday.

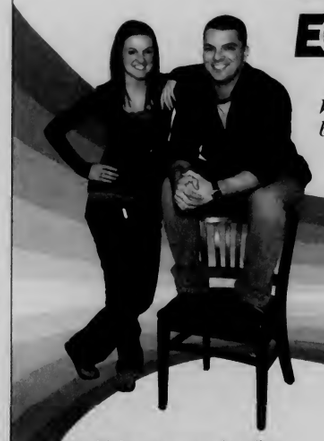
On the one hand, they will want to discourage people from lying to law enforcement, and show that there will be consequences for doing so, experts said. On the other, they don't want to discourage legitimate rape victims from coming forward, or discourage people who lied at first from telling the truth later on, experts said.

"That's the tension right now in the D.A.'s office," said Jim Cohen, a criminal law professor at Fordham University. "There should be some sanction for the consequences she caused," he said. "On the other hand, if they charge this woman, then someone similarly situated in the future might decide to stick with her story rather than coming clean."

A law enforcement source said Sunday that it is likely that the woman, who prosecutors have not named because she has not been charged with a crime, is "likely" to face charges this week.

The woman told Nassau, N.Y., police that she was tied up and gang-raped at about 3 a.m. Sept. 13 in a Hofstra University dormitory bathroom by five young men, authorities said. Four of the men, one of them a Hofstra student, were charged with rape in a case that gained nationwide attention.

She recanted Wednesday evening, after prosecutors interviewing her told her that a cell-phone video of the incident might exist.



Cornell Bouse, president of the Nassau Criminal Courts Bar Association, said the crimes the woman would most likely be charged with are all Class A misdemeanors, carrying a maximum of a year in jail.

Lois Schwaeber, director of legal services for the Nassau County Coalition Against Domestic Violence, said cases where people make false reports of rape hurt all legitimate rape victims seeking justice. But she said prosecuting someone who has made a false report will discourage real rape victims from coming forward as well.

"They may feel that if they can't support the charges they are making with enough proof, they could be charged."

KC Johnson, who wrote a recent book about the false rape charges filed against three Duke University lacrosse players in 2006, said the mental health of the person making the false report may also be an issue. In the Duke case, the state attorney who took over from Durham District Attorney Michael Nifong, did not charge the woman, in part because he had seen voluminous medical records proving she was deeply disturbed.

"This is one of the reasons prosecutors have discretion about whether to file charges," Johnson said. "It is perfectly appropriate for them to take all these factors into account."

Banking for the EGeneration

We work here and bank here too!
eGeneration banking is delivered by eGeneration bankers like Cara and Mike.
Check out mycoolbank.com today!
Get great info, open accounts online and get awesome stuff like eChecking*, eStatements, Online Banking and Bill Pay. It's easy for you to choose your style of banking. There's even online live chat.
*$10 minimum deposit to open eChecking Account. No minimum balance required to maintain account. Other bank's ATM surcharge fees that are charged to the account during current statement cycle will be refunded on the last business day of the current statement cycle. Accounts closed or changed to another product during a current statement cycle will not receive a refund of the other bank's ATM surcharge fees.
EASTERN SAVINGS BANK
My Bank
mycoolbank.com | 413.527.4111
Belchertown | Easthampton | Hadley | North
South Hadley | Southampton | Westfield
Find ESB on facebook
EQUAL HOUSING LENDER
DIF

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 2009

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself" - Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

SAFRA's benefits

Amidst the impending doom of federal stimulus money evaporating next semester and the inevitable annual fee hike along college campuses, students last week got at least a glimmer of hope with the Student Aid and Fiscal Responsibility Act (SAFRA) passed the House of Representatives.

The bill, which passed by a 253-171 voting margin, is designed to restructure financial aid for college students, increase federal grant money, cut out private lenders from the student loan process, and, according to the bill's backers, save $8 billion for taxpayers in a 10-year period.

It's great news and a dramatic improvement for college students everywhere – except for that last part.

The estimate, which stems from the Congressional Budget Office's analysis, has been the target of a great deal of criticism since the vote. And rightly so.

Although the bill's aim is to cut costs and save money by simplifying and streamlining the currently clunky financial aid system by allowing students to take out loans directly from the government through their university, the impact on taxpayers is not expected to be all beneficial. In fact, opponents of the bill have come forth claiming that, rather than saving money, the damage of the retooling and increase in financial aid will be around $58 billion dollars out of taxpayers' wallets.

While the price tag of the proposal is under siege the bill's restructuring of the financial aid system will be beneficial to students.

First, the bill will simplify the Free Application for Federal Student Aid (FAFSA). Rather than go through an entirely different process, the FAFSA forms will take the same information that goes on tax returns.

Second, students will handle their loans through their respective universities and colleges to receive money from the government. This change will eliminate the middle man from the loan equation, but will not push lenders out of business. While not handling the loans, private companies will still collect and service the loans.

Despite this, it's far too early for students to hail SAFRA as the end of college debt. The changes proposed in the bill will be beneficial to college students and improve the system, but the fiscal claims that are coming out from its supporters are far too extraordinary to be taken seriously.

When one side predicts almost $60 billion in savings while the other projects almost $58 billion in costs, somewhere is wrong. And with the way the financial system has been implemented in the past, the most likely conclusion is that the outcome will be closer to the latter. While the bill's fiscal claims didn't get any flaws in the House, the Senate opposition is expected to put up a bigger fight.

It's impossible to argue the benefits of the SAFRA bill. It's the best thing that's come out for college students for a whole. But with estimates so radically different, the underestimation of spending could force recent legislature and the overall status of the nation's economy, it's too early to put away the picket signs.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian editorial board.

HEY!

ED/OP IS FROM ME
ED/OP IS FOR YOU
WRITE TO ME
AND...
WE'LL ALL READ YOU!

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Institutionalized racism in the SGA

Alana Goodman

Racism is alive and well at the University of Massachusetts.

And I'm not talking about the hysterical, trumped-up allegations of racism made by people like Henry Louis Gates and Jimmy Carter at the mere mention of legitimate criticism about Barack Obama's policies.

I mean clear-cut, systematic, institutionalized racism.

Just look at our Student Government Association (SGA) bylaws.

As we prepare to swear in our elected representatives to the SGA senate this week, UMass students should be aware that 13 percent of our SGA senators will not have even competed in Tuesday's elections. Instead, they will be appointed to their positions before the election results even come in, solely on the basis of skin color.

This portion of the senate is appointed by a registered student organization (RSO) called the African-American, Latino, Asian-American, and Native-American (ALANA) Caucus (no relation to this columnist). Only minority students who fit one of those four racial categories – or other students who ALANA approves as "minority allies" – are considered eligable for these senate seats.

Proponents of ALANA will argue that anyone can be a member of the group and have access to its appointed seats, and they may be right – technically. On paper, RSOs like the ALANA are open to all fee-paying UMass undergrads. But while most RSOs actively work to recruit a large membership, ALANA doesn't; you will almost never see their members "tabling" in the Student Union or advertising their meetings to the general public.

They seem to prefer their organization small and close-knit, and why shouldn't they?

Unlike other RSOs, ALANA's annual funding isn't contingent on the size of its membership – the SGA's "ALANA Caucus Reserves Fund" earmarks an exorbitant $10,000 for the group each year.

I've often wondered how I, too, could join elusive ALANA, so I recently skimmed over a copy of its RSO Charter Membership requirements. Turns out it's a bit more complicated than joining, say, the UMass Ski and Board Club.

The easiest way to join ALANA is to become a member of one of its "ALANA-affiliated RSO's" – like the Haitian-American Student Association – and then have that RSO elect you as one of its two delegate members of the group. If you're not fortunate enough to belong to an ALANA-affiliated RSO, but you still somehow manage to find out where and when ALANA meetings take place, then pat yourself on the back and consider pursuing a career in espionage.

> Thirteen percent of our SGA senators will not have even competed in Tuesday's elections. Instead, they will be appointed to their positions before the election results even come in, solely on the basis of skin color.

Once at the meeting, you'll then need to convince two-thirds of ALANA to elect you as a member. Of course, you must first prove to them that you've "demonstrated a commitment to [ALANA's] goals" and "[signed] a statement of commitment to the purpose of the organization."

According to its charter, ALANA's purpose is, "Acknowledging that certain peoples have been and remain to be marginalized and underrepresented... based on racial impediments in the United States, and specifically at the University of Massachusetts ... the Caucus shall promote and reflect the diverse interests of students from multi-cultural backgrounds, including but not limited to students of African, Latino/a, Asian Pacific Islander and Native American descent."

Alternatively, I assume that signing a statement of commitment to any sermon by Rev. Jeremiah Wright will also suffice. Once you're a member, you'll need to get the approval of all three ALANA chairs before you can vote in their elections. After that, you'll finally have access to the smoke-filled room where 13 percent of the student "representatives" in the SGA senate are chosen.

This practice has been going on for years, and in addition to its sleeziness, it's also illegal.

In a Dec. 23, 2003 memo, the UMass General Counsel Terence O'Malley informed former Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Mike Gargano that the ALANA seats violated the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution, which prevents state governments from discriminating against individuals based on race or ethnicity.

"It is my opinion that the approval of the ALANA representation provision by the Board of Trustees would be unconstitutional," wrote O'Malley. "The proposed [ALANA Caucus] amendment reserves positions in the student senate on the basis of race or ethnicity."

On the advice of the Counsel, Gargano asked the SGA to remove the race-based appointments. Instead, ALANA promptly branded Gargano a "racist" and held campus rallies comparing him to Satan.

In the wake of controversy surrounding the issue, the illegal race-based seats were never removed.

But now the subject is being broached again by the new Vice Chancellor, Jean Kim. On Aug. 26, Kim sent a memo to SGA President Ngozi Mbawuiki, asking that the race-based seats be removed by March 1, 2010.

Hopefully Mbawuiki complies and puts an end to the ALANA's exlusion of students who don't possess the "right" skin color or the "correct" mindset.

It was nearly 55 years ago, after all, when Rosa Parks stood up against race-based seating on public busses.

But today, right here at UMass, seats of a different kind are still being allocated on the basis of race and ideology.

It wasn't right then, and it isn't right now.

Alana Goodman is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at angoodma@student.umass.edu

Clean laundry, good grades and college bliss

H.C. Wang

Settling into college once you get there can be quite a feat. Of course, this usually applies more to freshmen than anyone else, but after a while, anyone can miss the comforts of home. At home, you can enjoy the tastiness of home cooking.

You have your own space where you're not being kept awake by the kid across the hall blasting music in the middle of the night. You don't have to deal with school washers and dryers refusing to work properly.

All of that on top of colder weather on the horizons and an especially dangerous flu season, living at college can seem pretty grim.

The bright side is that it is not impossible to get into the swing of college life.

Here are some tips for getting on top of your course load without having to sacrifice your social life and, more importantly, your health.

First things first: This is college, not high school, so you technically don't have to go to class. Before you get too excited about that, let me advise you against skipping anyway.

While it is tempting to hit the snooze button and not force yourself to roll out of bed for that 8 a.m. class, it is important to keep up with your school work.

Depending on the teacher and class, there can be severe consequences for not going to lecture or discussion sections.

Most discussion sections take attendance, and participation counts toward your overall grade.

Even for the big lecture classes themselves – while the instructor may very well not notice your absence in a sea of 500 students – it is a disservice to yourself not to attend all of your lectures.

You may tell yourself it's no big deal to miss a few times here and there because it's a piece of cake to catch up on anything you might have missed by flipping through your textbook instead.

> While it is tempting to hit the snooze button and not force yourself to roll out of bed for that 8 a.m. class, it is important to keep up with your school work.

In fact, you might figure, if all the material is in your textbook or the lecture notes available online on SPARK, why do you need to attend class at all?

Trust me, not a good idea.

I know from personal experience that this doesn't work out so well. It is only too easy to go from thinking that if it's okay to miss a few lectures, then you can skip out a couple of times a week.

Even if it seems to work well enough earlier on in the year, as the semester progresses, so will the difficulty – or at the very least, the amount – of class material. Soon enough, with the flow of all your classes, you simply will not have sufficient extra time to catch up on the things you should have learned in class.

Even if you do, it would be a waste of the time you could be spending doing something more pleasurable. Also, professors mention other things in lecture not in the text that you will be expected to know for your exams. At the very least, they will highlight the information that is most important.

If you know how to listen for them and take good notes, this will help you out a lot later on.

By now, you've probably noticed how temperamental the washers and dryers in the dorm laundry rooms are. It looks like a lot of them have been replaced this year, but it has been reported to me that there are still problems.

My advice: Save your quarters and do laundry every other week. Now that is not an excuse to don dirty clothes and smell like a locker room.

I just mean if you don't absolutely have to wear a certain item the following week, you can put off the wash for later. Just think of it as an environmentally friendly thing to do when it comes to saving water and energy, as well as saving yourself time.

Seriously ladies, you do not need three changes of tops for each event you attend.

When the holidays roll around, if you can hold off until you get home to do it for free, then that can save you some pocket money as well. If, however, you are running low on socks and underwear then please, by all means, do us all a favor and do your laundry.

Last but not least, with the constant looming presence of swine flu thrumming like a dark undercurrent, it is time to recall back to the days of your childhood.

Remember your mom's rule about washing your hands before meals and covering your mouth after you cough? Observe it. Carry around antibacterial gel. UHS offers flu clinics.

Go get vaccinated!

It won't help you stave off H1N1 that vaccine will be available soon, I believe), but it helps in the meantime to make sure you're not missing days of school or work and feeling generally crappy for catching the regular flu. Drink plenty of fluids and hit the gym.

That's all for now, folks. Got a problem? I've probably got an answer. Drop me a line.

H.C. Wang is a Collegian columnist and can be reached at hui@student.umass.edu.

Gaza's suffering at the hands of a brutal Israeli war machine

Waqas Mirza

As students began returning to school this fall in the United States and in many parts of the world, an ambiance of despair and despondency engulfed the people of the Gaza Strip.

Schools opened there as every year elsewhere, but students and teachers alike found themselves overwhelmed with problems (the word doesn't exactly capture it) that many of us here at Amherst fortunately do not have to cope with.

According to Al-Jazeera, the remnants of nearly 300 schools that Israel bombed in its latest assault on Gaza (in self-defense, as always) were visible across the densely populated region.

Moreover, the continuing U.S.-Israeli-Egyptian siege of the enclave, which Amnesty International labeled the world's largest open-air prison, has continued to inflict incalculable suffering on an already beleaguered and destitute population.

Disregarding for the moment the terrible human and physical cost Israel so callously imposed on the people of Gaza during the January massacre, the Gazans continue to live under a siege which has turned their homes into a concentration camp, their borders into Israeli missile test sites, their graveyards into overflowing boroughs of human flesh and their lives into disposable instruments of geopolitics.

Most harrowing about all of this is the complicity and active support of the United States government as Israel continues in its biblical quest to punish the Palestinians for resisting the occupation of their native land.

For many of us, it is quite difficult to comprehend how Gaza's children – the ones who survived Operation Cast Lead – were even able to return to school after they were forced to witness the slaughter of family members and friends, the incineration of their society and, most painful, the silence of the international community.

With what standard does a child in Gaza measure the worth of his/her own life when the countries which are supposedly the guarantors of human rights are the same ones which sanction Israel as it tramples upon any and every vestige of humanitarian law and the Geneva Conventions with impunity?

> Gazans continue to live under a siege which has turned their homes into a concentration camp, their borders into Israeli missile test sites, their graveyards into overflowing boroughs of human flesh.

As it happens, these children are the lucky ones.

Three-hundred-and-twenty children were not able to enjoy the privilege of sitting in damaged and burnt schools with debilitating psychological effects as they perished in Israel's assault on the territory in January 2009.

The siege of the territory is calculated to maximize the misery and distress of the Gazans without the public relations debacle which accompanied Israel's military strikes in January.

Ninety-eight percent of Gaza's children, according to a study by Queen's University, are currently suffering from what the researchers called debilitating psychiatric and psychological effects. Imagine sitting in a classroom where 20 percent of students have Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder, 39 percent have Post Traumatic Stress Disorder and most others have some sort of an emotional disorder and/or suffer direct physical trauma.

World Food Program estimates indicate the need for nearly 400 trucks of food to meet the basic nutritional need for Gazans. Israel allows a fraction of that amount.

According to Israeli journalist Amira Hass, in the list of items Israel explicitly forbids Gazans to be able to import, one can find books, blankets, cups, glasses, musical instruments, tea, coffee, crayons, clothing, shoes and so forth, rendering any illusions one may have had about the siege reinforcing Israeli self-defense as entirely ludicrous.

A recent report by the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) in Jerusalem described the pernicious effects of the Israeli siege and gave an estimate of 120,000 job losses in Gaza.

In addition, it described 75 percent of Gaza's population as being food insecure due to 80 percent of Gaza's agricultural crops being destroyed by Israeli forces.

Adding to the chorus of consternation by international organizations, the United Nations Environment Program (UNEP) warned that Gaza's water supply were in danger of collapse due to the Israeli military's assault and ongoing siege.

Israeli restrictions on the import of any metals and pipes have left the sewage system in Gaza in dire need of repair, with sewage overflowing in the streets in many parts of the territory.

The continuing siege of Gaza is merely an extension of the January military operation, both in terms of its effects and its intentions.

As the diplomatic and political stalemate continues with superficial pronouncements of a Palestinian state by the Palestinian Authority, along with Israel's illegal settlement building in the West Bank, with generous contributions by American taxpayers via the U.S. government, the suffering of the Palestinians in Gaza prolongs.

In the words of UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Mary Robinson, a civilization is being destroyed in Gaza, with complete support by the U.S. government.

Waqas Mirza is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at wmirza@student.umass.edu

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 2009

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Warhol's art and legacy comes to UMass

By Samantha Marsh
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts will be showcasing the works of Andy Warhol and related artists at the University Gallery, beginning today, Sept. 23. There are two exhibits which will be displayed at the Gallery: "The Minox & the Big Shot: Andy Warhol's Photography (1970-87)" and "Connecting the Dots ...The Warhol Legacy: Tom Friedman, Ellen Gallagher, Vik Muniz and Rob Pruitt." The Andy Warhol Photographic Legacy Program has donated over 100 Polaroid pictures and 50 black-and-white photographs to the University, according to Kathleen Barach, a 2009 UMass graduate with a degree in art history.

"[The program] is designed to grant the public greater access to this little-known body of work," said Barach in literature regarding the displays. According to Loretta Yarlow, University Gallery director, the Legacy Program requested that UMass create an ongoing potential exhibit for student research. The Legacy Program was then created so that Warhol's photography could become better known in academia. Photographs are donated in hopes to spark student interest and discussion about Warhol and his work.

UMass has hired several interns to work with the Gallery on this project. While some are pursuing degrees in art history, many interns come from other academic backgrounds.

"We get students from all over," said Yarlow. "One of our tour guides is pre-med!"

Interns were stationed at the gallery over the summer working with the installation manager framing and mounting photographs. As a graduate intern, Barach researched the works and wrote several pieces of literature about the exhibit.

Warhol is globally recognized as a leader in the creation of "pop art." His portraits of celebrities such as Marilyn Monroe, Elvis Presley and Elizabeth Taylor, as well as his classic paintings of the Campbell Soup Can and the Coca Cola Bottles, are speculated as earning him this fame. The American Supermarket exhibit of 1964 also popularized Warhol. Much of his photography, however, has been unnoticed by the general public. It is important for art lovers to see these photographs, as they provide a peek into the life of Warhol.

"The Minox & the Big Shot, Andy Warhol's Photography (1970-87)," is the first display visible to viewers as they enter the gallery. This exhibit highlights some of Warhol's best work, some which have been rarely seen by the public, ranging from celebrity shots to photographs of strangers in the streets.

Although the exhibit features some of Warhol's famous portraits such as that of Ted Kennedy and Carly Simon, Yarlow prefers the black-and-white photography, and believes that the street photography gives a deeper glimpse into Warhol's life by allowing viewers to see firsthand the people he met and the places he has gone.

"It's like a diary of Warhol's daily activities," said Yarlow.

Other works at the exhibit include a stunning photo of a car embedded in snow, entitled "Cars in Snow," done in 1963. Beverly Chalfen, done in 1882, is a particularly striking black-and-white portrait of an average older woman; however, her lips are bright red in color. It seems that this photograph is displaying the vibrancy of someone who may otherwise appear ordinary. These photographs enhance the apparent "everyday life" theme of the exhibit.

The second exhibit, "Connecting the Dots ... the Warhol Legacy: Tom Friedman, Ellen Gallagher, Vik Muniz & Rob Pruitt," showcases four artists whose work explores similar themes as Warhol's. Tom Friedman and Rob Pruitt are both highly esteemed in the art world and have exhibited at famous museums around the country.

"We are really excited about their work," said Yarlow. Tom Friedman is known for his transformation of everyday products into astounding pieces of art. Featured at the exhibit is his "Dollar Bill" piece, done in 2000. Friedman creates a blurred effect of a blown up dollar bill, perhaps creating a message about the absurdness of money. Pruitt, another creative pop artist, catches viewers' eyes with his large, vibrant display of photographs taken with an iPhone.

Gallagher's pieces are defined by the numerous mediums that she uses to create her work. In one photo, "Deluxe (2004-05)," Gallagher uses over 25 different mediums, ranging from enamel to toy eyeballs.

Brazilian artist Vik Muniz's work is guided by the media and popular culture, according to a press release about the exhibit. "The Best of Life (1989-2000)," which includes photographs of drawings he sketched from memory of Life Magazine photographs, is featured at the exhibit. The four artists' works relate closely to Warhol's, creating complementary exhibits.

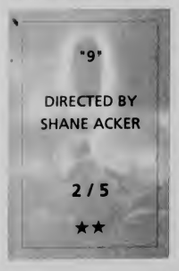
This Ellen Gallagher photo, titled 'Deluxe,' is on display at the Andy Warhol exhibition in the University of Massachusetts Art Gallery. The exhibit will be ongoing for the remainder of the semester.

At 6:30 p.m., Barach and contemporary art professor Mario Ontiveros will speak about the research and work that was put into the exhibit. Guest artists Friedman and Pruitt are scheduled to speak later in the semester. The University Gallery opens its doors for viewing the exhibits tonight from 5 p.m. until 8 p.m. The exhibit will continue to be on display for the remainder of the semester.

Samantha Marsh can be reached at smarsh@student.umass.edu

'9' fails in plot, soars in art direction

By Nick Ortolani
Collegian Correspondent



Do not let the friendly-looking rag dolls fool you – "9" is not a kid's movie.

The plot of the film is incredibly contrived, and, at times, texts both the audience's sense of logic and empathy, which is a shame, considering that the art direction is brilliant.

The story follows #9 (voiced by Elijah Wood), a miniature life form who looks like a small burlap body suit, which was created by a mad scientist on the eve of the destruction of the entire human race.

Because our main character is #9, it is safe to assume that there are eight others to accompany him. He meets one of them, #2 (Martin Landau), in the barren wasteland that once used to be human civilization. However, #2 is almost immediately captured by a mechanical life form resembling what a cat produced by the Skynet Company would look like. #9 then wanders along until he is spotted by #5 (John C. Reilly). #5 brings #9 into a church sanctuary, created by the seemingly wise and undeniably old #1 (Christopher Plummer).

We quickly learn that #1 favors isolation and the illusion of safety over progress, and he chastises #5 for bringing an outsider into his sanctuary. Upon learning that #2 has been taken, #1 immediately assumes #2 has been killed. #9 is not convinced, and leads a mission to find and rescue #2, accompanied by #5. Along the way, they run into #7 (Jennifer Connolly), and twins #3 and #4, who are silent vocally, but speak volumes with their body language.

What follows are a series of complex, and frequently disorienting action sequences. The script mimics an average action movie script, with the dialog only barely pushing the plot forward. At its heart, "9" is nothing more than an action movie. It attempts to explore deeper themes, but rarely succeeds. What little story the movie has simply serves to connect one action sequence to another.

One relieving aspect of the movie are the characters themselves. Each one has a distinct personality, which manifests itself not only in the careful voice acting, but also in their physical appearances. They are effective and convincing as being more than simply small sacks which possess the gift of life. As audience members, we understand why #6 (quite appropriately, Crispin Glover) was destined to be "the crazy one" – his maker decided to give him mismatched eyes and a jagged black-and-white pattern.

The film's overall art direction is nothing short of breathtaking. The textures and environments have depth and character, while still appearing to be animated. This film does not try to recreate reality with its drawings – it creates its own world. The vision is neither modern nor historical; rather, it seems like what the inhabitants of 1945 Europe might have envisioned the world to be like 20 years later. This bleak, steampunk-inspired Universe is part of the appeal of the film. Unfortunately, the appearance is only skin deep, and the film isn't much more profound.

Shane Acker directed the recently debuted movie "9," which follows the journey of nine animated characters after the destruction of the human race.

The best scene in the movie is possibly the opening, which is right after #9 has been "born." We watch as #9 discovers the world around him, learns to walk and explores his very sense of being. This scene is beautiful, as we observe life born into a world of destruction. However, the film doesn't explore this idea any further. Rather, the movie abandons its existential thinking early on in exchange for flashy action sequences. Outside of the first scene, there is nothing familiar about this world, which makes it impossible to relate to the subject matter of the film.

In comparison to "Up," which tells a story that many can relate to, "9," unfortunately, is all exaggeration and very little heart.

Nick Ortolani can be reached at nortolan@student.umass.edu.

A 'Beautiful Day' for U2 fans in Boston

By Justin Gagnon
Collegian Staff

Gillette Stadium was rocking this past "Sunday Bloody Sunday," but it wasn't the Patriots sweating under the hot lights.

The world-renowned Irish rock band U2 landed its 360 degree tour in Foxborough, Mass., on Sept. 20 and 21. Amazingly, the group still consists of its original four members: Bono, The Edge, Adam Clayton and Larry Mullen, Jr., all of whom are in their late 40s.

The 31-year-old band released its 12th studio album, "No Line on the Horizon," this past February, their first since "How to Dismantle an Atomic Bomb" in 2004. Their latest received five stars from Rolling Stone, better than the four their last one obtained.

"Horizon" was the number one album on Billboards Top 200 its first week on the shelf, staying in the top three for the next two weeks. It still remains on the list 28 weeks later, currently sitting at number 88.

The band has been amidst its current world tour since June 30, but just recently made their first stop in the United States on Sept. 12 at Soldier Field in Chicago, Ill. Before Foxborough, they played two shows at the Rogers Centre in Toronto, Ontario.

The stage at Gillette resembled a huge alien spacecraft, set on the end zone furthest from the main entrance of the stadium. It was constructed in such a way that fans could see the concert from 360 degrees around the stage; hence, the name of the tour.

According to its website, Gillette Stadium seats 68,756 people, just under twice the population of Amherst. Each and every one of those seats was sold; the most expensive of which went for $252.50.

U2's popularity is so abundant that they have played multiple shows in 11 out of the 18 cities they've stopped in so far. They even played three shows in their hometown of Dublin, Ireland.

Snow Patrol, known for their hit "Chasing Cars," has been the primary opening act throughout the world tour. Muse will be taking over the role until Oct. 18, when the torch will be passed to the Black Eyed Peas for the remainder of the scheduled tour dates.

Sunday's show began much later than expected, which was good for those who wanted to binge as many $8.50 beers as their stomachs and wallets could handle. All alcohol sales ended once the main act began.

Drummer Mullen Jr. was the first to take the stage, banging a drum riff to pump up the crowd. Fans young and old, men and women

See U2 on page 6

Don't call Kings of Leon mainstream

By Greg Crawford
Detroit Free Press

Drop the words "mainstream" or "arena" into a conversation with Kings of Leon lead guitarist Matthew Followill and his dismay is palpable, even via a cranky cell phone dialed from halfway across the country.

Point out that he and his band mates have been headlining at some of the largest venues in the United States and he turns apologetic. ("It's absolutely ridiculous.") Mention the Grammy, the platinum album and the single ("Use Somebody") that has recently caught the ear of soccer moms and Adult Top 40 radio programmers and he assures you that all this madness will soon be over. ("It makes me nervous. I'm sure we'll be back in the 5,000-seat theaters.")

Maybe. Or maybe Followill, 25, is just a little shell-shocked after a year of being frantically propelled into the ranks of rock royalty. It's important to remember that until very recently, he and his Tennessee cousins – Caleb, Nathan and Jared Followill – were merely four respected and upstanding members of the alternative rock neighborhood, a quiet and sane place where artists play small dates at clubs and theaters and have lots of time to think and create.

It's where the Followill boys were living back in 2003 when they released an EP of raw, Southern-tinged garage rock that turned heads and paved the way

See FOLLOWILL on page 6

Lead guitarist of Kings of Leon, Matthew Followill, says he is still adjusting to the famed life that he and his bandmates have earned themselves, but refuses to be referred to as ordinary.

U2 brings 360 tour to Gillette

COURTESY THE BAND

Irish rock band U2 recently released its 12th studio album, titled "No Line on the Horizon." After 31 years together, all four original members continue to deliver spectacular performances.

U2 from page 5

alike screamed like preteen girls at a Jonas Brothers concert when Bono and The Edge appeared and began the set.

Their first four songs were off their latest album, which was a main source for their material throughout the night, as they played six of its tracks.

The group started with "Breathe," followed by the album's title track, "No Line on the Horizon."

Clearly just riding the excitement of the start of the show, it wasn't until "Get On Your Boots," that they truly won over the crowd with their music. The song, which has a striking similarity to the one-hit wonder "Wild Wild West" by the Escape Club, ignited fans to start rocking out with powerful guitar-work by The Edge.

It seemed to be the perfect time to play a hit, but rather they unfortunately continued to promote their album and went with "Magnificent."

Possibly the best performance of the whole night came next when they played "Mysterious Ways." The moment the famous funky guitar riff pumped through the amps, everything that could breathe in the colossal arena went crazy.

Thankfully, Bono and crew chose to follow that song with a powerful recital of "Beautiful Day," which ended with a short cover of "Blackbird" by the Beatles.

After playing "Elevation," they returned to their strengths and performed "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For" also ending in a cover, this time of Ben E. King's "Stand By Me."

U2 ended a variety of their hit songs with such covers that were not necessarily true to the original sound, but interesting and entertaining nonetheless.

After a poor rendition of "Unknown Caller," they picked it up for a stretch of hits which included "New Year's Day," "Stuck In A Moment," "The Unforgettable Fire," "City of Blinding Lights" and "Vertigo," which included another ode to the Beatles with "She Loves You."

Following yet another song from the last record, Bono brought his political views to the stage for the first time for "Sunday Bloody Sunday." Images of Iranian violence were displayed on the large circular screen above the stage, and the song ended with a very short and soft cover of "Rock the Casbah."

"MLK" and "Walk On" were next, and they seemed to be the final songs of the regular set list. The band took what at the time seemed like an "encore break," and returned to the stage and played a very passionate and beautiful "One."

Bono sang "Amazing Grace" which bridged "One" right into "Where the Streets Have No Name." The whole audience sang along for all three songs as the end of the show was inevitably near.

They once again left the stage, and returned for a legitimate encore. Bono sang into a neon microphone resembling the Target logo for their first encore song, "Ultra Violet."

"With or Without You" was next and should have been the last song of the night, but they returned for one final song from "No Line on the Horizon" with "Moment of Surrender."

People began to file out after "With or Without You," as it seemed that the general consensus was that U2 should have done without the last shout out to their new record.

Overall, they put on an incredible show. Fewer songs from "Horizon" and more from previous albums would have made the concert perfect.

While Bono is often criticized for being too political, his message throughout the end of the concert wasn't as much political as it was charitable. It's evident there is more that we can do to help people dying in Third World countries from preventable causes.

While U2 is a very well-known and admired band for their work in the studio, seeing them live is an experience that cannot be fathomed or imagined without being there. Hearing Bono's bellowing "yeah" cries and dynamic voice live is spine-tingling.

U2 fans undoubtedly can look forward to more world tours and number-one albums in the future. The group hasn't skipped a beat in over 30 years, and show no signs of slowing down.

Justin Gagnon can be reached at jgagnon@dailycollegian.com

Followill following his dreams

FOLLOWILL from page 5

for their RCA debut in 2004. And it's where they stayed for the next few years and the next two albums as they experimented and shaped their sound, which grew steadily more complex. Though Kings of Leon attained unexpected star status in Britain during this period, the band flew mostly under the radar in the States, where only hipsters and music critics seemed to be susceptible to its charms.

That changed suddenly last summer with the arrival of "Only by the Night," a wickedly infectious and smartly produced disc that draws much of its magic from Matthew Followill's moody, muddy guitar and Caleb Followill's wailing, bluesy vocals. Leadoff single "Sex on Fire," accompanied by an oddly erotic music video filled with skin, sweat and smoke, quickly put the band on the stardom track, and the mainstream rock 'n' roll biz has been eager to pay its respects ever since.

The tune won a Grammy last winter. The band did "Saturday Night Live" and landed on the cover of Rolling Stone. Now there are reports that a Kings of Leon remix album is in the works with contributions expected from Linkin Park and Kings uber-booster Justin Timberlake. Further burnishing of the Followills' rock star credentials came late last month at England's annual Reading Festival, where they had themselves a good old-fashioned onstage meltdown. British press accounts of their performance say they hurled obscenities at fans and smashed guitars after a messy set that was marred by technical problems.

Matthew Followill spoke recently about Kings of Leon's whirlwind year.

Q: "Only by the Night" came out a year ago this month, and it changed things pretty drastically for Kings of Leon. Is it still possible for you to consider yourselves alternative?

A: Yeah, I don't feel like we're in the mainstream really at all. I mean I know we are now because we'll hear our song on the radio and then the next song will be Kanye West or Britney Spears. But we're definitely still in the alternative vein. We just got lucky, I guess, with these songs – "Use Somebody," "Sex on Fire." We didn't know those were going to be big singles.

Q: The band had a loyal but much smaller following before "Only by the Night." How have the fans who cut their teeth on tunes like "Molly's Chambers" and "Holy Roller Novocaine" from your first album reacted to your recent success?

A: A lot of them liked the raw music of the earlier days. I'm sure we've lost a couple of fans along the way. I've seen girls down front who obviously have been fans since the beginning, and they'll be going crazy for the whole set. And then "Sex on Fire" comes on, and they just sit there and cross their arms and act like they hate being there. I guess they just hate the new sound. You don't let that throw you too much, though; you make new fans.

Q: Words like "eerie," "dreamy" and "spooky" have been used a lot to describe the last two Kings of Leon albums ("Only by the Night" and 2007's "Because of the Times"). Your guitar work seems to have a good deal to do with that.

A: We did some big shows with some big bands, and we played in empty arenas during sound checks, and I think we just kind of liked that open sound. We said when were doing "Because of the Times" that we wanted to sound big. Plus, I started using pedals and stuff. I'd always been anti anything but the guitar and the amp. Then I thought maybe I should try something else on the next record, and I think that's where a lot of that dark stuff like reverb comes in.

Q: You guys are from Tennessee, and that's about as middle American as you can get. Yet it was fans in Britain who loved you first. You were huge there long before "Only by the Night." What's the secret of your appeal to the Brits?

A: I think they listen to a lot more music. It's definitely a broader audience of music listeners. I think we just hit at the right time. The Strokes were out, the White Stripes. There was different stuff going on, and we looked way different. We were Southern, and that was really different. Right off the bat, they took a liking to us. ... I guess they knew something we didn't.

Q: "Only by the Night" has won you a lot of older fans, people in their 30s and 40s, and some of them say they hear an echo of '80s arena rock in tunes like "Use Somebody." Are you OK with that or do you find it bothersome?

A: It sounds funny to hear "'80s arena rock" and I would never put the song in that category. ... I mean it doesn't bother us at all. We've been called everything. We have pretty tough skin now. Nothing hurts too much. But I don't know about that. Whatever. I guess we'll try to stay away from '80s arena rock from now on.

Don't make your girlfriend mad at you...
WRITE FOR ARTS!
EMAIL
arts@dailycollegian.com

LAZARD

Will be holding interviews for Analyst positions in its Investment Banking Group

On
Wednesday, October 7th, 2009
Career Center – College Hall

Seniors interested in interviewing with us should submit resumes and cover letters through Experience
by September 25th

For additional information, please contact:
Kristen.Holzer@lazard.com

Seahawks limit Rams' Jackson on ground

By Jim Thomas
St. Louis Post-Dispatch

MATTHEW PARKIN / THE DAILY

Rams' running back Stephen Jackson gets tackled by a Redskin defender. The Seattle Seahawks brought a safety toward the line of scrimmage before the ball was snapped, which limited Jackson to 17 carries and limited yardage on plays.

Even on a day when Marc Bulger had only 17 handoffs, Seattle's strategy in dealing with Steven Jackson and the Rams' running game was painfully obvious.

Time after time, in those crucial final seconds before the ball was snapped, the Seahawks would creep a safety toward the line of scrimmage, an eighth defender to help keep Jackson bottled up.

"There were eight down there quite a bit," Rams offensive coordinator Pat Shurmur said. "With a running back like we have, I think that's something we're going to see. And I would anticipate that Washington will do the same."

It's simple gridiron math. By sending a safety into the box – the area roughly from offensive tackle to offensive tackle along the line of scrimmage – the defense is committing eight players to stop the run. In base formations, most offenses have only seven blockers in that same area: five offensive linemen, the tight end and the fullback.

So in what's commonly described as a game of inches, having an extra body to tackle the running back can make a huge difference.

Jackson expected a lot of "eight in the box" against Seattle. Ditto for Washington on Sunday at FedEx Field, and really for every Sunday.

"That's just going to be my mindset for all 16 games that we have," Jackson said. "I anticipate for the rest of the year that defenses are going to put eight men in the box because we're just so young at the wide receiver position."

It makes all the sense in the world for defenses to gang up on Jackson.

"I mean, right now he's our best football player on offense," tight end Randy McMichael said. "A lot of teams know that, and they want to take him away.

We've got to find a way as receivers and tight ends to make plays.

"And even if they do have eight-man fronts, we need to get seven guys (blocked), and let Steven make the one guy miss. It's all about just staying on your man a little bit longer and helping 'Jack' find somewhere to run."

Easier said than done, particularly in more obvious running situations. Against Seattle, Jackson gained only 19 yards on eight carries on first down, a traditional running down. That's only 2.4 yards per carry. But on second and third downs, when defenses have to be more concerned with the pass, Jackson averaged six yards per carry (eight carries for 48 yards).

Jackson should see plenty of Washington middle linebacker London Fletcher, the former Ram, on Sunday. "He's a tackling machine," Jackson said. "From what I see on game film, he kind of mirrors the running backs. So it should be a good matchup with myself and him."

Fletcher had 18 tackles last week in the Redskins' season-opening loss to the New York Giants. Fletcher will have company, too. One of the Redskins' starting safeties – LaRon Landry or Chris Horton – figures to spend a lot of time in the box to stuff the run.

There are a couple of ways to combat that. For one, Shurmur can call more running plays out of three- and four-wide receiver sets. It's harder to jam the box with extra defenders when you've got extra wideouts to worry about on the perimeter. But the Rams haven't shown much inclination to use four-wide receiver sets, much less run out of them.

A more obvious way to loosen up a run defense is success in the passing game.

The more the Redskins or anybody else has to worry about McMichael, Donnie Avery or Laurent Robinson, the less attention they can give to Jackson.

"We're no different than fans or anyone else," quarterback Marc Bulger said.

"We realize we've got to get the ball down the field, to get pressure off of Steven. So that's on myself, and the receivers, to make it happen."

In their offseason acquisitions and final roster decisions, the Rams took a risk by going with a young and inexperienced wide receiver corps. And there were growing pains against the Seahawks. Whether they're classified as drops or not, Rams receivers got their hands on about a half-dozen passes that ended up on the ground, incomplete. On at least three occasions, Bulger had to throw the ball away because no one was open.

"We left a couple plays on the field last week," Avery said. "We've got to make 'em up this week."

Avery, who had zero touches in exhibition play because of a foot injury, looked rusty at Qwest Field. Slot receiver Keenan Burton had trouble getting separation. Robinson had some good moments but left about 100 yards and one touchdown on the field with near misses.

Robinson caught one pass for 45 yards in the fourth quarter. But he got his hands on one ball that would've gone for about 50 yards in the third quarter, and another that would've gone for 40 at the end of the game – with both passes falling incomplete.

"They were close situations," Robinson said. "And one of them, I should have gone up and used my hands a little bit (better). I let the DB knock the ball out. But that's something I've been working on in practice: going up with two hands and just catching it at the highest point."

Robinson caught a shorter pass for what would've been a 1D in the fourth quarter but didn't come down with both feet in-bounds, so the play was ruled incomplete.

"(The defender) kind of pushed me out," Robinson said. "I tried to get the other foot down, but I just wasn't able to. ... That's something I've got to do better on, getting my feet down in the end zone and making a play on the ball."

It all added up to a miserable day offensively. The Rams were shut out for only the fourth time since the move to St. Louis in 1995. And they became the first team since Atlanta in 2000 to finish plus-2 or better in takeaway-giveaway margin yet lose by 28 points or more.

"Nobody's going to sit here and tell you that we did a good job out there," McMichael said. "A lot of our yards came in the fourth quarter (after Seattle loosened up its pass defense). So we've just got to get in a better rhythm. We can't kill ourselves like we did a lot of times when we had opportunities to make plays."

Peterson earns second hat trick in UR win

A-10 FIELD HOCKEY from page 10

home against the Hawks (3-4), the Spiders could score once against the Red Hawks (4-3), who received votes in the last NFHCA poll.

Each game opened with a Spider lead.

With 2:10 into the first game, the Spiders' Katelin Peterson was already two-thirds of the way to her second career hat trick with two goals.

She completed the triplet early in the second half, as the Spiders defeated Monmouth, 7-0.

Despite 15 saves by Hawks goalie Melissa Katz, Richmond ended with goals by four players – including three by Peterson and two by league-leader Hannah Hess – and assists by two others.

Hess' three shots led the Spiders the next day, but only junior Dani Pycroft, out of Zimbabwe, scored against the Red Hawks.

The forward scored four minutes into the game, but Miami finished with five unanswered goals from five different players.

Midfielder Katie Brightwell led the Red Hawks with a team-high three shots on goal for a score and an assist.

Richmond finished with a 26-2 shot differential against Monmouth, but got off seven shots against Miami.

Richmond plays at home against William and Mary on Sept. 23.

SHUTOUT LOSSES FOR RAMS

A year after going 6-13 in 2008, West Chester is currently poised to equal last season's win total.

This weekend, the Golden Rams (5-3) took a step back, dropping two games to Towson and Penn State.

West Chester's only goal of the weekend came from junior Kelsey Ward. Towson won 2-1, and the Nittany Lions allowed one shot on goal in their 5-0 win.

Ward's goal against the Tigers (3-4) came in the 64th minute on a penalty corner assist from midfielder Leah Angstadt, who is tied for second in the A-10.

However, Towson won the game in overtime on a tip shot from midfielder Kristie Blumer.

In the 81st minute of the game, Tiger forward Christina Boarman took a shot from above the circle, which quickly entered the net called by the officials as a tip goal. However, West Chester contested whether the goal should count.

West Chester goalie Joelle Zarefoss led the game with seven saved shots.

The next day, Zarefoss saved 17 shots, but allowed five to go past her.

Penn State (2-6) outshot the Rams, 29-1, and earned 12 penalty corners compared to only one by West Chester. Penn State rode the victory to 12 votes in the NFHCA poll.

The Ram's will play on Sept. 25 at Rider University in New Jersey.

Daniel Herberholz can be reached at dherberh@student.umass.edu.

Welcome back!

You don't need to be an economics major to know Stop & Shop offers great values that fit perfectly into a student's budget!

- Prepared foods • Natural and organic foods
- School supplies • Personal care needs
- Redbox™ DVD rentals
- Plus the convenience of a full-service pharmacy

Save even more with this special bonus coupon!

Exclusive bonus coupon
Valid Wednesday 9/16 - Saturday 11/28
Stop&Shop
$5 OFF a purchase of $20 or more.
Coupon must be presented at time of purchase. Limit one coupon per customer per order. This coupon cannot be doubled, tripled or combined with any other offer. Offer excludes alcoholic beverages, tobacco products, gift cards, milk, Kitty Kibbles, specialty pharmacy items, postage stamps, prepaid telephone calling cards, Western Union®, money orders, Metro passes and any other purchases prohibited by law. Coupon not redeemable at Peapod® by Stop & Shop.
2 100000 143818

Minutemen move up FCS Coaches poll after 2 victories

FOOTBALL from page 10

"[R]hythm then we started in," Havens said. "Hopefully we can keep it rolling through the season."

However, the progress being made does not mean Havens can't improve further, and he knows it.

"I think just sharpening my decision making," Havens said of where he can make the biggest improvement. "I feel like I make good decisions, I could just make them a little bit quicker."

Even UMass coach Kevin Morris knows his quarterback can always improve, something he often stresses, and would not let Havens forget that. But at the same time, Morris knows a lot of the improvements will come with time.

"Kyle has not got to have those bad plays, a play where he misses the read or just doesn't figure out where to go with the ball at the right time," Morris said. "We have just got to get better with those things and he can certainly improve there. A lot of it is just reps and now he's getting more game reps and he'll continue to improve.

"He's getting better week-to-week, understanding the system better, staying true to his reads and getting the ball to the right guy at the right time is what we have got to continue to work on and we showed some good results last week, but there is still a lot of room for improvement."

MOVING ON UP

Not only did the victory over URI (1-1, 0-1 CAA) give Havens some recognition, it also gave some to the team as they moved up two spots in both the Sports Network poll and the FCS Coaches poll to No. 15. The ranking is the highest of the season for the Minutemen, who had been No. 17 for the first three weeks of the season in the Sports Network poll and ranked 18th in the FCS Coaches poll for the first two weeks.

UMass' win coupled with then-No. 20 Maine's loss to Albany – who the Minutemen defeated 44-7 in Week 2 – and losses by Wofford and Cal Poly propelled UMass to its highest rankings since late last season.

But for the Minutemen, the rankings mean little to the team, and according to Morris, are just a bunch of opinions that do nothing to help them reach their goals.

"It makes no difference to where we end up and it is all about winning the conference and the ranking has nothing to do with anything in terms of post-season or anything else," Morris said. "It is just an opinion poll, and people have opinions. It's good because it gets people talking about Division I-AA football, but it makes no impact on us."

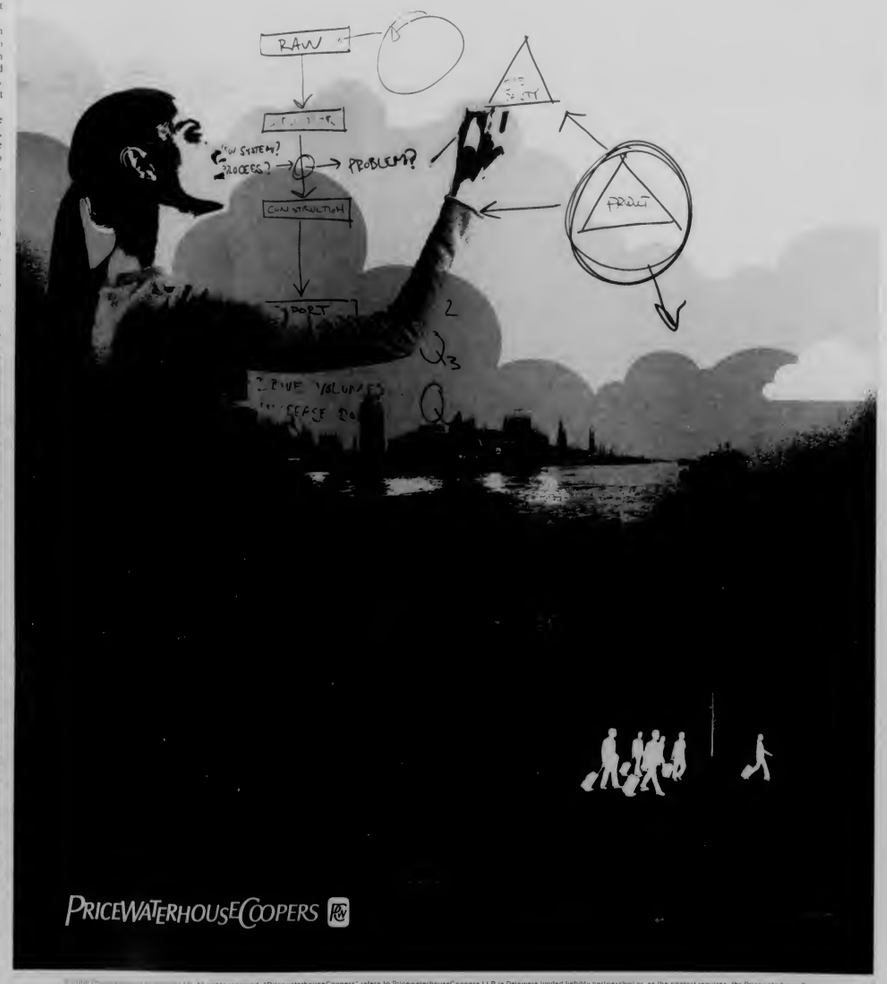
Even for Havens, the rankings do nothing for the team's goal of winning games now, and he relishes being lower in the rankings.

"I actually didn't know that we had moved up," Havens said prior to Tuesday's practice. "We pay attention and we look obviously, but we try not to let that bug you. We just want to win games.

"At the same time, it is kind of nice being the underdog so no one really expects much from us, so when we go on to shock everyone it's that much better."

RED ZONE ALERT

After two victories with a combined score of 74-17, it is hard to find much wrong with UMass this early in the season. But Morris constantly stresses that there is always room for improvement, and one of those areas is red zone scoring.



To this point in the season, the Minutemen have scored on 9-of-11 trips into the red zone, and seven of the nine scores came by touchdown.

"I think we've missed two opportunities and they were both turnovers at this point so we need to obviously improve on that," Morris said. "We need to just keep scoring touchdowns because we kicked three field goals in the second half on Saturday, that game could have been a much more lopsided-looking game if we had scored touchdowns instead of field goals, so that is going to be an emphasis this week."

Jeffrey R Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com

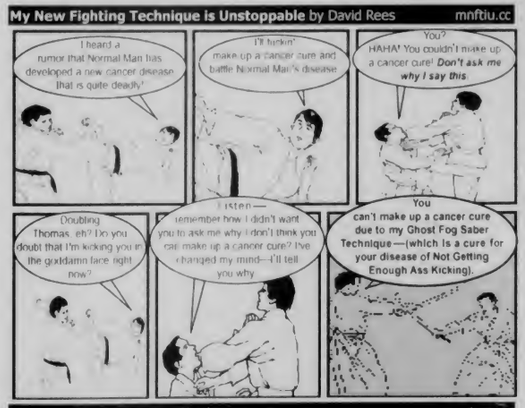
Quarterback Kyle Havens earned CAA Player of the Week honors after throwing for 300 yards and a near-perfect first half. But UMass coach Kevin Morris knows there is still room for improvement.

COMICS

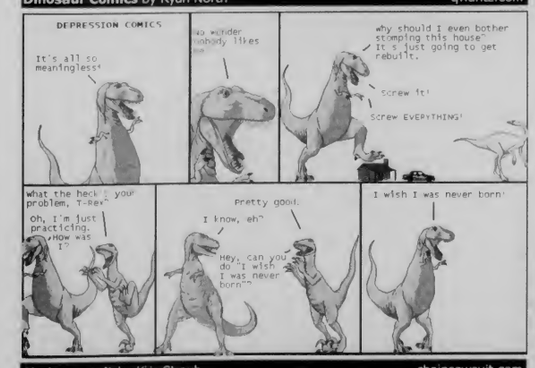
If Harry Potter's so magical, why can't he cure his own eyesight and get laid? A teenage lad shouldn't need a broomstick to cling on to.

– Frankie Boyle

Labrat by Richard Martelly



Wondermark by David Malki! wondermark.com



Mr. Gnu by Travis Dandro travisdandro.com

My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees mnftiu.cc

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North qwantz.com

Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub chainsawsuit.com

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!

Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.

E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com

Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

HOROSCOPES

aquarius JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Beware! The Knights who say "Ni" have set up camp in Orchard Hill.

pisces FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Your skill at checkers is not exactly worthy of an epic poem.

aries MAR. 21-APR. 19
Despite the fact that you are devoid of intelligenc, Transformers 2 is still not a good film.

taurus APR. 20-MAY 20
Red Foreman is not a fictional character now that he's leaving a trail of beer cans and foot-impressed asses.

gemini MAY 21-JUN. 21
Be more suave: Wink at every person you see.

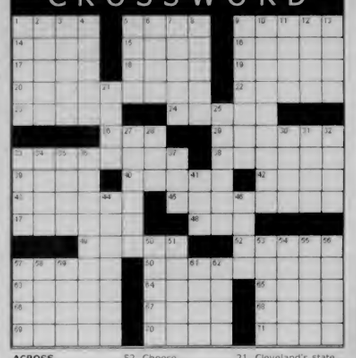
cancer JUN. 22-JUL. 22
If chickens had fingers, would you still eat them?

leo JUL. 23-AUG. 22
If anyone asks, that barrel of blunts is sitting there for aesthetic purposes.

virgo AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Since pigs are physically close to humans then throwing pig skin means...*
*We take no responsibility for your sick mind. -Editor

libra SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
You're much more attractive now that you're wearing MC Hammer pants.

scorpio OCT. 23-NOV. 21
A severe banjo beating is no way to settle a dispute.



sagittarius NOV. 22-DEC. 21
There are some moments in your life that even Morgan Freeman would not care to narrate.

capricorn DEC. 22-JAN. 19
Henceforth, each weekend that a Will Smith movie is being released shall be known as a "Big Willie Weekend."

SUDOKU

				2	4	3
	9			8				2
		8	6		3
9	3	6			2
8								5
	7	5	3				2
4	6			3		5		9
	5			9
					7

CROSSWORD

ACROSS
1. Travelled on a horse
5. Moved fast
9. Smidgen
14. Culminating point
15. Protagonist
16. Pass-the-baton race
17. A digestive juice
18. Goddess of discord (Greek mythology)
19. Make smile
20. Acquaint
22. 10 cent coins
23. The end of life
24. Acknowledge
26. Anagram of "Aid"
29. Necessitate
33. An idiomatic term for being in disfavor
38. Order of business
39. Mélange
40. S S S S
42. Cozy corner
43. Bavarian or Prussian
45. Blabbermouth
47. Dignified and somber
48. Caustic
49. Trap
52. Choose
57. Marble
60. Can't be seen
63. Periods of discounted prices
64. Chief Norse god
65. Diving bird
66. Skirt fold
67. A hard smooth ivory colored dentine
68. "Oh, my!"
69. Poorly kept
70. Notices
71. A birthday dessert

DOWN
1. Fanatical
2. Express a thought
3. Triangular formation
4. Bring to bear
5. Small storage structure
6. South American country
7. Health
8. Drugged
9. Exchanging
10. Abating at intervals
11. Astringent
12. Receptacle
13. Visual organs
21. Cleveland's state
25. Paltry
27. Chaperone
28. Donkey
30. Dwarf buffalo
31. False god
32. Body of water
33. Canines
34. Margarine
35. Young woman
36. Estate
37. Estimate (abbrev.)
41. Moray
44. Pardon
46. Bottom of the barrel
50. Violent disturbances
51. Endow
53. Pale purple
54. Hemorrhagic fever
55. A loose outer garment
56. Anxious
57. Vipers
58. Battering wind
59. Away from the wind
61. A type of clamp
62. Writing fluids

CLASSIFIEDS

EMPLOYMENT

Part-time personal care attendant. About 10-12 hours/week. Flexible Hours Please Call Patrick (413)-275-7928

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162

EMPLOYMENT

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

SPRING BREAK 2010

Spring Break 2010 sell trips, earn cash, and go free! Call for group discounts. Best prices guranteed! Info/reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 2009 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

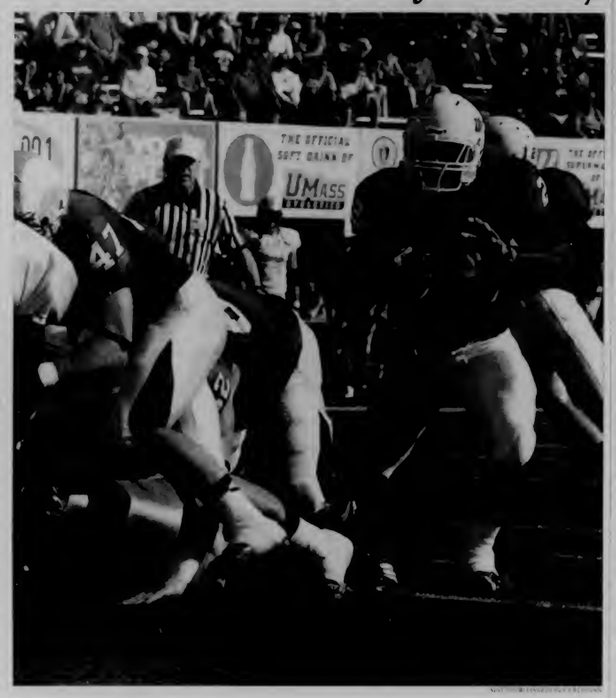
Offense makes Haven's job easy

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

After throwing for his first 300-yard game in a Massachusetts football uniform, quarterback Kyle Havens earned the Colonial Athletic Association Offensive Player of the Week on Monday.

The junior led the Minutemen (2-1, 1-0 CAA) to a 30-10 victory over Rhode Island with 329 yards on 22-of-30 passing, including two touchdowns and one interception. The first half against Rhode Island is where Havens was most impressive, as he went 15-of-17 for 206 yards and threw both of his touchdowns, lifting UMass to a 21-0 lead at halftime.

Havens may have put up the numbers to warrant the honor, but to him the honor is more for the entire offense.



"It feels good. It shows that the hard work is paying off, but it wasn't just me doing that on my own," Havens said of the honor. "I have a whole offense that has to operate correctly for me to be able to do my job, so I kind of needed everyone to help me get that."

The stat that stands out the most and exemplifies the quarterback's point that he could not have done what he did without the offense around him, is how the team went seven-for-seven on third-down conversions in the first half. Five of the seven conversions came from Havens' arm, while the other two came with the ball in tailback Tony Nelson's hands.

Since his first game as a Minuteman, Havens continues to progress, and with that, so has UMass' offense.

"I feel like it has been really good, the offense just in general is progressing really well and we're getting into a much bet-

See FOOTBALL on page 8

Running back Tony Nelson helped make quarterback Kyle Haven's job easier on the ground. Nelson converted two of UMass' seven third-down conversions in its 30-10 win over Rhode Island.

UMass needs Piekos in goal this weekend

Massachusetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch still doesn't know who his starting goalkeeper will be for the rest of the season. But after the win over Northeastern, junior Chris Piekos showed that he clearly deserves that honor and the competition should close immediately.

His numbers are far better than the other candidate, Shane Curran-Hays, in every aspect, and he is showing consistency with two shut-outs in three games.

If the first five games are any indicator for the offense, goals aren't going to come regularly this season. UMass is having its worst offensive start (three goals) since 1998 when it went 4-12-2.

That makes Piekos' 0.29 goals-against average (first in the Atlantic 10) that much more important to the Minutemen's hopes of making the tournament.

While numbers don't tell the whole story, it's hard to argue against what Piekos has done on the field. He is currently in a six-way tie for shut-outs, but almost everyone else he's tied with has played twice as many games as Piekos.

Adam Miller

He also leads the league in save percentage (.947), with an average of six saves per game (second in the A-10).

That's not to say Curran-Hays doesn't have a case for winning the job.

He is more comfortable controlling the defense and is more aggressive, especially on crosses.

He also had several offers to start for a Division I soccer team, but instead, chose to play for Koch's team with the hopes of beating out alumni Zack Simmons for the goalkeeping job.

Simmons won and Curran-Hays sat on the bench for two years without a complaint. This season should've been his year, but a summer knee injury opened the job up to Piekos, so Koch is definitely right to say that Curran-Hays deserves his shot, especially now that he's healthy.

But at some point there comes a time when getting it right becomes more important than being fair. Unlike last year, the Minutemen aren't playing a schedule that will largely help their hopes of an at-large bid to the NCAA Tournament, so the non-conference schedule isn't that significant.

However, there are only three more games until the start of the A-10 schedule. Unless Koch has already made up his mind, Curran-Hays will get what could be his last shot at starting against Siena on Sept. 26.

If he manages to impress Koch enough to win the starting job in that game, then at least he will have three straight starts to help him adjust to being the starter before UMass opens up the conference schedule against Xavier and Dayton.

If Koch does go with Piekos, he'll have 10 days of being out of the lineup before he sees action again. The Minutemen will only have two games with their keeper before being thrust into the hectic A-10 scheduling.

Closing the competition before the Siena game would essentially give him four straight starts dating back to the win over Northeastern, which would give Piekos time to adjust controlling the defense, which Koch believes Curran-Hays is better at anyway.

That competition should've been over by opening day, but the canceled exhibition game against Connecticut hurt the Minutemen by preventing Curran-Hays from starting until Sept. 5 against Hartford.

With the results inconclusive, Koch gave both of his candidates another shot in Vermont against the Catamounts and New Hampshire. Both games ended in a tie, but Curran-Hays gave up his third goal of the season against Vermont in his second game while Piekos had a shut-out.

It might be cliché to use the saying, "if it ain't broke, don't fix it," but when it comes down to who gives the Minutemen the best shot of clinching the A-10 title, it's generally better to go with the one who has kept opponents out of the net.

Adam Miller can be reached at amiller@dailycollegian.com.

MATTHEW HARRISON/COLLEGIAN

Junior Chris Piekos wasn't expecting much playing time this season, but that might change soon.

St. Joe's wins first match of season

Junior Kellie Walter tries to move past a defender earlier this season. On Sept. 19, she scored her first goal against Missouri State during a tournament in Evanston, Ill.

By Daniel Herberholz
Collegian Correspondent

The first goal of Kellie Walter's season led to the first win of the season for Saint Joseph's.

The junior scored with one minute, 41 seconds left in the second overtime of the night to help the Hawks capture their first victory of the season over Missouri State. The game, on Sept. 19, took place at Northwestern's tournament in Evanston, Ill.

A scoreless first extra period put the game into double overtime, and 90 seconds in St. Joseph's (1-5) earned a penalty corner opportunity. Senior Anne Schreuders blasted a shot from the top of the arc, but it bounced off the top post. Walter, however, grabbed the quick rebound to help the Hawks to their first win of the season.

A-10 Field Hockey

After an opening goal by each team, a 27th minute goal by forward Melissa Lantz put Missouri State (2-6) up 2-1. However, within two minutes, the Hawks responded with two goals to take a 3-2 lead.

The first came from sophomore Ellen Rowe on a loose ball in front of the net, followed 48 seconds later by a give-and-go from forward Kasey Daly to Hannah Rogers.

With four seconds left before halftime Missouri State senior Kristen Pettey tied the game on a deflection. She encored that shot with another goal off a rebound to open the second half. However, this was the Tigers' last score.

Missouri State goalie Steph Anderson finished with 19 saves, including a streak of five within three minutes, but ended her streak by misdirecting her dive at Schreuders' shot. The senior's first goal of the night came with 11:11 left in the game. Schreuders (3.86 shots per game), leads the league in shots per game and attempted nine shots on the night.

On the night of firsts, sophomore goalie Liz Messaros came in to relieve Kelly Sisgnick, logging three saves in 38 minutes to earn her first win.

Saint Joseph's next game is at Saint Francis University on Sept. 26.

Two Hawks eat the Spiders

Richmond didn't have much luck against the Hawks last weekend.

The Spiders (3-4) followed a dominating 7-0 victory over Monmouth with a 5-1 loss to the Miami (Ohio).

A day after allowing one shot-on-goal at

See A-10 FIELD HOCKEY on page 7

Offense, Deacons too much for Elon

Skinner throws for 289 yards, Phoenix plummets two spots

By Neil Carroll
Collegian Correspondent

The Elon football team could not withstand a solid performance from quarterback Riley Skinner and the Wake Forest offense, losing 35-7 at Wake Forest last Saturday night.

The game paired then 11th-ranked Elon against a Bowl Championship Subdivision team for only the second time in school history, and wound up giving the Phoenix its first loss of the season.

Skinner, the Demon Deacon quarterback, threw for 289 yards and three passing touchdowns – both career highs – while completing 14-of-20 passes and threw one interception. In the third quarter, Skinner hit wide receiver Marshall Williams for an 80-yard touchdown, making the score 35-0.

Elon finally put points on the scoreboard with seven minutes, 58 seconds remaining in the game with a 13-yard catch by Terrell Hudgins from quarterback Scott Riddle. The Phoenix offense depended heavily upon Riddle, as he threw the ball 43 times completing 23 of the throws, tallying 195 yards and one touchdown.

The Phoenix were ranked 11th in the FCS last week and the loss to Wake Forest dropped them down to 13th.

Crusaders defeat Harvard

No. 21 Holy Cross improved to 3-0 on Saturday through strong play from quarterback Dom Randolph, as the senior threw for 293 yards and two touchdowns in a 27-20 victory over the Harvard Crimson.

Randolph completed 25-of-39 passes in the game and rushed seven times for 42 yards with a one-yard rushing touchdown in the second quarter. It was also his touchdown pass to freshman receiver Gerald Mistretta with 11:03 left in the fourth quarter that lengthened the Crusader lead to 14 points, and put the game out of reach for Harvard.

In what was their season opener, the Crimson scored first with a five-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Collier Winters to Gino Gordon in the first quarter. After that, Harvard failed to move the ball successfully, punting on its next three possessions before turning the ball over on downs while time expired in the first half.

Holy Cross moved up the FCS Top-25 rankings from 23rd to 21st this week with the win over in-state rival, Harvard. With the loss, Harvard – which was previously ranked 25th – dropped out of the Top 25.

Richmond routs Hofstra

Richmond defensive end Nicholas Battle shined in the Spider's 47-0 rout of the Hofstra Pride at UR Stadium in Richmond on Saturday. The Sports Network named Battle the National Defensive Player of the Week after he finished the game with five tackles, one sack, two forced fumbles and one fumble recovery.

As a unit, the Richmond defense held Hofstra to less than 200 yards of total offense and forced fumbles on four out of its first drives on the field. At halftime, the No. 1 ranked Spiders (3-0, 2-0 Colonial Athletic Association) had a 31-0 advantage.

Although Richmond quarterback Eric Ward was held to 165 yards passing on 12-of-16 attempts, he hit four of his receivers for touchdowns throughout the game. Spiders tailback Justin Forte lead their rushing attack with 74 yards on 12 carries.

Hofstra quarterback Cory Christopher completed 17-of-26 passes for 172 yards, but had little help from his running game. The Pride did not have a player rush for more than 25 yards in the game.

With the loss, Hofstra drops to 2-1 overall and 0-1 in conference play.

Neil Carroll can be reached at nacarrol@student.umass.edu

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY

COLLEGIAN

HIGH: 78 LOW: 47 www.DailyCollegian.com THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 2009

Faculty Senate votes to change Gen Eds

Required classes fall to 10, each carries 4 credits

By Patrick Giddings
Collegian Staff

Starting next fall, general education classes at UMass are going to get a little harder. The University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate voted during their meeting last Thursday to change the general education requirements for incoming freshmen next fall.

The required number of general education classes will drop from 13 to 10, while their value increases from three to four credits. There will also be a new upper-level, integrative general education class requirement, according to information on the Senate's website.

The new requirements will cut one biological or physical science class, one literature or arts class, and one additional social world class. Writing and math requirements will remain unchanged.

In order to make up for this, the remaining required classes will add additional labs, discussion groups, or assignments in order to qualify for an additional credit, according to a Senate report. The proposed changes are being implemented sooner than previously expected because they will allow the University to serve the same number of students while offering fewer classes, thereby compensating for little or no hiring during difficult financial times.

Senate Secretary Ernest May said the move betters UMass' undergraduate program.

"The most important thing is that this is an improvement in our undergraduate curriculum, not a budget saving measure," said Ernest May, Senate Secretary. "You'll be taking a smaller number of more intense courses. It should make your life as a student more productive, more gratifying perhaps."

According to May, the extra credit will not increase actual class time, but rather will be earned through other forms of additional work.

"It could mean applying lessons to real world problems, increasing engagement with material," said May. "It's to be a deeper experience."

The recommended changes come from a special General Education Task Force (GETF) assigned to "make recommendations for improving general education at UMass Amherst," according to a Senate report.

Provost Charlena Seymour and the faculty Senate created the GETF in 2007, bringing together a joint force of faculty, administrators, and graduate students. They discovered that many students and faculty members lacked understanding of the value of the general education requirements. After reviewing and evaluating courses, surveys, and an Association of American Colleges and Universities report, the GETF determined that this would be the best course of action.

When asked, students on campus had mixed opinions about the changes.

Carly Davis, a sophomore majoring in Communications, feels the changes won't necessarily be a good thing.

"I think that you should take the same amount of Gen Eds," said Davis. "The purpose of Gen Eds is to diversify, so students can dabble in a little of everything. A lot of people come to UMass undeclared. These classes are a chance for them to experience what UMass has to offer."

Robert S. Feldman, Dean of the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences, thinks it will be worth this decreased variety.

"I think in the long run the greater depth of thinking that's going to go into the courses, and the ability to concentrate more fully outweighs the danger of taking fewer courses," he said. "It's a good trade off."

Other students were more positive about the new requirements. "I think 10 [classes] is better than 13," said junior political science major Wilhemina Agbemakplido. "Also, integrating Gen Eds into upper level classes could be a good idea. Kill two birds with one stone. On the other hand, four-credit courses might be more difficult, so that might be bad."

Most of the faculty seems to be in support of the move, according to May. Professors have a first deadline of October 15 to come up with proposals of how to add the extra credit hour, in order to get material into the catalogue and spire in time for next year.

In some cases, courses already contain enough material to warrant the extra credit.

"Some classes require more work than others," said Professor Donald Tomaskovic-Devey, Sociology Department Chair, when asked what kinds of changes are being discussed. "For the courses that already require a great deal of reading and writing, our sense is that they probably are equivalent to four credit courses already. The issue really is, for the other courses, what additional work would bring them up to that level. Probably there would be some increase in reading and writing, so it would be in fact more depth in the course."

Some students, however, doubt that the increased depth will be of much value. Senior Communications major Joseph Johnson likes the idea of reduc-

See GEN-EDS on page 3

Gen Ed Requirements Disappearing:

- Third BS or PS class (3 credits)
- One of the two AL/AT class (3 credits)
- Other "Social World" class (3 credits)

New Gen Ed Requirements:

- One Integrative Experience class (3 credits)
- All five BS, PS, AL/AT, HS, SB Gen Ed classes will now be 4 credits

BS - Biological Science	AT - Art Requirement
PS - Physical Science	HS - History Requirement
AL - Literature Requirement	SB - Social Behavioral

Reactions mixed to SAFRA bill

Students uncertain of benefits of student aid reform act

By Jessica Jankowski
Collegian Staff

The House of Representatives passed the Student Aid Fiscal Responsibility Act (SAFRA) on September 18, leaving the bill's fate now in the hands of the Senate, until they vote on their own version later this month.

The purpose of the bill is to help students better afford college and increase the number of students who graduate. The bill will bring an end to private banks lending money through the Family Federal Education Loan Program, and use only some of those savings for higher education.

The bill will also include the provision of $40 billion dollars over a 10 year period which would increase the Pell Grant, a grant sponsored by the Department of Education designed primarily to award financial aid to low-income students, to $5,550 from $4,050, for the maximum grant.

In addition, $10 billion will be given to students attending community college. The purpose of this is to support President Barack Obama's American Graduation Initiative to produce five million more two-year college graduates by 2020.

In response to this portion of the bill, students had very different opinions.

Freshman Elise Conde, who is undeclared, believes that bolstering community colleges is an important step in making college affordable.

"Giving money to community colleges is extremely helpful since there are thousands of people who cannot afford it," said Conde.

Kristi Mancini, a freshman majoring in political science agreed with Conde. "It is a great idea because many students have to drop out of school early because of money issues. Also, increasing the number of graduates may help the economy as well, since many brilliant minds will now have a degree in their hand."

Freshman political science major David Bettencourt feels differently.

"I think $40 billion dollars isn't a lot of money when you consider the number of students attending college now and those who will be attending later," said Bettencourt.

The bill will also include spending eight billion dollars over a 10 year period to improve early childhood education.

The bill includes spending $4.1 billion dollars to modernize and repair school and college facilities including those damaged in Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Freshman political science major Katie Duggan said that repairing campuses is something that should have been taken care of in the past.

"Repairing the schools is a great idea, especially those that were affected by Hurricane Katrina, this is something Bush should have funded soon after the hurricane hit," she said.

The last two points included in the bill are making the interest rates variable in 2012, when the rate goes up to 6.8 percent on the federal student loan program, and simplifying the federal financial aid form.

UMass student Jelisa Difon speaks on higher education reform with Washington figures including House Speaker Nancy Pelosi last week.

Freshman political science major Chris Mansi did not approve the interest rate change.

"I do not care for variable interest," he said. "I would rather have a locked interest rate, because if the interest rate unexpectedly rose higher than someone can afford to pay off, it may cause them to default on their loans.

"If this was to occur, it would only further hurt the economy when we can't take that much more injury at this point in time. I think we need to focus more on regulating the banking system instead."

In regard to the federal aid form being simplified, everyone agreed that it is a great idea, as they all disliked the process of filling out the form this past year.

Overall, students tended to believe there are more pros than cons to this bill.

Freshman Adam Karp, who is majoring in social thought and political economy said, "the bill is great, but I feel like it lacks the information we all want to hear, 'How much will the average student be helped by this bill?'"

Jessica Jankowski is a Collegian staff member and can be reached at jjankows@student.umass.edu.

Calming trial on Lincoln and Sunset ends

A two week calming trial, or an attempt to lessen traffic in the neighborhoods around Southwest and the center of campus, culminated Wednesday, with the town of Amherst recording traffic data to determine the trial's efficacy.

The trial began September, 8, and saw cement barriers put up obstructing half of Lincoln and Sunset Avenues, making it impossible to enter the streets from Fearing St., a main thoroughfare through Southwest. The barriers close half of each lane and force people coming from either side of Lincoln or Sunset to turn onto Fearing, as well.

On September 15, McClure Street and Sunset Court were entirely closed to through traffic.

Because Fearing St. was diverting traffic back to Massachusetts Avenue, down to University Drive, and east back towards Amherst Center, UMass Police were set to be monitoring the affected roadways carefully.

"We're prepared for additional traffic and will have officers direct traffic, if necessary," Deputy Chief Patrick Archibald said in a release.

To comment on the traffic diversion, e-mail publicworks@amherstma.gov and put "traffic calming comments" in the subject heading.

Collegian Staff

COURTESY - MASSACHUSETTS MEDIA RELATIONS OFFICE

Portions of Sunset and Lincoln Avenues could only be accessed by local traffic, as the Fearing Street entrances were blocked during a traffic calming trial.

Arts&Living

2009 Emmys a glorified popularity contest

Mad Men came away big winners from this Sunday's Sixty-first Emmy awards show, and host Neil Patrick Harris charmed audiences with his song and dance routine.

SEE PAGE 5

Sports

Minutemen take on Stony Brook

The Massachusetts football team hopes to make it two in a row when they take on Stony Brook Saturday at 6:00 p.m. at McGuirk Stadium.

SEE PAGE 10

Editorial&Opinion

A major roadblock

With the town of Amherst closing two roads that lead to campus, Nick Milano has noticed that UMass often gets bad wrap in Amherst.

SEE PAGE 4

DailyCollegian.com

Cirque de Soleil

See Cirque De Soleil's Alegria show, which played at the Mullins Center last weekend, through the lens of Daily Collegian photographer Matthew Harrison.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIX
ISSUE 13

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF: William McGuinness
MANAGING EDITOR: S.P. Sullivan
BUSINESS MANAGER: Daniel Jette
PRODUCTION MANAGER: Michael Sirkin
NIGHT SUPERVISOR: Kirsten Swenson
ADVERTISING MANAGER: Michael Tortorici
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION: Max Dentzer
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR: Shanna Murphy
COPY EDITOR: Anne Kerblikas
EDITORIAL EDITOR: Nick O'Malley
NEWS EDITOR: Nick Bush
SPORTS EDITOR: Jeffrey R. Barnard
WEB EDITOR: Brian Wood
PHOTO EDITOR: Matthew Harrison
IT MANAGER: Victor Jacek
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER: Marc Zolotnitsky
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING: Nicole Jacinto
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS: Linda Wallack
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER: Norman Provost
CLASSIFIED MANAGER: Kaneem Tamillo
ASST. ARTS & LIVING: Justin Gagnon
ASST. ARTS & LIVING: Elyse Horowitz
ASST. ARTS & LIVING: Cal Scannell
ASSISTANT COPY: Andrew Wirtz
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL: Michael Phillis
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL: Hannah Nelson
ASSISTANT NEWS: Samuel Butterfield
ASSISTANT NEWS: Alyssa Creamer
ASSISTANT NEWS: Jesse Hoshion
ASSISTANT SPORTS: David Bruich
ASSISTANT SPORTS: Mike Gillenwater
ASSISTANT SPORTS: Adam Miller
ASSISTANT PHOTO: Maxwell Sparr
ASSISTANT PHOTO: Samantha Webber
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA: Sara Cash
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA: Chris Shores

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS A NONPROFIT, STUDENT-RUN NEWSPAPER. THE OPINIONS EXPRESSED IN THE COLLEGIAN ARE THOSE OF THE EDITORIAL BOARD OR AUTHOR AND DO NOT NECESSARILY REFLECT THE OPINIONS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST. THE COLLEGIAN IS A MEMBER OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS. SUBSCRIPTIONS ARE $100 PER SEMESTER.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nick Bush

COPY EDITOR
Chelsea Dugan

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Guanno

Obama calls for cooperation at U.N.

In first speech at U.N., President asks for collaboration in facing world issues

BY WARREN P. STROBEL
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

UNITED NATIONS – President Barack Obama bluntly prodded world leaders Wednesday to join the U.S. in solving pressing global problems, challenging them to move beyond "an almost reflexive anti-Americanism which, too often, has served as an excuse for collective inaction."

Obama, making his inaugural address to the U.N. General Assembly, told fellow leaders in so many words that he has changed the tone and substance of U.S. security policies he inherited from President George W. Bush, and it is time for them to reciprocate.

"Make no mistake. This cannot be solely America's endeavor. Those who used to characterize America for acting alone in the world cannot now stand by and wait for America to solve the world's problems alone," Obama said.

Iran and North Korea, he said, "must be held accountable" if they continue nuclear programs outside international inspection. Israel, the Palestinians and the Arab States "must decide whether we are serious about peace or whether we will only lend it lip service." And developed and developing nations together bear responsibility for stopping global climate change, he said.

Obama's remarks betrayed frustration, and perhaps some surprise, that after eight months in office in which he's overturned much of the Bush legacy and offered engagement to friends and enemies alike, he's won few concrete benefits in return.

His Middle East peace initiative is stuck in low gear. Europeans and others are declining to offer more troops for the war in Afghanistan, and it remains unclear at best whether powers such as China and Russia will join in imposing harsher sanctions on Iran if negotiations that begin Oct. 1 fail.

Obama met later Wednesday with Russian President Dmitry Medvedev, in a session that senior U.S. officials said focused almost entirely on strategy toward Iran.

Afterward, Medvedev appeared to soften Russia's long-standing opposition to new sanctions on Iran if it fails to halt enrichment of uranium that could be used for nuclear weapons. "Sanctions rarely lead to productive results but in some cases are inevitable," the Russian leader said.

Obama's top aide on Russia, Michael McFaul, said that Washington and Moscow now agree on a joint strategy toward Iran. But it remains to be seen whether Russia will actually endorse tougher measures if the time comes.

In his U.N. speech, Obama repeated a familiar refrain for U.S. presidents who make the annual pilgrimage to its Turtle Bay headquarters. The world body should live up to its promise, he said.

"The United Nations can either be a place where we bicker about outdated grievances or forge common ground, a place where we focus on what drives us apart or what brings us together, a place where we indulge tyranny or a source of moral authority," he said.

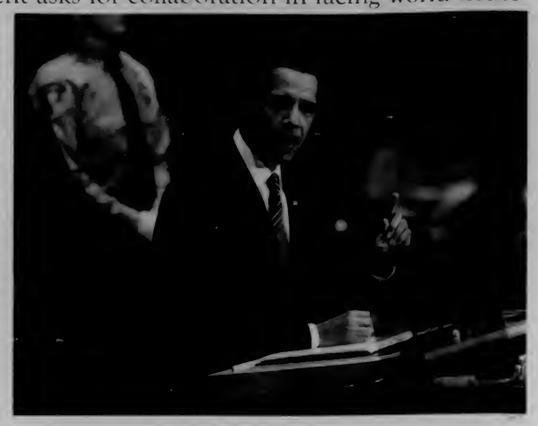
It took only minutes for Obama's hopes to be dashed.

Libyan leader Muammar Gadhafi, in the audience for Obama's speech, along with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, took the podium next and delivered a rambling, 96-minute tirade. In a speech harkening back to the ideological battles of the 1960s and '70s, he denounced the U.N. Security Council, which holds most of the world body's real power, and trashed U.S. policies from the 1983 Grenada invasion to the current war in Afghanistan.

He praised Obama, however, calling him "our son," because of his African roots, and suggesting he should be permanent president of the United States.

Obama and the senior members of his delegation had left the General Assembly hall before Gadhafi began speaking.

Obama himself was greeted politely by fellow leaders, who seemed well aware of the U.S. president's international star power and were eager to hear him out.



He received mild, modest applause when he criticized Israel's settlements in the West Bank. While the U.S. stands by Israel, "America does not accept the legitimacy of continued Israeli settlements," Obama said.

White House aides, who are under increasing pressure to show the dividends of Obama's soft-glove foreign policy, said that his moves for many fronts have laid the groundwork for real change.

Obama didn't take office thinking "that years of these challenges would be solved away in eight months," White House press secretary Robert Gibbs said.

However, Obama felt the need to remind the world leaders, foreign ministers, diplomats and delegates of how much he'd altered in U.S. policies since taking office.

He ticked off a long list of changes he's ordered, a ban on extreme interrogation techniques that many consider torture, closing the Guantanamo Bay prison, withdrawing from Iraq, seeking deeper cuts in U.S. and Russian nuclear arsenals, fully paying the U.S. tab to the U.N., and rejoining the U.N. Human Rights Council.

President Barack Obama gave his first speech ever before the United Nations Wednesday, calling for cooperation in confronting world issues like nuclear proliferation and global warming.

Colonel Muammar Gadhafi, Libya's leader, spoke before the U.N. Wednesday, accusing the U.S. of violations and calling for investigations into conspiracies.

Public Health & Health Sciences Career & Internship Fair

Thinking about a career in public health and health sciences?

Want an internship or a community service project?

Wondering what kind of jobs you could get with a degree in public health and health sciences?

Learn about careers and internships in public health and network with public health professionals. Over 25 health organizations from Western Massachusetts attending!

For: Undergraduate and graduate students
Where: UMass Campus Center Auditorium
When: Thursday September 24, 2009
Time: 10:00am - 2:00pm
Refreshments and light lunch will be served.
Special performance by the Not Ready for Bedtime Players.

FREE and Open to the Public.
Come for any or all of the time.

Please contact risa@schoolph.umass.edu or call 545-2529 for more information.

SPHS School of Public Health and Health Sciences

Funding was provided by a cooperative agreement between the Association of Schools of Public Health and the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention

UMASS AMHERST

Camping out for a cure at the Campus Center

Dan Levine, Trevor Bullard, Alex Holden and Christopher Weather (left-to-right) of Sigma Phi Epsilon camp outside the student union to raise monies for the American Cancer Society during their annual Campus Campout for a cure.

email Nick Bush at news@dailycollegian.com

LIQUORS 44
$22.99 $24.99 $34.99 $27.99 $17.99
$23.99 $35.99 $36.99 $28.99 $17.99
$28.99 $16.99 $19.99 $26.99 $30.99
$15.99 $29.99
LOWEST PRICED KEGS IN THE VALLEY
BUDWEISER LIGHT 1/2 KEGS $54.99
KEYSTONE LIGHT 1/2 KEGS $54.99
NATURAL LIGHT 1/2 KEGS $50.99
DEPOSIT REQUIRED
Please visit us at www.liquors44.com
DON'T DRINK & DRIVE

Geithner defends protection plan

Treasury Secretary attacked for plan to create Consumer Financial Protection Agency

BY RONALD D. OROL
MARKETWATCH

WASHINGTON – Treasury Secretary Timothy Geithner on Wednesday defended his financial reform proposals, including a measure that would create a new Consumer Financial Protection Agency that he said needs to both supervise banks as well as write rules for mortgages and credit cards.

"There is no reason to believe that consumer protection would not be done better if you have clear accountability for people doing consumer protection oversight in a separate agency," Geithner said to lawmakers at the House Financial Services Committee.

The new agency would take consumer protection supervision and enforcement responsibility away from the Federal Reserve and other bank regulators. It would give a new agency rule-writing, supervisory and enforcement authority, a combination that Geithner said would help make sure the agency isn't "ill-informed and dominated by agencies with enforcement power."

Critics, including Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke, have raised concerns with the proposed agency, arguing that it would result in lost synergy that exist today between safety and soundness supervisors, those at the central bank that seek to make sure a bank is adequately capitalized, and consumer protection officials at the central bank.

House Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank, D-Mass., defended Geithner's desire to create a CFPA.

"I am struck by the regulators' new found interest in consumer protection," Frank said. "I do not remember the Federal Reserve or any bank regulator ever volunteering anything on consumer protection. Their record on consumer protection is abysmal. I think with the possibility of absence the heart grows fonder."

However, Frank also released more details about his legislation to create such an agency that removes a previous measure requiring that banks and other lenders offer government designated "plain vanilla" 30-year mortgage products to borrowers before they are offered other specialized products.

The new Frank proposal also requires coordinated exams of banks by the CFPA and safety and soundness supervisors at bank regulators including the Fed.

Geithner said he was supportive of Frank's changes as long as the CFPA still takes steps to improve disclosures about mortgage products to borrowers.

"How many of you read those disclosures and understand what they mean?" asked Geithner.

"By getting disclosure right you enable borrowers to choose the best mortgage for them."

In response to a question from Rep. Maxine Waters, D-Calif., Geithner said consumer should be given the option for opting for a simple 30-year mortgage but they shouldn't be restricted from other mortgage products.

"We have been open to many suggestions that you find a way to have stronger standards for mortgages, without creating a risk that over time you allow borrowers have access to mortgages with lower standards," Geithner said. "There should be a better balance of choice and protection."

U.S. Chamber officials said that while they would prefer there be no CFPA they are hopeful Frank will eliminate his provision that lenders offer plain-vanilla mortgages before being permitted to offer other products. The U.S. Chamber and other critics argue that such an approach would limit consumer choice in finding a mortgage product that works best for them.

The chamber also points out that in some cases small lenders that only offer certain specialized mortgages would have to shut down as a result of such a regulation.

Geithner and lawmakers on the committee debated the usefulness of legislation to create the consumer agency, as well as other financial crisis reform efforts to make sure systemically risky institutions do not cause collateral damage when they become insolvent.

Geithner argued that the legislation should make clear that a large insolvent institution should be dismantled and restructured in such a way that it doesn't wreak havoc to the markets but so that taxpayers aren't assuming the burden.

However, Geithner added that government should not prohibit regulators from saving a large systemic institution in certain troubling circumstances.

"You can't fix this system and make it more stable in the future by abolishing the fire station, when you have a crisis," Geithner said.

Geithner's comments come after FDIC Chairwoman Sheila Bair said last week that regulators should be prohibited from providing open bank assistance to prop up systemically significant institutions.

Bair argues that regulation should make clear that such an institution would be broken up in such a way that it does not cost taxpayers funds but also does not cause systemic damage to its counterparties.

Frank argued that based on legislation he is working on, regulators will prohibit banks from engaging in risky actions.

"Those institutions deemed to be risky will be restrained," Frank said. "There will be restrictions on leverage and such a regulator would have told AIG to stop offering credit default swaps before they became dangerous to the markets. You have an ability to unwind them before they become risky."

Frank added that bank regulators will not identify systemically risky institutions upfront.

"Regulators will know a systemic institution when they see it," he said. "It could be one large institution or a number of smaller institutions all doing the same thing that could be systemically risky."

Should we limit taxpayer injections to $1 trillion?

Rep. Brad Sherman, D-Calif., expressed concern about giving the Treasury Department the unlimited authority to use taxpayer funds to inject into the system in the event of another financial crisis, as Geithner's proposal would permit.

Sherman pointed out that with the $700 billion Troubled Asset Relief Program, which was approved by Congress roughly a year ago in response to the financial crisis, lawmakers imposed oversight panels for use of taxpayer funds to prop up banks.

He added that executives as TARP recipient banks have pay limitations imposed on them, but that the Treasury's proposal does not have similar pay restrictions associated with any future taxpayer payouts to save banks.

To limit such unlimited taxpayer exposure, Sherman said he may consider introducing a measure that would limit government taxpayer infusions to prop up financial institutions to $1 trillion.

Geithner reiterated that he believed that a new resolution authority under consideration in Congress would use bank funds to unwind an insolvent institution so it does not cause collateral damage to the markets.

But he argued that Congress should not restrict Treasury from the authority to use taxpayer funds in the situation of a major crisis.

"Look what happened to the country when we allowed a system to build up and we had no choice to step in and limit damage," Geithner said. "Would you put the country in situation where government cannot get involved to save the system?"

However, Sherman argued that in the event of a crisis, taxpayers or a combination of mid-sized banks and taxpayers would pay to bailout large systemic institutions.

"You can claim that large systemic institutions will cover themselves in this resolution mechanism, but they will be saved either by taxpayers or by midsize banks that inject capital into the system," Sherman said.

Rep. Scott Garrett, R-N.J., pointed out that Senate Banking Committee Chairman Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., has thrown a wrench into the system by proposing to create a mega-regulator that subsumes four smaller bank agencies within it.

Geithner and Frank both envision combining the Office of Thrift Supervision and the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency into one agency, but they both also seek to maintain an independent Federal Reserve and Federal Deposit Insurance Corp.

Treasury Secretary Timothy Geithner has proposed creating a Consumer Financial Protection Agency to supervise banks and write guidelines for credit.

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
POTTER'S AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.pottersauto.com
(One mile North of UMass - as bus route)

Requirements change for Gen Ed courses

GEN-EDS from page 1

ing the number of required courses, thinking it might make it easier for some students to graduate without having to stay extra semesters. But that's the only benefit he sees.

"I don't really think it will affect the amount people will get from it," he said. "They still have their other classes and work and stuff, so they're not going be able to put any more time into them."

May emphasized this is not a one time thing, but rather a process that needs to be engaged. The Senate has formed an Ad Hoc Committee on General Education Revision and Implementation (GERICO) that will be monitoring the process. Ongoing assessments will also determine how well students respond to the new system.

Students are encouraged to submit their comments to senate@senate.umass.edu.

Patrick Giddings is a Collegian staff member and can be reached at dgidding@student.umass.edu.

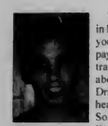
EASTERN MOUNTAIN SPORTS®
Parents Weekend
15% OFF*
Everything in the store
with this ad or valid college ID
September 25-27
Hadley
Mountain Farms Mall
413-584-3554
eastern mountain sports
EASTERN MOUNTAIN SPORTS
SHOP THE WAY YOU WANT online ems.com | phone 888-463-6367 | stores 64 locations

Massachusetts
HARVEST
FOR STUDENTS Week
• Meet John Ash, nationally renowned wine/food educator, restaurateur, and cookbook author of From the EARTH to the TABLE, Wednesday and Thursday 7pm
• Meet local farmers, artisan cheese makers, and bee keepers
• Sample fresh from the garden produce
MONDAY 9/21 · HAMPSHIRE DC
TUESDAY, 9/22 · FRANKLIN DC
WEDNESDAY, 9/23 · BERKSHIRE DC
THURSDAY, 9/24 · WORCESTER DC

September 21–24
All DCs from 5–9 pm

LOCAL HERO
RESTAURANTS & INSTITUTIONS
Ivy
UMASS DINING
UMassAmherst
umassdining.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN



EDITORIAL OPINION

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
- Sir Salman Rushdie

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 2009

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass vs. Amherst

Nick Milano

When driving in Massachusetts, you're likely to pay attention to traffic reports about Storrow Drive if you are heading to the Sox game, the Weston Tolls if you are going home from work, the Leverett Connector, the Zakim Bridge, the Cloverleaf. These are all common enough, but over the past two weeks, it is safe to say that traveling to and from campus trumps all of the above.

With temporary roadblocks up on Lincoln and Sunset Avenues, among others, off-campus students, faculty and staff have all been inconvenienced to placate a few landowners.

There is no doubt that hosting thousands of seasonal students is a struggle for a small town like Amherst. They must have a larger police department to deal with a population that spikes for two four month periods of the year; they must set aside appropriate resources for fire and medical emergencies. The roads must surely take a beating from the amount of traffic that may not be designed to handle.

So, surely Amherst has to contend with major headaches as it hopes to accommodate over 20,000 students. And that's just UMass.

But there are just as surely many benefits. Local businesses from bars and restaurants to delivery pizza places to bookstores all do an incredible amount of business compared to what they might normally see if there was no behemoth of commerce looming just a mile away.

It is also not as if students are constantly under threat either. Ride a PVTA bus and you are bombarded with signs detailing what might happen if you are an underage student found in possession of alcohol. A new sign is up this year though, threatening Amherst and Hadley's new nuisance house and party rules basically promising to put partying students through hell for doing what college students have done for decades.

The town of Amherst takes out enough of its anger and spite on students as it is, often not without merit. As I wrote last week, some drunken scum stole flags off the Amherst American Legion and damaged its flag pole. Incidents like that draw the ire of the entire town, and for good reason.

The town of Amherst takes out enough of its anger and spite on students as it is, often not without merit.

One could only hope that the same happened when two of the major roads leading to campus were shut down to through traffic. But there actually has been widespread disappointment. Amherst's token right wing whack-job Larry Kelley has posted on his website all the public comments made to the town regarding the closures.

There are definitely a few who appreciate the new obstacles, but the vast majority bemoans them.

Granted, the roads in question may not be designated to handle this kind of traffic, but speed ramps could potentially do the trick. It seemed whenever the ramps were put up, they would be gone the next week, then back up for a couple of days like a bipolar jumping from personality to personality. In shutting down these roads, Amherst has now funneled the traffic through just a few roads when coming from Amherst Center.

University Avenue is a possibility, but there is always traffic on Massachusetts Avenue. Further, the UMass Police are constantly standing guard on University Avenue to pull you over, search you and hassle you in anyway possible if you are going 26 mph instead of the prescribed 25 – whether it's 9 a.m. on a Monday or nearing midnight on a Friday.

Taking North Pleasant is just pure torture if you are trying to get to the lots near Mullins Center or the Campus Center Garage. Students walk onto the streets as if they are invincible and UMass police are always patrolling like sharks on the prowl. Jaywalking is certainly just fine. But beware if you do not see a student preparing to cross the street, the police react like you hit the kid.

One other potential route is taking East Pleasant either from North Pleasant or by going around the Wildwood school on Strong Street. This has been the most convenient route lately, but it makes the commute at least five or 10 minutes longer.

The road closures also those who take the bus. This year, I have suffered some of the longest bus rides to and from school and winter has not even hit yet. Even those who are trying to reduce their carbon footprint, use less gas and save money on parking permits get a raw deal. Meanwhile, those in the giant houses along Lincoln and Sunset are rewarded.

Amherst and UMass obviously have to coexist because UMass is going nowhere. Randomly shutting down roads that get students, faculty and staff to campus conveniently and quickly to campus might appease a few property owners, but it is a bone-headed decision made in spite of the economic engine that powers this region. Hopefully, these road closures are not made permanent.

Nick Milano is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at nmilano@student.umass.edu.

The super senior curse

Rachel Dougherty

What's faster than a speeding PVTA bus, older than most TA's, and able to pass a class without actually attending it? I'll give you a hint: It's not Tom Welling.

I'm talking about the super seniors, University of Massachusetts (UMass) students who stay beyond the expected four years needed to graduate. They walk among us, dressed as ordinary undergraduates, and this fall they will impact everything from class sizes to UMass economic growth.

According to the Office of Institutional Research (OIR), approximately 14.7 percent of undergraduates return for a fifth year at UMass, based on enrollment/retention rates for the past ten years. Only 3.2 percent return for a sixth year.

UMass administrators aren't the reincarnation of Snidely Whiplash, twirling their mustaches and plotting how to tie us up while they run off with our money.

Being a super senior does not give you the power to leap the concrete roadblock known as the Fine Arts Center in a single bound. Super seniors can't fly, they don't read minds, and if any more of them start donning spandex tights, I'm going to start wearing blinders to class. But Super seniors are super at feeding the UMass economy. The longer we stay, the more tuition we pay, the more coffee and books and Minuteman t-shirts we'll buy. All of which is great for UMass, especially given the $12 million budget cut proposed last year.

So the question is: is what's good for UMass also good for its students?

For some students, the answer is yes. Taking an extra year can be a good way to spread out a difficult course load, or make up for a bad semester. Junior anthropology major Ben Frenchette says that he is a "likely super senior" after switching majors and taking time off for financial reasons.

"Of course I'd rather not pay for an extra term," says Frenchette, "but I also don't want to take the 20-plus credits per semester I'd need to graduate on time."

For others, what begins as an extra year at UMass can turn into a never-ending undergraduate nightmare.

Art history major Ryan Subozc has been an undergraduate at UMass since Fall 2003. The 26-year-old Subozc cites changing degree requirements and a lack of class availability as major factors in her decision to stay more than four years.

"I took a semester off and when I came back, the requirements for my major had changed," says Subozc. "I had to repeat some of my classes. Then I found that some of the classes were only available once every two years, or they were only taught by a certain professor."

Difficulty getting into classes is a hallmark of the UMass undergraduate experience. We all know what it's like. Scrambling to get onto SPIRE on registration day. Showing up for a class only to be told that there's a thirty-person waitlist and it won't be offered again until after you're supposed to graduate. Large class sizes and a shrinking faculty make it harder to get into the classes we need, and harder to be noticed once we get into them.

"Even simple availability of classes, it's just not there," says Subozc. "In a major with small class sizes, like art history, the classes are always flooded. Most people in my major have had to take classes through the five-college system because they just can't get into the classes they need at UMass."

Part of the problem is that the University is admitting more students than it has the capacity or resources to teach. Enrollment is going up, but faculty numbers are frozen by budget cuts. In fall 2008, there were 20,308 undergraduates enrolled at UMass, the largest student body in at least thirty years. In fall 1998, only 17,524 undergraduates enrolled at the university.

According to Pat Callahan of the UMass office of news and media relations, "enrollment is going up, and that is planned." Callahan says it's important to remember though that the student body fluctuates naturally year-to-year. The enrollment increase is not a conspiracy for the school to get more money from its students.

"The idea is not to get a lot of kids to make a lot of money, but to find a student body that fits the university," he says.

UMass administrators aren't the reincarnation of Snidely Whiplash, twirling their mustaches and plotting how to tie us up while they run off with our money. But that doesn't change the fact that students have been negatively impacted by the admissions increase, both in the quality of the education they receive and their ability to graduate on time.

On a campus that is stressed, stricken, and generally stretched thin by state-mandated budget cuts, more and more students have to wonder: Is it worth it to stay another year? What's it going to be like when my friends graduate and I'm still stuck here in Amherst? Exactly how broke am I going to be when I finally get out of here?

It can be stressful, and for some students, devastating. Others see it as a chance to live their UMass years to the fullest. Junior Kasia Letowska, also a potential super senior, is looking forward to a fifth year on campus.

"I love UMass and never want to leave," she says.

Rachel Dougherty is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at rdougher@student.umass.edu.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

FULL, HEALTHY, MEALS A SIGN OF THE TIMES

RE: "Rumbling stomachs are a sign of the times at the Dining Commons;" Evan Haddad, Sept. 18

Dear Editor,

Last Friday, there was an interesting article written by Evan Haddad titled "Rumbling stomachs are a sign of the times at the Dining Commons" and while the article was well written, I would like to point out several things that UMass Dining Services is doing that he might not be aware of.

Americans, in general, face an epidemic of diet-linked adverse health conditions and chronic diseases, from obesity and type 2 diabetes to heart disease and various cancers. Today more than ever, many students are looking to their campus dining locations for food choices that are not only healthy, but delicious. It is incumbent on our chefs and staff to embrace opportunities to create healthy, appealing, everyday foods.

With health imperatives in mind, last spring, UMass Dining initiated an innovative menu strategy of stealth Health featuring healthier, flavor-driven menu options, without labeling them specifically as being healthy.

Our goal is to deliver delicious and tasty food with healthy options, to our customers, in the most sustainable and environmentally sensitive manner.

With over 14,000 students on the meal plan and being the third largest dining program in the nation, we would like to take a leadership role in providing healthier menus choices to our customers while supporting environmental initiatives.

The sliders, the mini-burgers, referred to in the article by Haddad, are some of the hottest items in the culinary scene; not only is the meat fresh, never frozen, it comes from a local butcher. With our all-you-care-to-eat program at the DC's, you can eat as many as you chose. We also noticed our students prefer to have an array of food on their plate and have quality food rather than quantity. With our trayless program, I know we can reduce waste while supporting the environment.

Here is what we have done and will continue to do this semester:

1. Reduced the portion size of every item we serve and rolled out a small plate, big flavor program
2. Focused on fruits and vegetables first with the goal of doubling students' consumption of produce, to promote good health.
3. Highlighted the increased use of healthy plant-based oils, eliminated trans fats, and substantially reduced saturated fats.
4. Increased options of healthy protein choices, such as more fish, nuts, and legumes.
5. Emphasized healthy carbohydrates, increased menu presence of whole grains and increased food and beverage options that have little or no added sugar.
6. Reduced salt (sodium) in food preparation.
7. Served Sustainable Seafood only.
8. Leveraged the flavors of World Cuisines from the Mediterranean, Latin America, and Southeast Africa.

Have no fear, the best is yet to come as we continue to evolve, serving delicious food with healthy options, in the most sustainable and environmentally conscious manner – that's our mission.

Ken Toong
Executive Director, UMass Dining Services

GOTTA LOVE SATIRE

RE: "Obama's hardly hired the best and the brightest;" Alex Perry, Sept. 21

Dear Editor,

I've been greatly enjoying the recent trend of your columnists to use satire as a means to prove their points. Two particular works of satire stick out in my mind. The first, "Death Panels: the new liberal threat," written by Chris Amorosi and, more recently, "Socialist radicals among Obama's key advisors," by Alex Perry.

Comparing these two, there is no doubt that Mr. Perry is the better satirist. I was in tears with laughter at his ability to so subtly mock the opposition. His writing was so clever, that I almost thought he believed what he said; but, such is the danger of the satirist. I particularly loved his comment about health care: "Basically, that's a way of saying the government should be the ones determining who is fit for health care and who isn't." Which is, of course, most humorous as the government already oversees Medicare. I also loved the part where he said Mr. Emmanuel "is a health care adviser that is a proponent of a system which puts values on lives based on age and health." Certainly not the impression I ever get from my current health care provider; God save their capitalist souls.

Finally, Mr. Perry shows his true satirical genius by referring to Holdren's book "Ecoscience." Surely a book published 30 years ago along with two other colleagues is a much better indicator than someone's entire professional history. Thanks again, Mr. Amorosi and Mr. Perry for your clever style that brings new life to these important issues.

Alan R. Levin
UMass Student

THE EXERCISE TAX

Dear Editor,

The focus on the nation's health and the cost of providing medical care highlights how much of our lives depend upon the decisions of others. Others that decide how much money to spend on our illness, others that decide what is or is not wrong with us when we feel ill. Yet one decision we have under our control is how much we exercise. Not anymore. UMass is doing its best to ensure that is not up to your motivation, but how much money you have.

Until recently UMass charged grad students $40 per semester to use the recreational facilities. Even if all you wanted to do was shoot some hoops for an hour or so, it would cost you $40 to shoot that hoop. That pales in comparison to the astronomical increase this semester. To shoot that same hoop you will now pay $125 per semester for the privilege. That's right, your annual budget for exercise is now no longer enough for just one semester because the cost is over three times higher. It will cost you $375 to shoot a basketball all year round.

Has anybody's income increased by three times? Even by just 10 percent? I don't think so. If you're an undergraduate UMass has probably already billed you and likely you don't know how much more you pay to stay healthy. Lucky you. Health is in our hands? I don't think so. You can't choose to use Boyden and avoid the new recreation center. You can't choose to pay only for court time or just the pool. Tell me UMass, how have you empowered students to choose a healthy life?

We have a national health crisis with obesity, diabetes and heart disease at record levels. UMass would rather keep it that way than let you decide for yourself to take the healthy path. They say health care is more expensive than ever, they weren't kidding.

Kwong Chan
Department of Marketing, Isenberg School of Management

ALANA'S TAKE ON ALANA

RE: "Institutionalized racism in student government;" Alana Goodman, Sept. 23

Dear Editor,

I would like to clarify the facts around the mistaken and slightly misleading statements made by Alana Goodman in her recent column on the African, Latino/a, Asian/Pacific Islander, and Native American (ALANA) Caucus.

First, any student of any race may join the Caucus.

Second, the Caucus's charter was changed in 2004 to comply with the legal concerns raised in 2003.

Third, the new leadership of the Caucus is actively seeking membership; anyone interested in becoming a member of or working with the Caucus should contact Will Syldor at wsyldor@student.umass.edu.

Fourth, the Caucus serves as a body that allows cultural RSOs to coordinate their schedules and collaborate on events; the $10,000 Ms. Goodman refers to is distributed to cultural RSOs that apply for emergency funding, freeing up money in the $25,000 SGA Finance Reserves for other RSOs.

Lastly, Ms. Goodman's statement that Vice Chancellor Jean Kim asked that the seats be removed is incorrect. The memorandum that the Vice Chancellor sent to the SGA leadership asks us "to correct the situation so that the SGA Constitution and By-Laws are consistent with the Constitution of the United States." At no point does she indicate what a resolution would look like, stating, "I trust that your administration has the will and the ability to address this issue and I ask you to resolve it by March 1, 2010."

SGA President Ngozi Mbawuike is working with her Cabinet and the Senate leadership to ensure that the Caucus fully complies with legal and constitutional principles of fairness while fulfilling its goal of promoting representation of historically marginalized communities.

Finally, the comparison of an imperfect method to promote inclusivity to the deliberate segregation of the Jim Crow laws is a serious misrepresentation of fact and history and is a disservice to The Collegian's readers. I hope that anyone concerned with this or any issue will shun controversy for its own sake and join in the constructive dialogue that the new SGA leadership seeks to develop.

Sam Dreyfus
Outreach and Education Coordinator, Student Government Association

Letters to the editor should be no longer than 550 words and can be sent to editorial@dailycollegian.com or submitted online at dailycollegian.com. We regret that, due to space constraints, not all letters will be printed.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 2009

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The Starling Report:

Saturday morning walk of shame, or triumph?

BY JESSICA STARLING JONES
COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

It's Saturday morning. Not quite sunrise, but not long after. The place: The mean streets of Fitchburg, where I spent most of my Friday nights this summer. The outfit: Wrinkled and askew. Low-cut top, platform heels. Smudged mascara compounding dark circles under my eyes, a sure sign that I didn't get much sleep last night.

It's a familiar tableau, one we've probably all seen a thousand times on this campus. It's more noticeable when the protagonist is a girl, all dolled up from the night before, or better yet, wearing a boy's t-shirt and shorts. Every so often, if you look closely, you can catch a guy red-handed too.

Indeed, the infamous "Walk of Shame" is a common sight in cities and on college campuses. I myself am no stranger to it. If I were good at planning ahead, I would probably bring flip-flops and a t-shirt with me when I go out, so I could look appropriately casual for my trek home the following morning. However, planning ahead is not my strong suit. Engaging in spur-of-the-moment debauchery is more my style.

On the aforementioned walk, in the few blocks from the house of my gentleman friend back to the house where I had been officially planning to stay that weekend, I was sure that every denizen of the neighborhood I passed was leering at me and thinking, "Hahaha. Walk of Shame! That girl totally got nailed last night." And those people would not have been wrong. My own thoughts as I winced in the harsh summer sunlight tended towards the "Ughhh...Walk of Shame, hope I don't trip over a pothole in these ridiculous shoes" end of the spectrum.

Then, it occurred to me: The reason for the heels, and the cleavage, and the party, and in fact all parties and all revealing outfits and all high heels in the history of mankind were geared towards a single purpose: sex. Wasn't that the whole point? It was all a game, and I had emerged victorious. A warm sense of satisfaction and the promise of more adventures next weekend were my spoils; tousled hair and smudged makeup my badges of honor.

Why then is this called the Walk of Shame? It should clearly be re-titled the Walk of Triumph. Modern society has no place for the antiquated morals of yesteryear. I certainly don't. It's time for a revolution in honesty, time for us all to admit that when we get dressed up and go out to bars and parties we're actually trying to get laid, and take pride in it when we reach our goal. No more hangdog Walks of Shame with our eyes downcast, hurriedly shuffling home before we can be spotted.

I've only been caught red-handed once in all my years of college. It was the morning after a party. I had brought one of my friends - a coworker in fact - home, and then decided to crash at his dorm because I was too lazy to go back to mine. Nothing happened, I swear! But in the morning I was skulking off, in my mini skirt and heels, shielding my sensitive eyes from the harsh light of day, and I bumped into yet another coworker in the bathroom. Of course, she put two and two together, and despite my vehement protests that I had merely slept there, she clearly assumed what any rational person would.

Apparently, the episode became the subject of much scuttlebutt around the office. At this point, I sincerely wish that something had happened, since I've had to endure the sordid assumptions of everyone we work with. Also, the guy in question is smoking hot. In fact, if we had hooked up that night, I would have been fairly glowing with triumph in the morning, instead of trying to make a furtive escape, tainted by the shame of having been too drunk to make it halfway across campus at the end of the night, and therefore, too drunk to get busy with anyone, even my devilishly handsome coworker. And that, my friends, is truly shameful.

Jessica Starling Jones can be reached at jessstarlingjones@gmail.com.

Neil Patrick Harris played host for the 2009 Emmy awards show. Harris sang and danced and took jabs at guests, all the while glowing like a giddy little boy.

2009 Emmy Award show glorified popularity contest for Hollywood celebrities

(AMC)

The cast of Mad Men, pictured here. The television drama won three awards this year, including one for outstanding drama.

BY KATE MACDONALD
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

When anyone can find out which celebrity is back in rehab for a supposed toothache, which is having an affair with their co-star while their spouse stays in the same city and which is beating their significant other while cruising the streets of L.A. simply by strolling down an aisle in Stop and Shop, why bother watching a glorified popularity contest? Sunday night marked the Sixty-first Primetime Emmy Awards, the sixty-first year television stars paraded themselves in front of cameras, fans, and an academy who votes to tell them who is the best at what they do.

But who is this academy to say that "30 Rock" is better than "Family Guy" when, besides being comedies, the two have nothing in common? Moreover, does anyone really care? Just because "30 Rock" is, for the third year in a row, considered the best comedy show out there does not mean people will stop watching any of the other nominees, or even the shows not considered. And the dramas that lost out to winner "Mad Men" will not stop production, lamenting, "Oh, the shame!" Nothing really changes. So, why is an awards show like this even relevant?

Instead of fading into unimportance, Neil Patrick Harris heralded in a new award show that has been forced to evolve with the changing times. 2009 marked the first year both the orchestra and the control room were made visible to the audience. To conserve time, because Americans generally need convenience or else everything becomes tumultuous, the awards were split into five sections: comedy, reality, miniseries TV movies, variety, and drama (in that order). The hope was to make everything run smoothly and avoid that slump in the middle during which everyone picks up the remote to watch the football game (because no one watches this to find out who will win for Outstanding Writing for a Miniseries, Movie, or Dramatic Special). Harris called attention to this goal in saying, "Here's hoping Kanye West likes '30 Rock!'"

Harris succeeded in keeping his audience rapt during the Emmys' droning three hour broadcast. He danced across the stage with as much grace as Hugh Jackman at the Oscars while singing a repetitive and far too long 40's style tune pleading with the at-home audience to put down the remote. For most of the night, Harris acted like a giddy little boy; it was obvious that he genuinely liked his position. He giggled after every joke told and kept the audience laughing along. Even if the relevance of the show must be questioned, it was worth watching simply to see which star Harris would take a jab at next.

The stars themselves cannot go without mention. The first winner of the evening, Kristin Chenoweth (for Outstanding Actress in a Comedy for her work on the now defunct "Pushing Daisies") set the night off with an overly dramatic tone. She was reduced to tears while making her acceptance speech, flinging herself into the arms of presenter Tina Fey. However, Chenoweth has been the recipient of numerous honors over the years, including a prestigious Tony Award. Soon after, Karina Smirnoff and Maksim Chmerkovskiy followed with a stilted dance number, alluding to their recently broken engagement. Moments like these provided for awkward and cringe-worthy moments.

Only Glenn Close brought attention to the hold actors and actresses have on their audience. In her acceptance speech for Outstanding Lead Actress in a Drama (which probably should have been given by the more versatile Mariska Hargitay or Sally Field) she noted the power and legacy that goes along with being a professional actress. To her credit, she did give an impressive speech, but her attempt at rebuilding the pedestal which stars are thought to sit on was feeble.

The Sixty-first Primetime Emmy Awards helped to show that even stars have the same problems as the average American, such as being overwhelmed by recognition or shaken by a rocky breakup. But then, do they deserve to be watched by millions receiving awards because they simply did their job well? As much as host, Harris tried to divert the audience from this conclusion, the inescapable answer is no. While any awards show has entertainment value, the U.S. is a nation in which some of its citizens can't afford a television to watch the event on. But for those who can, watching an event like the Emmys lets the average citizen escape the monotony of their daily lives for a few hours, at least.

Kate MacDonald can be reached at kaitlynm@student.umass.edu.

Herter Gallery group show, 'Flower Power' in full bloom

Exhibit centers on the symbolic value of floral motif in artworks

BY LISA LINSLEY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The University of Massachusetts' Herter Art Gallery is currently featuring a group show titled "Flower Power." The exhibit explores the ways in which flower imagery can be used to find meaning in nature.

Historically, flower and plant representations have held symbolic value in artworks. During the Medieval and Early Renaissance periods, flowers served as a symbol of religious truth. Ivy often symbolized eternal life and a peach symbolized truth and salvation. From the 1600s through the 1800s, flower paintings became popular, as they symbolized the ideals of the Romanticism era.

Due to various art movements, contemporary society possesses symbols and ideas regarding different objects. For instance, after the Victorian movement, red roses came to symbolize love, yellow roses stood for joy and friendship, while pink roses represented happiness.

The purpose of this exhibit is to display the current symbolic value flowers hold in contemporary artwork. Throughout the centuries, each movement has had flowers as a constant and this theme still exists today.

"Flower Power" features 15 artists including Zeke Berman, Michael Coblyn, Jeanette Cole, Robert Cumming, Butt Johnson, Rosanne Retz, Richard Yarde, Hanlyn Davies, Lisa Lindgren, Dale Schlappi, Deb Karpman, Geoffrey Miller, John Roy, Al Souza, and Jerry Kearns. The artists work with different media and each puts his or her own spin on the theme.

Some works use flowers in an obvious manner. For instance, the flowers are large, vibrant, and encompass the entire portrait. Others; however, emphasize a different focal point but have nature as the underlying subject. For instance, Lisa Lindgren's "Untitled 2" uses mixed media in a collage style. She uses paper cut-outs from prints to create petals with a human hand cut-out as the flower stem. Birds with human hands as feet surrounds the "flower" focal point.

Geoffrey Miller's piece, "Column," uses acrylic on Masonite. The piece comprises flowers as the main focal point and subject. His work reflects the title, in that it features a column shaped work with various squares of flowers. The piece begins at the top with extremely bright flowers and a bright background while the middle has very light, faint flowers. The bottom of the column uses dark acrylic.

Zeke Berman's piece features a more complex idea. "Blue Flower" features two blue flowers in glass placed inside a dark cave. A piece by Michael Coblyn, "Hiding the Moon with Smoke," uses pigment print and arched paper to display a stern, perplexed man. Alongside, you can see the man's body in a mirror image. A shower curtain and a large flower are displayed

See FLORAL on page 6

COURTESY OF THE ARTIST

Artwork by Butt Johnson, among others is on view at the Herter Gallery West. Pictured here is "Untitled (Rose I)," a ballpoint on mylar drawing.

Sam Roberts Band plays modest show

Montreal-natives, Sam Roberts Band played a low-key show Monday night at the Iron Horse. The group played selections from their latest album "Love at the End of the World," with musical styles ranging from folk to dance rhythms.

By Angela Stasiowski
Collegian Staff

This past Monday, Iron Horse Music Hall ushered in a new era of rock n' roll, playing host to Canada's Sam Roberts Band. The group of Montreal natives is currently touring the United States in support of their latest effort, "Love at the End of the World."

The 7 p.m. performance delivered tunes from every subgenre of rock, from folk to dance.

Opening the set was Northampton's The True Jacqueline, a band based somewhere on the quirkier side of harmony.

While the gang of fresh-faced musicians has a broad fan base in the area, they seemed to lack the cohesion their music required on this particular evening. That said, they were warmly received and even tried out some new material for their hometown.

After a brief recess, Roberts' Band, featuring 5 musicians clad in equally tight denim, took the stage.

A gentleman in the crowd said it best when he commented on the irony of the modest turn out. With experience at Lollapalooza and a half-dozen Juno awards under his belt, it is baffling that Roberts' talent is not yet adequately recognized in the United States.

The band kicked off the set with the title track from their latest album, "Love at the End of the World." Featuring driving electric guitar with a classic rock twist, the song set the standard for the evening. Roberts frolicked in place, delivering a power-packed performance, for so early in the show.

The Northerners have a gift for combining old and new in a style that is all their own. Written about the thriving American city, the toe-tapping "Detroit '67" served as a perfect example of the musician's style, moving the less reserved portion of the crowd to dance.

Bluesy keyboard accompaniment transformed the music hall into an old time bar scene. In this live setting, the song had all the precision of its recorded counterpart but with the added adrenaline of a live audience that gave it a life of its own.

Without a doubt, the most engaging song of the evening was Roberts' first single, "Brother Down." He led the crowd in an elaborate sing-along, drawing out the song to grand proportions.

The meager crowd banded together to dance after Roberts jested that he had paid two of the audience members $20 to do so. However cheesy the ploy may have been, it succeeded in getting the crowd on their feet. The floor was filled for the rest of the show.

Even without the liveliest band, Roberts would still stand out for his supremely energetic performance. He maintained his singing stamina throughout the show, without showing even the slightest signs of fatigue.

"Lions of the Kalahari," another song off of "Love at the End of the World," ended in an impressive jam session that showed off Roberts' virtuosic guitar skills. The band had exceptional tangible cohesion, seeming to know exactly what the other was going to play next and building on that knowledge.

"Words and Fire" was a trip to the softer side of rock. More melody driven than his other work, Roberts' acoustic songs were well worked into the set.

Switching off between acoustic and electric, the music took on a different identity with each new song.

Despite having awoken at 3 in the afternoon, Roberts complimented the town and their venue, saying that he was glad to have awoken in such a unique town with such nice people to play for. For a refreshing change, the comment came across as genuine.

After leaving the crowd salivating for more, Roberts and company returned to stage for a 2-song encore. The quality of a show can be measured by whether the audience is left wanting more, and Roberts certainly achieved this. Even after the encore the crowd waited for another return to the stage, a sure sign of a great performance.

The final song of the night, "Mind Flood" ended the encore on a high note, building up to an ambitious jam, with each member contributing the loudest, most complex improvisation they could conjure with an entrancing effect.

After the show, the band loitered outside to meet and greet their American fans.

The combination of Roberts' energy, innovation, and down to earth attitude makes him one of Canada's finest exports to date.

Angela Stasiowski can be reached at atasiow@student.

Contemporary art perpetuates the long-standing tradition of flower themes

FLORAL from page 5

in the corners.

Julie Heffernan's "Self Portrait as Thing in the Forest," is a long piece that uses human beings as the main focal point. This oil painting features a dark forest with fire bursting at the ground. As the fire goes up the page, it contributes to the illusion that it has morphed into flowers as it hits the trees. Sitting in the forest are two nearly identical women, wearing different dresses that are joined together to give the impression that they are in the same body. The flowers in these paintings clearly supplement the main theme.

Robert Cumming uses cut paper as his medium to create black and white flowers along the border of the piece. The focal point in the portrait is a plant hanging by a thread.

A UMass studio art professor, Hanlyn Davies, uses an outside-looking-in theme in her piece entitled "Inside/Outside (Collapse)." The piece features a window display, the view outside. Soil is a main image in this piece, perhaps signifying growth or newness.

The most unique piece, Al Souza's "The White Glove' is made entirely out of puzzle pieces. Appropriately, all of the segments feature floral motifs. It is pieced together in a collage fashion; however, certain areas pop out in a more three-dimensional style.

This exhibit uses contemporary art work to perpetuate the long standing tradition of using flowers as a symbol, a theme that still exists today but perhaps in a new form. Flower Power opened in the Herter Art Gallery (West) September 10 and will continue through October 9.

Lisa Linsley can be reached at llinsley@student.umass.edu.

We want you! Arts & Living arts@dailycollegian.com

Team effort Saturday

Havens, Nelson look for strong offensive play

FOOTBALL from page 10

ment, and the contest with the Seawolves is the perfect opportunity to get better before UMass goes into an open week followed by a tough October schedule.

"On offense, we just need to execute a little bit better and everyone needs to do their part," said quarterback Kyle Havens, this week's CAA Offensive Player of the Week.

Havens is coming off his best game as a Minuteman, in which he was 22-of-30 for 329 yards, two touchdowns and one interception. The offense is producing more than 30 points per game under the leadership of Havens, as well as tailback Tony Nelson, who is averaging 114 yards per game and five yards per rush.

The Seawolves defense will look to disrupt the rhythm that Havens and the rest of the offense has established in the last two games, and may be able to do so with a number of talented players on that side of the ball.

"For each level they have a star," Morris said of Stony Brook's defense. "They [have] got stars up and down the line up defensively and offensively."

The contest will be UMass' second night game under the lights at McGuirk Stadium with a kickoff time of 6 p.m. on Saturday.

Jeffrey R. Larnard can be reached at jlarnard@dailycollegian.com.

Young defense, sputtering offense not troubling Koch four goals on the season, despite a rotating goalkeeper situation. Defense has always been a priority for the Minutemen, but this year, its effectiveness was in question because of how many new faces are in the back.

M.SOCCER from page 10

UMass lost three of its top four defenders in Daniel Lepone, Chris Brown and Stuart Thomson. Those positions have quickly been filled by freshman Dominic Skrajewski coming in alongside sophomores David Key and Andrew Henshaw (the only returning starter from last season).

As an added bonus, former Lehigh midfielder Mark Dangleis is starting to emerge as a solid fourth back, which will allow Koch to move midfielder Stuart Amick into his natural position.

So far this season the young defense has been successful at limiting opponents on the offensive end, with Skrajewski playing a major role in that.

He originally came to UMass as a midfielder, but Koch believes he is versatile enough to play in the back as well, and has so far made an impression on him.

"[Skrajewski] has got a great field presence," Koch said. "He's great in the air, and he wins pretty much every 50/50 ball, and he wins pretty much every header. He's been a very strong presence in the back four, and he's been that way since the beginning of the season."

The inexperienced defense will have one of its biggest tests against an offensive-minded Siena squad. The Saints (10 goals) are tied with Iona as the top scoring team in the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference.

Siena puts much of the scoring load on freshman Joe Tavernese and junior Daniel Alderstad, who each have three goals on the season. But the problem for the Minutemen is not so much the individual efforts for Siena as much as the way the Saints plays.

Siena generally has the entire team moving with the ball, which will make it hard to get numbers on defense, but also to find open opportunities on offense.

"They're very organized," Koch said. "They get everyone behind the ball, so we're going to have to get behind their backs in order to find spaces for us."

UMass will look to counter that with the return of Chris Vaccaro, who was previously out with an injury, but will return in time for Saturday's game. The junior will fill-in at midfield to give the Minutemen some experience.

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill@student.umass.edu.

UMass wants Roswess, Amick to step up, attack opponents solid defensive team, and then we sit back and relax and wait for the counter."

OFFENSE from page 10

Koch believes that part of the key to improving the offense is to have a more balanced attack, rather than to rely on Roswess to break-out.

"I think everyone on our team has to be a leading scorer," Koch said. "[Roswess] is certainly one of our target players. He's certainly one of our attacking players, but we have a number of players who can take that role."

One of those players is Stuart Amick, who earlier in the season has helped fill in the back four on defense. With sophomore Mark Dangleis stepping up on defense, Amick will likely move into the midfield, which is where he's played most of his career as a Minuteman.

If Saturday's game against the Huskies is any indicator for what that move could entail for the Minutemen, they should be encouraged. Koch made the switch in the second half to give his team more support offensively, and midfielder Ben Arikian delivered to give UMass its first win of the season.

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill@student.umass.edu.

Quarterback Kyle Havens drops back last Saturday in last weekends match-up with URI. The Minutemen will look for Havens to repeat his performance this Saturday against Stony Brook.

Redshirt junior contributing after converting to cornerback breaks and change in direction."

BAILEY from page 10

Switching sides in the middle of his career brought some challenges for Bailey. In addition to the new personnel, system and terminology, he had to deal with a complete shift in mechanics.

"My biggest challenge would have to be the change in direction," Bailey said. "From running full speed forward, to trying to stop somebody backpedalling, that had to be the hardest part."

Bailey, though, did have an advantage coming from the outside of the ball. Coming naturally from the perspective of the wide receiver, Bailey knows how other receivers think, and tries to use that to his advantage.

"It gave me, I think, an advantage because I use the knowledge of a receiver, the way I ran my routes to how receivers run their routes now, and I can basically predict what they're going to do before they do it."

The quick transition and unexpected success of Bailey has been a recurring theme for the Minutemen all season, particularly on the defensive side of the ball.

With Smalls and Robinson graduating and preseason All-Conference linebacker Josh Jennings sidelined with an injury, UMass entered the season without many of its defensive leaders. The Minutemen are also without defensive guru Don Brown as head coach, and the defense, which was a disappointment in 2008, was expected to be mediocre in 2009.

"They've performed extremely well," Morris said. "We're not letting up points. And a lot of that is up front, then you get to your backers and then that back end's got to hold up too. You saw us last week with a more throwing offense and [we] did a pretty good job last Saturday holding a real strong quarterback down."

With unexpected contributions from players like Bailey, the UMass defense has played far beyond its expectations. Individually, though, Bailey, along with senior Corey Davis on the other side of the field, has had to live up to the enormous reputations of their predecessors.

During his senior season, Smalls was projected as a legitimate NFL prospect before a major knee injury derailed his professional career. Robinson, meanwhile, was signed as an undrafted free agent by the Philadelphia Eagles and spent time with them in camp.

"To replace those guys, to play at that high a level, it's not easy," Morris said. "Guys [have] got to step up, you know. Corey Davis and Ke'Mon have done a great job, and we haven't missed a beat defensively."

So while the defense and its inexperienced starters may surprise the rest of the conference, Morris and his team know what they are capable of all along: A group of players ready to contribute, including Bailey, regardless of which side of the ball he plays on.

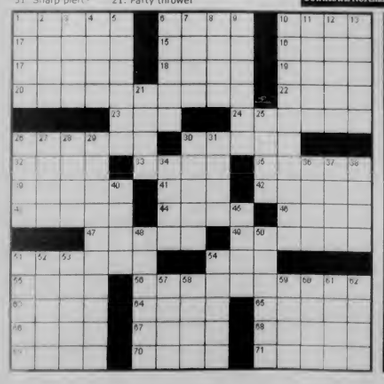
Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu

Attention: Students
Hospice Shop of the Fisher Home has got a sale for you...
Come in anytime during September and October and show your student ID to buy one item and get a free item of equal or lesser value!
The place for gently worn name brand & vintage clothing, shoes & accessories as well as housewares, art and books.
55 University Drive, right next to the Hanger
Monday 10-7, Tuesday through Saturday 10-4
(413) 549-8800

Rolling Green
All Rents Include: heat, hot water, and electricity!
Move-in Special:
$99 security deposit.
NO application fees.
NO non-refundable move-in fee.
1 bedroom: $980*
2 bedroom: $1135*
2 bedroom townhouse: $1275*
3 bedroom townhouse: $1500*
4 bedroom townhouse: $1995*
Contact us:
(413) 253-3000
rollinggreenamherst@eqr.com
*Pricing fluctuates. All pricing listed is based on a 12 month lease. Shorter term leases are available. Please contact us for availability.

COMICS

Line by Richard Martelly



Wondermark by David Malki!

CROSSWORD

ACROSS
1 Swedish money
6 Winged
10 Parts of a play
14 9 9 9 9
15 Unadulterated
16 Person, place or thing
17 Base 8
18 Rodents
19 Story
20 Brothel
22 Part of an archipelago
23 Long, long time
24 Sheen
26 Sags
30 Bogus
32 Frolic
33 Not us
35 Hebrew unit of dry measure
39 Highly skilled
41 French for "summer"
42 Rock
43 Male singing range
44 Magical symbol
46 Bit
47 A North American retail chain
49 Passed the tongue over
51 Sharp pierc-ing cry
54 Fled on foot
55 Partially carbonized vegetable matter
56 Numb
63 Hindu princess
64 Average
65 Left the engine running
66 Therefore
67 Crooked
68 Hang loosely
69 Biblical garden
70 Likelihood
71 Brusque

DOWN
1 Comprehend
2 Wealthy
3 Not deceived by
4 Close
5 Napping
6 Cooking bib
7 An elaborate Hawaiian feast
8 Products of human creativity
9 Sell again
10 Thoroughly clean
11 Seashore
12 Soft fine silk
13 Contemptuous look
21 Party thrower
25 Purposes
26 "Shucks!"
27 Travelled on a horse
28 Portent
29 Adversary
30 An unborn baby
31 Ends a prayer
34 German for "Mister"
36 On the end of a fisherman's line
37 ___ meridiem
38 Attached to one's neck
40 Tall woody plant
45 Distinctive flair
48 With hands on hips
50 Take a firm stand
51 Bender
52 Took heed
53 Cooktop
54 Leases
57 Require
58 Found on most beaches
59 Indolent
60 Smudge
61 Focusing glass
62 Border

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!
Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

"Bad Babysitting" by Mike Siipola

MIKESMAZE DARWIN!
FOOD, FUN, SPUDZOOKAS!
Weekends & Holidays 10am-5pm thru Nov 1
S. Main Street Rt. 47 Sunderland
www.mikesmaze.com
413-665-8331

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Google Maps has captured public urination from space.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Uggs has branched out into organic footwear: Nuggs.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Every person has a mute button buried deep in his or her abdomen.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Only respond to your "DJ name" today.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Today, picking your nose is a symbol. Its significance depends on the school of thought through which it is interpreted.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You are troubled. Is it because you are having trouble focusing your Chi?

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Enlightenment can be easily achieved by listening to the new Lil Jon.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Enhance your time management skills by running on marijuana-minutes.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
For every lock, there is a key. For every dollar: a Taco Bell value meal.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Discover what "The North Face" looks like before it's too late.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Recycling mistakes is not contributing to going green.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You've read the comics page, so we think you're an okay person. For now.

Hits Now 94.3 FM
The Valley's Hit Music Now in HD on 99.3 HD2
www.hits943.com

amherst cinema
Fri Sep 25 - Thu Oct 1
BIG FAN 2:15 4:30 7:15 9:15 +11:45am Sat & Sun
THE SEPTEMBER SONG 2:30 4:45 7:30 9:45 +12:00pm Sat & Sun
Cold Souls NO SHOWS THU! 7:00 9:30
PONYO 2:00 4:15 +11:30am Sat & Sun
28 Amity St. Downtown Amherst www.amherstcinema.org (413) 253-2547

PLEASANT STREET THEATER
Fri Sep 25 - Thu Oct 1
SERAPHINE 5:00 7:30 10:00 +2:30 Sat & Sun +10:00am 2:30 Wed
TAKING WOODSTOCK 7:15 +2:45 Sat Sun & Wed
(500) DAYS OF SUMMER 5:15 9:45 +10:30 Wed
27 Pleasant St. Downtown Northampton www.pleasantstheater.org (413) 584-5848

T Shirts & Sweatshirts in 1-3 Days!
sunraise printing
Custom Printed Tees
Student Discounts
586-7133
sunraiseprinting.com
Hadley, MA 01035

SUDOKU

6	8			5		2	3
					8		7
				7		6
		2
					7	3	6
	3	4	1		2
				8	5	7	4
		9			3
						8

"Club Nights" at the MONKEY BAR
9/24 Thirsty Thursday with DJ Yeahgui and Hot Sizzle
9/25 Dual Entertainment with Glisten Effect (live band) and DJ Construct
9/26 Dual Entertainment with Orange Television (live band) and DJ Burg
9/29 Techno Tuesday
413-259-1600
63 North Pleasant Street
Amherst, MA 01002
www.mymonkeybar.com

LA PIAZZA
pizza • and more
• specialty pizza
• wings
• calzones
• pasta
• salads
• desserts
OCMP Free Delivery
(413) 253-6444
www.lapiazzarestorante.us
2 medium cheese PIZZAS $13 Valid for Pickup and Delivery only Exp. 10/31/09
2 large cheese PIZZAS $18 Valid for Pickup and Delivery only Exp. 10/31/09

CLASSIFIEDS

EMPLOYMENT

Part-time personal care attendant. About 10-12 hours/week. Flexible Hours. Please Call Patrick (413)-275-7928

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided.

1-800-965-6520 ext. 162

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

Minutewomen get ready for comeback

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

With two struggling teams in Vermont and Quinnipiac coming up, the Massachusetts field hockey team will try to avoid a pair of possible trap games on the road this weekend.

The Minutewomen (5-2) are coming off a weekend where they almost defeated their second No. 9 ranked opponent of the season in Boston College (7-1). The near-upset combined with the win Saturday against Northeastern boosted UMass from a previous No. 11 ranking in the Kookaburra/NFHCA Division 1 National Coaches Poll to rounding out the top 10 this week.

Being ranked among the top 10 for the first time since 2000 is a testament to how well UMass has played this season. However, coach Justine Sowry believes that the team must now back up their national recognition with its play on the field for the remainder of the season.

"It's a great reward for the players and the program, and it's really been a result of years of hard work and preparation," Sowry said. "Here on out, I don't think it necessarily means a great deal unless we perform each game."

This weekend will show whether the Minutewomen are able to beat the teams. Sowry realizes the potential to overlook both opponents with another significant game against No. 3 Syracuse on the horizon, but feels her team will be prepared to take on the Catamounts and Bobcats this weekend.

"This is a danger week for us and a danger weekend. Having one of the toughest schedules in the country followed up by two lower ranked teams can be very dangerous," she said. "We're just revisiting the fact that we must respect our opponents, stick to the game plan, tidy up key areas of our game and bring out our best effort for the weekend."

UMass will first take on a familiar UVM team on Saturday. The two teams have matched up every season dating back to 2004, with the Minutewomen holding a 3-2 edge this decade.

This season, Vermont has had problems with their offense, and limps into Saturday's game with a 1-7 record. The Catamounts' only win this season came against UC Davis (3-5), when they had their best offensive output with three scores. Discounting that game though, UVM has only tallied a total of three goals while being held scoreless in five of its seven losses.

Last season, the Minutewomen and Catamounts were locked in a defensive grind the first half of the game. UMass finally got on the board with a goal 13 minutes into the second half and never looked back, coasting to a 2-0 victory.

Quinnipiac hasn't been much better this season either, as it enters Sunday's matchup with UMass searching for its first win. The Minutewomen outshot the Bobcats, 14-9, while the defense shut down the Quinnipiac offense for a 3-0 win last season.

With all of that being said, Sowry feels that Vermont and Quinnipiac have given UMass tough games. Regardless of their records this season, she isn't discounting the motivation that both opponents will have in knocking off a top 10 team.

"They will certainly be looking to redeem themselves and I think any opponent that plays against a ranked one will bring their 'A' game," Sowry said.

In terms of motivation for the Minutewomen, Sowry dismissed any notion that she had to inspire the team this week in practice.

"It's just become part of culture that every day, you [have] got to bring your best effort," she said. "We have a very high standard that we set for ourselves and we'll just continue to push the team and certain individuals to be the best they can be."

The Minutewomen have proven they can beat teams on their level as well as rise to the occasion to take down higher ranked opponents this season. After this weekend, we'll know if they can take care of business against the teams they should beat.

Jay Asser can be reached at jasser@student.umass.edu.

Sowry and Co. relying on underclassmen, UMass ranked No.10 in the nation

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The loss of any one offensive threat can often be overcome by a complete team effort. The Massachusetts field hockey team has tried to do just that after losing Mary Shea, Erin Parker and the Minutewomen's leading scorer in 2008, Katelyn Orlando to graduation.

UMass (5-2) leads the Atlantic 10 Conference with a 0.84 scoring margin against opponents this season and a team total of 14 penalty corner goals – half of the team's total goals.

This shows that the Minutewomen know how to get into an opponent's striking circle and catch unprepared defenses off-guard.

UMass coach Justine Sowry elects to use either defender Makaela Potts or forward Cher King in penalty situations, and both are productive in that role. Potts has three goals this season – two off penalty corners, including the game-winning goal against No. 14 James Madison (4-3). Two of King's team-leading three assists this season were on Potts' corner goals. King's lone goal came in the Minutewomen's 4-3 upset of then-No. 9 Iowa (1-5). Her unselfish and tactical play is what Sowry feels makes her such a formidable opponent.

"She has a great sense of the game and terrific possession skills," said Sowry of King.

King also has the only defensive save recorded by a Minutewoman.

While the UMass offense is potent, so, too, is its defense, led by All-American goalkeeper Alesha Widdall.

The total penalty corners forced against the Minutewomen so far this season is 78, and opponents put pressure on Widdall more so in the second half.

But as opposing pressure rises, so does Widdall's defensive prowess.

She's seen 64 shots after halftime, and her 0.818 save-percentage ranks seventh in the nation. Her 1.11 goals-against average is first in the A-10 and third in the Northeast Region behind Christine Hoffman (0.29) and Kristi Troch 0.57 of Albany (5-2). Widdall also leads the A-10 in shutouts (7), and as a team, UMass boasts a conference-low eight goals per-game.

Freshmen continue to impress

Sowry's recruiting class for this season is paying major dividends. Forwards Nicole Cordero and Kara Charochak already have one goal this season. Charochak scored against the Hawkeyes and Cordero scored against Boston College. The goals show the talent of both players, as both of them came against teams ranked in the top 10 nationally.

Cordero is a regular starter for the Minutewomen and is a fierce competitor on the forward line. Along with King, her possession skills give the forward line a similar look to last year's Orlando-led forwards.

Charochak is frequently the first player Sowry uses off the bench, and her six shots are second-most among all freshmen behind fellow forward Kim Young. Young is off to a slow start this season, but her selection to Junior National Camp this past summer along with her early enrollment at UMass shows why she is so highly regarded by Sowry for both her intelligence and dedication to the sport.

Midfield Kate Heineman recorded her first point of the season with an assist on Cordero's goal against the Eagles.

Climbing higher

The Kookaburra/NFHCA Division I Coaches Poll placed UMass at No. 10, the program's first top 10 ranking since 2000, when it reached No. 7. The Minutewomen knocked off then-No. 7 UConn that season – who UMass plays on Oct. 9 this season – to earn the ranking

The Minutewomen are 3-1 against ranked opponents this season and the loss this past weekend against No. 9 Boston College (7-1) came down to an overtime goal that gave a strong offensive Eagles team its second goal. Widdall held the nation's leading-scorer, BC's Chelsea Feole, to one goal that proved to be the game-winner.

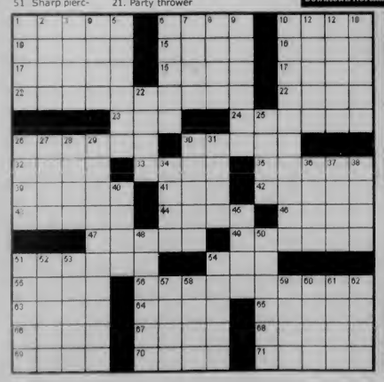
Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

Senior forward Jill Powers pushes the ball away from an opponent in a game last season. Powers and the rest of the Minutewomen will look to rebound after an overtime loss Sunday to BC when they take on Vermont on Saturday and Quinnipiac Sunday.

From class, to the library, to the dorm–
University of Massachussetts - Amherst students
Stay connected with a new Acer netbook from AT&T.
acer | ASPIRE one
• Roam on campus with built in Wi-Fi, access to the nations's fastest 3G network.
• Research on line and keep in touch with friends with quick access to the internet and built-in web cam.
• Easily tote in your backpack with this ultra light weight design featuring a 10.1" display.
B% monthly discount on qualified charges.
Bring this ad and your student ID to an AT&T store and mention FAN #2638766 or visit: att.com/wireless/umdstudents
Get Yours Today
$199.99 FREE SHIPPING
After Mail-in Rebate
Pay $299.99 for device, and after mail-in rebate receive $100 AT&T Promotion Card. 2-year service agreement on qualifying DataConnect Plan required. AT&T Promotion Card valid for 120 days wherever major credit cards accepted. May be used to pay wireless bill. May not be used at ATMs or gas pumps.
at&t

COMICS

Line by Richard Martelly



Wondermark by David Malki!

CROSSWORD

ACROSS
1. Swedish money
6. Winged
10. Parts of a play
14. 9 9 9 9
15. Unadulterated
16. Person, place or thing
17. Base 8
18. Rodents
19. Story
20. Brothel
22. Part of an archipelago
23. Long, long time
24. Sheen
26. Sags
30. Bogus
32. Frolic
33. Not us
35. Hebrew unit of dry measure
39. Highly skilled
41. French for "Summer"
42. Rock
43. Male singing range
44. Magical symbol
46. Bit
47. A North American retail chain
49. Passed the tongue over
51. Sharp pierc-ing cry
54. Fled on foot
55. Partially carbonized vegetable matter
56. Numb
63. Hindu princess
64. Average
65. Left the engine running
66. Therefore
67. Crooked
68. Hang loosely
69. Biblical garden
70. Likelihood
71. Brusque

DOWN
1. Comprehend
2. Wealthy
3. Not deceived by
4. Close
5. Napping
6. Cooking bib
7. An elaborate Hawaiian feast
8. Products of human creativity
9. Sell again
10. Thoroughly clean
11. Seashore
12. Soft fine silk
13. Contemptuous look
21. Party thrower
25. Purposes
26. "Shucks!"
27. Travelled on a horse
28. Portent
29. Adversary
30. An unborn baby
31. Ends a prayer
34. German for "Mister"
36. On the end of a fisherman's line
37. ___ meridiem
38. Attached to one's neck
40. Tall woody plant
45. Distinctive flair
48. With hands on hips
50. Take a firm stand
51. Bender
52. Took heed
53. Cooktop
54. Leases
57. Require
58. Found on most beaches
59. Indolent
60. Smudge
61. Focusing glass
62. Border

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!
Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

"Bad Babysitting" by Mike Siipola

MIKESMAZE DARWIN!
FOOD, FUN, SPUDZOOKAS!
Weekends & Holidays 10am-5pm thru Nov 1
S. Main Street Rt. 47 Sunderland
www.mikesmaze.com
413-665-8331

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Google Maps has captured public urination from space.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Uggs has branched out into organic footwear: Nuggs.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Every person has a mute button buried deep in his or her abdomen.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Only respond to your "DJ name" today.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Today, picking your nose is a symbol. Its significance depends on the school of thought through which it is interpreted.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You are troubled. Is it because you are having trouble focusing your Chi?

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Enlightenment can be easily achieved by listening to the new Lil Jon.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Enhance your time management skills by running on marijuana-minutes.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
For every lock, there is a key. For every dollar: a Taco Bell value meal.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Discover what "The North Face" looks like before it's too late.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Recycling mistakes is not contributing to going green.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You've read the comics page, so we think you're an okay person. For now.

Hits Now 94.3 FM
The Valley's Hit Music Now in HD on 99.3 HD2
www.hits943.com

amherst cinema
Fri Sep 25 - Thu Oct 1
BIG FAN 2:15 4:30 7:15 9:15 +11:45am Sat & Sun
THE SEPTEMBER ISSUE 2:30 4:45 7:30 9:45 +12:00pm Sat & Sun
Cold Souls 7:00 9:30 NO SHOWS THU!
PONYO 2:00 4:15 +11:30am Sat & Sun
28 Amity St. Downtown Amherst www.amherstcinema.org (413) 253-2547

PLEASANT STREET THEATER
Fri Sep 25 - Thu Oct 1
SERAPHINE 5:00 7:30 10:00 +2:30 Sat & Sun +10:00am 2:30 Wed
TAKING WOODSTOCK 7:15 +2:45 Sat Sun & Wed
(500) DAYS OF SUMMER 5:15 9:45 +10:30 Wed
27 Pleasant St. Downtown Northampton www.pleasantstttheater.org (413) 584-5848

T Shirts & Sweatshirts in 1-3 Days!
sunraise printing
Custom Printed Tees
Student Discounts
586-7133
sunraiseprinting.com
Hadley, MA 01035

SUDOKU

6	8			5		2	3
					8		7
				7		6
		2
					7	3	6
	3	4	1		2
				8	5	7	4
		9			3
						8

"Club Nights" at the MONKEY BAR
9/24 Thirsty Thursday with DJ Yeahgui and Hot Sizzle
9/25 Dual Entertainment with Glisten Effect (live band) and DJ Construct
9/26 Dual Entertainment with Orange Television (live band) and DJ Burg
9/29 Techno Tuesday
413-259-1600
63 North Pleasant Street
Amherst, MA 01002
www.mymonkeybar.com

LA PIAZZA
pizza • and more
• specialty pizza
• wings
• calzones
• pasta
• salads
• desserts
OCMP Free Delivery
(413) 253-6444
www.lapiazzaamherst.com
2 medium cheese PIZZAS $13 Valid for Pickup and Delivery only Exp. 10/31/09
2 large cheese PIZZAS $18 Valid for Pickup and Delivery only Exp. 10/31/09

CLASSIFIEDS

EMPLOYMENT

Part-time personal care attendant. About 10-12 hours/week. Flexible Hours. Please Call Patrick (413)-275-7928

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided.

1-800-965-6520 ext. 162

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

Minutewomen get ready for comeback

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

With two struggling teams in Vermont and Quinnipiac coming up, the Massachusetts field hockey team will try to avoid a pair of possible trap games on the road this weekend.

The Minutewomen (5-2) are coming off a weekend where they almost defeated their second No. 9 ranked opponent of the season in Boston College (7-1). The near-upset combined with the win Saturday against Northeastern boosted UMass from a previous No. 11 ranking in the Kookaburra/NFHCA Division I National Coaches Poll to rounding out the top 10 this week.

Being ranked among the top 10 for the first time since 2000 is a testament to how well UMass has played this season. However, coach Justine Sowry believes that the team must now back up their national recognition with its play on the field for the remainder of the season.

"It's a great reward for the players and the program, and it's really been a result of years of hard work and preparation," Sowry said. "Here on out, I don't think it necessarily means a great deal unless we perform each game."

This weekend will show whether the Minutewomen are able to beat the teams. Sowry realizes the potential to overlook both opponents with another significant game against No. 3 Syracuse on the horizon, but feels her team will be prepared to take on the Catamounts and Bobcats this weekend.

"This is a danger week for us and a danger weekend. Having one of the toughest schedules in the country followed up by two lower ranked teams can be very dangerous," she said. "We're just revisiting the fact that we must respect our opponents, stick to the game plan, tidy up key areas of our game and bring out our best effort for the weekend."

UMass will first take on a familiar UVM team on Saturday. The two teams have matched up every season dating back to 2004, with the Minutewomen holding a 3-2 edge this decade.

This season, Vermont has had problems with their offense, and limps into Saturday's game with a 1-7 record. The Catamounts' only win this season came against UC Davis (3-5), when they had their best offensive output with three scores. Discounting that game though, UVM has only tallied a total of three goals while being held scoreless in five of its seven losses.

Last season, the Minutewomen and Catamounts were locked in a defensive grind the first half of the game. UMass finally got on the board with a goal 13 minutes into the second half and never looked back, coasting to a 2-0 victory.

Quinnipiac hasn't been much better this season either, as it enters Sunday's matchup with UMass searching for its first win. The Minutewomen outshot the Bobcats, 14-9, while the defense shut down the Quinnipiac offense for a 3-0 win last season.

With all of that being said, Sowry feels that Vermont and Quinnipiac have given UMass tough games. Regardless of their records this season, she isn't discounting the motivation that both opponents will have in knocking off a top 10 team.

"They will certainly be looking to redeem themselves and I think any opponent that plays against a ranked one will bring their 'A' game," Sowry said.

In terms of motivation for the Minutewomen, Sowry dismissed any notion that she had to inspire the team this week in practice.

"It's just become part of culture that every day, you [have] got to bring your best effort," she said. "We have a very high standard that we set for ourselves and we'll just continue to push the team and certain individuals to be the best they can be."

The Minutewomen have proven they can beat teams on their level as well as rise to the occasion to take down higher ranked opponents this season. After this weekend, we'll know if they can take care of business against the teams they should beat.

Jay Asser can be reached at jasser@student.umass.edu.

Sowry and Co. relying on underclassmen, UMass ranked No.10 in the nation

By Mike Gillmeister
Collegian Staff

The loss of any one offensive threat can often be overcome by a complete team effort. The Massachusetts field hockey team has tried to do just that after losing Mary Shea, Erin Parker and the Minutewomen's leading scorer in 2008, Katelyn Orlando to graduation.

UMass (5-2) leads the Atlantic 10 Conference with a 0.84 scoring margin against opponents this season and a team total of 14 penalty corner goals – half of the team's total goals.

This shows that the Minutewomen know how to get into an opponent's striking circle and catch unprepared defenses off-guard.

UMass coach Justine Sowry elects to use either defender Makaela Potts or forward Cher King in penalty situations, and both are productive in that role. Potts has three goals this season – two off penalty corners, including the game-winning goal against No. 14 James Madison (4-3). Two of King's team-leading three assists this season were on Potts' corner goals. King's lone goal came in the Minutewomen's 4-3 upset of then-No. 9 Iowa (1-5). Her unselfish and tactical play is what Sowry feels makes her such a formidable opponent.

"She has a great sense of the game and terrific possession skills," said Sowry of King.

King also has the only defensive save recorded by a Minutewoman.

While the UMass offense is potent, so, too, is its defense, led by All-American goalkeeper Alesha Widdall.

The total penalty corners forced against the Minutewomen so far this season is 78, and opponents put pressure on Widdall more so in the second half.

But as opposing pressure rises, so does Widdall's defensive prowess.

She's seen 64 shots after halftime, and her 0.818 save-percentage ranks seventh in the nation. Her 1.11 goals-against average is first in the A-10 and third in the Northeast Region behind Christine Hoffman (0.29) and Kristi Troch 0.57 of Albany (5-2). Widdall also leads the A-10 in shutouts (7), and as a team, UMass boasts a conference-low eight goals per-game.

Freshmen continue to impress

Sowry's recruiting class for this season is paying major dividends. Forwards Nicole Cordero and Kara Charochak already have one goal this season; Charochak scored against the Hawkeyes and Cordero scored against Boston College. The goals show the talent of both players, as both of them came against teams ranked in the top 10 nationally.

Cordero is a regular starter for the Minutewomen and is a fierce competitor on the forward line. Along with King, her possession skills give the forward line a similar look to last year's Orlando-led forwards.

Charochak is frequently the first player Sowry uses off the bench, and her six shots are second-most among all freshmen behind fellow forward Kim Young. Young is off to a slow start this season, but her selection to Junior National Camp this past summer along with her early enrollment at UMass shows why she is so highly regarded by Sowry for both her intelligence and dedication to the sport.

Midfield Kate Heineman recorded her first point of the season with an assist on Cordero's goal against the Eagles.

Climbing higher

The Kookaburra/NFHCA Division I Coaches Poll placed UMass at No. 10, the program's first top 10 ranking since 2000, when it reached No. 7. The Minutewomen knocked off then-No. 7 UConn that season – who UMass plays on Oct. 9 this season – to earn the ranking

The Minutewomen are 3-1 against ranked opponents this season and the loss this past weekend against No. 9 Boston College (7-1) came down to an overtime goal that gave a strong offensive Eagles team its second goal. Widdall held the nation's leading-scorer, BC's Chelsea Feole, to one goal that proved to be the game-winner.

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

PJ STANLEY-COLLEGIAN

Senior forward Jill Powers pushes the ball away from an opponent in a game last season. Powers and the rest of the Minutewomen will look to rebound after an overtime loss Sunday to BC when they take on Vermont on Saturday and Quinnipiac Sunday.

From class, to the library, to the dorm–
University of Massachussetts - Amherst students
Stay connected with a new Acer netbook from AT&T.

acer | ASPIRE one
• Roam on campus with built in Wi-Fi, access to the nations's fastest 3G network.
• Research on line and keep in touch with friends with quick access to the internet and built-in web cam.
• Easily tote in your backpack with this ultra light weight design featuring a 10.1" display.

8% monthly discount on qualified charges.
Bring this ad and your student ID to an AT&T store and mention FAN #2638766 or visit: att.com/wireless/umdstudents

Get Yours Today
$199.99 FREE SHIPPING
After Mail-in Rebate
Pay $299.99 for device and after mail-in rebate receive $100 AT&T Promotion Card.
2 year service agreement on qualifying DataConnect Plan required.
AT&T Promotion Card valid for 120 days wherever major credit cards accepted.
May be used to pay wireless bill. May not be used at ATMs or gas pumps.
at&t

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 2009 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen want two in a row

Minutemen face Stony Brook, defense looking for shutout

Senior tailback Tony Nelson (28) takes a handoff from quarterback Kyle Havens (12). UMass faces Stony Brook this Saturday at 6 p.m.

BY JEFFREY R. LARNARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts football team has had few hiccups the past two weeks, routing both Albany and Rhode Island.

With Stony Brook coming to Amherst this Saturday, most think it will be another easy victory.

But to the No. 15 Minutemen's coach, Kevin Morris, no team can be taken lightly, even the Seawolves who have started off slowly.

"Like every game, it is a must win for us, and we better be prepared because they are a quality team," Morris said prior to Tuesday's practice.

Morris would know, as he has numerous connections to the coaching staff at Stony Brook (1-2), and even coached at the Long Island school.

He was the offensive coordinator in 1999 before moving on to Northeastern, and later UMass (2-1, 1-0 Colonial Athletic Association).

The Seawolves possess a tandem of tailbacks in Edwin Gowins and Conte Cuttion. The two have combined to average 113 yards per game on the ground, and Cuttion has contributed to the passing game as well.

"They can fly, and they both average well over 100 yards a piece per game," Morris said of the tailbacks. "This year they are not doing as well early in the year right now, but they can still hit at anytime, so we have to take care of them."

To compliment the duo of running backs, Stony Brook utilizes two quarterbacks that pose a threat. Sophomore Michael Coulter has taken most of the snaps for the Seawolves in the first three games, but Dayne Hoffman has also seen time under center.

Through three games this season, the Seawolves offense has struggled to produce, averaging 14.7 points per game, but Morris is aware of what their offense is capable of, especially from the tailback position.

"They have two guys playing quarterback, and they both can throw it and they have some quality wideouts," Morris said. "But their tailbacks are who they really want to emphasize in their offense."

The Stony Brook offense may find it hard to get on a roll when they arrive at McGuirk Stadium, especially with the way UMass' defense has been playing. The Minutemen have not allowed their opposition to score in either the first or fourth quarters of the first three games, and has also not allowed an offensive touchdown in 10 quarters – a streak that started in the third quarter of Week 1 at Kansas State.

While UMass' defense has been suffocating, its opposition has still been able to put points on the board, meaning there is room for improvement. The unit has set goals in previous games of not allowing points in the third quarter, or not allowing any points in the second half, but this week, the goal is bigger.

"Shutout," cornerback Ke'Mon Bailey said of the team's goal for Saturday's game. "[A] one hundred percent shutout."

Even the Minutemen offense, which has been stronger with each game, sees room for improve-

See FOOTBALL on page 7

Bailey making an impact at new spot

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

During the Massachusetts football team's first winter workout, redshirt junior Ke'Mon Bailey approached coach Kevin Morris with a unique proposition.

He wanted to play defense.

Bailey, who had been a wide receiver up until that point in his college career, was looking to switch to cornerback, a position that had been vacated after All-Americans Sean Smalls and Courtney Robinson graduated.

"He told me at first that if they needed me to play receiver, I had to come back, but to try it out anyway, but to not count on [playing defense]," Bailey said of Morris' reaction.

Through the first three games, though, Morris and the No. 15 Minutemen have had to count on Bailey. Since winning the job during training camp, Bailey has excelled at his new position. With 12 tackles (six solo), three pass deflections and a fumble recovery through three games, Bailey has hit the ground running in his first year on the defensive side of the ball.

Such productivity, though, was far from unexpected for Morris.

"We were looking for guys to help out the team [in] any way they can," Morris said. "Ke'Mon's always been a team guy, and he stepped right up into the role, and I feel he's done a tremendous job."

Bailey played defensive back in high school in addition to wide receiver, but in his transition at the college level, he had to virtually relearn the position.

"I took some from it," Bailey said about what he kept from his high school play. "But I started basically from scratch. I went back home, had to train real hard with my trainer to get back into the transition of backpedalling, coming out of

See BAILEY on page 7

THOM KENDALL FOR UMASS ATHLETICS

Originally a wide reciever, redshirt junior Ke'mon Bailey has already turned heads making plays as a defensive back for the Minutemen

Offense still lacking

UM looks to generate more goals Saturday

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In both of its two runs to the NCAA Tournament, the Massachusetts men's soccer team was better known for its defense that could shut down opponents, while its offense did enough to keep the Minutemen in games.

This year, the offense has seen a drought in its first five games, even by its own standards. The Minutemen (1-3-1) are dead last in the Atlantic 10 with three goals on the season. Last season, UMass relied on help from Mike DeSantis and Prince Ofosu for nine combined goals, but with both graduating, the Minutemen are now searching for someone else to step up.

Early on, that someone looked to be sophomore Chris Roswess. In the Minutemen's first and only pre-season game against Adelphi, he tallied both goals in their 2-1 victory.

Since then, Roswess has yet to score during the regular season, although he did pick up another two scores in UMass's latest exhibition against Winstars.

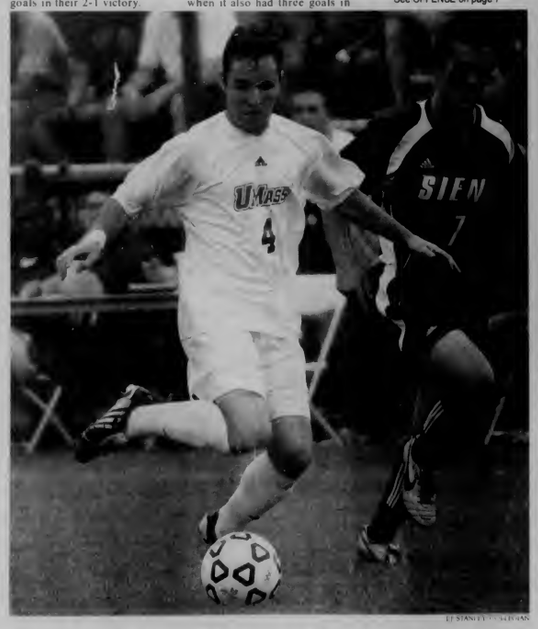
"He's certainly dangerous every time he steps on the field," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "He's created some good opportunities and he's scored in some games that haven't counted, but now we need him to score in games that do count."

Assistant coach Roy Fink, who works as an offensive specialist, believes that he has the potential to replace some of the scoring load missing from the graduated players, but part of his effectiveness is having other players step up as well.

"Chris is a very technical and good player, and he's almost going by himself on top, but he's getting a lot of focus from the defenders," Fink said.

The last time UMass had this slow of a start was in 1998, when it also had three goals in five games.

That team was shut-out three times before it scored its first goal of the season against Maine, and continued to struggle, posting a 4-12-2 record.



UMass is already in better shape than the 1998 team with its first win coming last weekend against Northeastern, and has also has the A-10's best defense with four goals.

But as Koch knows, defense only goes so far. In last year's NCAA Tournament, the Minutemen kept Harvard scoreless for all of regulation. It wasn't until Crimson forward Andre Apkan scored the golden goal in the 103rd minute that knocked UMass out of the tournament.

UMass also lost the A-10 Championship to Dayton despite giving up one goal.

"Part of the object in soccer is to score goals," Fink said. "But we are traditionally a very good,

See OFFENSE on page 7

EJ STANLEY/COLLEGIAN

Junior midfielder Ben Arikian finds an open man against Siena last season. The Minutemen beat the Saints, 1-0, last season, as the Minutemen will look to Arikian on the offensive side of the ball.

UMass wants to control ball, take pressure off defense, goalies

EJ STANLEY/COLLEGIAN

Junior midfielder Stuart Amick will move into the midfield to generate more scoring for a UMass team that has scored just three goals in five games so far this season.

Minutemen head to Siena for final non-conference road game

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch isn't a fan of turf fields, or as he calls it, "plastic grass."

But for the second week in a row, the Minutemen will have to deal with that sort of playing environment.

UMass (1-3-1) will head to Loudonville, N.Y., this weekend to play Siena on Sept. 26. The Saints (4-2) already have experience playing Atlantic 10 teams on their home field this season, with the Minutemen being the third team to come to Siena Turf Field.

So far, Siena has fared well against A-10 teams, beating Rhode Island, 1-0, on Sept. 6, and a 3-2 victory over St. Bonaventure on Sept. 11.

Koch knows this weekend is going to be a challenge for his team, but the Minutemen have the comfort of coming off their first win against Northeastern last Saturday with a 1-0 victory. He believes this game should be a good non-conference test for his players, with it being the last road game before UMass opens its A-10 schedule.

"Their place is a very difficult place to play, but we're playing a little bit better, and it will be a good test for us," Koch said.

UMass currently has the league's best defense, allowing

See M. SOCCER on page 7

the daily collegian

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM SEPTEMBER 25, 2009

inside this issue:

A-10 schedule begins

SEE PAGE 13

"Trail of Dead" rocks

SEE PAGE 9

Gain credit control

SEE PAGE 2

Charitable 'Chi' support Red Cross

KIRSTEN SWENSON/COLLEGIAN

Theta Chi Fraternity held a charity carnival on the library lawn to support the American Red Cross. Students that donated to the Red Cross received free Life Water beverages.

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN

CXVIX
ISSUE 14

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief William McGuinness
Managing Editor S P. Sullivan
Business Manager Daniel Jette
Production Manager Michael Sarkes
Night Supervisor Kirsten Swenson
Advertising Manager Michael Tortorici
Advertising Production Max Detmer
Arts & Living Editor Shayna Murphy
Comics Editor Annie Keithline
Editorial Editor Nick O'Malley
News Editor Nick Bush
Sports Editor Jeffrey R. Larnard
Web Editor Brian Wood
Photo Editor Matthew Harrison
IT Manager Victor Jacek
Asst. Business Manager Matt Zolnierz
Assistant Advertising Nicole Jacinto
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Distribution Manager Norman Provost
Classified Manager Katelyn Tamilio
Asst. Arts & Living Justin Gagnon
Asst. Arts & Living Elyse Horowitz
Asst. Arts & Living Cal Scannell
Assistant Comics Andrew Witts
Assistant Editorial Michael Phillis
Assistant Editorial Hannah Nelson
Assistant News Samuel Butterfield
Assistant News Alyssa Creamer
Assistant News Jenn Heshion
Assistant Sports David Brinch
Assistant Sports Mike Gillmeister
Assistant Sports Adam Miller
Assistant Photo Maxwell Sparr
Assistant Multimedia Sara Cody
Assistant Multimedia Chris Shores

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
ON STAFF TODAY

NIGHT EDITOR
S.P. SULLIVAN

COPY EDITOR
HANNAH MCGOLDRICK

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
MICHAEL SARKES

Nursing school wins grant

By Jennifer Heshion
Collegian Staff

For the second year in a row, the School of Nursing at the University of Massachusetts Amherst has received another welcomed grant which seeks to increase the student enrollment for those coming from disadvantaged backgrounds.

Through the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation (RWJF), the Nursing school has been awarded a $120,000 grant for the purpose of lessening the national nursing shortage by increasing the diversity of students in accelerated training programs.

Last year the Nursing School was the recipient of another grant in the sum of $80,000, which, along with the newest one, was also distributed by the RWJF's New Careers in Nursing Scholarship Program.

Launched by the RWJF in conjunction with the American Association of Colleges of Nursing (AACN), the newly received grant was established in order to expand the diversity of students in nursing programs by providing funding for students from underprivileged backgrounds.

Genevieve E. Chandler, associate professor of nursing and project director, who wrote and also received the grant, said that the University had been bestowed this gift the second time around because the RWJF had recognized the lack of diversity among the nursing students, which she said was once a mainly female dominated profession.

"RWJF noticed in the research reports that it is really important that the nursing population be as diverse as the general population," Chandler said. "Previously we did not have enough diversity among applicants, but after we received the first grant last year, we quadrupled our pool of applicants."

The new grant will offer scholarships to 12 applicants from underrepresented or financially disadvantaged groups to help them pursue a degree from the nursing program without leaving them or their families financially crippled.

The potential scholarship recipients will be recruited from the UMass campuses in Amherst, Lowell and Dartmouth, the Five Colleges, Baystate Medical Center programs and other local colleges.

The new endowment for the Nursing School has been awarded just a matter of months after the UMass class of 1959 donated $90,000 in scholarships as a reunion gift to the University for nursing students in the doctoral program.

Last June, the donation was given to the University to aid those nursing PhD students who qualify for financial assistance as well as a means to entice new students to the School of Nursing.

Jean E. Swinney, interim dean of the School of Nursing, says this latest grant award is a welcome boost for a program that is on the rise.

"To meet the needs of an increasingly more diverse and older population, it is imperative the School of Nursing increase the number of highly educated new nurses entering our nation's workforce," Swinney said.

According to a 2008 report by the AACN, there was just a 2.2 percent enrollment increase in entry-level baccalaureate programs in nursing programs, which the organization concluded was insufficient due to the projected demand for qualified nurses.

The report also stated that nursing schools in the U.S. had turned away 49,948 qualified applicants from baccalaureate and graduate nursing programs in 2008 because of an inadequate number of faculty, clinical sites, classroom space, clinical preceptors and budget constraints. Nearly two-thirds of the nursing schools responding to the survey conducted by AACN selected faculty shortages as a reason for not accepting all qualified applicants into their programs.

Faculty shortages are common with universities such as UMass, where all members of the nursing teaching staff must have a Ph.D in order to educate students. According to Chandler, with the grant from the RWJF, more students will be given the financial security to pursue a nursing degree which they can then use to practice in the field or become educators themselves.

Jennifer Heshion can be reached at jheshion@student.mass.edu

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

Nursing student sophomore Trish Perkins prepares for her nursing courses at UMass.

Gov. Patrick takes on plastic

By Michael Phillis
Collegian Staff

The Deval Patrick Administration has begun to initiate "Project Credit Smarts," a drive to inform college freshmen – including those at the University of Massachusetts Amherst – about the dangers of credit cards, gimmicks, fees and debt.

The Project Credit Smarts seminar, according to the Massachusetts Office of Consumer Affairs and Business Regulation (OCABR), will be on the UMass Amherst campus sometime in October.

The program will be geared towards incoming freshmen, but any student is welcome to attend. A free slideshow is available on the OCABR website that outlines the program. Teaching of the seminar will be done by OCABR staff, and, according to Undersecretary of the OCABR Barbara Anthony, it will not cost UMass anything.

"Our goal here [is] to teach a crash course to college students about how to be credit smart when it comes to credit and credit cards," said Anthony.

Sallie Mae and Nellie Mae – financial companies that specialize in college student services – conducted a survey in April of 2009, concluding that the mean credit card balance for college students is at its highest ever – $3,100. The same study found that college students on average graduate with over $4,100 in credit card debt compared to just $2,900 of

See CREDIT on page 3

ALYSSA CREAMER/COLLEGIAN

University of Massachusetts students frequently use credit cards to pay for meals and snacks in the Campus Center Blue Wall.

Students warned to be wary of credit

CREDIT from page 2

four years ago.

Anthony cited the high rates of debt that college students hold as a primary reason for the formulation of Project Credit Smarts.

On Sept. 16, Governor Deval Patrick announced the program at Roxbury Community College. "Young adults need to … develop responsible financial management skills."

As debt increases, Anthony claims that students are setting out on their own with a very limited knowledge of how to manage their personal finances. Project Credit Smarts is meant to help those new college students understand the consequences that taking out large numbers of credit cards and succumbing to free gifts from credit card companies can have on a person's financial well being.

Patrick Callahan of UMass relations said of the program, "(OCABR) is going to run [Project Credit Smarts] for the benefit of our students."

So far, there are nine colleges and nine businesses that are taking part in Project Credit Smarts. Those nine colleges are mainly focused in the Boston area and include such schools as Bentley College, Wellesley College and Fitchburg State College, along with UMass Amherst.

OCABR is collaborating with such business organizations as the Federal Trade Commission, the FDIC, and Sallie Mae, who was awarded, according to their Web site, a contract through the Department of Education "for the servicing of federal student loans" that has allowed the company to immediately add $100 billion in volume.

Massachusetts GOP communications director Tarah Donoghue commented that it was hypocritical for the Patrick Administration to teach financial common sense.

"I find it ironic that the Patrick-Murray Administration is educating students about credit card use, but cannot even manage their own out of control spending in Massachusetts," said Donoghue.

It was acknowledged that the recession has added to the recent tumult of student finances and debt management.

"Credit card debt is increasing for college students. [The] numbers are going up. It's a reasonable connection to make that in recessionary times, everyone works hard, and it is more tempting than ever to use credit to pay for things," said Anthony.

The Sallie Mae study said that one-in-five college students would have more than $7,000 in credit card debt – not including student loans – by the time of their graduation.

One of the biggest problems for college students is that most buy schools supplies like textbooks on credit, which vastly increase the student's debt.

On the Project Credit Smarts slideshow, an example is given in order to demonstrate what an 18 percent interest rate on a credit card might mean in the long term.

According to the slides, a thousand dollars of textbooks bought on an 18.5 percent credit card – if the minimum is paid every month – would take nine years to pay off and cost the debtor an extra thousand dollars in addition to the initial cost of the books.

According to advocates of the Project Credit Smarts program, another big problem for students in debt are gimmicks in credit reports. The catchy jingles of the company freecreditreport.com are given as an example of something to stay away from. The fine print of the company's print ads are blown up reading, "If you don't cancel your membership within the 14-day trial, you will be billed $14.95," for each month of continued membership.

Credit reports can be obtained for free; Project Credit Smarts advises that credit reports should never be paid for.

Former UMass faculty member and current Chairman of the FDIC, Sheila Bair, commented on the importance of the program. She said, "Being financially astute is nothing less than an essential survival tool." Project Credit Smarts warns students that not educating yourself to personal financial matters can lead to bad credit reports. Bad credit reports can lead to trouble finding a job, renting an apartment or even gaining entrance to graduate school.

Michael Phillis can be reached at mphillis@student.umass.edu.

Millions allocated to fix Mississippi water quality

By Tom Meersman
McClatchy Newspapers

MINNEAPOLIS – The river that begins as a trickle in Itasca State Park in Minnesota and ends 2,350 miles later at the Gulf of Mexico will get a $320 million infusion from the federal government to improve water quality.

U.S. Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack announced a program Thursday that will provide the money over the next four years to Minnesota and 11 other states in the Mississippi River basin.

Calling the river "a critical national resource," Vilsack said the Mississippi River Basin Healthy Watersheds Initiative will attempt to reduce excessive nitrogen and phosphorus runoff from farms that enter the river through its tributaries and create a "dead zone" each summer in the Gulf of Mexico. The nutrients cause vast algae blooms that eventually die, sink to the bottom, and are consumed by bacteria that rob the water of most of its oxygen.

In 2009 the dead zone covered about 3,000 square miles, slightly larger than Delaware. Although the zone was somewhat smaller than in other recent years, scientists and environmental leaders have expressed alarm since the 1990s about the large amounts of chemicals moving through the river, and

See MISSISSIPPI on page 4

SGA ELECTIONS
★★★★★★★★★★★★
RUN
As a Write-in Candidate

BUILD CONNECTIONS.
MAKE YOUR VOICE HEARD.
BECOME A LEADER!

CONTACT THE CHANCELLOR OF ELECTIONS
FOR MORE INFORMATION.

VOTE
Senate, Selected House Councils &
Sylvan Lt. Governor

SEPTEMBER 28 & 29
CAMPUS CENTER 11AM-4:30PM
ALL DINING COMMONS 5-9PM

CHRISTOPHER FAULKNER - CHANCELLOR OF ELECTIONS
OFFICE HOURS: TUESDAYS 2:30-3:30, WEDNESDAYS 1:30-3:30
IN THE SGA OFFICE (420 STUDENT UNION)

THE ELECTIONS COMMISSION
STUDENT GOVERNMENT ASSOCIATION
ELECTIONSCOMMISSION@STUAF.UMASS.EDU
BLOGS.UMASS.EDU/ECSGA
UMASS AMHERST

Thailand sees HIV vaccine breakthrough

By Fred Tasker
M.C. Gazette Newspapers

MIAMI — As an HIV vaccine breakthrough in Thailand stirs interest and hope, a pioneering AIDS researcher at the University of Miami Medical School says she is preparing to start human trials for a new vaccine that would fight the deadly virus.

While the Thai experiment is the first to prevent infection by the HIV virus that creates AIDS, Dr. Margaret Fischl of University of Miami is working on a vaccine that would be given to patients already infected with HIV to help boost their immune systems to fight off the disease. Both vaccines are years away.

If successful, the Fischl vaccine could replace the two-and three-drug "cocktails" of antiretroviral drugs now used to improve and prolong the lives of people with HIV. That approach is expensive and also produces numerous side effects.

Fischl is one the world's most respected AIDS researchers. In 1987, she was instrumental in developing AZT, a breakthrough that provided the first effective antiviral medicine that stopped AIDS from killing nearly all of its victims. It is still in use today along with many newer drugs, and AIDS deaths have plummeted.

Her new vaccine, being developed in conjunction with a major out-of-state biotech firm, has been successful in treating HIV in small mammals up to the size of rhesus monkeys. It should be ready for human trials by about January, she said.

"The goal is to use the vaccine as the mainstay of treatment, so infected people would no longer need HAART (highly active anti-retroviral therapy) with its expense and side effects," Fischl said. "With this they would take a shot every year to boost their systems and keep them in shape."

Alan Bernstein, executive director of the New York-based Global HIV Vaccine Enterprise, which is not involved in Fischl's study, called news of Fischl's vaccine trial "great news for people who already have HIV."

"Obviously, the vaccine in the Thai trial would not help people who already have HIV" because it's given to uninfected people to prevent HIV, he said. "So this vaccine would be very complementary."

Also, he said, people who control HIV with anti-retroviral drugs are never cured and must stay on the drugs for life. And he said new research suggests that such people are developing signs of premature aging, such as arthritis and early dementia.

Since a therapeutic vaccine would be aimed more directly at the HIV virus, it might have fewer toxic side effects, he said. It, too, would not be a cure.

Fischl and the biotech firm, which she cannot yet name, have been working on the new vaccine for years. She said more details will be released soon. It has been successful "in vitro" in the lab, and worked well in trials with six rhesus monkeys who had been infected with the HIV virus, she said.

"We know the vaccine works all the way up to the monkey model. We know its safety profile already," Fischl said. By about January, she said, it should be ready for its first trials in humans. About 30 volunteers would be recruited at several universities.

Human trials are very sensitive, she said.

"I feel very strongly that when you do a study in humans, even if you have volunteers lined up around the block, you move slowly. You give a dose to the first patient, and you wait to make sure there are no side effects. Then you give it to the second patient."

Eventually the vaccine would be given to humans with HIV who then would go off their anti-retroviral medicines. They would be watched carefully to see if any had "breakthroughs" of the HIV virus.

If all goes well, the new vaccine could seek "fast-track" approval by the FDA and be on the market in about three years, she said.

Around the world, at least 15 AIDS vaccine trials are under way at various stages with more than 8,500 volunteer subjects in the United States, Brazil, South Africa, Thailand and Peru, according to the HIV Vaccine Trials Network, which tracks HIV vaccine research. Drug companies involved include Merck, Wyeth, Chiron, NOVAD, Therion, GeoVax and others. Two previous trials in Thailand were failures.

In the United States, HIV/AIDS has gone from a lethal epidemic to a chronic disease. New HIV infections peaked in the mid-1980s at about 130,000 cases per year, declined quickly in 1995 when anti-retroviral drugs came on the market, but have plateaued since at about 55,000 new cases per year according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

South Florida is especially hard-hit. In Miami-Dade in 2008, one in every 82 Hispanic men, one in every 60 non-Hispanic white men and one in every 29 African-American men are living with HIV, according to the Florida Department of Health.

In Broward, those living with HIV include one in 98 Hispanic men, one in 76 non-Hispanic white men and one in every 42 African-American men.

At the end of 2007 more than 500,000 persons in the 34 states that report such statistics were living with HIV/AIDS.

Worldwide, about 33 million people were living with HIV/AIDS, with 2.7 million new infections that year, according to the World Health Organization.

River's excessive nitrogen overspill set to slow down their repercussions on the Gulf's ecosystem.

MISSISSIPPI from page 3

Wayne Anderson, principal engineer for the Minnesota Pollution Control Agency, was pleased by Thursday's announcement. "It's putting together some money that can start to make a difference and get the ball rolling," he said. For whatever reasons, said Anderson, federal agencies have been able to collaborate on studying the problem for years, but not to fund direct solutions.

Anderson represented Minnesota at the Gulf Hypoxia Task Force meeting in Des Moines where Vilsack's message was delivered by video. The task force includes 10 states and five federal agencies, and was established more than a decade ago to work on the problem.

The new federal effort is designed to help farmers introduce conservation and management practices that avoid, control and trap runoff from their fields. Those may include planting more grasslands and wider buffer zones near waterways, changing tilling practices to reduce soil erosion and restoring or enlarging natural wetlands to slow down runoff.

The program will be voluntary, and states and local governments in priority watersheds will need to compete for the funds through the Natural Resources Conservation Service, a division of the USDA. The $80 million a year being spent on the initiative will come from conservation funds created as part of last year's farm bill.

In Minnesota, much of the phosphorus and nitrogen comes from farm fields across the state that drain into the Minnesota River, a major tributary of the Mississippi. Nutrients also come from livestock manure, and from leaves and fertilizers that wash into waterways from cities.

Bob Shepard, administrator for the Minnesota Farm Bureau, said he supports the initiative. "I think Minnesota farmers and ranchers would look forward to working on those practices to help the situation," he said.

Anderson said that Minnesota contributes 4 to 7 percent of the nutrients to the Gulf, according to studies, and that some nutrients may never leave the state, but accumulate in lakes and creates local problems. He said that federal funding and a national focus on the problem is the best way to solve what's affecting the Gulf. "It's important to do our part, but also to know that other states are working on this too, so that what we do (in Minnesota) is going to make a difference," he said.

In his announcement, Vilsack pledged to "clean up the entire Mississippi River Basin, a critical natural resource that provides drinking water for tens of millions of Americans."

He acknowledged that industrial, municipal, residential, and agricultural sources have all contributed pollutants to river. The entire basin includes about 41 percent of land in the U.S., outside of Alaska and Hawaii. It takes about 90 days for water to travel from the headwaters to the Gulf of Mexico.

The Environmental Defense Fund praised the initiative, saying it "holds tremendous promise for addressing one of the nation's biggest environmental priorities."

Michael Reuter, director of conservation strategies for the Nature Conservancy in the central U.S.,

Shown above is the Mississippi River, which will be receiving $320 million to curtail the excess amount of nitrogen and phosphorous spilling into its banks.

editorial&opinion

"FREE SPEECH IS THE WHOLE THING, THE WHOLE BALL GAME. FREE SPEECH IS LIFE ITSELF" - SIR SALMAN RUSHDIE EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Campus security and 'tailgating' concerns

Brian Benson

When passing through doorways, there is a certain distance at which it is acceptable to hold the door for individuals not far behind you, and one at which this is inappropriate. If someone is too far, it is awkward and often unnecessary to do this. If someone is too close, it is often rude not to. Students are told not to hold doors open for people passing through the dormitories, or let people "tailgate" into the residence halls.

But try as they might, it is often impossible to stop this from happening. What are you supposed to do if you leave a hall and someone you do not know is nearly at the door? If you have already left, and the door is closing behind you, is there any real socially acceptable way to tell strangers to wait until it is closed for them to swipe their cards? There is not. It will happen.

Campus security staffs individuals at front desks so residents will identify themselves as positively belonging to a specific building. As much as this is almost unequivocally a good thing, there are clearly no perfect systems, and I do not suspect reasonable people expect them. There are only so many hours security staff can deter would-be criminals from entering. They are people. They need to sleep. And when they do, unlawful entrances happen either because entering or exiting students cannot reasonably halt people from snagging closing doors, or otherwise. Most of these incidents involve visitors with no malicious intent. Some of them, unfortunately, result in robberies.

> Security cannot be afforded constantly, and we cannot always be protected. At a certain point, the populace can simply not point fingers at those charged with the responsibility of keeping it generally safe, and the onus comes to the individual to make himself safe.

It cannot be said that campus security is lacking or insufficient when this happens. At least, this cannot be said if it occurs after working hours when traffic is low and the sun will soon rise. Security cannot be afforded constantly, and we cannot always be protected. At a certain point, the populace can simply not point fingers at those charged with the responsibility of keeping it generally safe, and the onus comes to the individual to make himself safe. Those robbed do not need to be considered at fault, to be regarded thoughtless. In the same way, those who give closing doors that one extra passing bump – even if only to be polite – are doing something equally negligent. This may not be a tactful way of framing the issue, but it is an honest one. Every single one of us has done this at some point or another, and nearly none of them result in any form of harm.

Indeed, this is a point that warrants a moment of closer examination. Barring a kind of optimism-pessimism dichotomy, a perfectly reasonable observation of human behaviors is that a fraction of people are ill-natured. Few people have been robbed on this campus relative to the number of those who have not. In a very real way, we are safe. Recent events need only serve as a reminder of something people, in general, already knew: there is a clear distinction between being cautious in a way where we inhibit healthy social functioning and one in which we prevent the comparatively rare from racking our comfort and wallets.

So keep your room doors locked at all times, whether you are sleeping or not. Even if you leave for a matter of seconds, lock your door and take your key with you. As a special word of advice to the freshmen reading this piece, have frank discussions with your roommates about doing exactly the same. There is no good reason not to.

Brian Benson is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at bbenson@student.umass.edu.

The technological fountain of youth

Ben Moriarty

In less than two decades, we could all be as robotic as my old soccer coach who had two metal hips and a cold heart. He also got perms, and he reminded me of Willy Wonka. I don't want to be like that man.

But the best part wouldn't be that we would be robots - because that would be pretty lame and nerdy and reminiscent of that horrible Bicentennial Man movie - but that we would become immortal. This is what Ray Kurzweil said this past week to the Telegraph in the UK.

Who is Ray Kurzweil? Wikipedia told me [and I astutely and independently verified] he is an "author, entrepreneur, scientist, futurist," and I told myself, he is "friendless." Just kidding, I'm sure he has at least one friend.

The premise of what Kurzweil is saying, according to the Telegraph, is that because of the rate in which we are gaining knowledge, "in around 20 years we will have the means to reprogramme our bodies' stone-age software so we can halt, then reverse, ageing…Ultimately, nanobots will replace blood cells and do their work thousands of times more effectively."

Whoop-de-doo! That sounds fascinating. Actually, this does: "Virtual sex will become commonplace." Instead of regular porn, you can be even more pathetic…and still not have to use your imagination. Imagine that.

While thinking of this reminds us of all the dystopian novels we read in high school, instilling fear on what could happen regarding wars and governmental control in the future, I think the real problem is that people would want to live forever. Or even longer than the general 80 years that people usually get.

And this has been happening for centuries. In the sixteenth century, Ponce de Leon sought out the Fountain of Youth. Even Herodotus in the fifth century B.C. spoke about a special water that granted youth. In the past century, one of the main goals of science has been to figure out how to make people who nuke each other and gorge themselves with food live longer.

> To many, religious people seem to grapple onto religion because "it is a crutch for the weak." What they are saying is that they are afraid of death, and that they believe in a God or an afterlife because they don't want to envision having nothing after death.

As long as they can. Good grief.

For most people, what gives life a purpose is that it ends. Not all, but for a lot of people, life is special because you have a limited time to do things, so you make it worth it. Yet, we still keep trying to extend life as long as possible, even willing to live in states which are not at all appealing to anyone, unless you like being immobilized experiencing dementia or senility.

The problem seems quite simply to be that most people are afraid to die, and want to extend that date as long as possible. We not only try to extend the actual lifespan, but also try to extend our quality of life at the end, in order to somehow rationalize extending it absurdly. Not to say that one should want to die, but as of now, and I imagine for a long time, we all are going to.

Unless we find a way to become cyborgs in order to evade this.

To many, religious people seem to grapple onto religion because "it is a crutch for the weak." What they are saying is that they are afraid of death, and that they believe in a God or an afterlife because they don't want to envision having nothing after death.

And I ask myself, what are we doing now by trying to extend life as long as it can possibly stretch, searching out Fountains of Youth, finding it necessary to live forever?

The answer to this question is undoubtedly something along the lines of, "life is good," "life is fun," "I want to experience more things."

Well, if you could experience everything, you would. And then what? At some point, you are going to have done everything you want, and you will have met one too many people to realize what Sartre was talking about when he said, "Hell is other people." And you're going to realize what Mellencamp meant when he said, "life goes on, long after the thrill of living is gone." The thrill will be gone.

The problem isn't that one doesn't want to extend their life as long as they can, it's that people are trying to extend their life as long as they can because they are afraid of what all know will happen when death comes.

Ben Moriarty is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at bmoriarty@student.umass.edu.

Reflecting on a summer of adrenaline

Summer should be a thrilling time for all college students. Ask yourself this: while you were away during the summer months, have a job that you hated? Did you listlessly count down the days until the start of the school year because you couldn't bear the monotony of your static existence? Or, did you seize the opportunity to learn something about yourself, your passions and life in general?

Lauren Strohmeier

During last winter break, I began to plan out my summer. I spent the wintry days in painstaking deliberation about how I wanted to make the most of my time off from school. "What should I do?" I pondered. Various ideas ran through my mind, which all shared a common theme. All of the ideas involved the great outdoors. The possibilities were endless; I could work as a counselor for an outdoor camp in Colorado, as a guide for a zip lining tour company or even as a guide on a whale-watching boat in Alaska. Or, and this one peaked my interest in particular, I could work as a whitewater rafting guide. After a few days of introspection, I opted for a whitewater experience.

Now, the ironic thing is that prior to my summer as a whitewater rafting guide, I did not have a paddle stroke to my name. Up until the summer, I had mostly concerned myself with terrestrial pursuits, such as hiking and backpacking. However, the novelty of the idea greatly appealed to me. I craved something fresh and unfamiliar. Whitewater rafting also had the perfect recipe: the outdoors and adrenaline. After all, those two ingredients are my soul's sustenance.

Fortunately, not much time elapsed before I was hired by a whitewater rafting company within the Nantahala Gorge in North Carolina. I had never been to North Carolina before, but I was excited by the prospect of immersing myself in an entirely new environment.

Let me fast forward to my arrival in North Carolina. My first night at the Gorge was somewhat surreal, possessing an otherworldly and ethereal quality. As I arrived at the company site, I gazed at the employee housing with unfettered delight. It seemed like a summer dream come true. Three wooden shacks, which were adorned by seemingly random pieces of ornamentation, formed a half-circle. In the center of the half-circle was a fire pit, giving promise to the possibility of future times spent around campfires. The shacks were enveloped by trees, which reached grandly into the sky and formed a cozy, protective canopy over the shacks. Colored Christmas lights, which dangled from the shacks and the trees, cast a comforting, fluorescent glow into the dark thicket of forest. To put it quite simply, the place screamed, "charismatic."

The unpredictable nature of whitewater rafting was alluring, and it drove me into a heightened state of awareness whenever I was guiding. Pumped up by an adrenaline-induced high, I couldn't quite get enough of the Nantahala.

The first few weeks spent at the Gorge were chaotic. Whitewater rafting was entirely unfamiliar to me. Therefore, I set about trying to acquire that "river-sense" that every river guide must possess. Learning to read a river is no simple task, especially for the novice. It's almost analogous to getting to know a person. The river has a distinct personality that needs to be figured out in order to allow for the comfortable commingling of human and river. As I spent more and more time on river, the Nantahala begrudgingly opened up to me, and I began to learn about some of its secrets and quirks. It was a learning process that was both difficult and exhilarating. The unpredictable nature of whitewater rafting was alluring, and it drove me into a heightened state of awareness whenever I was guiding. Pumped up by an adrenaline-induced high, I couldn't quite get enough of the Nantahala.

The wonders did not end there, however. As corny as it sounds, the most affecting moments came during my exchanges with the people I met there. My co-workers and I were a motley crew of characters, each one of us dynamic in our own way. Yet, we all shared one thing in common: a prevailing love for whitewater and an affinity for nature. I learned many important lessons through my interactions with these people, and these relationships formed an integral part of my experience in the Gorge.

I recall one instance in particular. I was given a family to guide down the river. A young girl, who was around eight years old, was in tears before the trip even began. Her conspicuous fright gave me the added pressure of alleviating some of her anxiety, as well as giving her an experience that she would enjoy. As the trip commenced and the raft bobbed up and down with the motion of the waves, the girl's crying subsided and was replaced by an indomitable grin and delightful laughter. After the trip, she ran up to me with her hands held wide, and embraced me. Let me tell you, that was one memorable hug.

My experience as a guide was jam-packed full of moments like those. It was a seductive summer, one that engaged me in every way. Never once did I find myself counting down the days until the start of the school year. It was a summer lived moment-to-moment. The only downside is that I'm now going through whitewater withdrawal. I'm determined to get my fix soon.

Lauren Strohmeier is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at lstrohme@student.umass.edu.

For the record: Due to a production error, the printed version of Collegian Columnist Alana Goodman's column entitled "Institutionalized Racism in Student Government" contained several mechanical errors that were not the fault of the author. Terms were improperly modified to comply with the Collegian style guide, obscuring the author's intentions. To read the piece as the author intended, as well as a response from SGA member Sam Dreyfus, please visit DailyCollegian.com.

arts&living

Yo News, Sports and Ed/Op, I'm really happy for you and Imma let you finish, but Arts & Living is the best Collegian section of all time...

YOUR WEEKEND GUIDE TO ART, MUSIC, FILM & CULTURE ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

COURTESY OF AMERICAN ZOETROPE

Francis Ford Coppola uses overwhelming visuals in his latest film "Tetro," which pays perfect homage to classic melodrama. The film, starring Vincent Gallo, is now showing at Amherst Cinema.

'Tetro' Dazzles, manipulates magnificently

By Mark Schiffer
Collegian Correspondent

Marvel at the pyrotechnic kaleidoscope that is Francis Ford Coppola's "Tetro!" Be amazed, as Vincent Gallo's titular character somehow manages to chew every piece of scenery on screen! Be astounded by the sensual curves of Maribel Verdu's Miranda, who's kisses have the capacity to shatter glasses of champagne! Be wowed by Coppola's operatic pretensions being projected in glorious black and white (and occasionally, color).

Tetro is a visually gripping film driven by smoke and mirrors, from the opening shot of a moth flying against a light bulb, to the closing city traffic that is rendered almost abstract by the camera's lingering gaze. There is not a single frame of this film that doesn't feel obsessively pored over, as if every moment needed to contain the very artistic integrity held so dear by its protagonist.

Coppola proves himself once again to be a more-than-able director. This is not a comment to take lightly. Critics once wondered whether or not the director, known for his misses (Jack, Dracula), as much as his hits (The Godfather, The Conversation), would ever reclaim his status as one of the titans of American filmmaking. While the non-technical aspects may leave something to be desired (the third act drags a bit), it is difficult to deny that this film, at the very least, points the way to further success both artistically and commercially for the filmmaker.

Viewers are presented with a tale of two brothers, separated at a young age. We have Tetro (Vincent Gallo), the damaged (quite literally, in the film's first half) former writer who leaves his home on the cusp of adulthood to live in anonymity in Buenos Aires. It would be easy to dismiss his performance as over-the-top, melodramatic, and ham-fisted. But that wouldn't be playing by the film's rules. He is meant to be the epitome of all that is broken and fantastical. His obscenity-laden monologues and cryptic tossed-aside statements place him in the realm of Bukowski. It is very telling that when Tetro's writings are discovered, they are written backwards. The only way to read them is to hold a mirror up to them. Only then can the truth of Tetro's past be told. For that is all that he can write about. Later plot developments elevate him to the level of a certain classical Greek dramatic figure.

Tetro is "married" to Miranda, played by the lovely Maribel Verdu (who you may remember as Mercedes from Pan's Labyrinth). Here, she comes across as beautiful, sympathetic, and tempestuous all at once. We also have Bennie (Alden Ehrenreich), the baby-faced slack-jawed military school runaway who carries with him the symbol of his hope, the letter sent to him upon his brother's departure. It has been ten years, and his brother promised to come back to rescue him from their troubled family. But it was not to be.

Beyond that, the audience is treated to a collage of a storyline, with set pieces ranging from a tonal performance of Faust, which soon devolves into a striptease, to extravagant dream sequences, which owe more than a little to the Powell-Pressburger ballet films "The Red Shoes" and "The Tales of Hoffman." At moments, viewers will thank the gods of cinema for bringing them to Amherst Cinema on that particular evening. Although some of the later plot developments come across as somewhat clichéd, it is to the film's credit rather than its loss. Only by emphasizing the main character's oedipal elements, and letting the music swell with the sudden turns of events, can Coppola's vivid depiction of melodrama unfold in a fully actualized manner.

Although it is certainly flawed, Tetro garners 4 stars. It is too technically gorgeous and manipulative to be anything but the perfect encapsulation of classic melodrama that it is meant to be.

Mark Schiffer can be reached at mschiffe@student.umass.edu

"Tetro"
Directed By Francis Ford Coppola
American Zoetrope
4/5

FRIDAY

COURTESY OF SEVEN NATIONS

SEVEN NATIONS

KNOWN FOR THEIR NON-TRADITIONAL SCOTTISH RYTHYMS, SEVEN NATIONS WILL BRING ITS THUNDEROUS BEATS AND BAGPIPES TO NOHO FRIDAY NIGHT.

VENUE: IRON HORSE MUSIC HALL
DOORS: 7:00 PM
PRICE: A $15.00 - D $18.00

SATURDAY

COURTESY OF PETER MULVEY

PETER MULVEY

MULVEY WILL BE CAPPING OFF HIS 1,100-MILE BICYLCE CONCERT TOUR AT THE IRON HORSE THIS WEEKEND PLAYING SONGS FROM HIS NEW CD, 'LETTERS FROM A FLYING MACHINE.'

VENUE: IRON HORSE MUSIC HALL
DOORS: 7:00 PM
PRICE: A $14 - D $17

Boos for the Met's new 'Tosca' weren't off-base

By David Patrick Stearns
The Philadelphia Inquirer

NEW YORK — Just because the world is devolving toward the fashionably gothic, does the Metropolitan Opera have license to reflect that with its seedy new "Tosca"?

That question encompassed more than one might have thought at Monday's season-opening performance, when the audience's booing wasn't the most damning reaction to a new (and not particularly revisionist) production of Puccini's thriller. More eerily disturbing was the listlessness of the applause, reflecting a disgruntlement that seemed to cast a shadow over what was indisputable good — tenor Marcelo Alvarez, a splendidly nuanced Puccini tenor and the only cast member not uglified by this instantly loathed production.

New Met productions are often booed these days. And naysayers vote early and often — so much that by the time the high-def movie theater simulcast rolls around ("Tosca's" is Oct. 10), regional audiences ask, "What was the problem?"

In this case, I predict less guessing.

The insurance promised by the casting of beautiful, stage-savvy Karita Mattila in the title role only went so far; separation anxiety from the previous, ultra-ornate Franco Zeffirelli production was definitely at work. Though it was widely criticized for cinematically detailed sets that dwarfed all who sang before them, Zeffirelli's take kept the audience a safe emotional distance from the opera's sordid souls: singer Floria Tosca, caught between her freedom-fighting lover Mario and the insurrection-crushing police chief Scarpia. Zeffirelli offered so much postcard value in his production, you'd gladly take a two-week vacation in there.

The more confrontational realism of European stage directors is OK for Shostakovich's Lady Macbeth of Mtensk, but not for the Met's core repertoire. And Bondy's world is downright Orwellian: When Mario is hauled off to be tortured, it's through a doorway that emits cold fluorescent light suggesting the dreaded Room 101 of "1984."

Beyond that, the Act II set of Scarpia's headquarters hardly suggested the usual sumptuous decadence of a heartless aristocrat. Instead, Bondy's Scarpia is a lower-class police chief in a gracelessly functional office with large maps and lots of prostitutes to illustrate sexual appetites that are clearly spelled out in the libretto. So driven is he by sex that he's reduced to begging Tosca for her favors, though he holds all the cards for saving her lover from execution.

So Bondy's ideas were never irrelevant, but the work of a hyper-alert theatrical intelligence delivering an earnest new reading of a work that hasn't lent itself much to reinterpretation. The opening-night eruption is evidence of a growing schism in Met audiences between those who side with theatrical relevance and those who believe the music covers that base just fine — which is why Mary Zimmerman's even-more-loudly-booed "La sonnambula" either saved or destroyed the opera last season, depending on whom you talked to.

This time, though, Met boosers — with whom I rarely side — had a point. The Richard Peduzzi sets were plain and lacked a point of view. Act III looked like a provisional skeleton set. Poor Mattila, awkwardly costumed (by Milena Canonero) as an Anna Magnani look-alike, has never looked worse. Though Scarpia's magnetism comes from his shameless bad-

PAUL MIRECA / COPYRIGHT METROPOLITAN OPERA

The Metropolitan Opera recently recieved boos for its newest show, "Tosca."

ness — and this Scarpia is bad — George Gagnidze was costumed like a bum. New York's Broadway and opera audiences automatically reject ugly shows. It's the law. Did nobody warn Bondy & Co.?

Alvarez, even in his Act III aria, resisted the crowd-pleasing temptation to bawl. His emotionalism was heated but precise. Gagnidze wasn't a sonorous Scarpia, but was a theatrically effective one. In the famous Act II aria "Vissi d'arte," Mattila dared to shriek the ending of her penultimate phrase to underscore her religious despair. It was gutsy, original, and chilling.

Yet she was also the primary musical hole. She has a great voice for Germanic repertoire, and excellently articulated the non-aria parts of her role. But her upper range feels so thin (is she veering toward mezzo-dom?) that high notes don't come close to blooming. That's not good Puccini. Arias that should be the heart of her role were the least satisfying.

Mattila has built up so much goodwill over the years, I don't see her being booed for this. But the general wrongness of this "Tosca" had a contributing factor in its star.

Rolling Green

All Rents Include: heat, hot water, and electricity!

Move-in Special:
$99 security deposit.
NO application fees.
NO non-refundable move-in fee.

1 bedroom: $980*
2 bedroom: $1135*
2 bedroom townhouse: $1275*
3 bedroom townhouse: $1500*
4 bedroom townhouse: $1995*

Contact us:
(413) 253-3000
rollinggreenamherst@eqr.com

*Pricing fluctuates. All pricing listed is based on a 12 month lease. Shorter term leases are available. Please contact us for availability.

Dorm cooking ideas let college kids go gourmet

By Jackie Borrell
Contra Costa Times

WALNUT CREEK, Calif. — There's more to the college experience than fascinating lectures, frat parties and pricey textbooks. There's all that Ramen, for one thing.

Mom and Dad may have paid for a dorm meal plan, but dining hall hours don't always jibe with student schedules or tastes, for that matter. Many students find themselves on the wrong side of campus, or still in class, when the cafeteria closes. Late-night study sessions require refueling. And a pizza-based diet gets old and fattening quickly.

So here are some fresh cooking ideas that will be equally at home at the big U. or in harried non-college households, too.

Start, says Chef Gigi Gaggero, by identifying what's available and developing a repertoire of easy-to prepare dishes.

These days, that's easy to do. The trending love affair with local, seasonal fare means farmers markets are popping up not just in urban centers, but on college campuses too.

A well-stocked dorm closet allows students to turn their produce finds into Caprese salads, bruschetta and similar simple fare without so much as a microwave oven. (Tip: don't store the laundry detergent near the cooking supplies or your Caprese salad will taste like Tide.)

But basic cookware - such as measuring spoons, mixing bowl and cutting board - make gourmet pursuits easy, even in a dorm setting.

But the biggest challenges for would-be dorm chefs are aromas and appliance restrictions, says Gaggero, who teaches college cooking classes at her Kids Culinary Adventures school in Belmont, Calif.

Be kind to your roommates, she says. Don't cook fish, whip up homemade pickled kimchee or burn the popcorn in the microwave.

As for appliances, read the fine print on your housing contract first. Mini-fridges are allowed everywhere, but the rules on microwaves, crock-pots, rice cookers and George Foreman grills vary from dorm to dorm.

"We had an open kitchen where we could cook for ourselves on weekends," says 2009 Stanford grad Molly Gerth, who lives in San Francisco now. "I learned how to make an omelet for the first time from more experienced friends when we cooked brunch for ourselves on Sundays. And some of my friends' favorite snacks were Annie's macaroni and cheese and deluxe quesadillas with all the fixings."

Those are good choices, says Gaggero, and many dorms have a communal kitchen. Or you can "borrow" a friend's apartment stove during a study session to cook a cache of baked potatoes or pasta.

"Cook a week's worth of spaghetti, penne or

See FOOD on page 10

...And You Will Know Us by The Trail of Dead puts on lively show

By Garth Brody
Collegian Correspondent

As "...And You Will Know Us by the Trail of Dead" exploded into their set this

Monday night at the Paradise Rock Club in Boston with "Isis Unveiled" the single off their most recent album, "The Century of Self" more than a few hands rose up to cover unprepared ears.

Trail Of Dead (as they are known by those who do not care to drop ten words on a band name) played very hard. They played so hard, in fact, that during every song, a roadie silently tuned the guitars from the previous song. Let that sink in.

Over the course of a single song, vocalist/multi-instrumentalist Conrad Keely's guitar took such an intolerable thrashing that it was unplayable for the next song. That's dedication. Because when you play the kind of complex and subtle compositions that Trail Of Dead play, it takes a certain dedication to the live aesthetic of punk rock to play as hard, loud, and fast as they did. The noise was unrelenting, the energy was high, and their music somehow lost none of its depth in all that sound.

Trail Of Dead is a six-piece art indie noise/hard rock outfit currently comprised of Jason Reece, Conrad Keely, Kevin Allen, Jay Leo Phillips, Aaron Ford, and Clay Morris.

They released two albums, in 1998 and 1999 to a warm critical response, but it wasn't until their 2002 major-label debut "Source Tags & Codes" that they garnered generally glowing reviews, including a rare 10/10 from Pitchfork Media, and achieved relative commercial success, reaching no. 73 on the UK Album Chart.

Three releases later, they are still performing regularly and making earth-shattering rock albums, now under their own label, Richter Scale Records.

The first opening act Monday night, "Midnight Mass," were tight but boring, much like their pants, even with some help from Trail Of Dead's Jason Reece and later on, Conrad Keely.

"Midnight Mass" was followed by "The Secret Machines," who had much more to offer in terms of musicality and personality. Much of their personality came from the bassist and singer, Brandon Curtis, whose unique vocal style fell somewhere in between Rob Halford and Gene Ween. With artfully crafted space rock ballads, they set the stage perfectly for Trail Of Dead's sonic supernova.

Both Jason's and Conrad's vocals raged and strained as though they were holding on for dear life against the raw power of the instrumental onslaught.

Trail Of Dead is a six-piece art indie noise/hard rock outfit currently comprised of Jason Reece, Conrad Keely, Kevin Allen, Jay Leo Phillips, Aaron Ford, and Clay Morris.

They released two albums, in 1998 and 1999 to a warm critical response, but it wasn't until their 2002 major-label debut "Source Tags & Codes" that they garnered generally glowing reviews, including a rare 10/10 from Pitchfork Media, and achieved relative commercial success, reaching no. 73 on the UK Album Chart.

Three releases later, they are still performing regularly and making earth-shattering rock albums, now under their own label, Richter Scale Records.

The first opening act Monday night, "Midnight Mass," were tight but boring, much like their pants, even with some help from Trail Of Dead's Jason Reece and later on, Conrad Keely.

"Midnight Mass" was followed by "The Secret Machines," who had much more to offer in terms of musicality and personality. Much of their personality came from the bassist and singer, Brandon Curtis, whose unique vocal style fell somewhere in between Rob Halford and Gene Ween. With artfully crafted space rock ballads, they set the stage perfectly for Trail Of Dead's sonic supernova.

Both Jason's and Conrad's vocals raged and strained as though they were holding on for dear life against the raw power of the instrumental onslaught.

The inventively primal arrangements lent a sense of timelessness to the group's dynamic, which makes describing them without invoking geological phenomena a challenge.

The avalanche force of Trail Of Dead came primarily from their directed use of noise; the guitars towered with heavy distortion and feedback, the two-drummer set-up blasted overlapping rhythms, while the bass and keys filled out the sound with driving harmony.

They reveled in the noise, playing extended instrumental sections as they moved wildly and violently about the stage particularly bassist Jay Phillips, who stomped around like a T-Rex at the more frenzied moments.

The show felt loose and even playful (in spite of the weight and intensity of the music) with band members jumping on and off each other's instruments, swapping guitars for keys, tripling up on vocals or sharing cymbals. At one point, all the members of "Midnight Mass" hopped back on stage for crowd vocals. Conrad even made a few jokes between songs, including one where he threatened to play "some acoustic, Fleet Foxes type stuff."

The looseness, the loudness, the anger Trail Of Dead delivered bountifully on everything good about rock music. Exceptional songwriting and musicianship backed up a rousing sense of rebellion that reached its pinnacle at the very end of their encore, when Jason rose from behind the drum kit and slowly approached the microphone, as though he wasn't supposed to. As the song built to its climax, he began to rhythmically chant, then shout, "Fuck you!" over and over, until the noise washed away and his last call closed the set.

Garth Brody can be reached gbrody@student.umass.edu

"...And You Will Know Us by the Trail of Dead" played an explosive show this past Monday night at the Paradise Rock Club in Boston.

The newest game in the series, "Halo 3: ODST," offers a brand new campaign while playing as a no-name rookie.

'ODST' supports a risky campaign

By Jeff Marchiafava
Game Informer Magazine

Though I enjoyed "Halo 3: ODST," my praise comes with a few caveats. On one hand, the campaign is shorter than Halo fans are used to, and considerably smaller in scale. Instead of fighting to save the world as Master Chief, you play a nameless rookie just trying to reconnect with his squad. Series veterans have already seen most of the enemies and weapons they will encounter in the game, and some of the graphics look considerably outdated.

On the other hand, I can't get enough of the game. Even after two marathon sessions totaling more than 20 hours of play, I was ready to jump right into another match. Although it might disappoint some, the limited scope of the plot also meant that I knew what the hell was going on for once, and the use of nonlinear flashbacks makes the story line mysterious and intriguing. The fugly characters you'll come across are quickly forgotten in light of the countless explosions you'll see (and cause) throughout the game, each scattering vehicle fragments, enemies, and the occasional ally through the streets of New Mombasa.

ODST fixes a few of the problems plaguing the series since its inception. Players finally have a map of their surroundings, complete with clearly marked objectives and the ability to place your own waypoints. Backtracking, an irritating, consistent staple of the franchise, takes place primarily in the open-city sections of the game, giving you the ability to pick different routes through buildings and side streets even if your destination is somewhere you've already been. For most players, the single-player campaign will serve as a warm-up to "ODST's" plethora of multiplayer offerings. The second, multiplayer-only disc is packed with value, sporting 24 maps, the full functionality of "Halo 3's" Forge and Theater modes, and an insane amount of player stats chronicled on Bungie.net.

Even if you're not a fan of "Halo's competitive multiplayer, the new Firefight mode is a refreshingly different experience for the series, delivering hours of fun in its own right. The mode takes the four-players-against-the-world co-op formula that's so popular nowadays and injects it with the franchise's top tier A.I. Instead of facing off against rounds of mindless cannon fodder ("Gears of War 2's" or undead enemies that run toward your explosives ("Left 4 Dead"), your opponents in Firefight mode are formidable and dangerously clever. "Halo's" battlefields haven't felt this intense and chaotic since the original game debuted in 2001. In just a dozen or so hours of play, Firefight mode delivered my most enjoyable experiences with the series to date.

Halo haters will dismiss "ODST" as more of the same, while diehard fans will proclaim it the greatest thing since — well, "Halo 3. Someplace in the middle is where "ODST" will make its biggest impact. If, like me, you've found yourself slowly falling out of love with "Halo" over the years, "ODST" provides a fresh, exciting experience that rekindles your interest in this seminal sci-fi shooter.

COURTESY OF STUDIO GHIBLI

The animated film "Ponyo" appeals to not only young children, but with important underlying themes, adults will also enjoy the all-star cast.

'Ponyo' explores man and nature

By Nora Drapalski
Collegian Correspondent

Within the first ten minutes of watching Hayao Miyazaki's newest film, "Ponyo," audiences can already predict what the story will be about. Fish meets boy, fish turns into girl and reunites with boy. Together, they explore the world of humans and fall in love with each other. What they might not be aware of is the underlying conflict that is presented throughout the story in a rather unconventional way.

"Ponyo" opens with the camera falling through the air and sinking into the ocean, as the world of man meets the world of nature. Upon reaching the ocean floor, an eager-faced fish-girl devilishly sneaks into sight, evading a mysterious red-haired man as she latches onto a jellyfish and rises to the surface of the ocean.

Unfortunately, before she can do much more than see a house on a cliff, she is rudely disturbed by a large ship which unearths mountains of trash and junk buried on the ocean floor. Just as Ponyo seems faced with death, trapped by a small glass jar capturing her head, she is rescued by a five-year-old boy named Sosuke.

On a shallow level, "Ponyo" is a Little Mermaid-like tale of a girl escaping her father's overprotective grasp in order to explore the world above and experience love for the first time. However, the story is told through the eyes of a child, lending a heart-tugging quality to the purity of the love. Looking past the animation and analyzing the story, "Ponyo" is undoubtedly a tale of the conflict between man and nature.

The end of the world approaches as the balance between man and nature has shifted to a slow deterioration of the natural world. Catastrophe can only be diverted when the stability between the power of nature and the destructiveness of man is restored, represented through the life of a small fish-girl named Ponyo.

Ponyo, a magical fish with the ability to grow arms and legs, develops as the representation of harmony between man and nature. The world becomes unstable while she edges closer to humanity, and only resolves after a compromise is reached.

Children can appreciate the film as yet another wonderful work of art by writer/director/producer Hayao Miyazaki, while adults can understand and enjoy the underlying theme. Miyazaki embraces the opportunity in all of his films, most notably "Spirited Away" and "Princess Mononoke," to both entertain the public and remind them of a serious and relevant issue, such as pollution or feminism.

Older crowds might also recognize some of the big stars featured in "Ponyo" as English voice actors. Matt Damon lent his voice to Sosuke's father, as did Liam Neeson for Ponyo's father. Tina Fey gave a wonderful performance as the spunky and almost childish mother of Sosuke, while Cate Blanchett saved the world as the Great Sea Mother using her ethereal voice and beauty. Betty White, Lily Tomlin, and Cloris Leachman act as three opinionated old ladies that add a humorous element to the film.

The casting of the two leads, Ponyo and Sosuke, however, left a slightly unsavory taste in one's mouth. Noah Cyrus, younger sister of Miley Cyrus, played the innocent Ponyo in a convincing role that was adorable and cute, although her voice was sickeningly sweet and high pitched. Frankie Jonas, a nine-year-old boy, seemed too mature to play the role of a five-year-old child. His enthusiasm was notable, but he lacked the childlike innocence found in such a young character.

Overall, "Ponyo" provides a great escape from reality with its stunningly vivid animation, while including a thought-provoking message that demands attention. Whether "Ham!" becomes your daily mantra or "Respect your father!" "Ponyo" will capture your heart and make you fall in love.

Nora Drapalski can be reached at ndrapals@student.umass.edu

Alternative dorm gourmet

FOOD from page 8

rigatoni," she says. "Drain it and toss it in a little bit of olive oil, then portion control it into baggies."

Reheat it in the microwave and add store-bought sauce, toss it with butter, garlic and fresh herbs, or top it with cooked, shredded chicken. That pasta can also be served cold, garnished with fresh veggies and tossed with an Asian peanut or sesame dressing.

Baked potatoes are also a reliable standby. Try splitting and stuffing them with cheese and broccoli, before reheating them in the microwave.

Of course, many vegetables can be cooked in their entirety in the microwave. Karen Rogers graduated from UC Berkeley last year, but the Berkeley resident still remembers slicing eggplant, drizzling it with olive oil, salt and a pinch of garlic powder.

"It was simple, healthy, and only required seven minutes in the microwave," she says. "Another favorite was sweet potatoes sweetened with brown sugar and dabbled with butter. All I had to do was poke the sweet potatoes with a fork and pop them in the oven for 10 minutes before they were soft."

At Marin, Calif.'s What's Cooking school, Michelle Stern teaches groups of off-to-college teens to make an entire Mediterranean meal of lemony, egg-laced Avgolemono soup, Greek salad, hummus and pita, using nothing more than a blender and a rice cooker.

"They love the soup," she says. "It's a combination of flavors they haven't necessarily had before. The egg adds a lot of protein and creaminess, and the orzo gives it some bulk. It feels really filling and nurturing."

Of course, there are caveats, too. Make sure your mini-fridge is cold enough to keep milk and meat safely chilled. Don't use a chicken-spattered cutting board to dice your vegetables. And avoid setting the building on fire.

One unfortunate Stanford student made headlines after his late night egg roll frying session set off his campus apartment's fire sprinklers in 2008. The resulting flood cascaded down three floors, according to the college newspaper, the Stanford Daily.

Use a microwave or rice cooker, says Stern. They're safer. And they turn themselves off.

Any final tips?

Every dorm room needs a little greenery, says Gaggero. Instead of a fern, put a pot of basil on the window sill. It's yummier.

Stocking the Pantry

Whether it's a tiny first kitchen, a dorm room or just restocking time, these basics make cooking easier and more flavorful. In the cupboard: Good quality olive oil and balsamic vinegar, sea salt and black pepper, garlic, dried pasta, couscous, marinara sauce, lemons, peanut butter, and chicken or vegetable broth. Cooking teacher Michelle Stern recommends Trader Joe's Savory Broth, a reduced-sodium, gluten-free, liquid concentrate that comes in tiny metallic packets. Add one pouch to one cup hot water, she says, and you've got flavorful broth.

- In the Mini-Fridge: Milk, butter, yogurt, eggs and cheese.

- On the Window Sill: Fresh herbs, such as basil or parsley.

- Don't Forget: A microwaveable bowl and mug, a small cutting board, utensils and a small, sharp knife.

- Don't Bother: Leave those microwaveable popcorn packets behind. They're expensive and they contain dicey chemicals, says Stern. Instead, buy popcorn kernels in bulk. Pour cup or so into a brown paper lunch bag, fold the top down a couple of times and microwave for about two minutes, or until the popping slows.

If you're sick of dining commons and crunchy noodles with more salt in them than Utah, Chef Gigi Gaggero has ideas for easy dorm meals.

UMass begins season

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior Maude Lecluyse (left) and junior Candynce Boney (right) react to a ball coming their way during a match last year. The Minutewomen open the 2009-10 season this weekend at the Eastern Collegiate Invitational Tournament.

By Chris Shores
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts tennis team, led by coach Judy Dixon, is set to begin its 2009-10 season. Dixon, who will begin her 17th year as the UMass coach, said that this year's squad of 11 women has the best depth she's seen as coach of the Minutewomen.

Seven members of last year's team (11-15) return to the squad this year. UMass also adds four new faces: three freshmen and sophomore Michelle Bosvert, who grew up in Amherst.

Leading the team as captain will be Maude Lecluyse. The senior, based out of Montreal, was recruited four years ago by Dixon when she was only 16. Lecluyse is currently sixth on the school's all-time doubles wins list with 52.

"She's one of the kids who the team looks to," Dixon said. "She is the passion of this team."

Dixon will look to Magdalena Ploch, last year's A-10 Rookie of the Year, to be the top player this season. Ploch is a sophomore from Germany, and Dixon calls her "one of the best players in the conference."

After Ploch, the Minutewomen's top three this year will include junior Candynce Boney from Las Vegas and freshman Julia Comas from Spain.

Rounding out the top eight this year are Lecluyse, junior Kaitlyn Carpenter from Pennsylvania, freshman Chantal Swiszcz from Spain, junior Tanisha Hodgson from Aruba and freshman Jocelyn Providence from Pennsylvania.

Just over half of the team members are international, which Dixon said is common among NCAA tennis teams. This is because training programs in foreign countries begin at an earlier age. International students also take their education very seriously and so a chance to attend an American university under scholarship is a "prestige and honor," she said.

The team is relatively young, as seven of the members are freshmen or sophomores. In addition to Comas, Ploch, Providence and Swiszcz, the team also includes sophomores Bosvert, Gabriella Jannotta from Nevada and Maria Vakulskaya from Russia.

Dixon has new graduate assistant coach Juancarlos Nunez as an assistant this season. As an undergraduate at University of Arkansas at Little Rock, he posted a career 78-30 career singles record and received multiple awards and honors.

She hopes Nunez's success during his playing days will help lead the Minutewomen in their first tournament this weekend.

In the upcoming Eastern Collegiate Invitational tournament, Dixon is allowed to bring eight members of her team. The invitational is a "flighted tournament" style, meaning that players must be designated to either the singles or doubles division and cannot compete in both.

Ploch will compete in the singles A-division, a field represented by every team's best player. Comas will compete in the B-division, Carpenter in C and Swiszcz in D.

Boney and Lecluyse will team up to take on opponents in the doubles A-division. Hodgson and Providence will compete in the B-division.

Jannotta will serve as an alternate because according to Dixon, "she has been playing so well this fall."

The team has only been meeting and practicing for a few weeks because of NCAA rules. Since tennis's main season is in the spring, the team was not allowed to meet until the first day of school this fall. Therefore, Dixon is excited to finally see her team in action against opponents.

"I'm really looking forward to this weekend. There is not a lot of pressure as it is not about the team, but rather an individual tournament. [There will be] some good match play to get us prepared for Holy Cross [next Thursday]," she said.

Chris Shores can be reached at cshores@dailycollegian.com

CHECK OUT
THE DAILY COLLEGIAN SPORTS BLOG
http://blog.masslive.com/dailycollegiansports

CINEMARK
For advance tickets & showtimes visit
cinemark.com
or call 1-800-FANDANGO + Exp Code 1118#
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL
FIRST MATINEE SHOWTIME (7 DAYS A WEEK) $5.00
ADULT MATINEE BEFORE 6PM $6.25 • STUDENT $7.00 (WITH ID)

◆ CLOUDY WITH A CHANCE OF MEATBALLS - REAL D 3D ($2.75 SURCHARGE) [PG] 205 425 645 900
◆ FAME [PG] 120 435 715 955
◆ PANDORUM [R] ① 130 440 740 1030
◆ SURROGATES [PG13] 150 415 750 1010
◆ CLOUDY WITH A CHANCE OF MEATBALLS - 2D [PG] 250 510 730 950
◆ JENNIFER'S BODY [R] ① 140 445 735 1020
◆ LOVE HAPPENS [PG13] 115 430 705 945
◆ THE INFORMANT! [R] ① 125 420 710 1000
DISTRICT 9 [R] ① 110 720
JULIE & JULIA [PG13] 105 400 725 1025
TYLER PERRY'S I CAN DO BAD ALL BY MYSELF [PG13] 410 1005
CinéArts
9 [PG13] 100 310 520 745 955
INGLOURIOUS BASTERDS [R] ① 135 455 820
◆ NO PASSES-NO CLASSIC SUPERSAVERS

Miami proving doubters wrong

Hurricanes on 2-game tear

By Mike Kern
Philadelphia Daily News

Many folks figured Miami was on the way back. But it wasn't necessarily supposed to happen this season. And it still might not. Because former Hurricanes linebacker Randy Shannon inherited such a messy situation three years ago. Plus, his team's opening four games are all against ranked opponents, which is more than some name programs face during an entire schedule.

Yet here UM is, at 2-0, having beaten Florida State on the road and Georgia Tech at home. On Saturday, they're at No. 11 Virginia Tech (2-1) in a matchup that could decide the Atlantic Coast Conference's Coastal Division. And who else ever started with three straight divisional foes?

Oklahoma visits next week.

The Hurricanes were 35th in your pre-season poll. Now they are ninth, their first Top 10 appearance since the final vote of the 2005 season.

Shannon won a ring as a player and got two more as an assistant coach. The Hurricanes captured a title in 2001, and nearly earned two others before things turned ugly for Larry Coker.

And doesn't college football seem more pertinent when certain schools, whether you despise them or not, are a factor?

Shannon went 5-7 his first season after starting 4-1. Last year, UM lost its final three (including the Emerald Bowl, to California) to finish 7-6.

So the last thing Shannon needed was a rough September.

Remember, this is a guy whose first decision was to remove player names from their uniforms, which wasn't exactly a ratings hit. Then he had to endure the slaying of Washington Redskins safety Sean Taylor, a former UM standout.

Shannon already has had a handful of recruits transfer. And he's fired two coordinators. His original contract hasn't been renewed. A year ago, a national publication ranked him last among BCS coaches.

Under the guidance of offensive coordinator Mark Whipple, who spent last season on the Eagles' staff, quarterback Jacory Harris has looked downright Heisman-worthy after sharing time a year ago with the departed Robert Marve. Obviously, it's way early, but the sophomore is on pace to erase Bernie Kosar's single-season school passing-yardage record of 3,642, which has stood for 25 years, and Steve Walsh's high of 28 touchdown passes, established in 1988.

"We are very humble," Harris said. "We understand we have other teams at hand we have to beat.

"In order to stay undefeated, you have to win the next game."

Questions remain. But at least for the time being, the buzz has returned. Nice sound.

TRIVIAL PURSUIT

The last time Washington beat a No. 3 team at home, who was its quarterback? Hint: Two years later, he was the Pac-10 Offensive Player of the Year before playing eight seasons in the NFL with Dallas, Kansas City and Denver. See "Answer man."

HARRIS INTERACTIVE POLL

Yes, it's that time of year again. Already. Because America craves arguments, logical or otherwise.

The first Harris Interactive Poll of 2009 will become official on Sunday. It's one of two rankings used to help determine which teams make it to the BCS title game. The other is conducted by the coaches (USA Today).

I still have my vote, which means I tend to take this stuff seriously, even if a bunch of constituents throughout the free world continue to criticize the system for being less than a full-fledged playoff. And they, of course, would be right. It's hardly a perfect way to settle things. But since a tournament that seemingly would satisfy the vast majority is still nowhere on the horizon, I'll stand by my story that this remains the best alternative anyone has unveiled that makes enough sense for everyone.

That doesn't mean you have to embrace it. Just accept it for what it is, until that day when something better is installed.

That won't be for a while. Existing television contracts must run their course. But you never know.

In the meantime, don't get too whacked out when your team gets a raw deal in those initial BCS standings. Or possibly even the second and third. It happens. The real fun starts Oct. 18, when computers finally are included in the equation. For the most part, there's not much difference in the polls. However, strength-of-schedule components aren't always easy to handicap. Or understand.

History shows that more often than not, some semblance of order sorts itself out by December. Words to exist by. As long as you're not a politician from Mountain West territory.

HELPING HAND

Widener plays its home opener against Frostburg State (0-3) on Saturday afternoon. And the Pride will take part in Coach to Cure MD, a nationwide project designed to build awareness about muscular dystrophy and raise money to support researchers attempting to find a treatment and cure.

"We are very proud ... to be associated with something as important as this," Coach David Wood said. "We've been fortunate to take part in other functions, including the bone-marrow testing drive, and this is something else we can say we accomplished."

William Foster, who has MD, will be the honorary captain.

To donate money online, go to www.CoachtoCureMD.org. To contribute by cell phone, text "CURE" to 90999, and $5 will be charged to your next bill.

MAC ME UP

—More teams (four) have yet to win a game than have winning records (three).

—Ball State, after winning 12 straight, has now lost five in a row. The Cards are at Auburn. Maybe the karma changed when they turned down a chance to play Boise State in the Poinsettia Bowl?

—Boise State (No. 8) will become the highest-ranked team to ever play at Bowling Green, which has declared an "Orange Out" under the lights at Doyt Perry Stadium.

ANSWER MAN

Steve Pelluer, then a sophomore, was the guy taking snaps when the Huskies defeated third-ranked Southern California in Seattle on Nov. 14, 1981.

(MCT CAMPUS)

Miami running back Damien Berry tries to get past a defender during a game early this season. The Hurricanes are 2-0 going into the game against No. 11 Virginia Tech with wins against Florida State and Georgia Tech.

(MCT CAMPUS)

Miami quarterback Jacory Harris completes a handoff during a scrimmage earlier this season. The Hurricanes went from 35th in the pre-season polls to No. 9.

MATTHEW HARRISON/COLLEGIAN

Junior Kelsey Anderson kicks the ball away from the goal in a game earlier this season. The Minutewomen start the Atlantic 10 schedule against Saint Joseph's and Duquesne.

UM looks to move Amick to midfield

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

During his freshman year, Stuart Amick (five goals in 2007) was the No. 2 scorer on a Massachusetts men's soccer team that made it to the College Cup. This season, he should have an opportunity to go back to his aggressive style of play if UMass coach Sam Koch had his way.

Koch moved Amick from a very deep midfield to the defense, which has suffered losses to three of its four starters. While he has played a significant role in helping his team maintain its reputation as the Atlantic 10's best defense (which has allowed four goals this season).

But Lehigh transfer Mark Dangleis is playing well enough that Koch might move Amick back into the midfield, which would give UMass another scorer offensively to complement junior Ben Arikian.

"Mark is finally figuring out what we need him to do, which will allow us to get Stu back into the midfielder," Koch said. "He's probably one of our most dangerous attacking midfielders and I think to get him back into the midfield will really help our attack."

Last season, Amick didn't have many opportunities at the goal because the Minutemen already had several players who could score, but this year they are without their graduated leading scorers Prince Ofosu and Mike DeSantis.

Brandso's showing potential

Freshman Morgan Brandso never saw his first minutes as a Minuteman until Sept. 13 against Vermont. However, his recent play in the exhibition game against the Winstars might give Koch no other choice but to find room for him.

Brandso originally came to UMass as a midfielder, but with that being its deepest position, he instead moved to defense during the exhibition start. Koch was impressed by his freshman's comfort on both ends of the field in Sunday's game.

Aside from helping the rest of the defense keep the Winstars scoreless, Brandso had two shots of his own in the Minutemen's 3-0 win.

Koch believes that Brandso has shown his potential for awhile, but his performance during the exhibition highlights what he can do with steady improvement the rest of the season. If he can raise his level of play even more, there is a chance that Koch might slide him in the left back spot to compete with Dangleis.

Vaccaro expected to play Saturday

Koch raised concerns earlier this week over junior Chris Vaccaro's undisclosed injury, but his improvement has been as expected and should once again make the start this weekend against Siena.

Vaccaro adds depth to the midfield position with his speed and ability to distribute the ball. Last season, he finished with a goal and two assists as mostly a reserve, but should start at midfield for most of the season.

Koch said that despite missing a game, Vaccaro has played through his injury for the most part, but he should be completely healed by Saturday.

"Vaccaro hasn't been playing at 100 percent," Koch said. "But when he doest get to 100 percent, he's certainly a player who can get into the attack and be dangerous in set pieces."

Adam Miller can be reached at amiller@dailycollegian.com.

Minutewomen begin A-10 play

By Steve Levine
Collegian Staff

The Atlantic 10 schedule begins today, and for Massachusetts women's soccer coach Angela Napoli, her team couldn't pick a better time to get hot.

After opening the season 0-4, the Minutewomen picked up their play with two double overtime ties and a win to finish off the non-conference schedule. Now the team looks to continue its impressive play when it matters most, in A-10 games.

"The team is looking very good," Napoli said. "We've been working really hard so it should be a good weekend. We're definitely confident right now after two ties and a win."

Although looking much better as of late, UMass has much more in store for itself on Friday, when it hosts Saint Joseph's, and then on Sunday, when it travels to Duquesne.

"We just need to focus on us. We've been talking about moving the ball and changing the point of attack," Napoli said. "These are going to be very tough games. St. Joe's and Duquesne have played tough games and have been playing well. If we can stick to what we've been doing, we can win out this weekend."

Things may change a little bit defensively for the Minutewomen on Friday, when they will have their hands full with St. Joe's forward Maggie Lupinski, who accounts for six of the team's nine goals.

"We won't change our strategy. We're just going to have to keep an eye on her at all times and make sure we know where she is on the field," Napoli said. "She plays on the left side so she will be matched up against Kelsey Anderson, who will be a great match defensively."

After dealing with the Hawks (3-3-2), the Maroon and White will finish the weekend against the Dukes (3-4-0).

Duquesne's three wins come at the expense of Robert Morris, Bucknell and Charleston. Leading its offense is Samantha Kaiser, who has four goals on the season. Perhaps Duquesne's biggest threat, however, is goalkeeper Gabby Morin, who has played all 608 plus minutes for the Dukes, while attaining a 1.33 goals against average, a 0.743 save percentage and three shut-outs.

Comparing statistics between UMass and its opponents will show quite a discrepancy in offensive categories, as the Minutewomen have three goals in 81 attempts against opponent's eight goals in 142 attempts. To this point, the Minutewomen average 11.6 shots per game while their opponents average 20.3. The only opponent to out-shoot UMass in that stretch was Hartford in a 1-1 draw.

Contrary to the offense, the defense has been consistent throughout the young season, allowing 1.14 goals per game.

If both sides of the ball can continue to contribute equally, the Minutewomen will drastically improve their record and set their sights on the A-10 tournament.

Historically, UMass has great success against both St. Joe's and Duquesne, owning a 9-2-0 record against the Hawks and an 8-4-0 record against the Dukes dating back to 1996, when coach Napoli started in net for the Minutewomen.

"I always want to keep the successful tradition of UMass alive. I remember when we wouldn't bat an eye at tough teams a while ago," Napoli said. "NCAA soccer is getting stronger every year so now it's tougher. No matter what team is on the field, we just want to go out and win."

No better time than now. With non-conference games out of the picture and the Minutewomen firing on all cylinders, the A-10 is up for grabs.

Steve Levine can be reached at slevine@student.umass.edu.

BRIAN TEUDER/COLLEGIAN

Stuart Amick dribbles the ball in a game last year. Massachusetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch could move the junior into the midfield as soon as Saturday.

comics

JORNALISM AT ITS FINEST

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Chill out on cursing. Say, "Holy Sith!" instead!

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Natty Ice has a new slogan: "Natty Ice! Drink it, then convert it to pee!"

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You're as bossy as those "Just Wear It" condom stickers.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
This is not sumfin you can control!!

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Please stop staring at the Led Zeppelin "Swan Song" poster...

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Battle of the sexes: Who can grow the better mutton chop-to-handlebar mustache?

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
If mohawks remind you of night-elves, then you might need help from a Psych major.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
The reason for high U.S divorce rates: pickled beats. Learn from this.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
The Jonas Brothers are actually gremlins. Multiply by adding water.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
When you sniff, the world groans.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Remind the world why meat-spin exists.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
The dingo didn't just eat yo baby, he also stole yo lunch. Fool.

Titmore by Annie Keithline and Andrew Witts

COLLEGIAN CLASSIFIEDS

FOR SALE

1989 Toyota Camry wagon, standard. Many new parts. $1,000. Call-(413)-588-8760

EMPLOYMENT

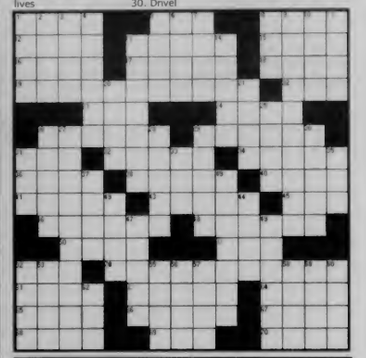
Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 1

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

EMPLOYMENT

Part-time personal care attendant. About 10-12 hours/week. Flexible Hours. Please Call Patrick (413)-275-7928

SPRING BREAK 2010

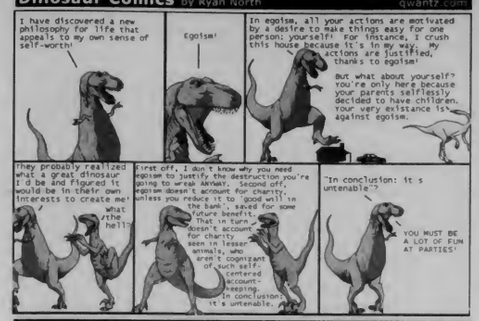


Spring Break 2010 sell trips, earn cash, and go free! Call for group discounts. Best prices guranteed! Info/reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

CROSSWORD

ACROSS
1. Flame
5. Rodent
8. Wrestling in Japan
12. Chief Norse god
13. 24 in a day
15. Catch
16. Frigid
17. Moses' brother
18. Sea eagle
19. A person who draws
22. Center of a hurricane
23. VCR button
24. It comes from sheep
26. Be in an agitated emotional state
29. A composite of mixed origin
31. Governor (abbrev.)
32. Any high altitude habitation
34. N. American retail chain
36. Winged
38. Blabs
40. Double-reed woodwind
41. Photographer's model
43. Fabric
45. A parcel of land
46. Abandon
48. A small hand tool
50. Arid
51. Expert
52. Dry, as wine
54. Inconceivable
61. Roastin,j appliance
63. An object
64. Dock
65. Eat
66. Subsequently
67. Lync poems
68. Countertenor
69. Greatest possible
70. Where a bird lives

DOWN
1. Central points
2. False god
3. Small brook
4. Withstand
5. Engine sound
6. Distinctive atmosphere
7. Gait faster than a walk
8. South southeast
9. Undependable
10. Quite a few
11. Arch type
13. A small ax
14. Resembling a blizzard
20. Stiff hair
21. Holds up
25. Chocolate cookie
26. Not liquid
27. Tending to vanish like vapor
28. Construct
29. Serf
30. Drivel
31. A narrow opening
33. Sick
35. Collection
37. Feint
39. Weird
42. South American country
44. Pawn
47. Leases
49. Munition
52. Fizzy drink
53. Wickedness
55. Skinny
56. Suggestion
57. Narrow margin
58. Wait
59. Bottom of the barrel
60. Formerly (archaic)
62. Prefix meaning "New"

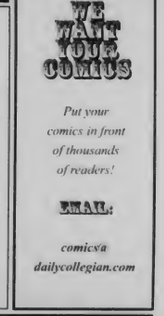


SUDOKU

				2	4	3
	9			8				2
		8	6		3
9	3	6			2
8								5
	7	5	3				2
4	6			3		5		9
	5			9
					7

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North qwantz.com

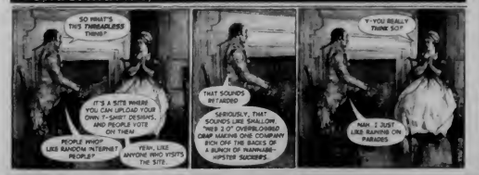
My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees mnftiu.com



Mr. Gnu by Travis Dandro travisdandro.com

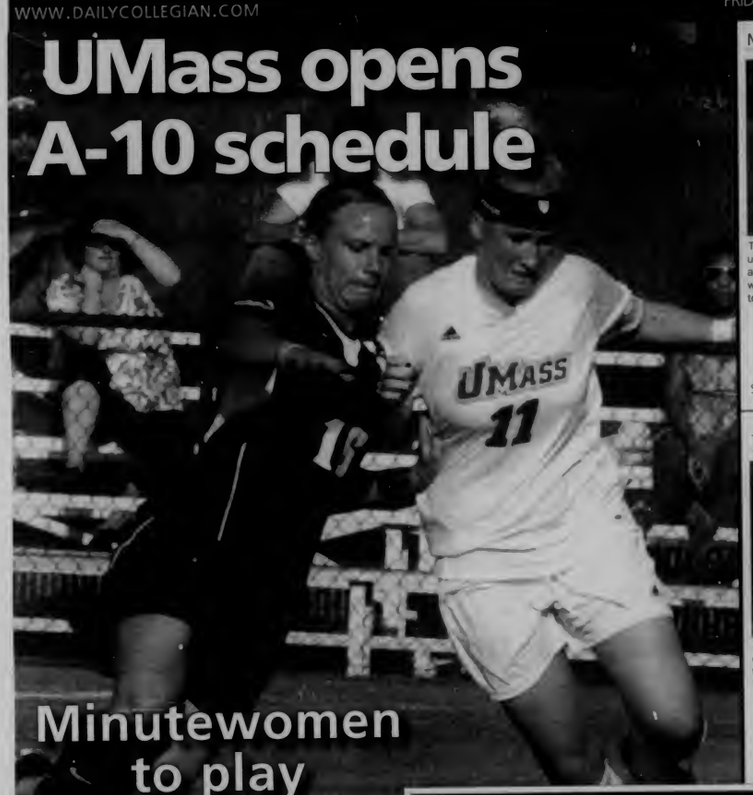
Labrat by Richard Martelly

Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub chainsawsuit.com



"Cool Shrine" by Mike Silpola

Afghanistan by Daniel Nott



Wondermark by David Malki! wondermark.com

WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 2009

UMass opens A-10 schedule

Minutewomen to play St. Joseph's, Duquesne see pg. 13

MEN'S SOCCER

The Minutemen are hoping to use junior Stuart Amick (pictured above) as an extra midfielder with the defense starting to come together.

SEE PAGE 13

TENNIS

The Massachusetts tennis team opens the season this weekend at the Eastern Collegiate Invitational Tournament.

SEE PAGE 11

DAILY COLLEGIAN sports WEEKEND EDITION

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

HIGH: 76 LOW: 50 www.DailyCollegian.com MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 2009

SGA elections set to begin today

Candidates make final case to voters

By Chris Shores
Collegian Staff

Nearly 100 candidates are running in this fall's University of Massachusetts Student Government Association election, which will take place Monday and Tuesday. The ballot includes 50 candidates seeking senate seats, 44 applying for spots in local House Councils and one running for a lieutenant governor position.

According to Chancellor of Elections Christopher Faulkner, students can vote either day in the Campus Center from 11 a.m.-4:30 p.m. or in any of the dining commons, from 5 p.m. to 9 p.m. Students can select senators from their residential area, as well as a House Council of President, Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer from their dorm cluster.

All of the candidates strongly encourage students to vote, many citing the fact that the SGA controls a budget of two million dollars. Voting for candidates will determine what is or is not done with that money, voiced many.

"It is essential that people vote in this upcoming election. There is an opportunity to elect the leaders of student government and have this organization represent the students," said Erica Nyer, candidate for a Southwest (north) senate seat. "Students should vote so they have a student body that directly represents the students. These issues affect everyone, and every individual has the power to do something."

Each residential area is allotted a certain number of senators to represent them in the SGA. Four areas – Central, Northeast, Orchard Hill and Southwest (south) – have competitive races this election. In Orchard Hill, eight candidates are seeking three open senate seats, making it the most competitive SGA senate race. In Central, six candidates are seeking four open seats. Four Northeast students are running for three spots. In Southwest (south), nine students vie for six open senate positions.

Both Southwest (north) and Sylvan have complete ballots, with four and two candidates, respectively.

There are 16 commuter students running for 17 spots. In the North apartments, zero students are on the ballot (there are two senatorial spots). Write-in candidates can win these positions and could potentially win other positions if they collect more votes than students on the ballot.

This year, SGA election planning members has decided to hold House Council elections at the same time as the SGA senate races, something they hope will have a positive effect on the election.

"I think that having House Councils elected alongside Senators will bridge the gap between the different branches of the SGA and will hopefully result in a higher voter turnout because with more candidates comes more people actively mentioning elections and getting

See ELECTION on page 2

Here, students can be seen voting in last year's Student Government Association election. Voting begins today for the election, with polling stations opening up across campus.

Go To
www.DailyCollegian.com
for an online voter's guide to the Fall 2009 SGA Elections

A new 'Voice' in government this semester

By William McGuinness
Collegian Staff

Something bubbles slowly in the Student Government Association's (SGA) senate election this year.

Late September typically produces a lukewarm stew of mini campaigns, but the current ballot features a gang of students pooling their grievances and resources. Some 22 individuals from six residential zones will add "students for a democratic voice" to their names in a move they think will lead to more effective governance that better reflects students' thoughts.

Commissioner of Elections Chris Faulkner said that, while the SGA does not recognize political parties in the election process, students are allowed be identified as they wish so long as their last names are included.

Charlie Felder, a candidate for senate running as a commuter, said the "democratic voice" is more of a coalition than a party. He explained his decision to join the group as a reaction to politics as usual in the SGA. He claimed the body had stopped representing the majority of student opinion some time ago. The result, he said, is an SGA that stymies political dissent and the flow of information between the senate and the students whom they represent.

Their talking points are similar to those of senators who have campaigned openly against the SGA status quo in years past. This year's difference, Felder said, is that these voices will be louder, more plentiful and should carry more influence.

"After watching candidates lose in the past and hearing, seeing and reading up on their stories, it's

See VOICE on page 2

The UMass Minuteman Marching Band and hundreds of other participants took to the streets Sunday to celebrate 250 years of Amherst history.

Amherst's birthday goes off without hitch

Weather fails to hinder 250th anniversary

By Noah Steinberg-Di Stefano
Collegian Staff

At 1 a.m. on Sunday morning, Amherst Town Committee member and organizer of the Amherst 250th parade Patricia Wagner was awoken by a mysterious phone call.

"Is the parade still on for tomorrow?" asked the voice on the other line.

"Yes, it is," confirmed Wagner. "Rain or shine."

For a day that was over four years in the making, Sunday's 250th Anniversary parade marched on through adverse weather conditions, attracting over 1,000 people from Amherst and surrounding towns.

"It's a little bittersweet," said Wagner. "We obviously wish the weather could have been better, but we had to work with it."

Wagner, a third-generation Amherst resident, has been planning the anniversary parade since the Town Committee established this Sunday as the date for the event in May of 2006.

Once the date was set, Wagner and fellow members of the Town Committee began the long process of contacting over 100 local bands and community organizations to get involved with the parade.

Boy Scout troops, local businesses, schools, clubs and churches all signed up to march down Massachusetts Avenue and along North Pleasant Street in downtown Amherst.

Aside from a handful of bands that cancelled at the last minute because of the weather, the highly anticipated event went on as planned. To quote an all too common cliché, those involved weren't going to let the weather "rain on their parade."

"We had put so much work into putting this day together," explained Wagner.

"There was nothing that was going to prevent it from hap-

See PARADE on page 3

Town marks historic milestone

By Caitlin Soto
Collegian Staff

Amherst's 250th celebration anniversary got off to a great start Sunday afternoon with an old-fashioned parade starting from Amherst College and ending at UMass's Haigis Hall.

Even with temperatures in the 60s and a steady flow of rain, spectators lined both sides of North Pleasant Street and Massachusetts Avenue to catch a glimpse of town history in the making.

The theme of the parade was a celebration of the heritage, character and history of Amherst, a pride which the participants and floats attempted to express.

Vintage cars, horses and tractors, bands and wagons all appeared in the event, which drew hundreds of onlookers.

The event marked the biggest parade in Amherst history, with over 100 entries representing everything from businesses, community organizations and youth groups to the Amherst Fire Department.

"The one thing that really stands out about this parade the participants. They made it happen. They made it a memorable parade. The community came out to see a great show and that's what they got, remarked an onlooker.

Many of the attendees sat in lawnchairs or on the curb of sidewalks, with children, pets and cameras, eager to catch a look at those participating. Floats from The Emily Dickinson

See HISTORIC on page 3

Fenton's Athletic Supply company carried a number of local children through the streets of Amherst during Sunday's parade, showcasing an unusual form of transportation: customized gas cans.

ARTS&LIVING
FALL FASHION GUIDE

From jeans to leather jackets, from ankle boots to loafers, the fall brings a new wave of fashion. Also, with the economy as it is, staying in fashion has never been so cost-wary.

SEE PAGE 5

SPORTS
MINUTEMEN MAKE IT 3 STRAIGHT

Tailback Tony Nelson was out of action in Saturday's game, but that the Minutemen in their 44-17 rout over Stony Brook. Jon Hernandez filled in with his first game rushing for over 100 yards.

SEE PAGE 8

EDITORIAL&OPINION
JUST DO IT

Collegian columnist Mike Fox advises students to take a minute and vote in the SGA elections.

SEE PAGE 4

DailyCollegian.com
SGA ELECTIONS VOTER GUIDE 2009

Writer Chris Shores explores the positions of all of the candidates in today's Student Government Association elections.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
CXVIX
Issue 15

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief William McGuinness
Managing Editor S.P. Sullivan
Business Manager Daniel Jette
Production Manager Michael Sarkes
Night Supervisor Kirsten Swenson
Advertising Manager Michael Fortorski
Advertising Production Max Detmer
Arts & Living Editor Shayna Murphy
Comics Editor Annie Keithline
Editorial Editor Nick O'Malley
News Editor Nick Bush
Sports Editor Jeffrey R. Larnard
Web Editor Brian Wood
Photo Editor Matthew Harrison
IT Manager Victor Jacek
Asst. Business Manager Matt Zolnierz
Assistant Advertising Nicole Jacinto
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Distribution Manager Norman Prowse
Classified Manager Katelyn Tamilio
Asst. Arts & Living Justin Gagnon
Asst. Arts & Living Elyse Horowitz
Asst. Arts & Living Cal Stannell
Assistant Comics Andrew Witts
Assistant Editorial Michael Phillis
Assistant Editorial Hannah Nelson
Assistant News Samuel Butterfield
Assistant News Alyssa Creamer
Assistant News Jenn Heshion
Assistant Sports David Brinch
Assistant Sports Mike Gillmeister
Assistant Sports Adam Miller
Assistant Photo Maxwell Sparr
Assistant Photo Samantha Webber
Assistant Multimedia Sara Cody
Assistant Multimedia Chris Shores

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar year. The Collegian is independent, student operated, ad-supporting student. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aegis Lite, became the College News in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Daily Collegian in 1936. It published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been independent since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nick O'Malley

COPY EDITOR
Caitlin Quinn

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Guanno

SGA candidates attempt to make a good impression as election arrives their friends, neighbors and supporters to vote," said Faulkner.

ELECTION from page 1

Of the candidates running for President, Vice President, Secretary or Treasurer of their cluster's House Council, 17 candidates are running unopposed. There are 10 positions that have at least two candidates running, including the entire Webster/Dickinson Cluster in Orchard Hill. Six individuals are applying for President of Webster/Dickinson, with two candidates running in every category.

A Daily Collegian survey of those running for SGA positions revealed that many candidates have similar issues they would like to address if elected.

Several candidates discussed their desire for the availability of wireless Internet in all dorms on campus and discussed the parking situation for students.

Others said their main focus would be on improving the "transparency and accountability" of the SGA, better allocating funds for students and improving communication between the SGA and the campus body.

Another issue that many of the candidates wished to address is already on the ballot this fall in the form of a referendum: Whether or not the SGA voting should be conducted online in an electronic form rather than at polling stations.

"We are one of a handful of campuses in the country without online elections, and I think that the SGA should be ashamed of itself for disenfranchising commuter students," said Derek Khanna, who said he has been pushing for online voting for three years.

One concern about online voting has been a growing fear that "over-the-shoulder" voting might occur, influencing the vote one way or another in favor of a certain candidate.

A second referendum on the ballot aims to establish a new $1 student fee, which would create a UMass Independent Film Production Club. Such a fee would be similar to the MassPIRG fee currently automatically charged to student's bursar bills.

An online voting guide for the SGA elections can be found on our website.

Chris Shores can be reached at cshores@dailycollegian.com

Only a small proportion of UMass students bothered to vote in last year's SGA elections. A referendum question on today's ballot would move elections online, a move some hope would get students to vote.

New 'Democratic Voice' party hopes to have impact on SGA clear that they fail to have a major impact because they don't have a network – a wide group of individuals – supporting their views," Felder said.

VOICE from page 1

Joshua Davidson, another democratic voice candidate running as a commuter, said that while the idea of political parties in a student government may seem excessive, they already exist.

He said that in any political environment, lines are drawn and circles are formed around senators with similar viewpoints.

Derek Khanna, an early organizer of the group and a commuter candidate, said the former senators were disproportionately influenced by members of the ALANA Caucus – a dynamic he said lead to a dangerous consensus that consistently failed the student interest.

SGA President Ngozi Mbawuike said she's committed to serving with whoever is elected. Whether the coalition results in good change or bad, she said they will all have to work together.

While this loose coalition is simply working to get elected now, most interviewed candidates said there is potential for the group to carry its influence into senate deliberations. Khanna plans to apply the "democratic voice" tag to amendments and motions should he be elected.

Felder hopes the coalition will second guess how money from the Student Activities Fee is appropriated, and Khanna hopes for a boost of support for his failed push for online elections last year.

Mbawuike added that once the seats are filled, she will look at the senate as a group of senators first. Like others, she plans to wait and see how much of a role the group will play in the SGA's future.

William McGuinness can be reached at wmcguinn@student.umass.edu.

Derek Khanna, pictured here in 2008, has emerged as one of the strongest proponents of the SGA's new 'Democratic Voice' coalition.

Town parade a long time in the making

PARADE from page 1

pening. Plus, it would have been impossible to reschedule."

Members of the Amherst Town Committee sought help from its counterpart across the bridge in Northampton, which in 2006 organized their own town's 350th anniversary parade.

Many of the same bands that performed at the Northampton parade were the first to be invited to entertain the people that gathered in Amherst on Sunday.

Local police and fire departments were on hand all day to oversee that everything went smoothly, shutting down roads where the parade took place and detouring traffic.

They were joined by over 75 volunteers who assisted with anything from directing traffic to hoisting parade banners.

Wagner says she spent the whole summer working with the Amherst police and fire departments to plot the best route for the parade and figure out necessary safety precautions.

The parade was particularly significant for lifelong Amherst residents, some of who were around to witness the 200th Anniversary parade in 1959.

Wagner recalls watching the last parade in Amherst as a little girl, climbing on her father's shoulders to get a better look at the marching men in blue.

"It was amazing to witness," she said. "The community really came together to make it work."

Another longtime Amherst resident, Patricia Holland, agreed with the strong feeling of community togetherness, despite the poor weather conditions that could have easily confined people to their homes.

"I liked the fact that it brought out people from all parts of Amherst life," said Holland. "It was too bad that it had to rain, but everyone was all smiles."

On Amherst's official website (Amherstma.gov), one can learn the history of the town, back to its establishment as a township in 1759.

The town was named after Jeffery Amherst, a war hero of the French and Indian War, who according to popular legend, won Canada for the British and banished the French from North America.

His name is still commemorated at the historic Lord Jeffery Inn which has played host to Amherst visitors for over 150 years.

For many members of the Amherst community, the anniversary parade was an important historical benchmark.

Anyone who was around to witness the last parade, 50 years ago, has seen Amherst transform from a quaint farming community to thriving hub of college education.

Scanning the crowd on Sunday, amidst the steady rain and gray skies, Amherst's most loyal stood along the parade route to be apart of a historic day.

Children huddled under umbrellas, peering through the masses to catch a glimpse of the marchers.

As the parade came to an end at the Haigis Mall on the University of Massachusetts campus, the final banner read, "Thank you for coming! See you in 2059!"

For those children that will someday raise their own families in Amherst and bring them to the 300th anniversary parade, one can only hope for a little more sunshine.

Noah Steinberg-Di Stefano can be reached at steinber@student.umass.edu

The stilt-walking "Cake Lady" came strolling through the streets of downtown yesterday in the name of Amherst's birthday celebration.

Amherst nods to past as it turns 250

HISTORIC from page 1

Museum, The Jones Library, The UMass Minuteman Marching Band and and re-enactors from the civil and revolutionary wars all made their way through downtown at various points during the day. The First Congregational Church also had a float featured.

"It is excellent, very well done," said Merry Goings. "There was lots of community participation, and the band is welcome anytime."

Goings added that seeing youth involved, like those from Hopkins Academy, is great and puts them into the spirit of the event. Her husband, Bob, described the parade as "fantastic."

He said he believed the whole day went well and it was a great thing for the community.

Amherst resident Matt Schager and his sons, Jack, 3, and Luke, 2, waved to the parade participants as they passed by.

"It is pretty spectacular," Schager said. "It was pretty neat to see the Budweiser Horses."

The Budweiser Clydesdales are the beverage industry's most recognizable mascots. During the week, the horses delivered beer to bars and restaurants in town, and on Sunday they participated in the parade.

"It is nice to see the community get together and celebrate 250 years," resident Emilee Rogers said. "I wish Amherst another 250 years."

Caitlin Soto can be reached at csoto@student.umass.edu.

Civil war re-enactors were on hand for Sunday's parade, adding an explosive element to the festivities.

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
POTTER'S
AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.potterauto.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

Non-profit aims for nuclear elimination

By Michael Phillis
Collegian Staff

The era of nuclear warfare began on Aug. 6, 1945 with the bombing of Hiroshima, Japan.

This past Thursday was the first meeting of the University of Massachusetts chapter of Global Zero – a non-profit institution aimed at eliminating nuclear weapons by 2030.

Eunkyo Choi, an international student from South Korea, is heading the UMass section of Global Zero. The launch coincided with similar meetings at 13 other schools this past Thursday.

One hundred world leaders established Global Zero at a Paris conference in December 2008.

They laid out a plan to reduce the number of nuclear weapons – first by reductions in Russian and American stockpiles and then by phased reduction worldwide by all countries – to achieve a nuclear-free world.

President Barack Obama has largely endorsed Global Zero's mission.

For the first time in American history, the President chaired a meeting of the United Nations Security Council and, according to The New York Times, "pushed through a… resolution that would, if enforced, make it difficult to turn peaceful nuclear programs into weapons projects."

Choi spoke to a group of about 10 students, where she spent about 15 minutes echoing the major ideas of Global Zero.

He called for the "elimination of all proliferation of nuclear weapons."

Following Choi's introduction, a live video was shown featuring former Special Representative for Arms Control and Nonproliferation and Disarmament to Preisdent Clinton Ambassador Thomas Graham, hosted by Georgetown University.

Ambassador Graham introduced Global Zero's intentions and goals.

"We can never get to zero if we can't hold the line of where we are today," said Graham.

Graham said that Project Zero wanted to "create conditions for a world without nuclear weapons," through "encouraging states to negotiate conflict."

There were some technical difficulties during the video presentation but the audience stayed for the 35 minute duration.

At the video's conclusion, Choi asked members to volunteer in an effort to educate the public about the need for a world free of nuclear weapons.

Choi was confident of the potential of UMass in forwarding Global Zero's cause. Her goal is to organize demonstrations and educate the public.

A video of Queen Noor of Jordan was also shown. She spoke briefly about the United Nation's Security Council passing their resolution – with President Obama's support – of ideas supported by Global Zero.

Commenting after the meeting, Choi admitted that nuclear weapons had played a role in keeping the peace between the Soviet Union and The United States.

"[Nuclear weapons] made [the U.S. and USSR] more afraid of a third World War."

During the Cold War between the Soviet Union and the United States, President Dwight Eisenhower was the first to implement a policy of "massive retaliation," should a nuclear attack occur.

When only a few nations possessed nuclear arms, peace could arguably be attained by tension and threat.

Today, however, more countries than ever possess or are seeking nuclear weapons.

Global Zero argues that the threat of nuclear weapons falling into the hands of terrorist groups has greatly increased, drastically changing the previous dynamic.

Global Zero alleges that there have been "25 incidents of nuclear weapons being lost or stolen," and that this danger is a primary reason to eliminate nuclear arms.

UMass student Meaghan Foran, who attended the meeting, said, "I think I will [volunteer]," but that there were some questions she wanted to have more answers to, even if "my gut feeling goes with [global zero]."

According to the Bulletin of Atomic Scientists, in 1985 there were around 65,000 nuclear weapons, whereas today there are less than 24,000.

Ambassador Graham touched on this point, saying that "if we can go from 60 [thousand nuclear weapons] to 24 in 20 years, why can't we go from 24 to 0 in the next 20 years?"

Russia and the United States have periodically agreed to decrease their nuclear weapons arsenals.

In 2004, President George W. Bush passed Resolution 1540 in the United Nations, which called for nuclear materials to be secured and their export to be restricted.

When Choi was in elementary school in South Korea, she heard a siren go off warning of a possible war with North Korea.

"Why did I have to deal with this?" Choi asked the group after recounting the story.

Choi said that these experiences – as well as the terrorist attacks of September 11 – were primary reasons for her drive against nuclear weapons.

"The solution lies in spreading knowledge," said Choi. Global Zero's goal "will not be possible without it."

Michael Phillis can be reached at mphillis@student.umass.edu.

write for news
CONTACT NICK BUSH NEWS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 2009

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
– Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Apartheid alive today

Leigh Greaney

Walking to the University of Cape Town's (UCT) campus shuttle stop, I pass meter high black letters that still say, "Free Mandela." Although he's free and has passed his goodness down through his years of presidency, South African people are still oppressed.

Kayalitcha, the closest township to UCT, sits on the Cape's worst plots of real estate. Shanty shacks – some burnt down and abandoned, some still standing – stagger the landscape as far as the eye can see. These deedless homes are laced with drying laundry on strings like telephone wires.

Electricity can only be found in its residents. They provide their own energy to get water when they walk down the street to fill up their buckets. Their dishwasher is their set of two hands. Their stove is the fire they build. Their air conditioner is the ocean down the road.

Meanwhile, the residents of Camps Bay have three-car garages, sandy lawns and balconies to have their morning coffee on. They wine and dine at night after coming home from their jobs in the city. The only part of Kayalitcha life that they experience is when their house cleaner shows up weekly.

The difference between these two worlds – make no mistake – is color. Apartheid still trickles down Cape Town's spine. Symptoms of poison haunt the stacks of shacks and loom guilt over the white painted homes of luxury.

Americans see Apartheid as the embodiment of oppression and evil racism. Like the Civil Rights Movement, the struggle for South Africa was the struggle to establish human dignity and freedom. Most importantly, it was the struggle for lost equality to be found.

The problem was – and will continue to be – more of an economical concern than a political one to those in charge. However, it was based upon and functions on something much deeper: racism. After 1948, when Afrikaners came to power, the economic concerns of the British imperials took a backseat to segregation and fear of equality.

Americans see Apartheid as the embodiment of oppression and racist evil. Like the Civil Rights Movement, the struggle for South Africa was the struggle to establish human dignity and freedom.

The economic upper hand was part of Afrikaner racist ideology. In 1950, the Population Registration Act made it mandatory for every South African to fit into a specific racial group: white, black or coloured (those of mixed race). This was decided at birth and from that moment on – a passbook must be carried at all times to distinguish oneself in one of those categories.

This disallowed mixed residential or commercial areas from existing and allowed for forced removals to take place, creating areas such as the infamous District 6. As a result, vast quantities of African people became neither urban nor rural. Population density and severe lack of agricultural opportunity attributed to the urbanization, while lack of services and employment matched with isolation made it rural.

Africans were given land, but not citizenship. Hendrik Verwoerd, an Afrikaner politician who became Prime Minister in 1958, believed that this "internal decolonization" by separation would allow each culture to live and exist separately and equally. Chiefs were appointed by the government to rule the Bantustans where African natives were forced to move. Ruled through Afrikaner figurehead leaders, promises of autonomy and "decolonization" through segregation were simply myths.

Yes, black South Africans were removed from their land and forced to move into "reserves" in their own Trail of Tears. Yes, this is social engineering. But, this land had been settled for years. This stolen land is now inhabited by the grandchildren of those who stole it.

Can it really be redistributed in all fairness? Can the victims of Apartheid's human dumping grounds ever go back to their rightful home without taking it away from someone else?

The answer is the same as it was and is for the Native Americans. Movement is as futile as it is necessary to the compassionate heart. Fairness isn't in the equation. Money rules. White people still hold the best land and the best jobs.

The Apartheid disease still erodes South Africa. Action is spoken of and then freezes. A solution never seems to appeal to all parties.

What would be "fair" is for all Africans to regain their land and for jobs to be provided to them in order to make enough money to maintain that land. But, every action has a reaction and that land and those jobs must come from somewhere. A role reversal between black and white populations doesn't end oppression – it just changes the color of the problem. Innocent people are still punished. Oppression still bites to bleed.

The only reasonable answer is knowledge. Those who were robbed of land, economic opportunity and the dignity of equal citizenship should be given the only kind of power that does not restrict the power of others. Education could attempt to cleanse the wounds of Apartheid.

Free job training would allow black and white people to have equal opportunities in the employment market. Power is put into the hands of people to do with it as they choose. Competition becomes a beacon of hope for monetary elevation and for democracy.

Education of compassion would hopefully infuse itself into the culture through lessons of history and literature that show the shadows of the past. Light can finally shine evenly on the faces of South Africans once everyone is exposed to it.

Leigh Greaney is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at lgreaney@student.umass.edu

A call to vote in SGA elections

Mike Fox

The University of Buenos Aires (UBA) has approximately 300,000 students, 134 different colleges, 11 campuses spread across the city, counts 14 presidents of Argentina since 1890 as its alumni and is completely free.

It is managed by a massive and disorganized bureaucracy, one which allowed a friend of mine to enroll in a class two months into the semester because someone "left the system open."

The school of Ciencias Sociales, where I take my courses, is a famed hotbed of Political activism. Noted graduate Che Guevara peeks down from murals on the school's walls between thousands of fliers advocating hundreds of different political causes. They're against the recent coup in Honduras, against the development of U.S. military bases in Colombia, against the Argentine president, for the imprisonment of the former Buenos Aires Chief of Police. Pretty much any and every cause imaginable takes up real estate on any free visible space in the building, creating a mish-mash poster fire hazard of epic proportions.

Waiting between classes, among people freely taking a cigarette in the industrial-looking building, it is fairly common to be approached by people flyering for their respective causes. An earnest and persistent group of students, it is also common during the first 10, even up to 30 minutes (that is if class starts within 30 minutes), for them to enter and flyer in classes.

Last week, I was sitting in class eating an alfajor (a fantastic Argentine cookie cake with a caramel-like substance called dulce de leche in the middle) waiting for the already 20-minutes late teacher to arrive when five or more groups came in one after the other for different causes. This rate was even higher than normal.

I then realized that the hallway fire hazard was on a significantly grander scale. Also, posters had started showing up on classroom walls. I took a closer look and realized that each set of posters belonged to different political parties within the school. I was in the middle of the every-few-years or so school election season.

At UBA, students and teachers run political parties together ranging through a wide spectrum of beliefs. The combined slates bring students into leadership positions within student services and bring faculty into department leadership positions.

The night of the elections, I returned to my campus to see the school's famed political activism at its most fevered pitch.

Student services include selling assigned photocopied readings – teachers assign packets of the specific readings expected of students – at 50 percent of the independent vendors, a variety of student-run food businesses, book stores, academic advising and a council that meets with faculty over academic requirements. All of these are done with the cooperation and assistance of the faculty.

The night of the elections, I returned to my campus to see the school's famed political activism at its most fevered pitch. Crowds lined the street campaigning for every one of the parties. The entrance was obscured behind the posters of groups that completely disregarded decorum. A line stretched through the halls of people waiting to vote. Everyone was captivated and aware that the future of their school was decided by their choice.

This spirit of political activism and academic freedom made the University the target of many of Argentina's brutal military regimes during the Cold War. The University has stood as one of the most important institutions in the country since its founding; a massive monument to the liberating power of education.

What drives the leaders of UBA are higher goals than political platforms. There is a universal devotion on the part of the people to the advancement of education. Even across party lines, faculty, students and administrators cooperate as custodians of an essential piece of Argentina. Petty political differences fall by the side in favor of a universal appreciation of an institution that gives all involved so much.

Student Government is limited by the creative approaches taken towards it and by the passion of the students that it represents.

Today and tomorrow are the University Massachusetts senate elections. A large group of passionate and talented student leaders are running this fall and if you can take five minutes to vote, five minutes to show that you do care about more than just drinking and getting a degree, but you truly care about the quality of your experience – you might just end up surprised by the results. Or at least, you will have stood up to say that you do care about the place where you're spending four of the most important years of your life.

As for those lucky enough to be chosen by their peers, the powers of a government are only limited when it pursues one mindset. UBA has existed as a flexible institution, tacking and jibing to survive through the chaotic politics of Cold War Latin America.

Additionally, the power of the students has come through cooperation and the pursuit of common causes with the rest of the school body, faculty and administrators. Everyone has the same goal, to make their school the greatest it can be. And with everyone together, the goal can truly triumph.

Mike Fox is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mgfox@student.umass.edu.

Study-abroad opportunities subpar

Eli Gottlieb

I don't just want to travel to Israel, you know. Back in the day, when I was still trying to figure out how to go abroad for some of my junior year, I also wanted to visit Hong Kong, Turkey, South America, Spain's Basque country, London, New Zealand, India and Madrid. So I had gone down to the International Programs Office (IPO) at the University of Massachusetts. There, I learned an interesting fact: You cannot feasibly study abroad as a computer science major.

The location doesn't matter. Australia, New Zealand, Canada, England and India may all technically speak English, but that doesn't mean any educational institution in any of those places has a competent, reliable program teaching science, technology, engineering, or mathematics (STEM) that I could convince my professors at UMass to recognize, nor did any university in one of those countries teaching such a subject have an actual exchange agreement with UMass.

The Computer Science department itself knew jack about studying abroad (quite literally not their department), though they do encourage us to go on domestic exchanges by posting notices of information sessions in the Computer Science undergraduate lounge in Lederle. And let's not even talk about trying to study abroad at a foreign-language institution in the local language in technical courses without a UMass exchange agreement.

Of course, IPO has plenty of wonderful options. If you want to go anywhere in the world and learn about the local language, history and culture for a semester, they've got you the whole way. You'll step off your plane with what we call in Hebrew a gavrahav (literally a "broad back"), or a large group of people supporting you.

Sure, you have to belong to a major with the wiggle room in its credit requirements to allow spending a whole semester or two learning naught but gen-ed material (goodbye STEM or studio/performance art majors, hello Commonwealth College liberal arts kids) or belong to a cultural major relevant to your destination, but that's just the price you pay for wanting to make yourself a well-rounded, worldly human being instead of a highly-trained worker bee. Besides, everyone knows that STEM majors are all East Asians and Indians anyway, so by default we've already got experience of a foreign culture, right?

Wait a minute, I'm a born-and-bred New York/New Jersey Jew taking a STEM major in which I constantly feel surrounded by atheistic Massachusetts white guys.

Not only that, our department actually drives to increase admission of and retain minority and female students year after year. That stereotype about everyone who goes beyond Calculus I belonging to certain racial groups wasn't right at all.

Obviously, I don't approve of the current situation at UMass with respect to the ability of students in every field or walk of life to find study-abroad opportunities. We should really ask: How do we fix this?

Obviously, I don't approve of the current situation at UMass with respect to the ability of students in every field or walk of life to find study-abroad opportunities.

The simplest answer is to call up every international program department at every major university in an English-speaking country and ask them about opportunities for our students to take in-major courses there, or at least gen-eds on which we could put a UMass stamp of approval.

Perhaps, if we really want to act like dirty Pioneer Valley liberals to piss off Glenn Beck, we could even have courses taken abroad fill gen-ed categories like "diversity" automatically. We could sign exchange agreements as promiscuously as a hedonistic hippie. We could allow students with foreign-language expertise to take real, relevant courses abroad in their language of expertise as long as their department approves the courses (for example, I have friends who speak Spanish, French, Mahrati and of course Hebrew fluently enough to handle non-English courses).

In another unfortunately necessary statement of the obvious, I don't hate the sorts of cultural courses that the typical study-abroad program offers. I just couldn't fit them into my diploma schedule for the life of me, and therefore, could not justify spending a semester's worth of tuition and fees – plus extra for taking courses in another country – on them.

Many students find themselves in the same situation by junior year: they've entered a demanding, focused major that they enjoy but also want to do things like travel.

However, we don't live in a closely-packed region like Europe or the Middle East, and taking a semester of courses on the other side of the country at University of Washington-Seattle (whose Computer Science department I heard, in a recent rumor, fell to ranking below ours, go UMass) just doesn't have nearly the same appeal to prospective travelers as say, Cambridge University.

After all, can you really say you've traveled if you haven't gone somewhere with a drinking age of 18?

Eli Gottlieb is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at egottlie@student.umass.edu.

Obama and the rationing of health care

Alex Perry

Understanding the ramifications of Barack Obama's proposed health care reform is critical for all Americans regardless of their age and health.

The decisions being made by our government in the coming weeks and months are going to have a significant impact on the future of our country in many respects. The price and quality of health care, taxes and the economy are all going to be impacted greatly by this potential reform. It is for those reasons that I find it necessary to make sure everyone understands the seriousness of the potential disaster that is at hand if Obama and his liberal counterparts get their way.

Before Obama was elected president, he ran an ad saying his health care reform was in the middle of two extremes. These two extremes were John McCain's proposals and "government-run health care and higher taxes." After making some general points, the ad concluded with the statement, "common sense for the change we need."

Unfortunately it seems as though conservatives are the only ones around with any actual common sense these days.

As I and many others have previously discussed, the country simply does not have the $900 billion required by Obama to pay for his health care reform. Although Obama has stated, "reducing the waste and inefficiency in Medicare and Medicaid will pay for most of this plan," it has become clearer over the past week how this bill will actually be paid for.

As it turns out, waste and inefficiency are not going to be paying for most of this plan. The reform, as it currently stands, has proposals that include cutting spending on Medicare and Medicaid by approximately $500 billion over the next 10 years. Those cuts are an open example of health care rationing. The government is deciding to take these funds away from deserving seniors and focusing it on people who are younger and currently uninsured.

Liberals apparently don't like this point being brought up though. Obama's administration recently initiated a probe that is investigating Humana – a major insurance company – for reaching out to its clients by mail to inform them of concerns they have about the proposed spending cuts in the reform.

The Department of Health and Human Services has ordered all Medicare Advantage participants like Humana to, "immediately discontinue all such mailings" as well as, according to a report, "remove any such material from their web sites."

In order to combat these rising costs, health care rationing will inevitably have to occur. It is the only way to prevent health care costs from skyrocketing.

This is appalling and hypocritical of our government. It is appalling because it is obviously an attempt to stifle free speech.

It very much looks like government is trying to prevent any information that is not helpful for getting reform passed from getting out. In addition to this, it is also hypocritical. It is hypocritical because government has done nothing to other organizations that have advertised positively for the reform bill.

They are singling out only those that disagree with liberal politics. The government is sending the message to everyone that if you go against their policies, you will have to answer for it. This practice is just good old-fashioned school yard bullying on a political level and it certainly reminds me more of big government dictatorship than democracy. The rest of this bill is going to be paid for with increased taxes, which also happened to be considered "extreme" in Obama's ad during his campaign, and health care rationing.

It infuriates me to hear liberals say there is nothing in the bill that states there will be health care rationing because rationing doesn't have to be literally written into the bill for it to result from the bill.

There is a very simple "common sense" argument that should make it clear to everyone that health care rationing will inevitably be one of the bill's results. That is, if 30 million new people are introduced into the health care system while the supply of doctors, hospitals, nurses, etc. remain constant, the demand for health care will increase. Anyone who understands the concept of supply and demand knows that when demand goes up and supply remains the same prices go up. That is just how it works.

In order to combat these rising costs, health care rationing will inevitably have to occur. It is the only way to prevent health care costs from skyrocketing. If you like this proposal I hope you also like federal bureaucrats or private companies determining whether or not the medications or surgery you want is cost effective because if it isn't you will not be receiving it.

The fact that Medicare and Medicaid are going to be cut by $500 billion over the next 10 years in this current health care reform plan is indisputable. Taxes on health care premiums will go up under this plan despite Obama promising everyone during the campaign that no taxes would be raised.

The fact that health care rationing will inevitably occur by shocking the system by adding 30 million new people is also simply common sense. Unfortunately for liberals though, it's just common sense for Americans to oppose this change we don't need.

Alex Perry is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at amperry@student.umass.edu.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 2009

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Fun fall fashion tips for all pocket sizes

By Janam Anand
Collegian Correspondent

The smell of fresh beginnings welcomes us as we ease into a new fall routine – new classes, new roommates, new friends and – gasp, a new wardrobe. Even though we are nowhere near January and the start of 2010, back to school is a perfect time to make some new resolutions. All the latest fall clothes are just beginning to hit the stores, and chances are that the money from your summer job is burning a hole in your pocket, screaming that wonderful phrase, "Back to school shopping!"

Though the depressing economy may be nagging us to keep our wallets shut, there is little reason to actually curb our fashion addiction. With financial and personal constraints in mind, there are tons of ways to be fun, original and enthusiastic with one's wardrobe. Monetary constraints can get you down when you feel like you have nothing to wear, but again, be creative.

"Do-it-yourself" techniques, though daunting at first, can add an entirely refreshing dimension to your wardrobe for very little money. A box of dye from your neighborhood craft store can turn that dingy old blouse into a bright, fancy show-stopper, while a two-dollar seam ripper and a cup of bleach can do amazing things to an old pair of jeans, à la Abercrombie and Fitch. Walk into the nearest AC Moore, a Goodwill store or even a flea market in Northampton, and you will be shocked by the goods you can purchase for just under $20.

As far as trends go this fall, the runways have provided us with just the right combination of avant-garde styles mixed with everyday wearability. The leather jacket, for instance, has long been seen as a token for ruggedness, edge and intimidation. First popularized by the slick-styled teens in "Grease," then by Harrison Ford in "Indiana Jones," the leather jacket has since found a practical and popular home in the mainstream. Whether worn for a night out on the town, or just on a casual stroll to class, the leather jacket adds a bit more spice to an outerwear item. Guys and gals, both, can opt to accessorize any dressy top, or even just a casual tee with a leather jacket. To ensure that you do not land yourself in a complete deficit, head to your local Forever 21, where you can find a cropped biker jacket for $38.90, and a more distressed version for just $34.80. Guys, too, can find a distressed, hooded leather jacket for a modest $39.40 on the Forever 21 Online Catalogue.

When it comes to trends for college students, jeans are the obvious choice. Jeans are forever a wardrobe must. They provide comfort, versatility and are always good for a person on the run. From day to night, casual to formal, lectures to meetings, and everywhere in between, denim is the one clothing item that is never out of place. Jeans go with everything and there is a pair out there to flatter everyone. This fall, the jean trend has taken a turn for the better. Gone are the days of ultra low, second-skin styles. The fall 2009 agenda calls for a non-traditional spin on jeans. The ultra- trendy boyfriend jean is a popular choice for fall. This generously cut, slightly slouchy style gives off that effortlessly cool vibe so many strive to attain. The comfort factor is, perhaps, the best feature of these jeans. They are perfect for any affair. Of course, these are not actually boys' jeans, they are women's jeans cut to look like guys jeans fitted to a woman's body. They are appealing for fall and work well with flats.

Guys, on the other hand, are being introduced to a rather experimental style of jeans. A pair of straight cut, dark rinse jeans are a wardrobe staple every man should have in his closet. These are the jeans you can wear on casual Fridays, for nights out, around town on the weekend and on many more occasions. Proving that you do not have to spend a pretty penny to acquire such a resourceful item, the Gap recently re-launched its denim line, serving up classic, perfect-fitting jeans like its Authentic Fit for a promotional $34.50. At such a reasonable price, you will want to buy several pairs and wear them everywhere this fall.

Shoe fashion trends for fall 2009 differ from previous trends with strictness of forms and colors. The new season seems to be much more practical than in previous years. Of course some fashion designers present their lavish lines of footwear as well, but in a time of economic decline, it looks defiant. Try to choose easy-to-wear styles. The color palette for the coming cold season looks dark, and seemingly mystic. Deep grays, black, reds, bold violets and moody shades of blue display themselves from an inconceivable side. The main trend for this fall is the ankle boot. First introduced in a strictly formal and oxford form last winter, this trend has since adapted to the various climates and conditions under which it is followed. A flat suede or leather ankle boot, perhaps with a zip, bow, or some buttons, can easily accompany skirts, dresses, jeans, as well as tights. The key, however, lies in quirkiness. This cute style can add even more of a flare, if worn in one of fall's moody colors.

Last fall's calf-length flat boot is gingerly growing into a knee-high, and even over-the-knee boot. The key to this fad, however, is to keep the rest of the outfit simple, dark, and clean. This extravagant trend can look rather overwhelming, and maybe even distasteful, if worn in bright colors, and with a plethora of accessories. Nevertheless, those who live for boldness can opt for this trend in a small heel, or better yet – none at all. Charlotte Russe offers a simple, flat, over-the-knee suede boot in a classy navy blue tone for an affordable $39.99, and the ankle boots start at a sensational $24.99.

Leather jackets aren't just for Indiana Jones and John Travolta. This fall, men and women alike can look good in leather at reasonable prices.

Guys can expect to see loafers galore throughout the fall, and even into the winter. This previously Euro-chic trend has finally found a home within the American hipster scene. On a more casual note, moccasins, and simply crafted but brightly colored sneakers are considered slick, stylish, and up-to-date. Visit your local Journey's for styles starting at $54.99.

As we ease our way into fall 2009's strong silhouettes and edgy trends, a few essential concepts may be worth following:

-The wackiness of the 80s-era is at your fingertips. Break out those colored tights, hit up a thrift store and purchase a padded blazer, and revive those polka dots.

-Chained bags, such as those from Chanel's vintage collection, are found in abundance at the local TJ Max, and may be no further than your grandmother's attic.

-Tailored coats and capes do not have to cost a fortune. London-inspired trench coats and heavy sweater capes can be found at H&M and Urban Outfitters, respectively.

Most centrally, however, your style is your own. Use fall 2009's flair generously, but adapt it to your own personality. You will be floored by the icon you see in the mirror.

Janam Anand can be reached at janand@student.umass.edu

Original 'Fame' lives on, sort of

By Rachel Aylward
Collegian Correspondent

"Fame costs… and right here is where you start paying." So started the remake of the 1980s musical hit "Fame." While this movie does have a literal cost, you may find that the price of the ticket is actually worth it after seeing this fun flick. If you are a dancer, singer or musician of any sort, you will be interested in watching this fresh group of talent parade their skills on the big screen.

The movie focuses on several teenagers who attend the New York Academy of Performing Arts and their difficulties with juggling all of their arts classes coupled with a full academic schedule. It takes you step by step through their adolescent lives – audition day, freshman, sophomore, junior and senior year, and a final performance – showing you their successes and their downfalls. They were, "four years of ups and downs, of wonderment and disappointment."

Living the life of an artist surely does prove to be a game of give and take, which becomes increasingly apparent with the plot's wavering progression. Even if you are not someone who is connected to the arts, you will undoubtedly still appreciate the earnestness of the characters who, in these short four years, learn their limits and work to exceed them.

Kay Panabaker, noted for her roles in various Disney Channel shows, plays the shy but talented singer Jenny Garrison who has difficulty breaking out of her shell. Jenny's character is eventually coaxed out by Marco, played by the gorgeous Asher Book. While Asher does have a mystifyingly smooth voice, we aren't quite ready to say, "move over, Zac Efron," with this one. His short filmography needs to rack up a few hits before we can go that far. It is true, however, that girls of all ages will be wooed by his adorably key role in this film.

Megan Mullally is also in "Fame," playing the part of a fun-loving voice teacher by the name of Ms. Fran Rowan. Megan is most well-known for her comical role in the hit TV show "Will & Grace." She continues to portray a sassy character in the few scenes she acts in Fame. Kelsey Grammar, who has won multiple Emmy nominations, has a cameo role, and also let's not forget Kherington Payne's ("So You Think You Can Dance") portrayal of Alice.

Debbie Allen, who plays Ms. Angela Simms, was actually in the original TV series of "Fame" in the 80s as the main character Lydia Grant. It is a definite treat to witness her revisit this major part of her life.

While the remake may not be as hot as the original "R" rated version, this watered down "PG" movie is still enjoyable and consequently accessible to a wider age demographic. The plot could have been thicker, but then again what did we expect considering that most of what was considered interesting in the first version was too graphic to make the cut for this juvenile remake? A story of artistic development, it is easy to get caught up in the emotions of so many young people trying to come into their own.

Some dropout, some change their course and some make it. In any circumstance, the characters' minor developments are enjoyable and easy for anyone to follow. As the lovable Neil said of his journey at the Academy, so can the audience agree that "it was everything [they] could ever hope for…end scene!"

Rachel Aylward can be reached at rpaylwar@student.umass.edu.

While not very true to the original rated 'R' version, the new family friendly adaptation of the musical "Fame" is still enjoyable for all audiences.

Ang Lee's "Taking Woodstock" tells the story of the historic concert's origins and the people involved in making it what it has come to be known by today.

'Taking Woodstock' takes look at the historic concert event

By Janam Anand
Collegian Correspondent

Ang Lee's most recent project, "Taking Woodstock," explicitly caters to a certain market, yet its draw is relatively comprehensive. It is based on Elliot Tiber's memoir and set during what is arguably one of American culture's most defining eras – the late 1960s during the Vietnam War.

The film offers an adoring look at the exploratory, grudging merge of diverse cultural ideas: the widespread use of drugs, flower-power culture and open radicalism, so to speak. It illustrates the true story of how the Woodstock Music Festival came to take place on Yasgur's farm in upstate New York, how the festival affected the people involved and the manner in which the hippie spirit brought acceptance to a largely Jewish, conservative region of the country.

The movie itself, though lighthearted, compelling and nostalgic, can be seen as hit-or-miss. Ang Lee, who previously directed "Brokeback Mountain," made a true star of the late Heath Ledger while also inducing all sorts of appraisal, as well as positive feedback on the subject of complex romantic relationships between two people of the same sex. Lee has since been applauded for devising endearing projects that appeal to our most intimate emotions – ones that are sensitive, plausible and may as well be about our own parents, friends and communities. "Taking Woodstock" is based firmly on reality, though the film is not about one character's journey. It is a coming-of-age story about America.

Filmmakers have chosen to address this particular era of American history many a time, and "Taking Woodstock", ineptly, does not offer any new angle to the subject matter. Elliot Teichberg, played by Demetri Martin, veritably stumbles through the film; though he sets up the deal with Woodstock's promoters, he does it only to keep his parents' rundown El Monaco Motel from foreclosure.

Like the character Forrest Gump, Teichberg accidentally finds himself in a remarkable situation. Imelda Staunton plays Elliot's mother Sonia, a grouchy, incapable woman whose greed and grudges makes her exasperating. Staunton is undoubtedly a tremendous actress, but her role, like Martin's, leaves little room for development.

Notable screen time went to Lies Schreiber, playing a cross-dresser with a pistol who performs security detail at the El Monaco, and Emile Hirsch's Billy, a freaked-out, war-scarred Vietnam vet whose flashbacks provide surprising comic relief.

The plot drags in the beginning of the film, but succeeds in making the viewer feel the way the characters must. Lee's proclivity for split-screen cinematography is quite resourceful in this film. Such cinematography was a technique common in film and TV in the 1960s and 70s.

Overlapping action and audio convey a sense of chaos – so much happened at once during the planning and execution of Woodstock, and the film plays with that idea. Lee is unquestionably an instinctual, visually motivated director, and the differences in color saturation from the beginning of the film to the end, conjure "The Wizard of Oz." When Treichberg finds himself taking acid in a van with two traveling hippies, the colors and patterns take over the screen offering the audience a look into a drug trip like none other. When Sonia and her husband Jake eat hash brownies, they dance in the rain with Elliot – a sweet scene in which age and cultural boundaries fall by the wayside.

Though the movie is a native story about a lot of people gathering in one place, it is a smart, somewhat charming tale with exemplary timing that goes beyond the 40th anniversary of the Woodstock Music Festival. In the present economic climate, with the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan troubling the collective American psyche, and with the first African-American president in office, the parallels between 1969 and 2009 are hard to miss.

Near the end of the film, Woodstock promoter Michael Lang, played by Jonathon Groff, approaches Elliot on a horse. As the two watch festival attendees clean up their trash and wade through the mud, Elliot asks, "What now?" Lang, a mysterious hippie type, replies, "Well, everybody's gotta chase the money now." Though this actually refers to the aftermath of the festival, it seems to be the film's true message. Maybe Americans should take a deep breath and look around once in a while. The idea seems to be that, well, maybe we will realize things can, in fact, be, as Lang says, "beautiful, man, beautiful."

Janam Anand can be reached at janand@student.umass.edu.

An article about the University Gallery's Andy Warhol event incorrectly identified a 2009 UMass graduate item who researched Warhol's works and wrote several pieces about the exhibit. The correct spelling of her name is Kathleen Banach. We regret the error Defense strong in second half of win

SECOND HALF from page 8

Minutemen smandered a touchdown on their opponents opening drive, as the Seawolves had a strong early showing on Saturday.

The early score helped the SBU jump out to a 10-7 lead midway through the first quarter. But the Seawolves would only score once more in the game, and were shut-out in the second half, as UMass' defense clamped down as the game progressed.

"You always want to come out hot in the second half and we started off a little slow," sophomore linebacker Tyler Perry said. "Stony Brook came out of the gates ready to go. [We] just settled down, started playing our gaps, doing our assignments and playing as a whole unit."

While the UMass offense had time to game plan around the loss of Nelson, the defense had to adapt quickly when a member of their squad was knocked out of the game. Senior linebacker Kurt Filler left the game in first half with an injury, as true freshman Perry McIntyre earned his first major playing time of his career.

Already hampered by the loss of star-studded linebacker Josh Jennings, who has been sidelined with back problems, the Minutemen's linebacking corps had to adjust once more to a major loss.

"From the beginning, Perry's been the guy that's stepped in and contributed immediately on special teams and defense and has been playing more and more with Kurt at that outside backer spot and both guys are on all our special teams," Morris said.

Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu.

Cuko perfect

FOOTBALL from page 8

the defense with eight tackles, filling in for Kurt Filler at linebacker, who was sidelined due to an injury.

"We always want to come out hot for the second half," linebacker Tyler Holmes said of his team's defense.

UMass scored again in the first five minutes of the third quarter with a 36-yard run by Hernandez to give him his third and final touchdown of the game.

The Minutemen followed that up with two field goals, and Zardas's second rushing touchdown of the game, which came with 40 seconds left in the third quarter on a 4-yard run.

"We played well, particularly in the second half, which I think was the difference in the game," Morris said.

The Seawolves caught a break late in the third quarter, when a face mask penalty gave the Minutemen second-and-25 on the 50-yard-line. But a 32-yard pass by Havens, which led to a field goal from 42 yards out by kicker Armando Cuko put UMass up 17, negating any advantage that SBU might have had from that penalty.

Cuko finished the game with a perfect night on three tries. The kicker has made 9-of-11 field goals this season.

Backup quarterback Scott Woodward came in mid-way through the fourth quarter when the game was out of reach, throwing the ball once and having an 11-yard rush.

UMass has what Morris calls a "well-timed bye week" before it heads to Delaware for its second away game of the season.

Morris hopes to use the time off to improve on some of his team's weaknesses, which he believes are still a problem despite blowing out its last three opponents by at least 20 points.

"We still have lapses in our game, which we need to continue to get better at and this off week will help towards that," Morris said.

Adam Miller can be reached at amiller@dailycollegian.com.

UMass on 5-game undefeated streak

SOCCER from page 8

Dukes fell to 3-6-0, 0-2 A-10.

UMass is now on a five-game unbeaten streak, with its last loss coming against Albany in double overtime on Sept. 9. Its 2-0-0 start in A-10 play is the best it has had since 2005.

"I think everyone is getting more comfortable with the style of play," Napoli said. "We got more fit, we're playing stronger in second halves, and the players are trusting the coaching staff more."

Napoli is trying to keep the team grounded by instilling in them a specific frame of mind.

"We're taking everything on a game-to-game basis. We have to focus on each and every game right now and not get too ahead of ourselves," Napoli said. "Our target goal right now is to make the A-10 tournament; it's way too early to predict the championship game."

Right now, the Minutewomen are only thinking about this Friday, when they continue their stretch of road matches against Saint Louis (3-5-2, 0-1-1 A-10).

Steve Levine can be reached at slevine@student.umass.edu.

Smith heating up, strong in second half

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

With the offense of the Massachusetts women's soccer team emerging after a five-game hiatus, midfielder Therese Smith is heating up at the right time for the Minutewomen.

The third-year Holyoke native scored a goal in each of UMass' two victories last week. In a 2-1 win over Saint Peter's College (2-8-1) last Sunday, the Minutewomen's first win of the season, Smith scored the winning goal with 5 minutes, 12 seconds remaining in the first half. She then struck again in the team's first Atlantic 10 match up five days later against Saint Josephs.

With the Minutewomen (3-4-2, 2-0 A-10) trailing 1-0 at the start of the second half, Smith took a pass from redshirt junior Sydney Stoll and launched a low strike past the goalkeeper to tie the game. She is tied with Stoll for first on the team with two goals, while her four points trail only Stoll's five.

"Therese is our most skilled player," UMass coach Angela Napoli said. "She is in more of a leadership role and she is great with it. She can hold the ball, and when we get stuck on defense we know she can clear it out. She is a big key to our attack."

Smith is well on her way to improving her stats for the third consecutive season. As a sophomore, she was second on the team with eight points, three goals, and two assists in 2008. If this hot streak continues, she could top those totals before the Minutewomen's next home game on Oct. 9 against La Salle.

Fox scores first goal

Freshman midfielder Meredith Fox showed off her skills with the first goal of her budding collegiate career.

The Pennsylvania native ensured a victory for UMass with her second half goal against the Hawks (4-4-2, 1-1) last Friday. Less then five minutes after Smith tied the game 1-1, Fox fought through a crowd in front of the net and chipped in a corner kick from senior Jacquelyn Desjardins.

"She is a hard worker, and all heart, and all abut the team," Napoli said of Fox. "She just works and works and works, and that is the type of player every team needs. She cares more about the final product than how many minutes she plays."

Fox has been the Minutewomen's top offensive freshman thus far, starting in all nine of the team's games, and is tied with senior Katie Ruggles for third on the team in both goals (one) and points (two). She has also attempted seven shots this season with three of them being on-goal.

Strong second half play

Going into the season, Napoli originally thought that her squad would be a first-half team. However, the Minutewomen's play in recent weeks has proven the opposite to be true.

This season, the Minutewomen have put up better numbers in the second half, most noticeably on the offensive end. In nine games, they have attempted 52 shots in the second half, with four going for goals.

In the first half, they attempted 11 fewer shots and scored one less goal. The only time the Minutewomen have scored in the first half during its first five games was against St. Peter's, where they chipped in two goals prior to halftime.

"I felt early that we would be a first-half team," Napoli said. "I guess we need time to adapt to our opponents. I give credit to our fitness level. The fitness staff has worked extremely hard, and it shows."

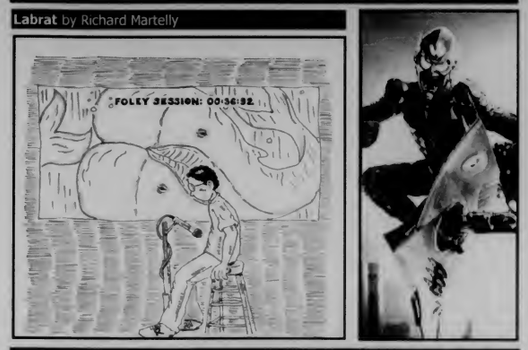
On the defensive end, UMass has allowed 74 shots and given up three goals in the second half this season. Because of this, goalies Lauren Luckey and Emily Cota have seen their save numbers drop after half-time. Excluding overtime periods, the duo has combined for 57 saves on the season, with 31 coming in the first half and 26 coming in the second.

Mike Mastone can be reached at mmastone@student.umass.edu.

Feed your future

See how more than 29,000 people are working together to help inspire change.

Begin at www.pwc.tv

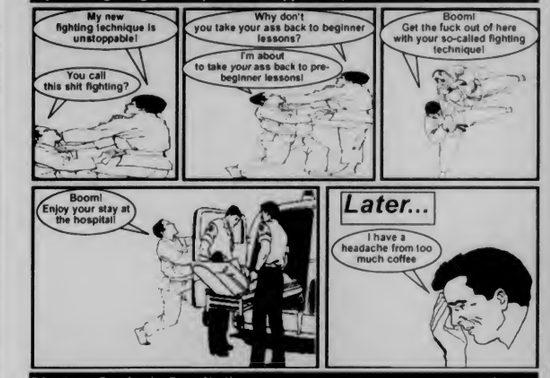


PRICEWATERHOUSECOOPERS

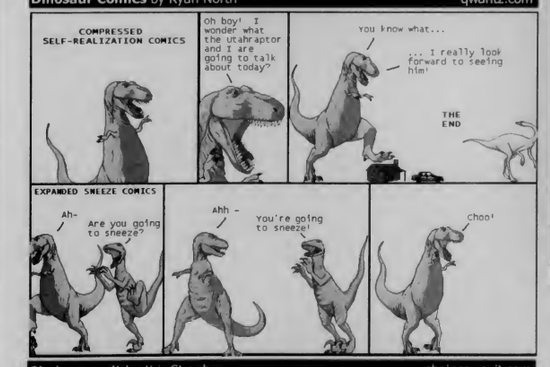
PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP All rights reserved PricewaterhouseCoopers refers to PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP (a Delaware limited liability partnership) or, as the context requires, the PricewaterhouseCoopers global network or other member firms of the network, each of which is a separate and independent legal entity. We are proud to be an Affirmative Action and Equal Opportunity Employer

COMICS

Labrat by Richard Martelly



Wondermark by David Malki! wondermark.com



College Ninja by Stephanie Ressler

My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees mnftiu.cc

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North qwantz.com

Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub chainsawsuit.com

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!

Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.

E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com

Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
A "Good Samaritan" does NOT steal hair gel.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Give up your religious beliefs: the Detroit Lions won.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
The truth comes back to haunt you. Especially if you're Roman Polanski.

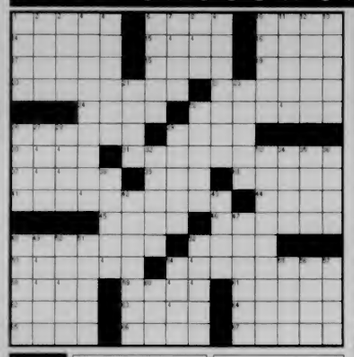
taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Vast amounts of alcohol do not increase the hardness of your skull.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Brain scans measure injury, they don't unlock your potential brain power.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Androids aren't far-fetched. Channing Tatum is one of them.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Please spend your day finding the key to pearly white teeth.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
It's okay to "awww" at Bill Clinton and Al Gore's continuing bro-mance.



libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Sorry – "That is so meth!" will never be a popular catch phrase.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You'll need more than Facebook ads to promote your "Hairy Knuckles" blog.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Like a good sandwich, the Patriots need more Mayo.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You need to make a decision: are you real or are you FO real?

CROSSWORD

ACROSS
1. Sharpen
6. Assist
10. Resorts
14. Cognizant
15. Cousin of a mandolin
16. After-bath powder
17. A temporary stay
18. Holly
19. Operatic solo
20. Gossamer
22. Try to fix or mend
24. Gestures of assent
25. Ordinary
26. It hangs from the necks of turkeys
29. Found on a rotary phone
30. Dogfish
31. Gar
37. Triangular formation
39. Tattered cloth
40. Flavor
41. United into a whole
44. Hint
45. Pledge
46. Go to
48. Trade stoppage
52. Threesome
53. Lasso
54. To show differences when compared
58. "Oh, my!"
59. Detail
61. Leg bone
62. A dog wags this
63. Means
64. Acquire knowledge
65. Coastal raptor
66. Visual organs
67. S S S S

DOWN
1. Economize
2. Blockhead
3. Reckless
4. To acquaint with the existing situation
5. Gasoline
6. Assumed name
7. Male cow
8. French for "Summer"
9. Relating to a text
10. Not sit
11. A kind of heavy jacket
12. Unearthly
13. Frighten
21. Biblical garden
23. Part of a body of water
25. Gnatlike insect
26. Dry riverbed
27. Ends a prayer
28. Slant
29. The end of life
32. Muse of love poetry
33. Manufacturing plants
34. Part of an archipelago
35. Bowl over
36. Attention
38. Ancient Greek marketplace
42. Music with a syncopated melody
43. Gosh!
47. Jot
48. Cheer up
49. Cheekbone
50. What we think with
51. A long narrow passage
52. Weighty books
54. Formally surrender
55. Fabrics made from goat hair
56. A title of address
57. Bronzes your skin
60. Plaything

Bubblegum Heroes by Greg Roberts and EJ Massa

SUDOKU

		8	3		1			6
7	4		8				1
1				9		2	5
6						5
	8			1		9
3		2	4	8		7		1
	3			2	7
		9	6		8		3	2
	1	6			5		4

CLASSIFIEDS

EMPLOYMENT

Part-time personal care attendant. About 10-12 hours/week. Flexible Hours. Pleaes call Patrick (413) 275-7928.

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162.

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

RESEARCH STUDY

Join a Research study conducted through the UMass Communication Department! Watch 80 mins of T.V. News, answer survey questions, and learn up to $10 for your time! Contact Lisa Wortman at Lisadenice@gmail.com to sign up!

SPRING BREAK 2010

Spring Break 2010 sell trips, earn cash, and go free! Call for group discounts. Best prices guranteed! Info/reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Montreal Party Weekends From $99 Includes Hotel, Bus, and Clubs montrealexpress.net (781)979-9001

GUITAR TEACHER

Professional Electric Guitar Teacher & Performer; Specializing in Jazz, Improv. Music Theory & Technique. Call (413)665-8794

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 2009 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen run over Seawolves

Horne leads way on offense

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Jeremy Horne waited for his day to breakout for the Massachusetts football team. After Saturday night, he no longer has to wonder when that day will come.

The redshirt senior receiver had his fifth career 100-yard receiving game with 124 yards on five catches, as the Minutemen (3-1, 1-0 Colonial Athletic Association) rolled to a 44-17 win over Stony Brook at McGuirk Stadium. The Seawolves (1-3) picked off quarterback Kyle Havens twice during the game, but could do nothing to prevent UMass from having its way.

UMass	44
SBU	17

Havens never threw a touchdown, but finished the game 12-of-24 with 259 yards. That didn't seem to matter, as UMass still found plenty of scoring opportunities.

The Minutemen finished with five rushing touchdowns and 241 yards, even without their leading rusher, Backup Jon Hernandez filled in for starter Tony Nelson, who was out with an upper body injury. Hernandez finished with 29 carries for 140 yards, including three touchdowns.

It was Hernandez's first time in his career rushing for over 100 yards.

"It's a testament to our offensive line, tight ends and fullbacks," UMass coach Kevin Morris said of Hernandez's performance. "It takes more than just the running back to get all of those good yards that we were getting."

UMass controlled the game from the very first play, as Havens completed a 49-yard pass to Horne on SBU's 27-yard-line. That drive ended 2 minutes, 21 seconds later after fullback Chris Zardas found the end zone on a 3-yard rush to push the Minutemen out to a 7-0 lead with 12:39 to go.

SBU quarterback Michael Coulter (14-of-23, 126 yards) completed two passes for 12 yards to knot the game up after running back Conte Cuttino had three rushes for 20 yards and a catch for 14. On their next possession, the Seawolves took their only lead of the game on a field goal with 6:02 left in the first quarter.

They kept that lead for about four minutes, before the Minutemen went on a 14-0 run with two straight rushing touchdowns by Hernandez.

"Our line did a tremendous job today," Hernandez said. "The front five came out today. I just ran behind them, hit my holes and found my assignments."

SBU scored its last points of the game capitalizing on an interception from Havens with a 15-yard pass from Coulter to receiver Jordan Gush, but still trailed UMass at the half, 24-17.

Throughout the game, the Seawolves struggled on third-down conversions, finishing 3-of-11 while making just two trips inside the red-zone. True freshman Perry McIntyre led

See FOOTBALL on page 6

MAXWELL STANLEY/COLLEGIAN

Quarterback Kyle Havens failed to throw a touchdown in UMass' 44-17 victory, but still threw for 259 yards on 12-of-24 passing.

Loss of Nelson not an issue

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

No Nelson? No problem.

Senior running back Tony Nelson, the preseason All-Conference, Walter Payton Award candidate is the work horse for the Massachusetts football team's ground attack. On Saturday, he didn't play a down.

Scratched from the lineup just hours before the game, Nelson was in pads on the sidelines for Sunday's game against Stony Brook. Meanwhile, in the huddle with the rest of the starting offense was redshirt sophomore Jon Hernandez.

A backup so far at UMass, Hernandez was named the starter for the first time in his college career. He made the most of his start, carrying the ball 29 times for 146 yards rushing and three touchdowns against the Sea Wolves, en route to a 44-17 victory at McGuirk Stadium.

Also picking up the slack with Nelson out was redshirt freshman running back Cedric Gonnet and senior fullback Chris Zardas. Zardas' skills proved handy in goal line situations, as he scored two of the team's five rushing touchdowns on the day. Gonnet also contributed to the offensive attack, gaining 50 yards on seven carries.

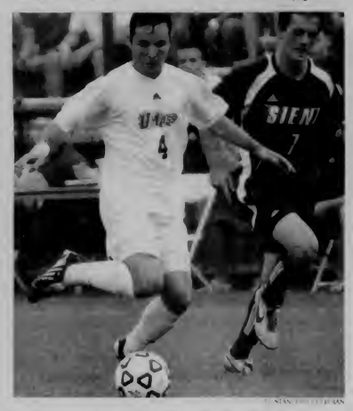
"That was a game-time thing," UMass coach Kevin Morris said. "We said, 'let's go with Jonny and Cedric and see what we can do with those guys, and Chris Zardas, and they responded tremendously and did a great job."

Morris praised his team's deep roster and the ability for players further down the depth chart to step into larger roles when called upon.

"That's really been the testament to our team in the first four weeks has been that, guys stepping up when other guys are out," Morris said. "We've had it at all positions. Our O-line's been doing a great job, providing those guys an opportunity to get big plays and Jonny, he's a hard-hitter and made a lot of yards on his own as well."

So far this season, the Minutemen have had to adapt on the fly and adjust to injuries on the offensive line, the linebacking corps, the wide receiving corps and now to Nelson.

As a team, the Minutemen accumulated 241 total yards on the ground on 46 total carries Saturday. The successful ground game took pressure off quarterback Kyle Havens, who attempted a season-low 24 passes against Stony Brook.



The story of the night remained Hernandez, who shattered his previous career highs in carries, yards and touchdowns.

The night before the game, Nelson told Hernandez, his roommate, that he might be too dinged up to play the next day. Nelson had been questionable all week after experiencing what was officially listed as an "upper-body injury." The switch, though, provided Hernandez an opportunity to be used as more than a speed back, a role he had been limited to in the past.

SECOND-HALF SHUTDOWN

For the first time all season, the

See SECOND HALF on page 6

STAN BOUDREAU/COLLEGIAN

Junior Ben Arikian had an assist in last years' match with Siena and did even more this year as he had an assist and a goal in UMass' 2-0 win.

Arikian leads way over Siena

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the second year in a row, junior Ben Arikian played a major role in defeating a familiar opponent.

Instead of just catalyzing a goal, the midfielder had both an assist and a score, as the Minutemen (2-1-3) shut out Siena, 2-0, Saturday afternoon.

Last season, Arikian helped catalyze a score against the Saints (4-3-1) on Sept. 6, as Chris Brown headed in the game-winning goal en route to UMass's first shutout of 2008.

UMass	2
Siena	0

Arikian netted the game-winning goal in the opening minutes of the second half, on an unassisted try from the left corner of the box, as UMass got its second victory of the season.

Ten minutes into the first half, senior forward Mark DeSantis got the Minutemen on the board when he ripped a shot from the right side of the box inside the left far post to put UMass up 1-0.

Arikian, along with sophomore midfielder Chris Roswess, was credited for the assist on DeSantis goal, which helped build momentum in the opening moments of the game.

Arikian and DeSantis are tied for the lead in goals for the Minutemen with two on the season, while Arikian leads in overall points with six. Both have one game winning goal each so far in 2009, as UMass coach Sam Koch will look for both to keep contributing offensively as the team begins Atlantic 10 play in the upcoming weeks.

The Saints, who have one of the most dynamic scoring attacks in the Metro Atlantic Athletic Conference, tried to generate offense throughout the game, holding an advantage in shots, 20-14, as well as corner kicks, 4-1.

The Saints defeated two A-10 teams this season in Rhode Island and St. Bonaventure, but a stingy UMass defensive game plan and consistent play in net held the Saints at bay.

Goalkeeper Shane Curran-Hays was impressive in net for the Minutemen, making eight saves on the day, including five in the first half.

It was the redshirt sophomore's first career win and shutout in only his third collegiate start.

Curran-Hays and junior Chris Piekos have been splitting time between the pipes, with both making 18 saves so far this season. However, Piekos has a slightly higher save percentage (.947), which is second in the nation, than Curran-Hays (.857), and has two shutouts on the year.

The Minutemen will come back to Rudd Field after a five-game road trip to take on Colgate Tuesday, a place they haven't played a regular season game since Sept. 1.

UMass tied Boston University, 1-1, in a double overtime match, before tying two of its next three opponents.

After a 2-0 loss to Hartford, the Minutemen got their first victory over the year, with Arikian again leading the way in a 1-0 win.

He scored with less than 10 minutes to go in the contest, as Piekos made four saves in the game.

The meeting with Colgate will be just the second meeting between the two teams, with the Minutemen defeating the Raiders back in 1989.

Koch needs just one more victory to reach his 200th career win at the helm of the Minutemen program.

Tuesday's match-up with Colgate is slated for 3:30 p.m. at Rudd Field.

David Brinch can be reached at dbrinch@student.umass.edu.

UM perfect 2-0 in A-10

BY STEVE LEVINE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's soccer team bears no resemblance to its former self from a few weeks ago.

With their 0-4-2 start in the rearview mirror, the Minutewomen opened their Atlantic 10 schedule this weekend, defeating Saint Joseph's, 2-1, on Friday and Duquesne on Sunday.

UMass	2
Duquesne	0
UMass	2
SJU	1

"St. Joe's was a solid game," UMass coach Angela Napoli said. "We played better in the second half by finishing on early scoring chances. From then on, we just held on to the lead."

Junior forward Therese Smith scored her first goal of the season redirecting a pass from junior Sydney Stoll at the beginning of the second half. Four minutes later, freshman midfielder Meredith Fox netted the first of her career with a pass from senior Jacquelyn Desjardins. The goals overcame a mistake the Minutewomen made five minutes into the match, when they scored on themselves from a Hawks cross.

St. Joe's (3-4-2, 0-1 A-10) controlled the ball for most of the first half, registering 10 shots to UMass' three. The second half was almost the exact opposite, as the Minutewomen outshot the Hawks, 9-3.

The Minutewomen then traveled to Pittsburgh, where freshman goalkeeper Emily Cota made eight saves en route to her first collegiate shutout and UMass' third-straight victory.

"Emily has come up with some great saves and right now we feel comfortable with her as our top keeper," Napoli said. "We're going to stick with whoever the best player is at any given time."

If not for Sydney Stoll, Dukes goalie Brittany Findley would have had a shutout as well, without having to make a save. Stoll's goal with under four minutes to play in regulation was the only shot on goal for the Minutewomen.

"Everyone was tired after a long weekend," Napoli said. "Duquesne probably had the better chances but we battled until the end and countered off their corner. Jenna Goodwin brought it up the sideline and fed Stoll to win the game."

Goodwin's assist was the first of her collegiate career. Stoll's goal was her second of the season as she is becoming the focal point of the UMass offense.

"[Sydney] is a worker. She's all heart and she's fast," Napoli said. "She's really good with the ball at her feet and without her in the middle of the field, we would lose a lot because she also helps on defense and transitions."

With both wins, the Minutewomen improved to 3-4-2, 2-0 A-10, while the

See SOCCER on page 6

UMass grabs two wins over weekend

Offense strong vs. Quinnipiac, Kelly leads way with three goals

BY JAY ASSER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts field hockey team needed to take care of business on the road and came through with two important victories this weekend.

After a going through a string of difficult opponents to begin the season, the Minutewomen finally ran into two struggling teams in Vermont and Quinnipiac.

UMass	7
QU	1
UMass	2
Vermont	1

Before this weekend, it seemed as if UMass played a team ranked in the Top 25 of the Kookaburra/NFHCA Division I National Coaches Poll every other game. Following the heartbreaking loss to No. 9 Boston College (7-2) last weekend, the schedule put the Minutewomen in a favorable position to pick up two wins heading into another challenging weekend with a matchup against No. 6 Syracuse (9-1).

The ease in the schedule came at a beneficial time, but also forced the Minutewomen to capitalize on the opportunity and focus in practice leading up to the weekend. With a move up to No. 10 in the polls this past week, UMass had to prove that it could defeat the unranked opponents as well as the ranked opponents. The high expectations combined with the potential of two trap games made for a dangerous weekend for the Minutewomen.

UMass though, was able to avoid a letdown by scraping out a win against Vermont and scoring its way past Quinnipiac.

The Catamounts (1-8) didn't play to their record on Saturday and nearly stuck around long enough to pull off a win.

UMass struck first with a goal by freshman Kara Charochak 25 minutes, 15 seconds into the game. The score was only the second of Charochak's career and came off of Makaela Potts' third assist of the season. Nearly three minutes into the second half, Vermont answered with a goal by Chelsea Stevenson, knotting the game at one apiece. The Catamounts' defense was able to slow down the Minutewomen attack for only so long, as Katie Kelly scored the go-ahead and eventual game-winning goal with 17:36 left in the game for the 2-1 win.

PJ STANLEY/COLLEGIAN

Katie Kelly breaks past a defender last year against Kent State. Kelly had three goals on the weekend for UMass, including two against Quinnipiac.

Once again, Vermont provided a tough game, something that the Minutewomen have become accustomed to when facing the Catamounts.

Sunday was a different story, however, and UMass held nothing back in unleashing an offensive assault which was its highest in over nine years.

Facing an unfamiliar Quinnipiac (1-6) team, the Minutewomen spread around the scoring to tally seven goals in claiming a 7-1 victory. Kelly provided a multi-goal game, scoring her team-leading fifth and sixth goals of the season. Also scoring were Potts, Charochak, Kate Heineman, Jill Powers and Nicole Cordero.

The lone goal recorded by the Bobcats came off of the stick of Tina Watkins on a penalty corner in the second half during garbage time with the game out of reach.

UMass' seven-goal output was the most by the team since a 7-0 thrashing of Colgate on Aug. 30, 2000.

With the wins, the Minutewomen now move to 7-2 on the season and gain momentum heading back onto the road with a matchup with Syracuse this upcoming Saturday.

Jay Asser can be reached at jasser@student.umass.edu.

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY

COLLEGIAN

HIGH: 64 LOW: 46 www.DailyCollegian.com TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 2009

ART LEE/COLLEGIAN

Students seen here voting in last year's SGA elections will have the opportunity of voting online with the use of UMass' OWL system should the new referendum pass.

New proposal seeks online SGA voting

BY SAM BUTTERFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One year after a proposed referendum to move Student Government Association (SGA) voting online was opposed by the administration in power at the time, the tide seems to have turned on the online issue.

The issue, which dates back to last spring, originally stems from a petition filed by Mike Feder, Derek Khanna, Sean McNair, Erica Nyer and Dave Robertson, to hold elections both in dining commons and over the University's Online Web-based Learning (OWL) system.

Last year's SGA held that the OWL system was vulnerable to hacking attacks, leaving the legitimacy of the potential online voting in question, and that the proposal was brought before them too late in the semester for the council to properly consider the measure.

"The online elections measure was proposed to the senate last semester at the very last meeting," said SGA chancellor of elections Chris Faulkner.

"The senators that were not in favor of it voiced concerns such as that they didn't have enough time to review it, and voted on a motion saying they were in favor of online elections, but at that time didn't want to change the bylaws without enough time for review," he said.

However, a voter turnout hovering around 10 percent and a push from student legislators to make the elections more accessible and convenient has brought the voting referendum to the ballot in 2009.

A group of candidates for SGA office said they favored the initiative, introduced this year by Khana, and could only see increased participation and more student involvement in government resulting from holding elections online.

Khana said he has campaigned for online voting for several years, and that he feels the measure will remedy low voter turnout and keep the University in step with other major colleges which have moved their elections to the Web.

"In my research it seems like nearly every major college in the country uses an online voting system," Faulkner said.

"So it seemed to me when we had a 10, 11 percent turnout on election day. The number-one thing we could do to change that would be to have an online election," he added.

SGA candidates were largely in favor of the referendum.

Senior commuter senator candidate Charlie Felder called himself a "huge fan" of moving voting online, noting that the proposal "would only broaden voter turnout."

Felder said that while the present system of holding elections in dining commons is not entirely flawed, he feels that format misses students who do not eat at the dining commons. "Relegating the voting process and electoral outcome to the will of students who casually

See SGA on page 2

Budget cuts limit Amherst emergency response teams

Record weekend for emergency calls has the Amherst Fire Dept. needing more medical staff

BY MICHELLE WILLIAMS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

During the second weekend of the University of Massachusetts' school year, a record number of emergency calls were made with over half involved in alcohol from locations across the Hampshire County.

From Friday September 18 to Sunday September 20 approximately 48 calls were made to emergency services, 40 of which prompted ambulance visits. Over half of the emergency medical transportation services were alcohol related, with many individuals underage. Taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton over the weekend were 15 UMass students and three Amherst College students.

With the volume of calls requiring an ambulance within a three-hour period reaching 14 incidents, Chief Lindsay Stromgren of the Amherst Fire Department said he cannot remember the number of emergency calls ever reaching such heights. With a budget cut of $120,000 the Amherst Fire Department has been forced to stop staffing up to eight on-call emergency medical technicians on their busiest nights of Thursday, Friday and Saturday. With only seven on-call EMTs the Amherst Fire Department is only able to staff three ambulances rather than four. This shortage often forces Amherst town officials to call neighboring towns for help, causing large delays. Feeling overwhelmed by the constant urgency, Chief Stromgren expressed in a statement to the town as to what had happened and how the budget cuts have constrained the Fire Department's ability to respond to medical emergencies. He said that he hopes this situation focuses attention on how thin their resources are being stretched.

When needing further medical attention, students and community members are taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital of Northampton. Dr. MD R.F. Conway, medical director and chief of emergency medicine at Cooley Dickinson said that while the hospital is prepared during the school year an extra physician was still needed to be called in due to the unprecedented volume of emergencies. This forces other patients to wait to be seen during potentially crucial moments. It also requires an extra bed, as it is the policy of Cooley Dickinson to keep those with alcohol related maladies overnight.

Many suspect the rise in emergency medical calls are due to the University's implementing of the Good Samaritan policy. This allows students who suspect individuals may be severely intoxicated to receive medical attention without fear of University or judicial consequences.

Ed Blaguszewski the executive director of news and media relations at University of Massachusetts said, "We do not want students to hesitate when they believe someone may be suffering from an alcohol overdose."

He added, "While prevention of such situation is our first priority, they do occur, and everyone wants to avoid potential tragedies."

Such care can be expensive,

See Emergency on page 2

SGA rejects four candidate nominations due to breach of the association's guidelines

BY NICK BUSH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

As University of Massachusetts students vote this week to elect their peers to the Student Government Association, four people will not find their names on the ballot this semester. The nomination forms of four students – Jon Merzin, Sarah Schultz, Andrew Dawson and Brad DeFlumeri – were ultimately rejected by the SGA election commission. Each can still reach office through a write-in campaign.

According to SGA guidelines, a candidate's nomination can be rejected by the election commission for two reasons: If more than half of the signatures and student information has errors or omissions within, or if the nomination is suspected of being forged. While the nominations of Merzin, Schultz and Dawson were rejected due to errors and omissions, the only candidate to be rejected due to suspected forgery was DeFlumeri.

The SGA guidelines for reviewing signatures states "50 percent of a candidate's required nominations be 'valid,'" which means that half the form has to be completely filled in. In the cases of Merzin, Schultz and Dawson, their nominations lacked essential information such as phone numbers and addresses, leading to the rejection of their forms.

"All nominations were placed on the table at once, and if two members of the elections commission agreed that the forms were complete, the completed ones went in one pile," said SGA Chancellor of Elections Chris Faulkner. "We used People Finder on the UMass website to confirm students' identities. If the student on the nomination could not be found online, we would call the listed number to get confirmation. It would have been logistically impossible to check every student on every candidate's nomination, but we did everything according to our pre-determined evaluation standards."

After both members of the SGA election commission reviewing DeFlumeri's nomination to be a Sylvan senator agreed that the form appeared forged, a larger investigation was opened. According to the SGA election guidelines, "if multiple nominations appear to have the same handwriting, the elections commission reserves the right to investigate the nominations further to confirm or deny their validity."

"We had to get in contact with a lot of people [on the nomination]," said Faulkner. "Our procedure was that, after calling the listed phone number, we would ask 'Did you vote for this person?' If they said 'yes,' we would check them off."

To be nominated as an SGA senator, a candidate needs only 13 signatures. Some 26 of the 30 signatures received on DeFlumeri's nomination were ultimately deemed suspicious by the election commission due to handwriting similarities, and when a record any of the students' existence could not be found by calling their numbers or searching for them on People Finder, commission members contacted the Registrar's office, which confirmed that many of the individuals on the form were not currently enrolled at UMass. The elections commission at the same time obtained floor plans for the Sylvan Residence Halls, which showed that two of the addresses on DeFlumeri's nomination did not exist. Another signature listed the Brown Residence Hall cluster office as an address.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian obtained a copy of DeFlumeri's nomination, and an independent analysis of the phone numbers listed with the signatures found 19 numbers that are out of service and do not exist, as well as five numbers that belong to people who were not the individual who signed the nomination (including one number belonging to a Toronto resident). A telephone hotline for Children's Hospital also found its way on to the nomination form.

UMass student Nicole Sobel's signature was one of the many on DeFlumeri's nomination, but when the Collegian contacted the number listed next to the signature, it was out of service. After we reached her for comment, Sobel confirmed that she has never met DeFlumeri in person, and did not nominate him to the SGA. She also confirmed that she lives in an apartment off of campus and does not live in 2061 McNamara as the nomination contends.

"I authorized somebody to collect signatures on my behalf," said DeFlumeri in an interview. When asked about the identity of the individual who collected the signatures, DeFlumeri responded that he would "not disclose that information." "I did not check the names [before turning them in to the SGA]," continued DeFlumeri. "I take the blame for not going around myself, but I didn't have the time."

According to DeFlumeri, the rejection of his nomination signatures is due to ideological and personal differences between himself and the SGA. "I think the fact that I've criticized the SGA harshly in my newspaper The Minuteman has contributed to their response to my nomination," said DeFlumeri. "If there was no person on the elections committee with an agenda, I would be surprised. I don't understand why someone would even run for the SGA if they don't have an agenda."

Faulkner maintains, however, that the SGA elections commission is only doing its job by policing forgery in its nomination process. "[DeFlumeri] has been trying to make the argument that we have selected him for special investigation due to his past history with our organization," said Faulkner. "He has also tried to connect our denial of his nomination to his work at The Minuteman [newspaper]. This is not true in the least. We followed guidelines that have existed for a while now."

Nick Bush can be reached at nbush@student.umass.edu.

UM partners with Springfield

BY MATT SULLIVAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Last November Springfield Mayor Domenic J. Sarno and University of Massachusetts Chancellor Robert C. Holub signed a long term partnership agreement aiming to stimulate the city's slumping economy.

Along with University funding, a grant from the Economic Development Administration of the U.S. Department of Commerce totaled a combined $320,000 towards achieving the mission set forth by the city of Springfield and UMass. The partnership will mainly look to boost energy conservation and green fuels production that are available at UMass, but will also contribute much needed support to Springfield's public school system.

Unemployment stands at 8 percent within the city, but with low proficiency ratings of 28 percent on MCAS scores, the future looks uncertain. Coupled with these low test scores, Springfield public school's drop-out rate currently stands at 12.3 percent, four times the Massachusetts state average of 3.4 percent. Roughly half of the students attending these schools graduate within a traditional four year period.

Poverty has also had its crippling effect on the community's education, as most students qualify for free or reduced priced meals.

The goal of the Chief of Grants Management in the school system is to allot federal resources, such as the grant received from the University, to fully educate all students and boost academic achievement.

SEI, or Sheltered English Immersion, is a program required by the Massachusetts Department of Elementary and Secondary Education and is specially designed for students with limited English. Nearly a quarter of the students enrolled in Springfield's public schools do not speak English as a first language. Training teachers in one of the four SEI categories is just one of the initiatives of Springfield public schools.

Additionally, resources will be used to increase the number of students who have to attend summer school. Another primary objective is to boost the low proficiency ratings of not only MCAS scores but the Massachusetts English Proficiency Assessment (MEPA) and the oral test (MELA-O) as well.

The partnership between UMass and the Greater Springfield area will also be geared toward nutrition education for low income families, continuing and professional education and youth development.

At the official ceremony held at the Old First Church of downtown Springfield, Paul Kostecki, vice chancellor for research and engagement at UMass reflected on what he hopes the partnership will accomplish.

Kostecki said, "Bringing education to the masses and developing the intellectual capital that we do on campus, to the society."

Matt Sullivan can be reached-mdsull@student.umass.edu.

ARTS&LIVING
KICKER

As hunger pangs and homesickness collide, students can sate their appetites at the exclusive University club.

SEE PAGE 5

SPORTS
KICKER

The Massachusetts soccer team enters Atlantic 10 conference play this weekend behind a three-game win streak. The Minutemen are undefeated at home this season.

SEE PAGE 10

EDITORIAL&OPINION
KICKER

Collegian columnist Matt Kushi advises students to rethink their alcoholic ways before they leave a stain on the University.

SEE PAGE 4

DailyCollegian.com
KICKER

For a sneak peek at the new Recreational sports center visit the dailycollegian.com for a visual slideshow.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
CXVIX
Issue 16

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief William McGuinness
Managing Editor S.P. Sullivan
Business Manager Daniel Jette
Production Manager Michael Sarkes
Night Supervisor Kirsten Swenson
Advertising Manager Michael Tortorici
Advertising Production Max Desmer
Arts & Living Editor Shayna Murphy
Comics Editor Annie Keithline
Editorial Editor Nick O'Malley
News Editor Nick Bush
Sports Editor Jeffrey R. Larnard
Web Editor Brian Wood
Photo Editor Matthew Harrison
IT Manager Victor Jacek
Ass. Business Manager Mari Zohniser
Assistant Advertising Nicole Jacinto
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Distribution Manager Norman Provost
Classified Manager Katelyn Tamilio
Ass't. Arts & Living Justin Gagnon
Ass't. Arts & Living Elyse Horowitz
Ass't. Arts & Living Cal Scannell
Assistant Comics Andrew Witts
Assistant Editorial Michael Phillis
Assistant Editorial Hannah Nelson
Assistant News Samuel Butterfield
Assistant News Alyssa Creamer
Assistant News Jenn Heshion
Assistant Sports David Brinch
Assistant Sports Mike Gillmeister
Assistant Sports Adam Miller
Assistant Photo Maxwell Sparr
Assistant Photo Samantha Webber
Assistant Multimedia Sara Cody
Assistant Multimedia Chris Shores

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating, advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 3:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
William McGuinness

COPY EDITOR
Chelsea Whitton

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Dan Centola

SGA referendum may expand voting to web or accidentally catch a glimpse of a voting booth like this is not all that ambitious," he quipped.

SGA from page 1

Brandon Tower, a junior senate candidate from Southwest North, said that he has actively supported the move since last year, when he started a petition to move voting online and circulated it in his classes and then around campus.

"In all the time I spent knocking on doors, talking to students and asking for support," he said, "only once did I find a student not in favor of such a system."

Patrick Watson, a senate candidate from Central, said he felt the proposal would not only increase participation, but would help prospective voters be more informed in their choices, and allow for greater convenience.

"(Online voting) would also allow students to have information available about the candidates online, right as they vote, so not only would there be more votes, but there would be more informed votes," he said.

Watson furthered that online voting would run around the clock, rather than just during dining common hours, giving students the convenience of voting when they wanted.

Janam Anand, a Webster/Dickinson presidential candidate, called the proposal "a superb idea."

"I feel like the SGA is such a crucial part of the student body, and by making voting and biographies available online, a larger majority of the student population could get involved," said Anand.

While a majority of the candidates held favorable opinions of the initiative, several expressed some reservations about the security of the computer systems.

Junior Northeast candidate Melissa Urban said she backs moving the elections online, citing the precedent of other universities holding Internet-based elections, but cautioned that the University must be wary of possible problems caused by Web voting.

"I do believe that online voting could be a great service to our campus and vastly increase voter turnout," Urban said. "A large number of universities have already implemented an online voting system. Clearly this is not a new concept, and it's achievable."

However, she added, "it is important that we continue having conversations and learn from these other schools to work out potential glitches in the system before we put our own into effect."

Azeen Khanmalek, a commuter senator candidate, echoed some concerns of last year's SGA voting calling the threat of interference with online voting "an unacceptable concern," and listing instances of University servers being hacked as evidence of potential flaws in an online voting system.

"I believe that online voting could be a huge step forward for voting practices," said Khanmalek, "however, I feel that there are several issues that stand in the way of it becoming a functional and efficient reality."

"My primary concern is security," he said. "The problem is that online voting results are still vulnerable to external manipulation."

"As much as we might not like it, voting, for now, is something that needs a paper trail so we can check and double check as to its legitimacy and fairness," he continued.

One member of last year's SGA who cited concerns about the past proposal said he favors online voting in principle, but has not specifically seen the wording of this proposal, which he said would be a determinant factor in his opinion.

"I haven't actually had a chance to look at the wording of this year's proposal," said Subhan Tariq.

"In general principle I am in favor of online elections, because I feel that they will increase voter turnout and give more legitimacy to the SGA," he said, adding that he had not spoken to other members of last year's senate on their sentiments on the measure.

Modesto Montero, speaker of last year's SGA, said, "I definitely think that online elections are something that we are behind on, I'm definitely on board with having an online election, my only hesitation is that there hasn't been a full deliberation on where the money's going to come from, how it's going to be put into place, we were pretty much semi-blind-sided when we were given that motion, we found out at the last meeting, I feel like a lot of the senators want to ask questions and make sure things are going to be done right the first time, it has to be done right, I'm definitely for online election, I'm not feeling this whole big push for it without giving it adequate consideration, I think the way that's done is by allowing the senators to hold the meeting, and ask questions and really really be thorough in the whole process."

Sam Butterfield can be reached at sjbutter@student.umass.edu.

Guest speakers plug technology at UM

Lecturers promote the use of new technology for colleges

By Brittany Collentro
Collegian Staff

On Thursday, September 24, the fourth Digital Quadrangle series was held in the campus center of the University of Massachusetts. The discussion, held annually, focused on how universities and colleges can use new technology to make scholarly information more accessible to the student population.

The featured speakers, Stuart Shieber of Harvard University and Ann Wolphert of MIT, are the authors of the recently released report "The University's Role in the Dissemination of Research and Scholarship - A Call to Action".

The main idea of the conference is how new research can be spread to the college community using technology such as the Internet. Before, the main process was that new discoveries were publicized through books and journal articles.

However, as stated by the report by Schieber and Wolphert, "print-based distribution system retards the development of new models."

Shieber and Wolphert argue that nowadays, having research and other faculty work published only on paper is counter-helpful to the students and goals of any university. They argue that it is the most beneficial way to spread information is to use both print and online methods.

In order to accomplish this goal, Shieber and Wolphert have suggested a number of changes that universities should make. For example, publishing laws should be more flexible so as to allow information to be freely distributed without taking the guarantee of protection that comes from publishing with a copyright. Copyright laws have been in effect for about 100 years, and they provide a guarantee for any author, whereas a guarantee can occasionally be lost if placed on the internet.

Along with copyright issues is the concern of validity. In order for most research to be considered valid, it has to be appraised by other experts within that field. Afterwards it is published in a reputable journal. Wolphert and Shieber suggested that setting up an evaluation system within departments to achieve that same result. These departments would allow for work and research to be evaluated so that the findings can become valid without having to be printed in journals or books.

Wolphert and Schieber recommended that institutions should seek chances to exchange ideas and information with other institutions. By cooperating with other universities, information will be more easily communicated throughout the university and the surrounding communities.

This is exemplified by the local Five College. This system allows for students to take books from other libraries, or classes at other colleges starting second semester of freshman year. Many colleges do not offer this opportunity, and that is one thing that Shieber and Wolphert are trying to change. By having an online exchange of ideas and research, they said, colleges will be able to better share these insights and gain valuable information in return.

Brittany Collentro can be reached at bcollent@student.umass.edu.

A series of alcohol related incidents raises questions of students' substance abuse

Emergency from page 1

with a hospital bed for one student costing $1200 before insurance.

A freshmen student, who had asked to remain anonymous, recounted the time when she had been rushed to the hospital.

"I didn't want to be taken to the hospital," she said. "I would have rather just been put to bed. Luckily I have the student health insurance plan, otherwise I don't know how I would have paid for my room."

The University hopes that with education, the need for medical attention can be prevented. Students who have been caught underage drinking by authorities are required by the University to take an alcohol abuse course, Brief Alcohol Screening and Intervention for College Students, otherwise known as BASICS.

The need for students to be taken to Cooley Dickinson may in part be due to the limited hours of the University Health Services (UHS) which provides walk-in care. While walk-in care is available 8 a.m to midnight seven days a week, it is no longer open 24 hours a day. Instead there is an emergency on-call service team available by phone for advice. While Blaguszewski said he believes the limited hours of the UHS is unrelated to the increased amounts of students taken to Cooley Dickinson Hospital, Chief Stromgren said the Fire Department is unsure how much of a factor the limited hours are on the weekend's emergencies. He will be meeting with UMass representatives to discuss this issue next week.

In response to the events of the second weekend of September, the University released this statement "We will be looking at the details and circumstances of the weekend to see what we might learn from them. Overall, we believe the University has a strong program of education, prevention and enforcement that has made substantial progress on this issue in recent years. However, we must remain vigilant and continue to work hard on preventing alcohol abuse among some students, which is an issue faced by colleges and universities across the country."

Michelle Williams can be reached at mnwillia@student.umass.edu.

Jordanian teen is held for terror plot

By Jason Trahan, Jon Nielsen and Selwyn Crawford
The Dallas Morning News

DALLAS — Dueling portraits emerged Friday of the 19-year-old Jordanian immigrant accused in an FBI sting of attempting to blow up a 60-story Dallas skyscraper filled with office workers.

The U.S. Attorney's office in Dallas has charged Hosam Maher Husein Smadi with attempting to use a weapon of mass destruction to take down Fountain Place on Ross Avenue at Field Street. If convicted he faces a maximum of life in prison.

The government says the man, who was in the U.S. illegally, spewed jihadist rhetoric and talked of killing Americans during more than six months of communications with three undercover FBI agents. The agents first encountered Smadi through an extremist Web site.

But friends in Italy, Texas, about 50 miles south of Dallas, say "Sam" as he was known, never gave any indication that he was a devout Muslim, much less that he had bloodshed on his mind. They described a carefree teen who drank and smoked with friends, entertained ladies and enjoyed dancing to techno music.

"We all thought he was cool," said Tabatha Rogers, a neighbor who sometimes let Smadi babysit her children, ages 2 years and 3 months.

"Come to find out he wants to blow us up because we believe in God."

Friday morning, Smadi made his initial appearance in court before U.S. Magistrate Irma Ramirez. They removed his handcuffs, but left on his leg shackles.

He was dressed in all black. They were presumably the same clothes he was wearing Thursday when he dialed a cell phone number that he thought would trigger a fake ammonium nitrate fertilizer bomb tucked inside a Ford Explorer Sport Trac. The used vehicle and bogus bomb were provided to Smadi by FBI agents, who say he wanted to commit a violent act despite their efforts to dissuade him.

After he dialed the cell number, FBI SWAT team members converged and arrested Smadi.

He spent the night in the Dallas County jail under suicide watch. In court, he spoke in halting English when responding to the judge, who had to ask him to speak up several times.

"There are some concepts that he understands in English, but he speaks Arabic," said Richard Anderson, the federal public defender who represented Smadi at the hearing.

Ramirez asked Smadi if he understood his right to silence and to have an appointed lawyer and, after a pause, he answered, "Yes," and, "I don't have any questions."

Smadi, who is under an immigration hold, waived the option to have a detention hearing but reserved the right to ask for one later if his immigration hold is lifted.

The judge set a probable cause hearing for Oct. 5.

After court Friday, Anderson said that Smadi was scared, but the attorney declined to talk more about the case.

Later Friday, Peter Michael Fleury, from the federal public defender's Fort Worth office, was officially appointed to represent Smadi. He could not be reached.

Smadi's father in Jordan said the charges against his son were baseless.

"The issue is completely fabricated and in our family we never condoned terrorism," Maher Hussein Smadi told The Associated Press.

The father said that his sons Hosam and Hussein came to the United States in 2007 on student visas. Authorities said, however, Hosam Smadi was not currently enrolled in school.

The brothers lived in a Santa Clara, Calif., apartment with an older relative until February 2008, when a small fire forced them to move. Smadi told his apartment manager, Joe Redzovic, that the family was poor and had come to America for a better life.

While Hussein Smadi, 18, stayed in California, his brother, also citing conflicts with his relatives, told friends that he was moving to Dallas. It remains unclear why.

As Hosam Smadi interacted with undercover FBI agents in Texas, his brother got into trouble in California. Santa Clara police arrested him Aug. 11 for misdemeanor possession of ecstasy. His case is pending.

Hosam Smadi moved to the outskirts of Italy in April 2008, said his landlord, David B. South, owner of Morgan Meadows, a dome-construction community.

"He came in under the radar and stayed under the radar," South said. South said his company ran a background check on Smadi, who at the time had a California driver's license and no criminal history.

Smadi had little to say to his new friends in Italy about where he was from or his plans for the future.

On Sept. 11, the FBI's investigation nearly fell apart.

An Ellis County, Texas, sheriff's deputy arrested Smadi for failing to have a driver's license and insurance.

A background check showed that he was on a national terrorist watch list. The FBI, who already knew about the arrest because they were tracking Smadi at the time, feared that Smadi would find out about their sting from Ellis County deputies.

Research claims using iPods can help reach teenagers suffering from Asperger's

By Maura Lerner
Star Tribune

MINNEAPOLIS — Sue Pederson knows that the teenage boys in her treatment program have trouble making conversation. They may not know what to talk about—on the other hand, once they get started, when to shut up.

That's one of the striking features of people with Asperger's syndrome: They struggle with the social skills that come so naturally to others.

But about a year ago, Pederson, a psychologist, and her colleagues at the Fraser Child & Family Center in Minneapolis found a new way to reach these students — right through their headphones.

They're using iPods, which play music and videos, to teach them how to fit in.

It may have started out as a form of entertainment, but Pederson says this kind of technology is turning into an unexpected boon for children and teenagers with special needs. The devices, it turns out, can be crammed with the kind of information they need to get through the day. While it's still experimental, she said, "I think it's going to spread like wildfire."

With Asperger's, a form of autism, people lack the inner voice that tells them what is, or is not, appropriate behavior. At Fraser, Pederson's staff came up with the idea of programming iPods to act as an electronic substitute for that missing voice.

In this case, the staff helped students create a series of short videos and slide shows on how to behave in different social settings. Some are barely 30 seconds long: How to carry on a conversation ("Let the other person talk AND change the topic .. "); how to respect other people's boundaries, and think before they speak ("Use your filter!").

In the world of special education, these scripts are known as "social stories," used to teach basic social skills. "It's a mental checklist for things to think about when you're interacting with other people," explained Mandy Henderson, who works with Fraser's Asperger's program.

As part of the Fraser project, the students can transfer the videos onto their iPods, and replay them over and over, to drive the lessons home.

Jack O'Riley, of Eagan, Minn., said it's just what his 15-year-old son P.J. needed. "This really hit the mark," he said. Like many kids with Asperger's, P.J. is baffled by the normal rhythms of social interaction: in conversation, he may blurt out too much information, or say nothing at all, his father says.

At the same time, P.J. is easily distracted and has a hard time staying on task, another common trait of Asperger's. For years, O'Riley posted laminated signs around the house to remind his son how to get through the day — take a shower, brush his teeth, get ready for school.

Now, with the videos developed at Fraser, "we can plug this stuff into his little 'extended memory,' " O'Riley said. P.J. is building a library of videos on his iPhone, so they'll be at his fingertips. "He can pull up a topic on his 'to do list' and find everything he needs to know," his father said.

Sixteen-year-old Myles Lund of Lakeville, Minn., another student in the Fraser program, said he's learned to use the iPod to help control his emotions by playing his favorite music. "It helps take my mind off of it," he said. At the same time, Myles, who says he rarely initiates a conversation, agrees the videos can help in social situations. "I just pull out my iPod and go through a list of things to talk about."

The staffers at Fraser came up with the idea after they noticed how students with Asperger's would use iPods as a calming device, to block out noise or other distractions. "We just started thinking, how else can we use this technology?" Pederson said. They got a $7,500 private grant to buy the iPods and other equipment, and started experimenting.

They're not alone.

Jim Ball, an adviser to the Autism Society of America, said similar projects are popping up around the country. Some people are designing adaptations for smart phones, Palm Pilots and other devices to fill the same need, he said.

"This is just another way of prompting kids when they're in situations when they don't know what to do," said Ball, who works with autistic children in New Jersey. "The technology gives them the ability to be independent."

Ball noted the devices could work especially well with Asperger's kids, because they're often far more comfortable with electronic gadgets than they are with people.

"It's a machine; they don't have to react to it, they don't have to understand it," Ball said. "They just need to know how to work it. And they do."

Another advantage, especially for teenagers, is that they won't stand out using this kind of device, noted Pederson. "If you walk into a family reunion and you've got a teenager with an iPod, nobody bats an eye," she said.

Barbara Luskin, a psychologist with the Autism Society of Minnesota, agrees. "Adolescents with Asperger's, like all adolescents, don't want to look different," she said. "If the device just blends in with everyone else's, she said, "you're much more likely to use it."

So far, there appear to be few commercial products aimed at this market, but that may be changing. The Conover Co., a special-education software company in Appleton, Wis., recently adapted its "Functional Skills System" for the iPod Touch. But the package, which sells for $3,500, is mainly marketed to schools and other organizations.

Fraser, meanwhile, is hoping to get another grant to expand its iPod program.

Ball, of the Autism Society, predicts this is just the beginning. "I think that technology is limitless in its potential for working with kids," he said.

Study IDs 10 foods which can provide healthful benefits

By Stephanie Rogers
Mother Nature Network

Blueberries are on the list of ten 'superfoods' that have great nutritional value and could potentially help some live longer lives. The antioxidants in blueberries provide protection against cancer and heart disease.

Not all foods were created equal — some are so packed with vitamins, minerals, antioxidants, essential fatty acids and other beneficial substances that they've been deemed "superfoods."

Superfoods have incredible health benefits, packing a powerful nutritional punch that helps protect against cancer and heart disease, lower cholesterol, protect the organs from toxins and improve digestive health. Some nutritionists even say superfoods can help you live longer.

Here are 10 superfoods that can supercharge your diet, including fruits, vegetables, dairy, legumes, grains and fish.

— Acai: This exotic berry from the Amazon has been the subject of intense hype, but there's a good reason why it's so trendy. Named by famed nutritionist Dr. Nicholas Perricone as his No. 1 superfood and one of the most powerful foods in the world, acai (ah-sigh-ee) contains a remarkable concentration of antioxidants, amino acids and essential fatty acids. It's considered one of nature's best offerings to combat premature aging thanks to its high monounsaturated oleic acid content. Oleic acid helps omega-3 fish oils penetrate cell membranes, making them more supple.

— Yogurt: It's alive! Yogurt contains active cultures known as "friendly bacteria" that restore healthy balance in the digestive system. Among the most well-known cultures is Lactobacillus acidophilus, which passes through the stomach and populates the intestines, helping the body fight off infection. One cup contains 50 percent more calcium than the same size serving of milk, and it's also full of potassium, riboflavin, magnesium and phosphate.

— Broccoli: This cruciferous vegetable is loaded with vitamin C, folic acid and carotenoids, which are packed with vitamin A and can protect your cells from the damage of free radicals, enhance immune system function and improve reproductive health. Just one serving (1 medium stalk) provides 175 percent of the recommended daily value of vitamin K, which helps build strong bones and plays an important role in blood clotting. Just half a cup of broccoli per day is also said to help prevent a number of cancers, particularly cancers of the lung, colon, rectum and stomach.

— Lentils: Among the most nutritious legumes, lentils are a great source of cholesterol-lowering fiber and lean protein. They contain plenty of iron and B vitamins and are very filling, yet low in calories. Folate and magnesium also contribute to heart heath and improve the flow of blood, oxygen and nutrients throughout the body.

— Sweet potatoes: They'll satisfy your craving for starches but are far healthier than their white, nutritionally lacking cousins. Carotenoids, vitamin C, potassium and fiber are just a few of the benefits of eating this savory-sweet veggie, which is ranked among the highest vegetables on the nutrition scale. Sweet potatoes can help stabilize blood sugar, making them a great choice for diabetics, and are relatively low in calories.

— Blueberries: Hidden within the juicy, deep blue-purple flesh of this tasty fruit is cancer-fighting ellagic acid, an antioxidant that has been proven in laboratory research to slow the growth of some cancerous tumors. Blueberry extracts have also been shown to have anti-inflammatory properties and help prevent infectious bacteria from clinging to the walls of the gut, bladder and urethra.

— Wild salmon: Packed with omega-3 fats, wild salmon can help reduce the risk of sudden-death heart attacks and contains lots of vitamin D and selenium for healthy hair, skin, nails and bones. Wild salmon can be eaten with little fear of mercury or excess contaminants and is more nutritionally rich than farmed salmon. Wild salmon also has a smaller environmental impact. Consume two to four four-ounce servings a week for optimal benefits.

— Goji berries: They've been called the most nutritionally dense food on Earth, and they taste something like salty raisins. Lycium barbarum, commonly known as goji berries, contain more vitamin C than oranges, more beta carotene than carrots and more iron than steak. The dried Himalayan fruit is also a great source of B vitamins and antioxidants and contains 15 amino acids. Goji has been used medicinally in China for centuries to improve blood circulation, strengthen the limbs, improve eyesight, protect the liver, increase libido and boost immune function.

— Kale: A dark, leafy green in the same vegetable family as broccoli and Brussels sprouts, kale contains high amounts of beta carotene, iron and folate. It's also a low-calorie, low-carb source of protein that's packed with fiber, which improves digestive health and helps you feel full. A small cupful of cooked kale provides more than half the recommended daily allowance of vitamin C.

— Barley: This low-glycemic grain is high in both soluble and insoluble fiber, which help the body metabolize fats and promote a healthy digestive tract, respectively. Eating hulled barley on a regular basis is said to lower blood cholesterol levels, protect against cancer and keep blood-sugar levels stable. Barley is rich in niacin, vitamin E, lignans and phytochemicals that function as antioxidants.

University Health Services • Mental Health Services
Support and Therapy Group Meetings • Fall, 2009

RELAXATION SKILLS TRAINING
Mondays, 3:30 – 5 p.m.
beginning Oct. 19
A three-session workshop to learn and practice relaxation techniques in a group setting. Attendance at all sessions expected.

MANAGING DEPRESSION
Tuesdays, 4 – 5:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 13
A three-session workshop on managing depression symptoms and developing healthy coping skills.

EXPERIENTIAL PSYCHOTHERAPY GROUP FOR GRADUATE STUDENTS
Tuesdays, 7 – 8:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 6
Focusing on self-exploration in a safe atmosphere.

LIVING WITH LOSS
Wednesdays, 4:30 – 5:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 7
A support group for undergraduate and graduate students dealing with the loss of someone close to them.

MINDFULNESS-BASED STRESS REDUCTION (MBSR)
Mondays, 5 – 6:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 5
An experiential ten-session workshop aimed at improving self-awareness, lowering stress and enhancing health and wellbeing. Open enrollment throughout the semester.

EXPERIENTIAL PSYCHOTHERAPY GROUP FOR UNDERGRADUATE STUDENTS
Thursdays, 3:30 – 5 p.m.
beginning Oct. 8
Focusing on self-exploration in a safe atmosphere.

Pre-registration is required for all groups. To register, or for more information, call (413) 545-2337 or come to Mental Health Services, 127 Hills North, Monday – Friday, 8 a.m. – 5 p.m.

UMassAmherst

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 2009

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
- Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Bill 2028 is kosher

Chris Amorosi

It would be easier if those who wish to die from swine flu would simply infect themselves now and save me the trouble of having to read through their hysterical ravings over Massachusetts Senate Bill 2028. Ironically, I imagine that a die off on such a scale would make it easier to repeal the Patriot Act. I fully support temporarily suspending civil liberties when our well-being is threatened by a palpable threat like libertarian flu carriers.

S2028 essentially grants local health authorities broad authority in containing threats to public health, whether they are anthrax terrorist attacks or H1N1. The bill's provisions would come into effect should the governor declare a state of emergency. The bill must pass approval by the House before becoming law.

Section 2 of the bill lists several powers granted to health authorities. I mostly agree with these powers such as the power to enforce quarantine, to prohibit public gatherings, to redistribute medical supplies, to decontaminate material by destruction and to require people with medical expertise to assist in these actions. The power to search premises without a warrant is somewhat shady, though keep in mind that the bill was written to accommodate possible terrorist attacks shortly after September 11, 2001. I don't think that the bill should muddle terrorism with natural threats to public health unless the emergency response would be substantially similar.

The death panel interpretation of this bill probably stems from Section 2B, paragraph b, subparagraphs 8 and 9. I will quote the subparagraphs in full, and I encourage you to find and skim the full text of the bill via Google search. Remember the bill originates from the Massachusetts Senate.

The bill permits local public health authorities "(8) to procure, take immediate possession from any source, store, or distribute any anti-toxins, serums, vaccines, immunizing agents, antibiotics, and other pharmaceutical agents or medical supplies located within the commonwealth as may be necessary to respond to the emergency" and "(9) to require in-state health care providers to assist in the performance of vaccination, treatment, examination or testing of any individual as a condition of licensure, authorization, or the ability to continue to function as a health care provider in the commonwealth."

I'd rather have an armed National Guardsman between me and the zombies should a particularly virulent plague break out.

I had to lube up the Matterhorn to find a slope so sheer and slippery to reach the conclusion that this bill provides the foundation of a medical police state. Well, subparagraph 8 is concerned with redistributing medical property. That sounds like Communist China to me, except with more concern for the value of human life.

Subparagraph 9 demands that health care providers assist with the crisis or lose their licenses. The bill defines a health care provider as "any person or entity that provides health care services including... health plans..." along with actual medical doctors. HMOs forced to give emergency care for the betterment of society? I think I can see the hand of Obama in this bill, a hand dripping with our precious bodily fluids.

The only problem I have is that the bill charges a fine of $1,000 per day for anyone who resists the provisions of the bill. I'd like to throw them in with the sick instead, but they might start haranguing the real victims with talk of liberty. It is silly to levy a mere fine when people could die from negligence on the part of WorldNetDaily readers. Throw them in quarantine and deal with the lawsuits later, if they survive.

After a life of surviving bicycle accidents without helmets and car accidents without seat belts, the mind of the average libertarian is reduced to a barely sapient paste. Occasionally two neurons make a connection as the goop sloshes around the cranial cavity. Their goal: end what remains of their pathetic lives by engaging in more highly-principled, irresponsible acts. Refusing voluntary, free vaccinations for themselves and their children are popular methods of killing themselves off.

Very well, let them remove themselves from this life. But I'd rather have an armed National Guardsman between me and the zombies should a particularly virulent plague break out. I don't think swine flu will become the Black Death, but it makes me feel safer to know that there are contingencies should it happen. And on further reflection, the self-destructive tendencies of those who would circumvent quarantine also reassures me. Let them have their nation-wide swine tea parties. Perhaps we should give them liberty so that they can give themselves death.

Chris Amorosi is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at camorosi@student.umass.edu.

Fed/Up?

Ed/Op.

editorial@dailycollegian.com

Alcoholic reputation

Matt Kushi

As I look back at the local news headlines from a week ago, I can only stand and shake my head. There were over 40 University of Massachusetts area 911 calls in one weekend for alcohol related issues. Even for a campus that has a reputation such as ours for partying, that is a bit much.

That is not a statistic to be proud of for the University. On a small scale, it is not a good reflection as to where the priorities of the student body lie. We all know that most college students are responsible young adults. However, the college crowd often gets a bad name from the small fraction that think that its major is alcohol.

If you are of age, it is alright to have a few beers with your friends every once in awhile. However, this should not be the reason you are here at UMass.

When you are an incoming freshman into college, this can be a bad portrayal of college to see. College is about more than freedom and having a raucous time. It is about discovering who you are and why you are that person. You find direction in your life, and you find your true passions.

We must take into perspective that we, in this generation, have a unique opportunity. We have the chance to leave a mark on this world and change the course of history. In the end, we can leave this world a better place than when we were born into it.

Yes, this is the same opportunity that has been taken on by every generation before us. However each generation has had something that the previous hasn't – technology. Seeing as we are the newest generation to come of age, we have the technology to change the world for the better than any generation before us.

However, we have to be willing to take the step forward and embrace our status in the world as the movers of time. We can't sit down and allow ourselves to be taken hostage to the dogma of lethargy.

That is why this time in college, or your late teens to early 20s, is so critical. It is our coming of age. Yes, we are allowed to have a good time and a good time we should have. It's called living a well-rounded life.

Yes, we are allowed to have a good time, and a good time we should have. It's called living a well-rounded life.

However, we cannot shun the responsibilities that are starting to come our way. We can no longer hide behind the innocence of youth. We can no longer delegate our responsibilities to adults because we are the adults now.

The responsibility of a generation is a hefty load, no doubt. That is why we are on the path to discover what are passions are. It is within those passions, from the office to the battlefields, that we will carve our niche in history and what the future holds for others.

In Native American music, the one consistent state of being is the drumbeat. The drumbeat is set up and timed to represent the beating of a heart. It goes along with the theme of one heartbeat, one focus.

In a sense, it is the same with the individual. We are all guided by the feelings of our hearts and the logic of our mind. We all have something that makes us tick – something that drives us on. The way that we discover what makes us tick is by following our own hearts.

This means not buckling to peer pressure. Being the social beings that we are, we like to please people. This can be a good thing and a bad thing. It's a good thing when it means that you get along with others. It's a bad thing when you allow yourself to be manipulated and you lose the true sense of your own self.

This all leads back to this simple case of drinking woes presented earlier in this column. Remember that you are not alone. You are part of a team too. When you appear in that police blog or in the emergency room to have your stomach pumped, you not only make a fool of yourself but also where you come from. In this case, the University of Massachusetts.

If you do not want to drink, don't drink. If you do, at least be responsible and legal. Think for yourself and be responsible. Those two skills can be applied in college and throughout your whole life.

What we must remember is that we must trust our own hearts and not be afraid to take a step forward because of what others may think. We must be willing to stand and deliver. We must be willing to stand our ground for what is right and be willing to take the hits from those that disagree.

There is a quote from the movie "Braveheart" that captures this point. "Your heart is free. Have the courage to follow it." Yes, we can still have a good time. However, we must also embrace the responsibilities that are presented to us. The future depends on it.

Matt Kushi is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mkushi@student.umass.edu.

Hunger in Amherst

Eric Magazu

Last Tuesday MassPIRG held its semester kickoff meeting in the basement of the Campus Center. After some brief introductory remarks by leaders, the group divided up into four smaller sections. One of the sections was dedicated towards addressing the issues of hunger and homelessness. This section was perhaps the largest of the four sections in attracting new students.

It's extraordinary to know that our fellow University of Massachusetts students are interested in such a serious issue. Many of our political leaders, those possessing good hearts and sincere desires, have tried over and over again to address the issues surrounding hunger and homelessness and poverty more generally. Yet today we continue to see many of the same problems in America.

Hunger and homelessness are present even here in Amherst. According to the document "All Roads Lead Home," put together by a workgroup established upon a November 2006 conversation among the mayors of Holyoke, Northampton and Springfield, homelessness occurs also in suburban and rural areas. It's in these suburban and rural areas that homelessness often goes undetected because it can exist much more easily behind the scenes. Homeless individuals can camp in the woods and never be seen by their fellow citizens.

In the early days, most of the response was handled by private organizations, especially churches and missionary organizations. The federal government began to take on some of these responsibilities in the 1930s as part of President Roosevelt's New Deal, and America officially declared a war on poverty in the 1960s as part of President Johnson's Great Society.

It seems that at some level the situation of hunger and homelessness is an enduring one. This does not indicate that we should choose to ignore the problem.

The Town of Amherst even established its own Committee on Homelessness in 2007 with a charge to make recommendations to the town based upon "All Roads Lead Home" and other sources. The fact that a local community like Amherst established such a committee is quite unique and provides testimony in favor of the character of the town in which our University resides.

Amherst is quite distinguished in the sense that we offer free community meals seven days a week at the Amherst Survival Center and the Not Bread Alone kitchen based downtown out of the First Congregational Church. Both of these locations offer complimentary groceries to residents in addition to nutritious meals. There is no reason why any person should go hungry in this area.

We can see from all these attempts — at the national level, at the local level and at the level of our fellow students, there is a natural desire among many to alleviate the problems of our fellow citizens who have become hungry and homeless. Yet, after all of these attempts, the situation persists unabated. Deuteronomy 15:11 offers insights into the matter, "For there will never cease to be needy within the land. Therefore, I command you, saying, you shall surely open your hand to your brother, to your poor one, and to your needy one in your land."

It seems that at some level the situation of hunger and homelessness is an enduring one. This does not indicate that we should choose to ignore the problem. Just four verses earlier, in Deuteronomy 15:7-8, we see that, "If there will be among you a needy person, from one of your brothers in one of your cities, in your land the Lord, your God, is giving you, you shall not harden your heart, and you shall not close your hand from your needy brother. Rather, you shall open your hand to him, and you shall lend him sufficient for his needs, which he is lacking."

We see several biblical injunctions to help the needy with a tender heart and an open hand, to the extent that to fulfill the command, a person must lend to his fellow citizen to cover him in all that he needs. Such a practice is rare to find due to the nature of our humanity. It is quite natural to take care of our personal needs first and foremost. For most of us, we can barely afford to take care of our personal and family needs, how can we even begin to take care of those every person we come across, especially to the extreme demanded by the bible?

There is truly one way to bridge the gap that none of our governmental committees and personal initiatives could achieve. This is to understand our fellow, and we must literally reside with him, to move into his neighborhood. If we place ourselves in his life, by doing so we bridge the gap between us and him. Then his needs truly become our needs, and we can be there in his time of trial. Through this we can share in the rescuing work of God, and with man's faith and God's grace, our hearts will be restored to the nature they were originally intended to have.

Eric Magazu is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at emagazu@student.umass.edu.

Crossing the divide

Thomas Moore

Two and a half months ago, I stepped out of the blazing sun and into a cramped dark shelter that was constructed out of mud and rusted sheet metal. My eyes adjusted to the windowless room and I followed directions to sit on a three-legged stool that elevated one foot from the dusty floor. I looked around the room at my hosts; directly in front of me was a man dressed in dirty military garb with black boots taking long drags of his cigarette.

The man to his right was pouring himself a drink that, judging by his demeanor, was alcoholic. A third man was standing by the door and held the equivalent of an American machete in his left hand. I sat in silent fear that day, right in the middle of an active African warzone thousands of miles away from my cozy home in Wayland, Mass.

This summer I spent five weeks living in Uganda, alongside the people and immersed in their culture. I spent half my time living in the northern district of Gulu and the other half in the capital of Kampala. Uganda is a gorgeous country and was often referred to by Winston Churchill as the, "Pearl of Africa." When our plane touched down, I was blown away by the lush green landscape (expecting the orange landscape depicted in "The Lion King").

If my next-door neighbor's house was broken into, his parents slaughtered and everything burned, I would give the survivors anything they needed.

However, despite its beauty, Uganda is the stage for a gruesome civil war that has lasted more than 20 years, leaving the people that are still alive scarred, both physically and emotionally.

Uganda is home to the child soldier war model, a concept fathered by a native named Joseph Kony stategizing the kidnapping of children between the ages of five and 12 and forcing them to become ruthless soldiers. This is done through fear and brainwashing as commanders of Joseph Kony's army create "kill or be killed" scenarios which force the children to murder others in their village who are unfit to serve. These people include, through accounts that I have heard, their cousins, their aunts and uncles, their own mothers and fathers, and their own brothers and sisters. I think this is where we can admit that there is something horribly wrong.

I think that as Americans, or maybe just as humans, we are extremely good at ignoring things that are wrong. I can say this with confidence because I have spent the last 20 years here as a citizen of both the United States of America and of humanity. Take Ibuprofen for instance – the drug that we have created numbs a headache, which is a symptom, but does not cure the root of the illness. When we ignore the root of the illness, sometimes our bodies heal themselves. Sometimes it doesn't cure. After spending time in Africa with people who have had their lives broken to pieces and their families destroyed, I remembered thinking when I was in America that this was just another problem that would fix itself if I just ignored it. I was completely wrong.

Why had I never gotten on my feet to help before? I heard about what was happening and how desperately they needed aid, both material and emotional, but why had I never given out of my abundance to keep an ex-child soldier alive? If my next-door neighbor's house was broken into, their parents slaughtered and everything burned, I would give the survivors anything they needed.

Why then, when Katrina hit, did I not have a similar impulse to stand and help? Maybe it was because there were other people helping, or maybe because it was all the way "down there" or any other excuse that would allow me to maintain my comfortable life "up here." When it came to my learning of the Ugandan situation, many similar excuses played out. "I'm sure some other organization is intervening, why should I go? For heaven's sake, they're not even American," I found myself saying.

Some of the greatest problems in humanity have come out of the mentality of there being an "us" and a "them." As I sat with ex-child soldiers, responsible for the deaths of thousands of innocent people, who have repented of the life forced upon them, this distinction became blurred.

Two and a half months ago when I was fearing for my life in that shack in the middle of the African bush, I heard the words that would answer many of my questions.

"Thomas," the man in the military uniform said as he put his hand on my shoulder. "Thank you for traveling this far for us, my brother." There is no "them," there is only "us."

I challenge you as a citizen not of Amherst, or of Massachusetts, or of America, but as a global citizen, to stand to your feet and help those in need. For more information and ways to help, visit www.childvoiceintl.org.

Thomas Moore is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at tjmoore@student.umass.edu.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 2009

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Home-style dinner on a YCMP diet

Campus eatery gives students cause to skip on burritos, tacos

BY ANDREW SHERIDAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

SAMANTHA WEISS/COLLEGIAN

Nestled deep within the center of campus, the University Club offers homesick co-eds the chance to set their stomachs (and minds) at ease with a myriad of home-style meals, including chicken picatta and Delmonico steak.

For most University of Massachusetts students who get their food fix through the "Your Campus Meal Plan" program, quantity – not quality – is the name of the game. Burritos at the Blue Wall, pitas at the Pit and DC grub of all kinds fit the bill and fill the bellies of the hungry masses.

Survival is the main concern for the average starving college kid, but one can only live off of pizza and chicken strips so long before those hunger pangs start to get the best of you. While taco salad may be filling, home cooking it is not.

Yet, not far from the center of campus, tucked away behind the Durfee Conservatory is a little-known eatery that offers the discerning YCMP diner a little bit more of a taste of home.

The University Club has a long history of serving quality food. While the building itself consists of the two oldest houses in Amherst, dating back to 1728, the business began over 75 years ago as "The Faculty Club."

For years, the club existed as an exclusive eatery, accessible only to UMass faculty and graduate students. While the Faculty Club still operates, with a bar and function room dedicated to due-paying members, the facility has been expanded to The University Club and is now open to anyone with an appetite.

When walking into the club, one question comes to mind: what is this place, and why does it look like my grandmother's house? The décor is decidedly quaint, seemingly a cross between a Massachusetts history museum and Grandma's cottage. It is complete with collections of porcelain teapots and pictures of presidents hanging on the walls. And while it may not look like the next Todd English fine dining locale, everything inside the restaurant gives it a cozy, intimate feel that is hard to find in the fashionable restaurant industry.

The homey feel is further advanced by the service. Friendly and amiable wait staff is to be expected in a fine dining establishment, but The University Club goes further. Regular rounds are made by the manager and even the chef, who was happy to discuss the dishes and check up on the end results of his work.

When the sun is warm, diners are given the option of eating on the club's patio facing the scenic UMass greenhouses, but during inclement weather patrons are seated in the dining room, which is arranged so snugly that an ambitious eater could spare a ravioli from the next table over.

The University Club's lunch menu, which is available every weekday on a walk-in basis, seems to be geared towards the YCMP crowd, with a good variety of high quality sandwiches and burgers, as well as more unorthodox dishes such as the Italian Salumi platter. Prices range from nine dollars for the standard cheeseburger to $15 for the more ambitious options. If a bill runs over the eight dollar limit of one YCMP swipe, the balance can be paid off in cash, credit, more swipes. It may cost a couple of bucks to get lunch here using YCMP, but the quality trumps anything found in the Campus Center.

Dinner options are more limited but also more expensive, with most entrees priced at over $20. Chef Chuck has gathered recipes from near and far, and the two-page menu contains classics such as Delmonico steak and chicken picatta. More exotic items like excellent Majool dates with goat cheese and bacon are also an option. The odds are good that Mom never cooked anything quite like this, but unlike your home dinner table reservations are required.

What was most impressive about the University Club was the freshness of all of its offerings. From hot-out-of-the-oven bread to crisp green Boston lettuce salad, everything that arrives on the table is full of fresh flavors. Even the roasted vegetable, served with pasta dishes, — often overlooked in many restaurants, had a vibrant local flavor.

The University Club's odd charm and high-quality food make it worth a second glance for anyone who misses the comforts of home-cooked food. After all, how many times can you really get burritos?

Andrew Sheridan can be reached at Asher1@student.umass.edu.

SAMANTHA WEISS/COLLEGIAN

Scenic patio dining and a friendly wait-staff help endow The University Club with a warm and congenial vibe. Patrons are encouraged to sample exotic delights, such as Majool dates with goat cheese.

Damon's latest blows a whistle on deceptions

True story of price-fixing schemes 'informs' on issues of mental illness, office espionage

AP

Acclaimed thespian Matt Damon generates plenty of sympathy as real-life corporate whistleblower and compulsive liar Mark Whitacre in the "The Informant!"

BY NORA DRAPALSKI
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Instantly, as a briefcase flips open and a tape begins to roll, the audience of Steven Soderbergh's newest film, "The Informant!" is immersed in the world of Mark Whitacre and the life of lies and conspiracy he built to maintain it.

"The Informant!" is based on a true story about an ordinary man whose lies lead him into an extraordinary situation. Mark Whitacre, played by Matt Damon, is a corporate vice president for Archer Daniels Midland. After discovering the company's price-fixing activities, he becomes an informant for the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI).

The film follows Whitacre as he helps the FBI with a corporate espionage case in 1992, until he reveals ADM's involvement in an international price-fixing of a lysine conspiracy. Whitacre secretly records conversations he has with various figures – from ADM's international rivals supporting their agreement to sell lysine at the same price. Whitacre falls deeper and deeper into the case, thriving off the thrill of working with the FBI. But the case also placates to a darker side of his demeanor, one which thrives off falsehoods and deception.

Whitacre's compulsive lying is later attributed to his undiagnosed bipolar disorder, which screenwriter Scott Burns highlights in "The Informant!" through the use of narrated internal monologues.

Throughout the film, Whitacre engages in long, trivial narrations following a stream of consciousness form. The comedic element of the movie derives from the various topics he discusses during these narrations, including steam rising from pools and businessmen buying used panties from vending machines in Japan. Often, his internal monologue silences background dialogue during intense dramatic scenes, emphasizing his mental illness and his disconnect from the real world.

Whitacre's internal monologues, audible only to the audience, complete the picture as the audience tries to understand his character. His mental illness distorts his train of thought so that his words are comedic, in an almost pleasurably guilty kind of way. Whitacre is unaware of his abnormal thought process, but the audience, aware of both the current situation he is in, and the idea that he is abnormal, view these clear and sudden interruptions from the storyline as humorous.

The written dialogue in the film reminds the audience that "The Informant!" is a comedy, not a drama. When asked by an ADM employee whether the FBI was tapping two lines in Whitacre's house, FBI Special Agent Shepard (Scott Bakula) abruptly interjects, "I really can't answer that." Additionally, after receiving a special briefcase with a hidden tape recorder inside, Whitacre coolly refers to himself as "0014," and when questioned why, he claims, "...cause I'm twice as smart as 007."

"The Informant!" is a deftly written story whose script ensures its success. With Whitacre, Scott Burns crafts an endearing character, making his multimillion dollar embezzlement schemes seem trivial. Burns' Whitacre is an optimistic, yet an incredibly naïve individual who believes he will retain his position even after he assists in the arrest of the executives of his company.

Matt Damon captures Whitacre's character well, pulling in possibly one of his best performances to date. Damon adopted a light voice for the naïve executive and effortlessly pulled off the complicated voiceover work. The monologues

See INFORMANT on page 6

Bipolar CEO captures hearts

INFORMANT from page 5

seem genuine, and surprisingly believable, for words so distant from the image seen on screen.

Mark Whitacre, now COO of Cypress Systems, is a very different man from the one described in "The Informant!" Since he first began 17 years ago aiding the FBI, 14 years have passed since the trial began. During this time, Whitacre was treated for his bipolar disorder and has since stabilized his life. Whitacre battled stress-induced suicide attempts while he remained undiagnosed. These attempts were never featured in the film due to the nature of such an already dark comedic film.

Damon's portrayal of Mark Whitacre, while vastly different from Dustin Hoffman in "Rain Man" or Russell Crowe's 'John Nash' in "A Beautiful Mind," is a notable example of an actor embracing the way their character thinks and adopting it as a believable character. Mental illness does not limit or define his character, but it is simply a part of who he is.

Nora Drapalski can be contacted at ndrapals@student.umass.edu.

Director Steven Soderbergh's career has been marred with box office flops in recent years – including the wince-inducing "Ocean's Thirteen" and the overly-ambitious "Che." With "The Informant!" Soderbergh looks to redeem himself – and he succeeds.

Scantily-clad office 'skinterns' suggest Capitol Hill still hasn't learned its lesson

By Jessica Starling-Jones
Collegian Correspondent

As the summer months dwindle and fall begins to peak through the leaves, congressional male staffers look forward, with equal parts excitement and longing, to "skintern" season – a time when thousands of supple young female interns swarm Capitol Hill, strolling its marbled hallways in tight-fitting skirts and revealing tops.

At the same time, established female professionals loathe the arrival of such tarts, who, they feel, seem to give women in the workplace a bad name. This leads to an interesting question – are there dress codes one should abide in the workplace? Or should dress, much like freedom of speech, be ungoverned and unrestrained – should women be allowed to dress however they choose?

The term "skintern" essentially refers to female interns who display far too much skin in the office. Capitol Hill internships notoriously attract scads of well-qualified and intelligent young women who often have not yet grown accustomed to the professionalism required in the workplace. Though looks certainly can deceive, a person's appearance sends important cues as to how she hopes to be perceived.

Many college-aged women rely on the same tried and true barroom strategies to get noticed in the workplace. Such tactics range from wearing short skirts, visible undergarments, heavy makeup and blouses that plunge perilously deep into the valley of one's cleavage. Though boys may welcome the sight of a robust décolletage, more often than not provocative dress sends the wrong message. But opinions vary as to how these messages are received.

Not surprisingly, some male interns with a keen eye for bare flesh look to "skinterns" from various congressional districts as fantasy fodder, rather than as workplace equals. This also begs the question – has coming of age during the Monica Lewinsky Sex Scandal taught young women nothing about propriety? Not to be a prude, but while the cardigan is still very much in, wearing one over your nightclothes doesn't exactly make it work appropriate, yet its common practice for young interns to do as much. To an observer, it may seem like some young interns would like to take one of those "Member of Congress Only" signs from restricted areas and post it over their beds.

In speaking with a fellow intern, the question arose as to whether an intern can really advance by virtue of her looks. Demanding attention for one's appearance through revealing dress in fact gives staffers license to dismiss you. And don't count on receiving any offers to tag along to various committee meetings and conferences when your dress would be better suited to work in a brothel. You don't want your boobs or lips to enter a room before you do.

But in all honesty, when working in an environment largely dominated by middle-aged men, it takes very little to draw attention. For that reason, some young women make a concerted effort to appear as unattractive as possible. Pair shapeless sack dresses with any kind of orthopedic footwear and you can be sure not to make an impression. If a shoe is closed-toe and comfortable to walk in, then chances are its ugly enough to wear to work.

Though "skinterns" do provide ample entertainment and a welcome distraction for many young staffers, the situation actually points to a disturbing reality lurking behind the heavy gilded doors of the Capitol: by appearing scantily-clad in their attire, women self-designate themselves into inferior roles and open themselves up to objectification. It's a disheartening scenario, imaging many bright young women not taking themselves seriously enough to cover up a bit. It suggests that essentially, such women lack the confidence that people will appreciate their professional accomplishments and intellectual contributions.

For young women who have grown up with every opportunity and the expectation that they can make meaningful contributions in the working world, the harsh reality remains that they feel primarily valued for their looks. Their dress indicates that they identify themselves more strongly as sex objects rather than as young professionals.

On the other hand, for fear of pre-existing biases against "skinterns," many young women prohibit themselves from having a little fun with fashion. Where does one draw the line in terms of compensating for one's good looks with unflattering apparel? In all fairness, women should allow themselves to take joy in their appearances while at the same time expecting to be appreciated for their many assets beyond their looks. In a sea of skin, the well-dressed woman who manages to strike a chord between appropriateness and sexiness is a sight for sore eyes, demonstrating the careful balancing act of style and sensibility.

Jessica Starling-Jones can be reached at jessicastarlingjones@gmail.com.

Former intern Monica Lewinsky (along with her infamous blue dress) helped set an example for generations of "skinterns" to come.

Come visit us at the College of Engineering Career Fair

September 30
10 a.m. - 3 p.m.
Campus Center Auditorium

What have you done for me lately?

It's never too late to start making a difference in the world. Start today by considering a career at GE, where we're making a positive impact on the planet we live on and the people we share it with through our Ecomagination and Healthymagination initiatives. Whether your interests lie in engineering, finance, manufacturing, marketing and sales, human resources or information technology, we have an opportunity for you to join us in creating a better world for generations to come.

imagination at work

ge.com/careers

Don't make your girlfriend mad at you... WRITE FOR ARTS!

EMAIL arts@dailycollegian.com

Domino's Pizza
2X Tuesday
Buy any large pizza, get second one FREE.
413-256-8911

Minutemen looking to bring stiff defense

SOCCER from page 10

has established in recent years.

The past two games are the best example of that. The Minutemen have shut opponents out three times this season, which includes both of their wins against Northeastern and Siena.

"We're finishing our chances a bit better; we're creating better chances; we're moving the ball down the flanks better, but we're still not were we want to be," Koch said.

Their recent success comes at a wrong time for the Raiders (4-3), who have struggled recently despite starting the season 4-1.

Colgate's last loss came to Lehigh in a 2-1 overtime affair and a week before dropped to New Hampshire by the same score. However, Koch knows better than to have his team take the Raiders lightly.

"We're concerned about playing today," Koch said. "It doesn't matter what we did yesterday, we have a good opponent today and were playing a little bit better. Bottom line, each week we're trying to get better."

Colgate already has three games where it scored more than one goal including twice when it scored three against Syracuse and Albany.

The Minutemen finish their non-conference schedule on Saturday with another home match against Fordham.

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmil0@student.umass.edu.

Once unsure defense producing results as season moves forward play here, and putting him back up there gives us a whole new dimension, that has opened up Arikian and DeSantis."

DEFENSE from page 10

With Amick most likely moving back to midfield; look for even fresher faces to come off the bench for Koch and to make an impact early.

Even with the offense looking to create more plays, the defense has been a staple of the Minutemen program for many years.

"We stress defense, because defense wins championships, so were always defense first," Koch said. "That's the easiest thing for us to get them to understand, and then we build off our defense."

Amick started his career with UMass as a midfielder in 2007 and made an impact in his first two seasons as a Minuteman. Ironically, Amick's freshman year was athe year that UMass made the College Cup, and Koch made a similar move, switching midfielder Doug Rappaport to the backfield.

The Minutemen are a team which historically, relied on dynamic defensive play, as goalie Zac Simmons and defenders Chris Brown, Kenny Cook and Trevor Singer helped UMass make it to the 2007 NCAA national semifinals.

"Are we playing pretty good defense as far as I'm concerned, yes, we are, but we still aren't doing everything we need too."

Along with the defense, having two starting caliber goalkeepers in Shane-Curran Hass and Chris Piekos splitting time proposes match-up problems for opponents, especially Colgate.

"It's great to have two starting keepers, and both get better each week, and we don't want to change anything if its not broken," Koch said.

David Brinch can be reached at dbrinch@student.umass.edu.

Forward Mark DeSantis has two goals this season, including the game-tying goal against Siena that started the Minutemen's multi-game unbeaten streak. He'll rake his scoring ability into UMass' game against Colgate.

Midfielder Ben Arikian is to the midfield what DeSantis (left) is to the Minuteman forward line, a player who can hurt a team with both his speed and experience. Arikian and DeSantis both lead UMass with two goals in 2009.

UMass starts season with winning effort

Eastern Collegiate Invitational proves fruitful for Boney, Ploch

By Ben Lambert
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts tennis team got its season off on the right track at the Eastern Collegiate Invitational this weekend. The doubles pairs were the stars during the event as junior Candyncе Boney and senior Maude Lecluyse teamed up to win the No. 1 doubles title. The team of Tanisha Hodgson and Jocelyn Providence battled back from a tough first-round loss to win the second doubles consolation bracket as well.

Singles play was also strong for the Minutewomen, as three players reached the semifinals of the main draw. All three players eventually lost to the eventual champions of their respective brackets.

Boney and Lecluyse defeated teams from Pittsburgh, St. John's, Cornell and Binghamton on their way to the title.

Magdalena Ploch, the Atlantic 10 Most Outstanding Rookie Performer and a First Team All-Conference Performer last season, played in the No. 1 singles slot during the event for the Minutewomen. Ploch defeated Katie Haught of West Virginia with her strong ground strokes 6-0, 6-1 in the second round after a first round bye. The natural lefty then defeated the No. 6 seed from Quinnipiac, Mary Wilson 7-6(6), 7-6(6) in an extremely close match that came down to two tiebreakers in the quarterfinals.

In the semifinals, Ploch started strong by taking the first set 6-1 against Long Island's Selma Babic. Babic won the second set, and eventually won the match with a 10-7 tiebreaker victory. Babic went on to win the No. 1 singles title.

At No. 2 Singles, freshman Julia Comas defeated Nakita Austin of St. Johns 6-1, 6-1 and Ashley Pilsbury of West Virginia 6-1, 6-3 in the first two rounds of the tournament. She then beat Jillian Santos 6-3, 6-2 to gain entrance into the semifinals, but she ran into trouble against CC Sardinha No. 1 of Syracuse. Sardinha defeated Comas 6-3, 6-3, and went on to win the No. 2 singles bracket.

Karen Carpenter also reached the semifinals at No. 3 singles, beating Rachel McGowan of Duquesne 7-6(0), 6-3 and Karina Cordero-Martinez of Seton Hall 6-1, 62. She then earned her way into the semifinals by defeating Demi Iepuras of Bucknell 6-2, 6-2. Carpenter could not overcome No. 1 seed Emily Harman of No. 1 Syracuse, who went on to win the No. 3 singles title.

Gabriella Jannotta and Chantal Swiszcz played No. 4 singles for UMass, with Swiszcz reaching the quarterfinals.

Hodgson and Providence's road to victory included victories over Marist, Niagra and No. 5 West Virginia.

"I think we did really well. I'm really pleased," said UMass coach Judy Dixon. "This is the deepest team I've ever had. In each division, we did really well. I feel very confident that this team could be one of the best I've ever had."

Dixon was also pleased with how her players jelled in their first match of the season.

"Team chemistry is very good," said Dixon. "It bodes well for us."

The Minutewomen play next at Holy Cross on Oct. 1 at 1 p.m.

Ben Lambert can be reached at wlambert@student.umass.edu.

Banking for the EGeneration

We work here and bank here too!

eGeneration banking is delivered by eGeneration bankers like Cara and Mike.

Check out mycoolbank.com today!

Get great info, open accounts online and get awesome stuff like eChecking, eStatements, Online Banking and Bill Pay. It's easy for you to choose your style of banking. There's even online live chat.

*$10 minimum deposit to open eChecking Account. No minimum balance required to maintain account. Other bank's ATM surcharge fees that are charged to the account during current statement cycle will be refunded on the last business day of the current statement cycle. Accounts closed or changed to another product during a current statement cycle will not receive a refund of the other bank's ATM surcharge fees.

EASTHAMPTON SAVINGS BANK
My Bank. My Future.
mycoolbank.com | 413.527.4111
Belchertown | Easthampton | Hadley | Northampton
South Hadley | Southampton | Westfield

Find ESB on facebook

LENDER Member FDIC

UMass Amherst
ISENBERG
SCHOOL OF MANAGEMENT

Isenberg School of Manage
Chase Career Center Pres

All Students Are Cordially Invited to Attend!!

eptember 30, 20
:00 Noon Ends at

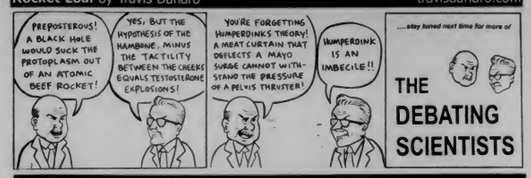
Arena Floor:

Acosta Sales and Marketing
AG Salesworks
Aldi
ARAMARK Corporation
Avery Dennison
Bank of New York Mellon
Berkshire Bank
Black & Decker
BlumShapiro
Buckeye International, Inc.
C&S Wholesale Grocers, Inc.
Caturano and Company, PC
Deloitte & Touche
DiCicco Gulman & Co.
Edelstein & Company LLP
Enterprise Rent-A-Car
Ercolini & Company, LLP
Eze Castle Software, LLC
FDIC
First Investors Corporation
FTI Consulting
Huron Consulting Group
Internal Revenue Service
John Hancock Financial Network-Boston Partners
KPMG LLP
LarsonAllen LLP
Lowe's Companies, Inc.
McGladrey & Pullen/RSM McGladrey
Medical Information Technology, Inc. (MEDITECH)
Millipore Corporation
Morris & Morris, P.C.
Northwestern Mutual Financial Network
Novogradac & Company LLP
O'Connor & Drew, P.C.
Parent, McLaughlin & Nangle
PeoplesBank
Pepsi Bottling Group
Rogers Corporation
Rucci, Bardaro & Barrett, PC
Ryder Systems, Inc.
Sherwin-Williams Company
SS&C Technologies, Inc.
State Street Corporation
Target Stores
The Hartford Financial Services Company
TJX Companies, Inc.
TTI Floorcare
Walgreens
Walter & Shuffain, PC
Wolf & Company, P.C.

Concourse Level:

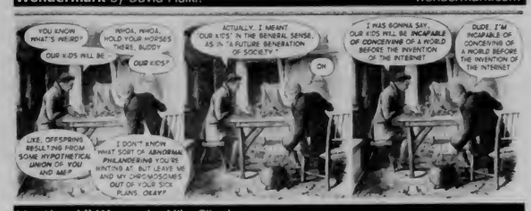
Aerotek, Inc
Alexander, Aronson Finning & Co,. P.C.
Blinds To Go
CVS
EMC Corporation
Ernst & Young
General Electric
Hanover Insurance Group
Kohl's Department Stores
Liberty Mutual
Macy's, Inc
MassMutual Financial Group
Naval Sea Systems Command
PricewaterhouseCoopers
Raytheon Company
Samet & Company, PC
TechTarget
UHY, LLP
United States Marine Corps
United Technologies Corp.

Helpful Hints:



1. Bring a supply of resumes with you to leave with the company representatives you meet.
2. Dress appropriately. This means tie and jacket for men, dress or blouse, skirt or pantsuit for w
3. Speak with corporate representatives of interest to you and ask for a business card, if availa

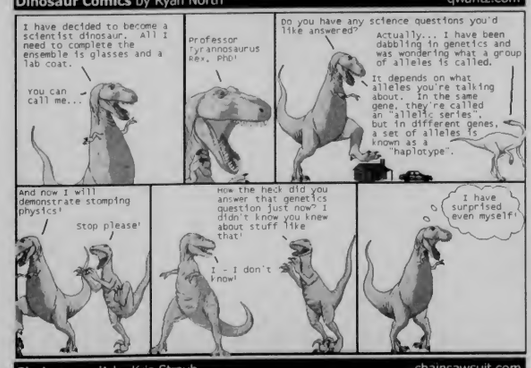
For your convenience, there will be a van leaving Haigus Mall to the Mullins Center every 20 minutes from 11:45pm to 5:00pm.



COMICS

Rocket Loaf by Travis Dandro travisdandro.com

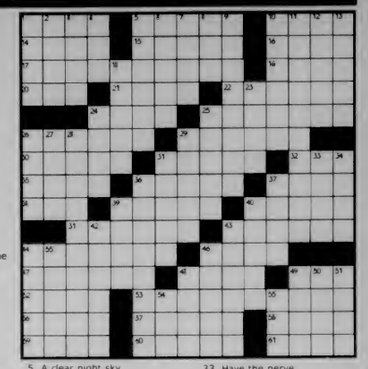
Wondermark by David Malki! wondermark.com



Meeting Lil Wayne by Mike Slipola

My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees mnftiu.cc

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North qwantz.com



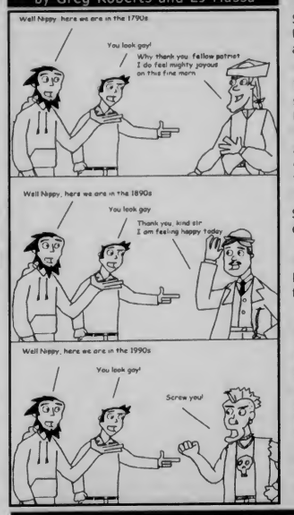
Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub chainsawsuit.com

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!
Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

CROSSWORD

ACROSS

1. Hurt
5. Vexations
10. Annoyance
14. Found in skin lotion
15. Forbidden
16. Countertenor
17. Dwelling
19. Not fat
20. Exist
21. Historical periods
22. Soothsayer
24. An earthy deposit rich in lime
25. Harness racing horse
26. Foolishness
29. Peanut
30. Hour
31. Taxonomic category
32. Lyric poem
35. A superhero might wear one
36. Notes
37. Chew on
38. Summer refresher
39. Rip up
40. Wavelike design
41. Sexual attacker
43. Cavalry member
44. Dud
46. A melody
47. Bless
48. Twirled
49. Request
52. Walking stick
53. A dig
56. Freudian stage
57. Avoid
58. Doing nothing
59. Join metal
60. Gunpowder ingredient
61. Let go



DOWN

1. Laugh
2. Winged
3. Gown
4. Japanese apricot
5. A clear night sky
6. Birth-related
7. Nile bird
8. As well
9. Full and loud and deep
10. Roof of the mouth
11. Powered by electricity
12. Not fresh
13. Laser printers need this
18. Instruct
23. Holds up
24. Brood
25. Strengthened
26. Ancient Peruvian
27. Pair
28. Nonsubjective
29. Agile Old World viverrine
31. A very spiny and dense evergreen shrub
33. Have the nerve
34. Pitcher
36. A baker's dozen
37. A large chime
39. Rotate
40. Bread from heaven
42. Far away from home
43. A slat in a window or shade
44. Colorful parrot
45. Silly
46. Shovel
48. Leave in a hurry
49. Assistant
50. Dealt
51. Bend this to propose
54. Sixteen in Roman numerals
55. Twitch

SUDOKU

		1		2			6	3
	2			1
			5
	8	5	2					1
6	9						5
		3					9
7
3					5	1
	1		8	4				7

Bubblegum Heroes
by Greg Roberts and EJ Massa

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Study the hierarchy of noob-dom, from newbie all the way to fr00b.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Your fantasy football team's win last week does not make you look like a stud.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
There's only one way to diffuse this major ACORN situation: we bring in SQUIRREL.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Despite what the TV networks display, murder scene investigations do not make you sexy.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Screw Merriam-Webster. Urbandictionary.com has got all dah answers.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
If Benjamin Franklin were here, he'd school you in some Battleship, homeslice.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
According to Oprah, couples cannot continue to exist when just one of them pays to be in her book club.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Sleep apnea is just the result of EPIC dreams. Don't hate.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Do you know why kids are koo-koo for Coco Puffs?

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
The Apocalyptic event in 2012 will be caused by a "Venom" movie starring Larry the Cable Guy.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Spend some time with your childhood. The Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles are beckoning you.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
The world only loves tyrannical idols, like Little Debbie.

CLASSIFIEDS

EMPLOYMENT
Part-time personal care attendant. About 10-12 hours/week. Flexible Hours. Pleaes call Patrick (413) 275-7928.

EMPLOYMENT
Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162.

RESEARCH STUDY
Join a Research study conducted through the UMass Communication Department! Watch 80 mins of T.V. News, answer survey questions, and learn up to $10 for your time! Contact Lisa Wortman at Lisadenice@gmail.com to sign up!

ANNOUNCEMENTS
Montreal Party Weekends From $99 Includes Hotel, Bus, and Clubs montrealexpress.net (781)979-9001

GUITAR TEACHER
Professional Electric Guitar Teacher & Performer; Specializing in Jazz, Improv. Music Theory & Technique. Call (413)665-8794

EMPLOYMENT
Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 2009 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UM, Colgate meet at Rudd

Minutemen look to extend unbeaten, winning streaks

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's soccer team hopes to pick up on its momentum from a two-game winning streak as it plays Colgate at home today. The match marks the first time in almost a month that the Minutemen have played at Rudd Field.

Their last game in Amherst was the season opener on Sept. 1 when UMass (2-3-1) tied Boston University in a 1-1 tie. Following their first game, the Minutemen had their only loss of the season to Hartford, 2-0, but are undefeated in the last five games.

Their last win came in a 2-0 victory over Siena, with goals coming from midfielder Ben Arikian and forward Mark DeSantis. The game also gave goalkeeper Shane Curran-Hays his first shut-out of the season.

Looking forward at the game against the Raiders, they have a dynamic freshman in Mike Reidy who doesn't take too many shots, but when he does is sure to get a good chance of getting a goal. Reidy has four goals on 18 shots (nine of them on goal) with a 222 shot percentage.

"We have to be aware of were he is at all times on the field, and he's a very good player," UMass coach Sam Koch said.

"They have some good players, and he is the key offensive threat for them, and they're a good team."

But Reidy's style is pretty uncharacteristic for the Raiders, which as a team is very aggressive.

On the season, they have 123 shots compared to the Minutemen's 55. As much as Colgate relies on Reidy, it has scoring from six different players to give it a somewhat balanced attack.

Midfielder Alex Weekes has three goals and two assists this season but is pointless in his last two games.

Weekes, Chris Ross and Jeff Leach all have multiple assists this season.

Koch hopes to counter that aggressiveness the same way he did against Siena with his team's solid defense. Recently, UMass has lived up to the reputation it

See SOCCER on page 7

FJ STANDISH/COLLEGIAN

Midfielder Stuart Amick and the Minutemen welcome Colgate to Rudd Field today. The Minutemen are (2-3-1) this season.

Defense best in conference

UMass defenders lead the Atlantic 10 in goals allowed

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's soccer team knows a thing or two about playing solid team defense.

UMass is one of the best defensive units in the Atlantic 10 so far this season, leading the conference in goals allowed (4), goals-against average (0.60), while ranking second in shutouts with three. Even with some unfamiliar faces in the backfield, the Minutemen are nationally-ranked in team save percentage (.900) and in goals against average (0.60).

Even with the accolades, UMass coach Sam Koch doesn't want his team getting complacent.

"As far as being the best defense in the A-10, I don't know, because we haven't played each other," Koch said.

The Minutemen (2-1-3) open their conference schedule at Xavier (1-4-1) on Oct. 9, before playing Dayton (3-3-1) on Oct. 11.

Freshman Dominic Skrajewski and Brodie Steigerwald have seen substantial time on the field, while sophomores Sam DeNormandie, Michael Doherty, David Key and Mark Dangleis are contributing players on the defensive front.

Dangleis, a transfer from Lehigh, had a little trouble adjusting to the style that UMass plays, as it took time for him to mesh with the system.

"He's very dangerous offensively; he can cross the ball very well; he can shoot the ball very well; but his job here is the make sure the other team doesn't score," Koch said.

Koch sees Dangleis playing back as beneficial for the offensive unit both in changing the field and in the transition.

Along with this group, Koch has used junior Stuart Amick and Dangleis in both the midfield and defense to generate scoring chances for Ben Arikian and Mark DeSantis, while helping out in the backfield when opponents are in the Minutemen's zone.

"Stu is so dangerous in the attack and creates problems for other teams in the midfield, and he attacks [from the] left side as well as anyone we have had

See DEFENSE on page 7

Minutewomen stand behind new defensive leader Cota

BY STEVE LEVINE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Minutewomen probably wouldn't be in the midst of a five-game unbeaten streak if it wasn't for strong defense, specifically goaltending.

Up until its last game against Duquesne, UMass (3-4-2) played every game splitting time in net between senior Lauren Luckey and freshman Emily Cota. Against Duquesne, however, Cota made her first career start, saving eight shots in a shutout effort. It was the first time all season UMass coach Angela Napoli stuck with one goalie for all 90 minutes.

Cota's recent efforts have been recognized by both UMass and the Atlantic-10 conference, as she was awarded the UMass Player of the Week as well as A-10 Co-Rookie of the Week.

In 458.20 minutes, Cota ranks first in the A-10 with a .909 save percentage and an 0.59 goals against average. She is perfect in conference games so far, with a 1.000 save percentage, 0.00 goals-against average, and a 2-0-0 record.

Coming into the season, the plan was to have Lauren Luckey as a mainstay in goal and Cota behind her on the depth chart as the highly touted prospect from the Jim Rudy coaching era. Luckey has not performed poorly, but Cota's statistics patrolling the box are quite hard to ignore, propelling her into the number one spot in the depth chart.

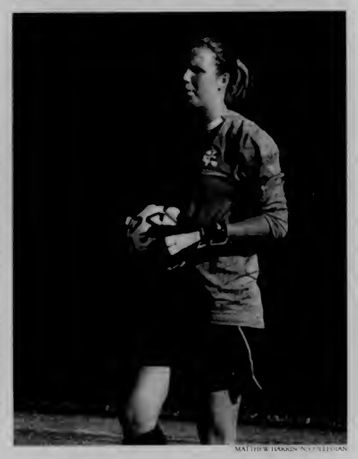
It will be interesting to see how Cota responds to consistent starts and increased minutes. Only time will tell how short of a leash Cota will be on, as the Minutewomen move through their conference schedule.

PROBLEMS WITH THE OFFENSE

It is unfair to compare the current team with the one that took the field before Sept. 13, when UMass started its current five-game unbeaten streak against New Hampshire.

Before September 13, the Minutewomen could not score goals, and relied heavily on their defense. On top of that, they were not yet acclimated to new coach Angela Napoli and her playing style. As the team practiced, it became more organized and more trusting of the coaching staff. Although offensive statistics to this point show their opponents at a great advantage, UMass is showing more life offensively, but still have room to improve.

The Minutewomen tallied 99 shots on goal against their opponent's 172 so far this season. Of those 99 shots, six have gone in, good for an average goal rate of 0.67 per game. Of their opponent's 172 shots, nine have gone in, good for an average goal rate of 1.00 per game. Opponents have nearly doubled UMass' shots per game, averaging 19.1 to UMass' 11.



Improvements on the offensive side of the ball would greatly complement the Minutewomen's already strong defense and goaltending. It is hard to say where UMass would sit in the standings if not for its defense, but without such effort defending the ball, the season could already be a stark contrast to what it is in actuality..

LOOKING AHEAD

The Minutewomen's next match is away at Saint Louis on October 2nd. The Saints (3-5-2, 0-1-1 A-10) are coming off a loss against St. Bonaventure on September 27. UMass will have to keep a constant eye on Billikens' senior forward Susan Fredericksson, who accounts for three of the team's seven goals while also owning two assists. Saint Louis' strong offense and weak defense is a good combination for UMass, because if the Minutewomen defense continues its solid play, a shutout of the Billikens is not out of the question.

Two days later, UMass will face Charlotte, who currently sits atop the A-10. The 49ers (8-2-0, 2-0-0 A-10) have an extremely potent offense, with six players scoring at least two goals this season. Junior forward Whitney Weinraub has eight goals and three assists, giving her the team lead in points. Charlotte could be the best team in the conference, so UMass' play in that match should give good insight into whether or not they can go deep into the conference tournament.

Steve Levine can be reached at slevine@student.umass.edu.

MATTHEW HASKIN/COLLEGIAN

Freshman Emily Cota earned both her first collegiate win and shutout this past weekend and hopes to build off that success against Saint Louis.

Quarterback Eric Ward and No. 1 Richmond are undefeated this season, thanks in part to Ward's 949 yards and eight touchdowns.

Quarterbacks Archer and Ward playing well at right time against opponents

Ward leads No. 1 Richmond, JMU defensive play praised

BY JUAN PACHECO
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Both Richmond and William & Mary continue to show why they are two of the top teams in the Colonial Athletic Association, as their quarterbacks, Eric Ward and R.J. Archer earned conference co-offensive player of the week honors.

CAA Football

Ward led the No. 1 Spiders (4-0) to victory over in-state rival Virginia Military Institute by the score of 38-28. He recorded career highs in the process, completing 28 of 39 passes for 394 yards and three touchdowns. His 394 passing yards were second in school history. Ward spread the ball among the Richmond offense as three different receivers caught touchdowns.

The Spider running game was also effective against the Keydets (1-2), picking up 177 yards from scrimmage on the ground. Running back Justin Forte led the team with 154 yards on 21 attempts, scoring one touchdown. Richmond ended up with 548 total offensive yards. They have a bye week this week, allotting two weeks to prepare before taking on No. 6 James Madison.

The No. 5 Tribe, led by Archer, also came away with a win, beating conference rival Delaware, 30-20.

Archer had a career game of his own against the Blue Hens (2-2), passing for 313 yards, completing 23 of 37 passes, and two touchdowns for William & Mary (4-0). His first touchdown of the game made school history, completing a 91 yard pass to wide receiver Chase Hill.

Chase had an impressive game of his own, catching a career-high six receptions for 148 yards and two touchdowns. Both Archer and Chase originally were high school quarterbacks, converted to wide receivers when they arrived to William & Mary. Archer returned to his original position, this being his first year as starting quarterback for the Tribe.

This is William & Mary's best start to a season since 1994. The Tribe defense also factored in on the victory. The defense recorded five sacks and took away the Delaware running game, allowing only negative two rushing yards on 18 attempts. Their next game is at No. 2 Villanova in a conference showdown.

JMU GRABS HONORS

No. 7 James Madison's defensive play, led by CAA Defensive Player of the Week defensive lineman Arthur Moats, beat No. 25 Liberty, 24-10.

Moats recorded nine tackles in the game – a team high – including three tackles for losses. Moats also sacked quarterback Tommy Beecher, as well as forcing a fumble.

JMU (2-1) held the Flames to 217 total offensive yards, down from their season average 325 yards per game. Liberty's 10 points in the game is a season-low for points scored. During the season, the Flames (2-2) average 22 points per game.

The Dukes' defensive play was important to the victory, as the game was tied 10-10 going into the fourth quarter. JMU held Liberty to a field goal in the second half. Free safety Griff Yancey intercepted the ball, returning it for 34 yards to the Liberty 13-yard line, which set up a touchdown by running back Corwin Acker, sealing the win for JMU.

UNH WINS GRANITE BOWL

In the annual game against in-state rival Dartmouth, New Hampshire convincingly beat the Big Green, 44-14 to win the Granite Bowl Trophy.

The No. 7 Wildcats (3-0) beat Dartmouth for the second straight year, giving them the advantage in the all-time series.

New Hampshire played both sides of the ball well, picking up 528 total offensive yards and holding Dartmouth to 314 total yards. The Wildcat running game was impressive, as it rushed for 287 yards. The 287 yards on the ground was a collective effort as UNH utilized 10 different players on the ground.

The Big Green (0-2) kept the game close in the first half, losing 20-14. However, the Wildcats went on to score 24 unanswered points in the second half, putting the game out of reach for Dartmouth. Running back Chad Kackert led the team in rushing yards with 74 as well as rushing attempts (12).

The only bright spot for the Big Green was running back Nick Schwieger. Schweiger finished the game with 119 yards, the first time a Dartmouth running back reached the 100-yard mark in a game since 2007.

New Hampshire goes on the road this week to take on Towson in an in-conference game. Kick off will be at 3:30.

Juan Pacheco can be reached at jcpachec@student.umass.edu.

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

HIGH: 57 LOW: 38 www.DailyCollegian.com WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 2009

Creation of picture books showcased in Du Bois Library

BY RACHEL TUMIN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"The Making of a Picture Book: The Marriage of Text and Art" at the Du Bois Library showcases the life of a picture book from its inception to its publication.

An open reception for the exhibit and a talk with Corinne Demas, the exhibit's curator and an English professor from Mount Holyoke College, will be held on Oct. 4, from 2 p.m. to 4 p.m. in Memorial Hall.

Nestled in the center of the learning commons (the lower level of the library), "The Making of a Picture Book" focuses on four children's books by local authors and illustrators. Demas is also one of the authors featured in this exhibit.

Demas' story "The Littlest Matryoshka" and Kathryn Brown's illustrations are dissected and seen in "The Making of a Picture Book." Displayed in the exhibit is a letter, from the author to the illustrator, describing the tale as, "a very sweet story about the littlest of a group of Russian nesting dolls who gets separated from her sisters, has many adventures and finally is happily reunited with them in the home their new owner, a thoughtful little girl."

Within the display, the actual dolls that served as an inspiration for this story stand in front of Demas' letter to Brown. The dolls were all named for characters in Anton Chekov's works, and they were bought by the author for her daughter Artemis – who is pictured in the exhibit playing with them. Also, the exhibit presents the original rough sketches of "The Littlest Matryoshka," and onlookers are able to compare these with the final print as it is showcased next the original sketches.

The details of what the illustrator and author did and why they did it to alter the story are all shown in this exhibit. Explanations are given about the work, from the doll maker's beard being added to the exact placement of the dolls. The active process through which the story develops and how the images correspond with the story is completely outlined within this exhibit.

Additionally featured is the story of "The Perfect Wizard: Ilans Christian Andersen." Written by Jane Yolen and illustrated by Dennis Nolan, "The Perfect Wizard" is displayed with several pre-printing drafts.

The exhibit houses a "book dummy," a black-and-white copy of the text of "The Perfect Wizard," attached in the shape of a book, with Nolan's sketches. It also shows a copy of the "F & Gs," the "Folded and Gathered Sheets," an unbound pre-production draft and a set of the book's first color proofs. For this historical biography, Nolan explains that he "used a combination of watercolor washes to 'antique' the paper and colored pencils for the drawing."

"Ten Times Better" is a counting book gone on African safari also found in the display. Award-winning printmaker, painter, sculptor and illustrator Leonard Baskin created a bright red background and a watercolor zebra to highlight the exactness of author Richard Michelson's wording.

A spare painted zebra torso lays beside the book with the explanation that, "the stripes in the original illustration were the wrong number because there needed to be 99. An assistant painted a new zebra body to cover the original."

This book underlines how the text influenced the images, and vice versa, or how images can shape a story.

Next to the painting of a single, watercolor bee, Michelson has written, "Basking painted one bee. I made photocopies of the bee and laid them out in a pattern ... They looked better swarming towards the text."

The final picture book on display is a collaboration between mother-daughter writing duo, Patricia MacLachlan and Emily MacLachlan-Charest, and painter Katy Schneider. "Once I Ate a Pie" is a book of dogs the authors and illustrator "know, or have known and loved."

The illustrations for this story began as an oil painting of actual dogs. Schneider, who was able to "sneak in" two of her own dogs, writes that, "Researching took the longest. Once I have my source material, the actual painting is pretty quick." A standalone cutout of an intrigued-looking pug overlooks the exhibit.

On a short study break, sophomore Sam DiNardo stops by to admire the picture books. Glancing over the myriad of colors and techniques, he said "I think the exhibit is really great. I really like seeing the artwork."

Handwritten notes in the exhibit's comment book seemingly take the same tone, ranging from "wonderfully informative" to "fascinating" and also "Inspiring! I want to go write my own picture book right now!"

"The Making of a Picture Book: The Marriage of Text and Art" can be viewed on the Lower Level of the Du Bois Library through Dec. 18, 2009.

Rachel Tumin can be reached at rtumin@student.umass.edu

SAMANTHA WEINBERG/COLLEGIAN

Corinne Demas' picture book titled "The Littlest Matryoshka" serves as a demonstration in the library's exhibit of how such literature is created.

New workout wonderland opens

The University of Massachusetts' new recreation center provides a combined 22,000 square feet of free weights and fitness equipment to the student population. Many of the machines, including the ellipticals pictured above, face windows, allowing students to work out with a view.

BY ALYSSA CREAMER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After a two-day delay in opening, the University of Massachusetts Recreation Center will open on Sept. 30 for all students.

The recreation center is available to students from 7 a.m. to 12 a.m. Before its creation, all campus recreation activity operated out of Boyden Gym, located on Commonwealth Ave.

The building, which was designed in a year and half and constructed over a two-year period, has three floors and covers 119,000 square feet. According to the recreation center's project manager Cleve Carrens, an architect and UMass employee, its location was determined with the idea that it would be a building with entrances connecting the east side of campus by the library to the west side of campus where the Mullins Center sits.

Although varsity athletes are welcome at the recreation center, it is mainly a facility designed to promote healthy lifestyles that encompass exercise for all of UMass' population.

"We want to see students working out and doing healthy things," said Carrens.

The building includes three basketball courts that are also marked to serve as nine badminton and three volleyball courts. Curtains can separate the three courts to allow for different activities to occur simultaneously.

There are three activity rooms in which students can participate in fitness programs of varying degrees of intensity. Carrens stated that the rooms are predicted to be used for wrestling, fencing, aerobics and martial arts classes.

Weight training and fitness equipment are organized throughout two of the center's floors.

The building is also fitted with lockers and showers for students and faculty members.

At the east entrance to the building there is also a juice bar and lounge area with bleacher-like seating for students to watch games on the center's big screen television.

Paid for with UMass students tuition fees, the construction of the building cost $30 million and was designed by Sasaki Associates of Boston.

Alyssa Creamer can be reached at acreamer@student.umass.edu.

Students vaccinated to prevent flu virus

BY CAMERON FORD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With over 27,000 Americans infected by the global H1N1 pandemic and the traditional flu season approaching fast, the University of Massachusetts and the rest of the Five Colleges are bracing themselves for a wave of cases.

The H1N1 vaccine anticipated time of availability to students is still unknown. Currently, the Five Colleges are administering seasonal flu shots which do not have any effect on stopping H1N1 virus.

In a meeting on Sept. 24 with Ann Becker, UHS' chief public health nurse, Becker stated that "seasonal flu shots are in limited supply due to the vast numbers of students trying to get immunized."

At UMass, seasonal flu shots have been administered over the past two weeks, and there are a limited number left. A visit to University Health Services' (UHS) flu clinic during hours last Thursday unveiled a team of nurses administering shots behind curtains in a large room with a sizeable waiting line outside the door.

The amount of flu activity on campus increased last week, according to Becker.

"Last week we saw several cases of seasonal flu, which is somewhat high for this early in flu season," said Becker during an interview. "And there are definitely more coming. In fact, it's been estimated that roughly 30 to 40 percent of the campus could come down with the flu at some point this season."

More seasonal flu vaccines have been ordered, but they will take some time to arrive.

"Currently, UHS is running low on seasonal flu vaccines, but we still have a good supply of nasal mists," said Becker. "These are recommended for anyone ages two to 49 who is healthy and not pregnant."

The nasal mists are offered as

See FLU on page 3

UMass' University Health Services offers seasonal flu vaccines and advice for students on how to stay healthy.

ARTS&LIVING

FEMALE ARTISTS SHOWCASED IN DOCUMENTARY

The Everywoman's Center will be showing "Who Does She Think She Is?" a documentary displaying the lives of five adult artists that inspires female empowerment.

SEE PAGE 5

SPORTS

UMASS DEFEATS COLGATE, 3–0

The Massachusetts men's soccer team is on a three-game winning streak after defeating the Raiders.

SEE PAGE 10

EDITORIAL&OPINION

SECURING OUR SCHOLARSHIP

Collegian columnist Dave Coffey endorses the belief that the United States should extend public school days to improve educational standards.

SEE PAGE 4

DailyCollegian.com

HIT THE GYM OR CLICK A MOUSE

Check out the slideshow of photos taken during an exclusive tour of UMass' new recreation center, and also read an expanded article on its features.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIX
ISSUE 17

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF William McGuinness
MANAGING EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
BUSINESS MANAGER Daniel Jette
PRODUCTION MANAGER Michael Sarkes
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Kirsten Swenson
ADVERTISING MANAGER Michael Tortorici
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Max Deemer
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Shanna Murphy
COMICS EDITOR Annie Keithline
EDITORIAL EDITOR Nick O'Malley
NEWS EDITOR Nick Bush
SPORTS EDITOR Jeffrey R. Larnard
WEB EDITOR Brian Wood
PHOTO EDITOR Matthew Harrison
IT MANAGER Victor Jacek
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Matz Zolnierz
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Jacinto
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Norman Provost
CLASSIFIED MANAGER Katelyn Tamilio
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Justin Gagnon
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Elyse Horowitz
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Cal Scannell
ASSISTANT COMICS Andrew Witts
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Michael Phillis
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Hannah Nelson
ASSISTANT NEWS Samuel Butterfield
ASSISTANT NEWS Alyssa Creamer
ASSISTANT NEWS Jenn Heshion
ASSISTANT SPORTS David Brinch
ASSISTANT SPORTS Mike Gillmeister
ASSISTANT SPORTS Adam Miller
ASSISTANT PHOTO Maxwell Sparr
ASSISTANT PHOTO Samantha Webber
ASSISTANT MULTIPEDIA Sara Cody
ASSISTANT MULTIPEDIA Chris Shores

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALPHA LIT, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1902, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967, THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Kirsten Swenson

COPY EDITOR
Elizabeth Tran

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Michael Sarkes

Students make future job connections at fair

MICHAEL TOOMEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

University of Massachusetts gain valuable experience and contacts while attending a career fair.

On Sept. 29, the University of Massachusetts hosted the 2009 Engineering & Technology Career Fair from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. in the campus center auditorium.

Fifty-three companies signed on to meet with students, receive resumes, answer questions and talk about employment opportunities. Among the 53 visiting companies were Bose, IBM, General Electric, Lockheed Martin and Genzyme.

Finding work in a struggling economy challenges most of today's unemployed population. Recent and soon-to-be college and university graduates, often without substantial work experience, might feel this usually formidable challenge particularly hard this year.

Because of this, many students feel that this year's Engineering & Technology Career Fair may have been a more useful experience than it has in past, more economically stable years.

Career fairs are opportunities for students to add a smile and some personality to their resumes and differentiate themselves from others who instead remain faceless job-seekers by applying online.

Cheryl Brooks, director of student and career development at the UMass College of Engineering, said "In addition, companies that come to our engineering career fair are looking specifically to hire UMass students. In a very competitive environment, this is a much more effective strategy than simply applying on the big job boards."

Alum Constantina Zapris '08 made a great first impression and established a good rapport with State Street Financial Group at the 2007 career fair at the Isenberg School of Management, and started working there two months after graduating.

"When I met with State Street, it went really well. They took my name and information, and not long after that, they contacted me about an interview, which obviously went well. It was really good luck," said Zapris.

"Some students will land interviews as a result of the fair, others will make connections. Seniors are, of course, looking for full-time jobs and the companies coming now are looking to hire spring grads as well as December grads," said Ginger Goldsbury, associate director of UMass Career Services and organizer of the 2009 career fair.

While today's struggling economy adds another element of difficulty to the post-graduation job search, many industries represented by companies participating in this year's career fair have remained stable.

"Construction was down this year, as was manufacturing and commercial products. Other industries such as defense, energy and healthcare stayed steady," said Brooks of how the crisis has affected industries that tend to hire many technical majors.

Companies that sign up for the career fair aren't there to make a gesture of community outreach, they are looking to win over and hire accomplished students.

"They get to market their opportunities to qualified students. They are all looking for the best and this is a way to get their name out there or to keep it there as the case may be. Some companies are not household names but have wonderful opportunities. They certainly want to be at career fairs," said Goldsbury.

This makes the fair particularly relevant to seniors that will soon face the post-university world. Brooks says the fair is also relevant for sophomores and juniors interested in internships or co-ops, as well as freshmen students who might benefit from getting familiar with the skills related to the employment search.

"Few engineering companies hire first-year students because they don't have quite enough technical knowledge under their belt," said Brooks. "However, these students would benefit from attending the fair to become familiar with how a career fair works, and to practice talking with industry representatives in a fairly laid-back environment."

While the fair is said to have a relatively informal feel, students are encouraged to present themselves as they would at an actual job interview. Beyond the professional wear, students might benefit from doing a little research on some of the companies they might be interested in talking to.

"Rather than asking industry representatives, 'What do you do?' students should come prepared with some basic information about the companies so that they can talk about specific things that interest them," said Brooks.

Sophomore math major James Simons said of the fair, "I didn't know about it, but now that I do, I'll go."

Likewise, Kevin Tringali, a junior engineering major, "got some e-mails about it earlier," but the date snuck up on him. "I think I might go," he said after being informed of the event's date and time.

Junior engineering major Travas McCarthy said he wasn't interested in attending the fair because he already had some interesting job offers.

Michael Toomey can be reached at mjtoomey@student.umass.edu

Driver indicted for explosive conspiracy

BY JOSH MEYER AND TINA SUSMAN
MCCLATCHY-TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Airport shuttle driver Najibullah Zazi was indicted on terrorism charges Thursday, as federal authorities alleged that he and at least three other Denver-area men bought suspicious chemicals from beauty supply stores as part of an active bomb plot conspiracy, with plotters still at large.

Authorities confirmed that they were searching urgently for the other conspirators for questioning in what they describe as the first alleged al-Qaeda-linked plot on U.S. soil since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. And the Justice Department said that "others" accompanied Zazi on his circuitous trip from a New York-area airport to a militant stronghold in Pakistan last year, suggesting that they too might have clandestinely received al-Qaeda weapons and explosives training in furtherance of the plot.

"Zazi remained committed to detonating an explosive device up until the date of his arrest" last Saturday evening, nine days after arriving in New York City, allegedly to meet with other members of the plot, according to a Justice Department detention motion filed in support of its effort to keep Zazi detained without bail. A federal judge in Colorado agreed Thursday, setting the stage for Zazi's transfer to New York to face charges of conspiracy to use weapons of mass destruction against persons or property in the United States.

The Justice Department documents did not identify any of the other alleged co-conspirators, though authorities in recent days told the Tribune Washington Bureau that they were investigating at least a dozen possible suspects. While Zazi was ordered held, his father, Mohammed Zazi, and a New York imam were ordered released on bail. They were arrested along with Zazi on charges of lying to authorities in the sprawling and intensive terrorism investigation.

The detention motion alleges that Zazi planned for more than a year to launch the bomb plot, that he had recently bought some chemicals that can be used for bomb-making from beauty supply stores, and that he was looking for "urgent" help in the last two weeks to make homemade bombs.

On Sept. 6 and 7, before he set off in a rental car for New York, Zazi tried multiple times to communicate with another individual "seeking to correct mixtures of ingredients to make explosives."

"Each communication," the detention motion alleged, was "more urgent in tone than the last."

As proof that he posed an urgent threat, prosecutors disclosed some details on Thursday, saying that Zazi had traveled overseas to receive bomb-making instructions and conducted extensive research on the internet regarding components of explosive devices. They also said Zazi bought — on multiple occasions — unusually large amounts of readily available components necessary to produce TATP (Triacetone Triperoxide) and other explosive devices" before arriving in New York City on Sept. 10, "in furtherance of the criminal plan."

TATP is the explosive used in the deadly 2005 London train bombings that killed 52 people. It was also intended to be used in other al-Qaida-linked plots, including the 2005 jetliner plot and the 2001 attempt by Richard Reid to detonate a shoe bomb. Both of those plots focused on detonating explosives on packed commercial jets flying from London to the United States over the Atlantic.

The government also alleged

See TATP on page 3

Micro-blogging site Twitter reportedly valued at $1 billion

BY PETE CAREY
MCCLATCHY-TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

SAN JOSE, Calif. — The wildly popular microblogging website Twitter reportedly is close to locking in as much as $100 million in new investment, placing a $1 billion value on a company that has yet to generate real revenue or show anyone how it can.

The San Francisco-based social media and messaging network has raised $50 million from investors to date, but now is said to be poised to rake in twice that from a team of new and repeat investors.

The investors, according to reports in The Wall Street Journal and New York Times, include Insight Venture Partners, a New York venture capital firm, T. Rowe Price, the mutual fund company, and current Twitter backers Spark Capital and Institutional Venture Partners.

Twitter did not respond to requests for comment, nor did any of the investors.

Twitter — a real-time messaging site in which users are given 140 characters to answer the question, "What am I doing now?" is exhibiting the kind of growth without revenue that evokes the giddy days of the late 1990s dot-com boom.

The company has rocketed from 3 million unique users to 40 million to 50 million in little more than a year, but it has struggled to answer the question of how it intends to make money.

Co-founder Biz Stone blogged a partial answer to that question this week, saying "We leave the door open for advertising." But in an earlier post, Stone said Twitter isn't interested in "traditional web banner advertising."

"Facilitating connections between businesses and individuals in meaningful and relevant ways is compelling," he continued. "We're going to leave the door open for exploration in this area."

As for selling the company, Gartner analyst Ray Valdes said it will take much more than $1 billion for the Twitter founders to agree to an acquisition. He said Twitter is without a business

See TWITTER on page 3

Welcome back!
You don't need to be an economics major to know Stop & Shop offers great values that fit perfectly into a student's budget!

• Prepared foods • Natural and organic foods
• School supplies • Personal care needs
• Redbox™ DVD rentals
• Plus the convenience of a full-service pharmacy

Save even more with this special bonus coupon!
Exclusive bonus coupon
Valid Wednesday 9/16 Saturday 11/28
Stop&Shop
$5 OFF a purchase of $20 or more.
Coupon must be presented at time of purchase. Limit one coupon per customer per order. This coupon cannot be doubled, tripled or combined with any other offer. Offer excludes alcoholic beverages, tobacco products, gift cards, milk, lottery tickets, gasoline, pharmacy items, postage stamps, prepaid telephone calling cards, Western Union®, money orders, Metro passes and any other purchases prohibited by law. Coupon not redeemable at Peapod® by Stop & Shop.
2 10000 01438 8

Hadley

"The Tibetan Freedom Movement - Post 2008"
Thursday, October 1st, 7 pm
UMass Campus Center Auditorium
Tenzin Tsundue
An internationally acclaimed writer and activist, Tenzin Tsundue is regarded as the leading voice of the Tibetan exile community and is on the forefront of Tibet's struggle for independence.
Sponsored by UMass Students For A Free Tibet

Annual SGA elections held

SAMANTHA W[illegible]/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Sam McMahon exercises his right to vote in the Student Government Association elections at Franklin Dining Commons.

Man traveled overseas to gain bomb supplies

TATP from page 2

that at least three other men purchased suspicious quantities of hydrogen peroxide or acetone from beauty supply stores in the Denver area — an indication that they were also conspiring to mix the chemicals into homemade bombs, authorities said. It did not identify the men.

At Hair Joy Beauty Supply in Aurora, a Denver suburb, manager Bennie Harris said his store hadn't had any contact with Zazi. He described Clairoxide, one of the products Zazi is alleged to have bought for its high concentrations of hydrogen peroxide, as a developer used in coloring. "It's been around since time began ... We've never sold a lot of it," he said, adding that the store may consider selling limited quantities of the product because of this case.

Authorities also alleged that they found evidence that Zazi had heated the chemicals on the stove of an Aurora apartment unit he had rented Aug. 28. "Importantly, the bomb-making notes (found on his laptop) contemplate heating the components in order to make them highly concentrated."

"We believe any imminent threat arising from this case has been disrupted, but as always, we remind the American public to be vigilant and to report any suspicious activity to law enforcement," Attorney General Eric H. Holder Jr. said in announcing the indictment.

A federal grand jury in Brooklyn returned the one-count terrorism indictment against Zazi Wednesday, alleging that between Aug. 1, 2008, and Sept. 21, 2009, he knowingly and intentionally conspired with others to use one or more weapons of mass destruction.

In public statements, Zazi has denied being part of any terrorist plot. But the FBI alleges that he admitted under questioning to receiving explosives and weapons training by al-Qaeda in the tribal areas of Pakistan that are considered to be the headquarters for the terror network headed by Osama bin Laden.

Authorities also allege in the court documents that they found handwritten bomb-making instructions on a hard drive on Zazi's laptop computer that appear to match his handwriting, and that they found his fingerprints on the kind of small electronic scale and batteries often used in the making of homemade bombs.

Zazi's father, Mohammed, and Ahmad Wais Afzali, a Queens imam and New York police informant, also have been charged with lying to investigators in the case. Mohammed Zazi is expected to be freed on $50,000 bail. Afzali's lawyer says he is an innocent scapegoat who was unfairly accused of tipping off Zazi to the terrorism investigation.

FBI agents in Colorado first arrested Zazi on Sept. 19, after prosecutors filed a criminal complaint charging him with knowingly and willfully making false statements to the FBI in a matter involving international and domestic terrorism.

The arrests came after the FBI raided numerous locations in New York and Colorado, looking for evidence of explosives and other suspects. Federal agents are still poring over evidence seized in those raids, including computers and cell phones. And the FBI and Department of Homeland Security in recent days have sent out a flurry of alerts, warning authorities around the country to be on the lookout for such explosives, and any evidence of a possible attack on mass transit, sports arenas and entertainment complexes.

Every tweet smells sweet like new money to social network model, but betting that it will succeed financially is "probably not too risky."

TWITTER from page 2

Twitter has several things going for it, Valdes said, including that it is now used as a verb and celebrities like Oprah, Sarah Palin and President Barack Obama all tweet.

"Even when one discounts all those premiums as fashion-driven motivations that will fade," Valdes said in an e-mail, "the fact remains that Twitter's growth curve is remarkable and will continue, at least for the near term."

At $1 billion, Twitter is valued at about $25 per user. That compares with AOL's acquisition of Bebo for $21.50 per user and Microsoft's $250 million investment in Facebook in 2007, which gave it a value of $250 per user. Facebook has since settled at about $30 to $35 per user, Valdes said.

Charlene Li, of the Altimeter Group in San Mateo, said Twitter could make money through the many applications and add-ons that have blossomed to help users make the most of the messaging service.

There are at least 275 Twitter apps or Twitter "tools," according to the website Squidoo.com, which compiled a list of them.

Facebook has faced similar worries over its business model. The social networking website has 300 million users and has raised $690 million since it was founded in 2004.

Based on a $200 million investment in May by the Russian firm, Digital Sky Technology, Facebook is valued at $10 billion, and just started reporting positive cash flow.

More flu vaccinations to arrive midway through fall semester an alternative to the traditional syringe vaccination. They consist of an anti-flu virus which is inhaled through the nostrils and is then absorbed into the bloodstream.

FLU from page 1

In order to make immunizations more easily accessible to students, UHS is planning two walk-in seasonal flu clinics in the campus center auditorium, on Oct. 1, from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. and Oct. 27, from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. The cost of the immunization will be $30, and the clinic will be open to the public.

Becker stated that once any student comes down with flu-like symptoms (e.g. fatigue, headaches, fever and chills, body pains, etc.), they should call the UHS Triage Advice Nurse at (413) 577-5229. Then, they can receive advice as to whether or not they have the flu and what their next course of action should be.

"One message that I want to get out there is that UHS will look at students with the flu; however, right now we are just trying to see who can manage on their own," said Becker.

As part of its plan for coping with cases of students infected with either H1N1 or seasonal flu, UHS will be asking infected students to go home, if possible. If this is not feasible for the student, they are advised to stay in their rooms and e-mail their professors to inform them of their illness and make the necessary arrangements. In addition, they will be advised to find themselves what Becker refers to as a "flu buddy."

"A 'flu buddy' is anyone who can look after the sick student until they get better," she said. "We will also distribute flu kits to sick students. These will contain items to help students take care of themselves, including surgical masks and brochures about the flu."

I Mass Dining also plays an important role in the well-being of ill students who are forced to stay on campus. "Sick trays" are offered, which are packaged meals for bed-ridden students. They must be requested ahead of time and include chicken soup, crackers, Jell-O, fruit and ginger ale.

UHS' communications manager Karen Dunbar Scully stresses the value of staying up-to-date on the swine flu development by visiting the UHS website.

"I especially want to encourage people to look at our flu resource web page," she said. "There is a lot of useful information there for both students and faculty."

UHS is coordinating the Five Colleges' vaccine response to the swine flu threat, led in large part by Becker.

Once the federal government receives its shipment of 195 million doses of H1N1 vaccine, it will distribute them to the states. In the case of Massachusetts, 1,600 drop sites have already been determined for healthcare providers to collect their orders.

To reduce the risk of any difficulties in ordering and retrieving the doses of vaccine, the Five Colleges decided to order them collectively as a group, according to Becker.

"[The Five Colleges] ordered 32,000 doses of H1N1 vaccine in total," she said.

The other schools in the Five Colleges system are making preparations of their own to cope with both seasonal flu and H1N1. And just like at UMass, seasonal flu shots have been going fast.

At Hampshire College, for example, it took just two weeks for the student body to go through the college's entire stock of seasonal flu vaccines. More have been ordered, but it will take some time for them to arrive, according to Sara Aierstuck, Hampshire's director of health services.

"The problem is that right now, most pharmaceutical companies are devoting their resources to producing the H1N1 vaccine," said Aierstuck during a phone interview.

Hampshire College has made preparations to offer what Aierstuck refers to as "isolation services" to sick students.

"What's great about Hampshire is that most students have single rooms, so they can easily be isolated there. We're offering them meal deliveries, check-up calls by our nurse staff, notifying their professors about their illnesses and flu-care kits."

Aierstuck said that the kits will include hand sanitizer, surgical masks, tissues, instruction kits on how sick students should take care of themselves, cough drops and over-the-counter drugs to help them cope with their flu.

At Mount Holyoke College, several students have developed flu-like symptoms, according to Nancy Apple, MHC's director of environmental health and safety.

"We have a limited number of single rooms and on-campus apartments that we have set aside to isolate ill students," she said during a phone interview.

As with UMass and Hampshire, shots have been administered to faculty and students at MHC for several weeks now, but supplies are dwindling. But instead of using flu kits, the isolation units will be equipped ahead of time with flu-care supplies for when the ill student arrives.

Officials at Smith and Amherst Colleges could not be reached for comment. However, a post on the Smith Health Services website revealed that as of Sept. 17, the college had 60 doses of seasonal flu vaccine remaining, and will not offer any more vaccinations after Sept. 22 until they are resupplied.

Similarly, on Amherst College's health department website, a post indicated that the campus has seen two alleged cases of flu. The students were isolated and recovered fairly quickly, according to the post.

In addition, another post updated on Aug. 28 showcased detailed plans for flu patients. Ill students with singles will be isolated in their rooms, while those in shared rooms will be confined to an empty residence hall, where staff will deliver meals daily. Hand sanitizer dispensers have been installed in every building on campus, and a communications line has been opened up for isolated students to keep in touch with health personnel.

Cameron Ford can be reached at cjford@student.umass.edu

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 2009

"FREEDOM OF SPEECH IS OF NO USE TO A MAN WHO HAS NOTHING TO SAY ..."
- FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Rec center a great add

Michael Phillis

After a few delays – some of them at the last minute the University of Massachusetts is set to open its newest "new dirt" building.

The UMass Recreation Center sits where battered old barns once stood across the street from the Mullins Center. A little less than a week ago, because of my job doing grunt work for OIT, I spent about three hours inside the new facility.

I have to say, I was impressed.

After walking the first wide stone staircase, you come up to a landing that overlooks most of the facilities. Wooden benches sit along the staircase behind you and a glistening basketball court lies off to the right.

I came very close to attending BU, largely because of their unbelievable fitness facilities. It's nice to think that UMass is taking steps to compete. The absence I've felt since arriving at UMass of a real fitness facility is starting to ebb, replaced nicely enough, by a glimmer of pride in our state institution.

It doesn't hurt that the facility is free for undergraduates. While I'm sure that the administration had calculated the costs meticulously into our student fees without our realizing, it will be nice to present my student ID and walk through the entranceway without paying a dime.

For three years now, I have belonged to a gym, specifically the Leading Edge, which has taken a few hundred dollars out of my budget each year. After this next bill, I no longer have to subsidize a mediocre business that has always had an affinity for nickel and diming its members.

For those of you who are uncertain whether to keep your old gym memberships, there is a clear answer – don't. Cancel them at first chance and head to the newest building on campus.

The recreation center doesn't have the same cramped, cave-like feel that many of UMass' buildings do. It's meant to feel open, refined and does this exceptionally well.

Natural light streams in from everywhere, lighting the building to the point that on a sunny day, you may have to squint. The simple use of windows by itself makes the recreation center drastically different architecturally than anything else on campus.

I tend to think of UMass as a school that rapidly expanded during the 1970s, and did so by constructing cement buildings that appear to be wetting themselves whenever it rains. UMass is slowly but surely moving forward from this unfortunate history.

The details, however, are really what make the recreation center so nice. When I was there, workers were meeting and discussing the little things that needed to get done before everyone arrived. Construction was still being done, seemingly perfect floors were being sanded to an even greater degree of perfection as an anxious feeling weighed over the supervisors who wanted things done just so.

There are two floors of free weights and machines, three basketball courts, an expansive area full of more treadmills and elliptical machines than you can count and even a dance studio. The lockers are even an improvement. Instead of a sheet metal exterior, there is a wood finish – albeit fake – that ensures a polished feel.

UMass needed to build a facility like the recreation center. This school has to compete with private colleges like Boston University in a state that could not be more competitive when it comes to higher education.

For those of you who are uncertain whether to keep your old gym memberships, there is a clear answer – don't. Cancel them at first chance and head to the newest building on campus.

There has been grumbling from some of my friends concerning the construction of the recreation center. There are budget deficits, and the University spent more than $50 million to give this building life.

I have always liked the idea, but some of my friends think the money should have gone towards scholarships or hiring more faculty. Rolled eyes are not uncommon, as people show their distaste that even more money is being spent on athletics.

It's always easy to find other ways to spend money – every group on campus is going to think that their particular interest deserves it more than something else. This, however, does not take away the most important point of this construction. UMass has finally started taking steps towards becoming a more reputable institution. They have begun building, and in so doing, they are leaving the pangs of their mediocre past behind them in exchange for a new kind of future – a future where this school receives the respect it is beginning to deserve.

We will never be Harvard or MIT, nor should we be. UMass is meant to educate solid students, mostly from the state, and enable them to achieve excellence. With the new recreation center, we have taken a solid step in making this school competitive. Most state schools in the Midwest are the pride of their state's citizens; UMass is coming closer to this kind of recognition.

Michael Phillis is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mphillis@student.umass.edu

Less vacation, more education

Dave Coffey

While it has perhaps been overshadowed by the debates concerning the economy and healthcare, President Barack Obama's position on education plans to bring some changes to the table for our country's school system. The Obama administration supports an initiative to expand the amount of time kids in America spend in school.

In an interview with the Associated Press, Education Secretary Arne Duncan said "Our school calendar is based upon the agrarian economy and not too many of our kids are working in the fields today ... Young people in other countries are going to school 25, 30 percent longer than our students here. I just want to level the playing field."

To fit in more time for kids in the classroom, it is proposed that several steps be taken, including adding more hours to the school day, adding more days to the school calendar and cutting into summer vacation, amongst other things.

Whether or not you agree with this administration's other decisions, this one, while perhaps somewhat unconventional (and potentially unpopular with kids), is a very good one.

In 2008, a documentary by the name of "2 Million Minutes" came out. The film basically demonstrated the differences in the high school experiences (in four years of high school, a student will have about 2 million minutes total between his freshman and senior year) between two American students, two Chinese students and two Indian students. In the movie, director Bob Compton basically shows how, in terms of subjects like math, science and technology, the U.S. is getting the living crap kicked out of them by countries such as (but not limited to) India and China.

Throughout the film, we see that students in high school in China and India have a much more rigorous academic schedule. While they attend nine hour school days and weekend class sessions, as well as focus heavily upon the fields of math and science, their American counterparts spend a comparatively moderate amount of time studying while also focusing on many other extracurricular and social activities.

The film was meant to call attention to the fact that the U.S. is losing its grip on its globally competitive edge by the second, mostly due to the fact that, on the whole, Chinese and Indian students are trouncing American students in the subjects of math, science and technology.

It did cause some stir in education policy circles, and while some reactions were mixed, many experts began to reassert the fact that the future looks bleak for the U.S. unless they can somehow catch up with other countries' educational output. Shirley Jackson, Ph.D., president of Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, gave a series of speeches called "The Quiet Crisis," attempting to call further attention to the growing problem.

The concept is as simple as it is condemning: The U.S. needs to produce more scientists, and it is simply not doing that.

"The engine of our national economy ... is powered by the technological and scientific discoveries and innovations made by scientists and engineers," said Jackson. "As it happens, the U.S. scientific and engineering workforce is aging. The number reaching retirement is likely to triple in the next decade."

Because of this large demographic shift, the U.S. will soon have to fill millions of shoes in scientific and mathematical departments just to attempt to keep up in an ever-increasing globally competitive economy. But Jackson notes that there are less and less students to fill those shoes as of late.

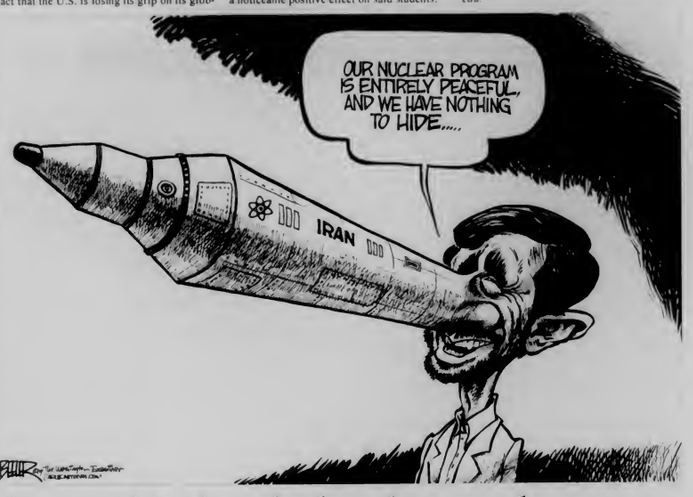
"Undergraduate student enrollments in engineering and the physical sciences are static or declining, and have been for a number of years. Computer science degrees decreased steadily between 1985 and 1995," Jackson said.

The concept is as simple as it is condemning: The U.S. needs to produce more scientists, and it is simply not doing that. But that is where the Obama administration's approach to education comes in. There is a strong case to be made that the policy of adding more time on to the American student's school year can have a noticeable positive effect on said students.

In an Associated Press article concerning the possible impact of adding extra school time for American students, several points of research point to promise in the new policy. One part looked at other countries in which there are longer school days than those in the U.S.

"Researcher Tom Loveless of the Brookings Institution looked at math scores in countries that added math instruction time. Scores rose significantly," the article said.

The article also noted several examples of added time being beneficial in the U.S. as well. Evidence points to the fact that charter schools, which are generally known for having longer school days, weeks and years, almost always outperform the school district averages on state tests.



In addition, the article also pointed out the advantages of shortening the summer break, or even having a year-round schedule, where summer break is shortened and other breaks are lengthened. Essentially, they point out that an extended summer break is actually detrimental to many students' continual learning process.

"Summer is a crucial time for kids, especially poorer kids, because poverty is linked to problems that interfere with learning, such as hunger and less involvement by their parents. That makes poor children almost totally dependent on their learning experience at school," said Karl Alexander, a sociology professor at Baltimore's Johns Hopkins University, home of the National Center for Summer Learning, said the article.

As someone who doesn't necessarily agree with all of the Obama administration's decisions, I truly think this is an incredibly necessary initiative. At a time when the economy is in a shaky state at best, America needs to be able to remain sharp on the global competitive scale.

This simply is not happening at the current rate, in terms of how our education system is running compared to others around the world. To invest in the future of our country's economic and social growth, we must first invest in an overhaul of the current basic education system.

Dave Coffey is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at dscoffey@student.umass.edu.

Obama's missile defense plan has holes, but makes sense

Ben Rudnick

President Barack Obama's cancellation of U.S. plans to place anti-missile installations in Poland and the Czech Republic has brought the issue of ballistic missile defense back to the forefront of our consciousness. Complex national security issues like missile defense demand that we try to comprehend the full context in which these decisions are made before we render judgment upon them.

There is reason to doubt Obama's claim that the cancellation was not an effort to appease a resurgent Russia. For instance, a Sept. 21 story in The Wall Street Journal noted that Russian President Dmitry Medvedev received a letter in February that proposed scrapping of those installations in exchange for greater Russian cooperation in dealing with Iran.

There is also reason to criticize the administration's clumsiness in handling the announcement. The fact that nobody at the White House or State Department realized that Sept. 17 was the 70th anniversary of the Russian invasion of Poland in 1939, which was made possible by a secret agreement between Stalin and Hitler, certainly calls their diplomatic acumen into question.

Despite those blunders, there is some sense in Obama's ideas. Based on a comprehensive review conducted by the Department of Defense and supported by both the Joint Chiefs of Staff and Secretary of Defense Robert Gates, who was appointed by the previous administration, the logic underlying the new missile defense plans appears to be sound.

Most importantly, President Obama reinforced America's commitment to ballistic missile defense even as he intends to shift emphasis and funding from land-based sites to sea-based systems. The Navy has a proven capability in its Aegis radar and Standard SM-3 missile systems, as seen in their successful shoot down of a damaged satellite last year, and these form the cornerstones of Obama's proposal.

The danger of this reallocation of resources away from more advanced systems into those with longer track records is the fact that the older technologies are not effective against longer-ranged missiles, such as the ones under development by nations such as North Korea and Iran.

In particular, Iran is developing several nuclear capable missiles with ranges up to 2,000 km., placing targets in Israel, Turkey and Eastern Europe at risk. There have been reports regarding Iran's work on longer-ranged models, with assistance from North Korea and perhaps even from Russia, but most experts believe that the Iranians won't have a missile capable of striking Western Europe or the U.S. until perhaps 2015 or 2018.

As such, the decision to focus on systems to counter the threat from medium and short range missiles, while continuing development on technologies to address long-range threats, appears sensible.

We cannot "un-invent" the bomb, so we must dedicate ourselves to minimizing the danger of its use.

Since the administration is continuing funding for the deployment of the more capable interceptor missiles in Alaska and California, albeit at reduced levels, and intends to station anti-missile-equipped ships to defend Israel and Western Europe, they appear to have made some wise choices.

America must continue to develop new and better ways to counter the threat of ballistic missiles because it is our responsibility to do so. No matter what one thinks of the use of atomic weapons on Japan at the end of World War II, American science made the terrible promise of nuclear power a horrific reality. Due to that fact, America has a duty to devote its scientific resources and talent to finding ways to prevent any further use of nuclear weapons.

We cannot "un-invent" the bomb, so we must dedicate ourselves to minimizing the danger of its use. Obviously, there are uneconventional ways of delivering nuclear weapons. We are all familiar, for example, with the nightmare scenario of terrorists smuggling a nuke into the country by cargo container or truck. However, the looming threat from rogue nations using missiles armed with nuclear weapons is also very real.

Clearly, just as it took years of trial and error in our own ballistic missile programs, it will take time for Iran or North Korea to develop the missiles and nukes needed to attack America directly. However, the same development time applies to the systems designed to defend against those weapons, which demonstrates why we cannot afford to fall behind our enemies.

This was made abundantly clear with the series of shocking stories over the past week regarding Iran's new enrichment facility and their short and medium-range missile tests. Continued diplomacy is needed to address these provocations, but considering the ineffectiveness of U.N. efforts so far, I think it verges on insanity for anyone charged with the defense of this country to depend entirely upon them for our protection.

That leaves military force, either offensive or defensive. Considering the way Iran's nuclear and missile facilities are spread across that country, any attack upon them is as likely to cause civilian casualties as it is unlikely to completely destroy their capabilities. The obvious alternative is to continue to invest in defensive systems to demonstrate to Iran's tyrannical theocrats our determination to stop them from ever using those weapons.

As such, I applaud Obama's confirmation of America's continuing dedication to the development of more effective missile defense technologies. Unfortunately, his plan's dependence on ships that can be recalled at a moment's notice means that there is nothing to guarantee that those defenses will be in place should they ever be needed.

Only time will tell if President Obama is truly sincere in his Sept. 17 commitment "to protect the U.S. homeland against long-range ballistic missile threats."

Ben Rudnick is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at brudnick@student.umass.edu.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 2009

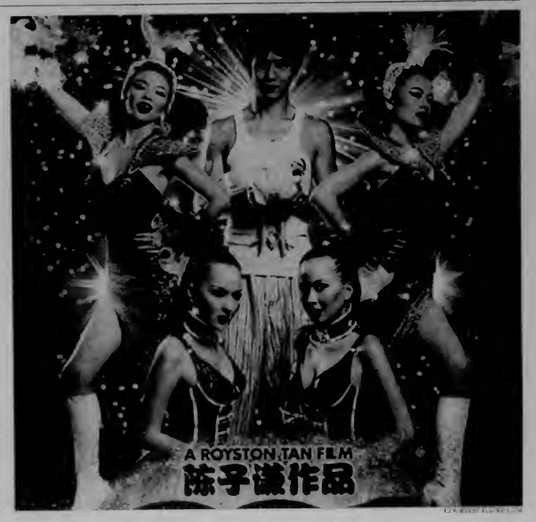
ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Singaporean spectacle showing at Isenberg

By Mark E. Schiffer
Collegian Correspondent

The Asian Arts and Culture Program is screening films at the Isenberg School of Management every Wednesday evening at 7 p.m. throughout the fall semester. Covering everything from the Iranian coming-of-age story "Times and Winds" to the Bollywood extravaganza "Om Shanti Om," this series is sure to interest devoted film fans and newcomers alike.

This week brought the Singaporean submission to the 2007 Academy Awards, "881" (pronounced Papaya). This in-depth look at the competitive world of Getai singers was directed by Royston Tan, and was the highest grossing Singaporean film on its year of release.



"881" is the tale of a singing team of girls called the Papaya Sisters, who perform at the yearly Getai festivals. Little Papaya (Mindee Ong) is a cancer-bound orphan, who provides the melodramatic pathos and Big Papaya (Yeo Yann Yann) is a middle-class valedictorian at her school. They have been blessed by the goddess of Getai with a "feel." Unfortunately, in addition to this blessing, they have been bound to a vow of chastity. A rival Getai group also provides conflict in the film, culminating in a showdown that has ties to the supernatural.

The Getai was chosen as the center of "881," when the director and his two lead actresses were jokingly discussing what was "uniquely Singapore." Known in English as "song stage," Getai is an integral part of the ghost festival, which is held on the 14th day of the seventh lunar month, usually in Malaysia or Singapore. The celebration is known for its bright colors and boisterous music, and "881" attempts to capture that atmosphere with extended musical numbers and lavish costumes and sets. Every song chosen by the director was a previously established Getai classic written by the late Chen Jin Lang.

Previously known mainly for his short films, Tan has begun to gain acclaim for his features over the past few years. Both his child-gang epic "15" (2003) and "4:30" (2006), which tells the tale of the unlikely bond formed between a boy and his alcoholic tenant, have garnered much in the way of praise, the latter of which was the first Singaporean film to actually close the Singapore International Film Festival. "881" marked a noted shift towards a more vibrant and extravagant kind of filmmaking for this director, who once was known for his dark and meditative works.

Pulling together elements from musicals, comedies and melodramas, "881" is a film that is sure to have an appeal for all audiences. Although receiving some criticism for its overt campiness and unevenness in tone – the film is an over-the-top musical comedy which strives for pathos – for some, that will be part of its appeal. Be sure to catch this international flick tonight in room 137 of the SOM. Admission will be free of charge.

Mark Schiffer can be reached at mschiffe@student.umass.edu

COURTESY PHOTO

Royston Tan's latest film, "881,"chronicles a group of female singers in the Getai, an annual festival that takes place in Singapore. The flick is said to be lighter than Tan's earlier productions.

Mayumi Oda stands in front of two pieces of her artwork. Oda speaks to the troubles she faces as a Japanese female artist in the documentary, "Who Does She Think She Is?" which is playing tonight in the New Africa House.

Artists address struggles in male-dominated field

By Julie Holbrook
Collegian Staff

The Everywoman's Center and the Women of Color Leadership Network will be presenting the film, "Who Does She Think She Is?" tonight at 7 p.m. in the Augusta Savage Gallery in the New Africa House. This event is free to everyone, and the location is also wheelchair accessible.

The documentary focuses on five contemporary female artists of varying ages, who come from all over the United States, and portrays the struggles they face both in the world of art as well as balancing their careers with their lives at home.

The artists featured in the film are Angela Williams, a Broadway actress and mother of two living in New York City, N.Y.; Camille Musser, a painter and mother of two residing in Cambridge, Mass; Janis Wunderlich, a Mormon sculptor and mother of five from Ohio; Maye Torres, a sculptor, painter and mother of three living in New Mexico; and Mayumi Oda, a 60-year-old artist and Japanese immigrant.

Although these women come from different places and have different mediums to display their art, they all share common issues and struggles within their lives, and are therefore very relatable to the many female viewers who also face the challenges of balancing work and family.

Not only do these women struggle with balancing their families and careers, but they also deal with the fact that approximately 98 percent of art shown in major museums and exhibits is done by male artists. As a result, these women must each discover ways in which they can stand out amongst their male counterparts, while so many people disregard their work simply because they are women.

According to Hind Mari, an employee from the Everywoman's Center, the film is "extremely powerful" and "tells the story of great female artists," while also portraying the "negotiations between being parents, wives and artists at the same time."

"The men's art is more appreciated," Mari says, pointing out that the women have "less exhibits, and less appreciation for their work."

The film also includes interviews with other artists, such as Riane Eisler, the author of "The Chalice and the Blade: Our History, Our Future;" Maura Reilly of the Sackler Center for Feminist Art-Brooklyn Museum; and the Guerilla Girls, famous feminist artists. Each additional artist adds her own opinions and views of women in the world of art.

The film's producer, Pamela Tanner Boll, won an Academy Award in 2005 for her film "Born into Brothels: The Kids of Calcutta's Red Light District."

"Who Does She Think She Is?" was shown this past spring in Amherst, where it was very well received.

After the screening, Mari commented that "we're hoping to have a discussion after the film by local artists. They can talk about their struggles." By doing this, the audience will have a means of interacting with people facing very similar issues to those they viewed in the film.

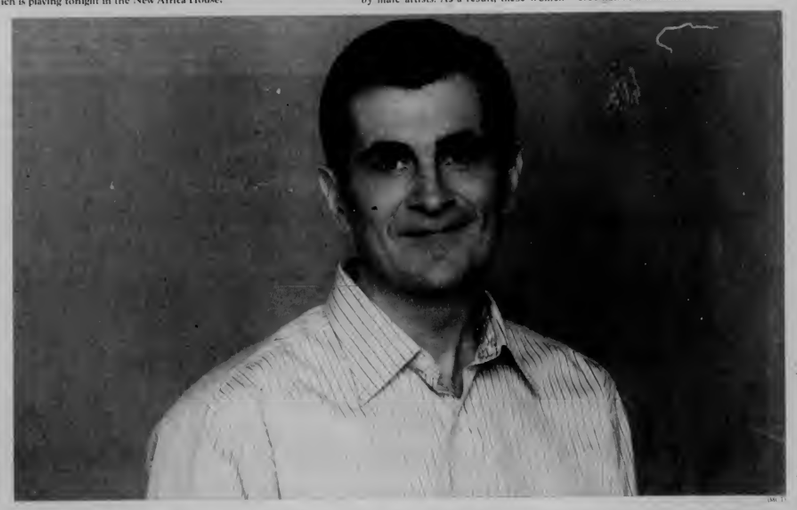
Julie Holbrook can be reached at jholbroo@student.umass.edu.

Old friends, new faces in fall TV lineup

By Luaine Lee
McClatchy-Tribune News Service

Actor Ty Burrell usually plays the menacing bad guy, threatening the good folk with all kinds of devious ploys. But in a coup of reverse casting Burrell reigns benign as the wanna-be "cool" dad in ABC's hilarious new comedy, "Modern Family."

"I played a lot of villains in film and my features lend themselves toward that, so I got turned down for a lot of leading man parts for me being menacing looking," he says in a quiet meeting room at a hotel here, not looking particularly menacing.



"If you knew me, I'm the biggest wimp that ever lived," he laughs.

"I played an evil corporal in 'Evolution,' a true jerk in the remake of 'Dawn of the Dead,' a really mean boss in 'In Good Company,' and an extremely sleazy anchorman in a movie coming out next spring called 'Morning Glory.'"

Revenge is wreaked on him in "Morning Glory." He gets fired. "I always play the mean guy who gets fired," says Burrell, 42, who admits he's been fired himself, but not for any of the above transgressions.

"I was fired from a table-waiting job. I was so bad at my job and the bosses were so nice. There was a time when I couldn't cover for somebody else's shift. And I think it dawned on them: 'If he

See FALL SHOWS on page 6

Ty Burrell plays a father of three in ABC's new comedy, "Modern Family." Other headlining fall sitcoms include ABC's "Cougar Town" and Fox's "Dollhouse," though neither are new to the silver screen this fall.

Season's sitcoms make a splash can't even cover somebody else's shift why are we keeping him? And he's a horrible waiter.' They were like, 'Well, we'll let you know when you're on the schedule again.' It was the beginning of a lot of rejection."

FALL SHOWS from page 5

Rejection comes with the territory of acting. "Even to this day I don't think I'm a quote-unquote confident actor," he says. "And I've been trying to get laughs since I was 3. I am a needy extrovert. That's the formula to one type of comic actor."

"I remember being at a dinner party with my parents and a bunch of friends. I was 4. My aunt was talking about being in a toilet stall next to somebody who kept pulling and pulling the toilet paper and I said, 'Well, maybe there was a prize at the end of it.' The table laughed and I feel like that is still the moment I've been chasing desperately my whole life. It was like a love-bath."

Fans may remember his slender face and dark black hair from sitcoms "Out of Practice" and "Back to You," which he did most recently with Kelsey Grammer, or as Doc Samson in "The Incredible Hulk."

"I've enjoyed all kinds of acting in my adult life. I got started late. At the heart of the silliness of this character is the reason I ever got into acting in the first place. I ended up doing a lot of drama early on. Most of my parts were very dramatic parts. It's not that I didn't enjoy them but since I started comedy, I've just felt more at home. I will continue to enjoy doing dramatic stuff but I get so much joy out of this work that doesn't need to be over thought. It's like playing baseball or gardening – whatever you do naturally."

Doing things naturally is really Burrell's way. A year ago he and his wife, Holly, moved to Utah. "Because she has family there and so we just really enjoyed being outside and bike rides, fishing, gardening. So far it's been OK for the career; it just means more of an effort. Still working out the kinks."

About Holly, he says, "She's just an unconditional love machine, so it's been an incredible and an ongoing lesson. She'd never admit to it. She was an actress when we met, but she's a pastry chef. It's a stream of bowls and spatulas for me to clean off with my mouth."

He and Holly are starting a family and family has been critical in Burrell's life. Losing his dad, a social worker, when Ty was 21 changed him. "He never saw me act," he says softly.

"It's funny how those things are, how a crisis can also be an opportunity. I think I was a little bit off-track. It was the worst time of my life, but it churned things up and out of that fertile soil I figured out some ideas about what I wanted to do with my life."

Before he started acting, he says, he was doing absolutely nothing. "I was totally rudderless. And it's funny because I had dropped out of school and was basically on my way to becoming an expert Slurpie-puller at the 7-Eleven, and that's when my dad got sick. And then when my dad passed away, two months after he passed away, I walked into a graduate acting Shakespeare class and by the end of the day, I'd changed my major."

There has been a rumbling that Fox's shows "Bones" and "Lie to Me" will have a cross-pollination known as a "crossover" show, where characters from both are woven into one drama. But Hart Hanson, executive producer of "Bones," says it's still a consummation devoutly to be wished.

"It's slightly better than rumor and it's much less than a fact. I think the fact that here we are going into our fifth season, we're a machine in a way in terms of generating stories and getting scripts out and 'Lie to Me' is still they've got a new show runner. It's a lot harder for them. In a way we're waiting to see if 'Lie to Me' is able to do that."

The surprise here is that Shawn Ryan (executive producer of "The Shield") will tote his arsenal over to the soundstage to retool "Lie to Me," which was sputtering last season. Star Tim Roth spent half his time mumbling his lines, the scripts went nowhere and the show's pace resembled cooling magma. Ryan is working with "Lie to Me's" executive producer Samuel Baum.

"I came out and helped out a little bit on the last couple episodes as a favor to the studio," says Ryan. "I didn't really know Sam, but I had a couple of my old 'Shield' writers who were over there, and I thought, 'Well, that will be cool.' I enjoyed it. I got to meet Tim and the rest of the cast. I dug the show. 'The Unit' (also his show) was unceremoniously dumped by CBS, so I suddenly found myself with a little time. And I thought I could bring something to the show. I thought – it was something that excited me. In terms of what I think I might bring to it, I think I'm trying to push it a little bit more in a character direction, add a little bit of adrenaline to the show, but really sort of dig deep... It's an incredible cast. And I just want to get to know these characters better. And believe me, there's enough work on a TV show for both Sam and I."

Courtney Cox has finally found a funny show to follow her "Friends" tenure. ABC's "Cougar Town" is about a now-single woman in her '40s who feels she has to dive back into the swim again. That often means younger men. Cox, who is married to actor David Arquette, says she lives that in real life. "David is much younger than me. (Actually, seven years.) I think it's great to be a cougar if that's what they are called. I just don't know what the term is for a man who dates a younger woman."

"Dollhouse" is back on Fox, a turn of events that writer-creator Joss Whedon ("Buffy the Vampire Slayer") didn't expect. Last season's show featured a sexier turn, but Whedon says he wasn't urged to do that by the network.

"The network did not pressure us to have shower scenes in every episode, that just sort of happened naturally. But actually we haven't broken a story with a shower scene yet. We are a little disappointed in ourselves and we know we have let America down too.

"They were not pressuring us to make the show sexier or edgier. They were pressuring us to make the show safer basically. And easier to take and which is completely understandable on a perfectly reasonable agenda, it is just I'm not very good at that. So if there is something in the show that seems a little bit off or maybe a little bit racy, know that that was me. That was totally me and Andrew Chambliss. The other writers are all Mormons."

LMc '13

Various cookbooks are hitting the shelves, promoting vegetarian diets with simple recipes that fit college students' budgets.

Today's veggie-eaters create menus with college cooking kits

By Steve Petusevsky
Staff Health & Science Columnist

I've come in contact with lots of college kids. And I've learned that there are two distinct camps when it comes to how kids eat when they are away from home.

Young adults either try cooking for themselves, or they go out every night to eat fast food because it is cheap and easy. After all, most of them are on conservative budgets. But truth is, even light cooking will save kids money and allow them to eat more healthfully.

Looking at my son's credit card charges for a two-month period, I see that he eats fast food at least five nights a week. In his favor he tries to eat healthier fast foods, not just burgers, but he could do better.

However, there are reasons college kids don't cook. Even my daughter goes long periods without picking up a pot. That's because college kids often don't have the equipment they need to prepare easy meals. And they don't want to bother with clean up, share ingredients with roommates or take time to food shop.

So now that my kids are coming home for Spring Break, I plan to make a survival box for them to take back to school (not that I'm trying to rush them to leave, mind you).

Whether they use it is another thing. I create a college cooking kit that includes everything they will need except perishable ingredients. I think I've made it as simple as possible for them to prepare fresh, healthful meals at school.

Large camouflage plastic crates from a discount store hold the supplies and add a touch of humor. All they'll have to do is purchase a few perishables and they'll be able to make dinner in the dorm or apartment kitchen. Here's what I pack:

Nonstick grill pan. These are wonderful for cooking any protein, pan-grilling vegetables or even making great panini sandwiches with almost no oil.

3-quart saucepan with a lid. You can cook pasta, rice, grains or any vegetable and cleaning is no problem, unless stuff gets burned.

Extra-virgin olive oil. I tell my kids to limit butter and never eat margarine. I use this oil to cook just about everything. You don't have to buy a really expensive oil. A liter will last them a semester.

Olive oil spray. A can of it is good for keeping whatever you are cooking from sticking.

Pasta. There are a number of large companies making full lines of whole-grain pastas that bear no resemblance to the old chewy, dark brown wholewheat pasta.

One of my favorite brands is Heartland. Their whole-grain pasta is made with wheat, oats, rice and wheat bran and comes in a variety of shapes. It tastes great and is much better for you than semolina varieties.

Grains. I include couscous, which doesn't even need to be cooked (just reconstituted with boiling water).

Brown rice. You can buy the quick-cooking kind to help your kids save time. A few flavored rice blends that don't have high amounts of salt or any MSG are good too.

Cooking sauces. Most grocers and all natural food stores now carry jars of ethnic cooking sauces that are really good. They come in Indian, Mexican and other varieties that can be added to any protein and simmered for great results.

Spice mills. Sea salt, peppercorns and various spice blends like Tuscan, garlic pepper, lemon pepper and steakhouse are available ready-packed in spice grinders. Use them on tofu, pasta and pizza. They also make a simple salad come alive.

Canned black beans. Easy for kids to make by adding a few ingredients (hold the lard). Served with pasta or couscous, they provide a great-tasting and nutritious meal that's really cheap.

Chipotle chili in adobo. This is for kids who like spicy foods. Sold in cans, these are great in dips, rice, pasta and beans.

Above are a couple of recipes to tuck into the box along with the ingredients. Any college kid can make them, and you might enjoy them too. Even if they get adventurous and cook just once a week, it's worth it.

SPICY BLACK BEANS WITH LIME AND CILANTRO

If there's no place to chop onions, most supermarkets carry plastic containers of diced onions. Or substitute minced garlic, which can be purchased in jars. Cilantro and most other herbs, along with garlic, ginger and hot chili peppers can be purchased pureed in tubes. I use them when time starved. You can find them in the produce sections of most markets. Serve over rice, pasta or couscous. Or this back bean mixture can be drained and used as a burrito stuffing or rolled inside a tortilla with cheese.

1 small onion, chopped
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 (29-ounce) can black beans with liquid
1 chipotle chili in adobo from a can, minced
Juice of 1 fresh lime
1\2 cup chopped cilantro

Spray a 3-quart saucepan with olive oil cooking spray and heat over medium heat. Add the onions and garlic and saute 1 minute. Add the beans with liquid, bring to a boil, reduce heat and simmer 15 minutes. Add the chili, lime juice and cilantro and heat through. Makes 3 to 4 servings.

Per serving: 187 calories, 8 percent calories from fat, 2 grams total fat, .01 gram saturated fat, no cholesterol, 30 grams carbohydrates, 12 grams total fiber, 1 gram total sugars, 18 grams net carbs, 11 grams protein, 726 milligrams sodium.

WHOLE-GRAIN PASTA WITH "BURNT" ONIONS AND SPINACH

The onion is really caramelized, but I'm told it's often stretched to a burnt brown. Some of the new whole-grain pastas are very flavorful and loaded with fiber and nutrients, something that kids need desperately. If spinach doesn't cut it with your kids, omit it or substitute any favorite chopped vegetable like broccoli. I usually use baby spinach leaves, which are tender and small.

1 (12-ounce) box whole grain pasta
1 tablespoon extra-virgin olive oil
1 medium onion, chopped
2 cups whole baby spinach leaves
1\2 cup shredded parmesan or Romano cheese

Cook pasta according to package directions; drain and set aside.

Heat oil in a large saute pan over medium heat and add onions. Cook without stirring about 2 minutes until they begin to brown. Once the onions are golden begin to stir occasionally until they become a deep brown color. Add the cooked pasta to the onions along with the spinach leaves. Combine well until the spinach wilts. Sprinkle cheese over the top before serving. Makes 3 to 4 servings.

Per serving: 366 calories, 17 percent calories from fat, 7 grams total fat, 2 grams saturated fat, 5 milligrams cholesterol, 66 grams carbohydrates, 8 grams total fiber, 4 grams total sugars, 58 grams net carbs, 16 grams protein, 153 milligrams sodium.

University Health Services • Mental Health Services
Support and Therapy Group Meetings • Fall, 2009

RELAXATION SKILLS TRAINING
Mondays, 3:30 – 5 p.m.
beginning Oct. 19
A three-session workshop to learn and practice relaxation techniques in a group setting. Attendance at all sessions expected.

MANAGING DEPRESSION
Tuesdays, 4 – 5:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 13
A three-session workshop on managing depression symptoms and developing healthy coping skills.

EXPERIENTIAL PSYCHOTHERAPY GROUP FOR GRADUATE STUDENTS
Tuesdays, 7 – 8:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 6
Focusing on self-exploration in a safe atmosphere.

LIVING WITH LOSS
Wednesdays, 4:30 – 5:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 7
A support group for undergraduate and graduate students dealing with the loss of someone close to them.

MINDFULNESS-BASED STRESS REDUCTION (MBSR)
Mondays, 5 – 6:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 5
An experiential ten-session workshop aimed at improving self-awareness, lowering stress and enhancing health and wellbeing. Open enrollment throughout the semester.

EXPERIENTIAL PSYCHOTHERAPY GROUP FOR UNDERGRADUATE STUDENTS
Thursdays, 3:30 – 5 p.m.
beginning Oct. 8
Focusing on self-exploration in a safe atmosphere.

Pre-registration is required for all groups. To register, or for more information, call (413) 545-2337 or come to Mental Health Services, 127 Hills North, Monday – Friday, 8 a.m. – 5 p.m.

UMassAmherst

Pack your bags
Grab your passport
Experience the world

The Ernst & Young Global Student Exchange Program

New challenges. Global mindset. Opportunities to grow. The Ernst & Young Global Student Exchange Program offers you all this and more. Not just at your home office location, but abroad as well. From day one, you'll collaborate with people of diverse backgrounds – both professionally and culturally. And you'll gain invaluable international exposure. With Ernst & Young, there's no limit to what you can achieve.

A select number of global internship opportunities and locations are available. See an Ernst & Young recruiter or visit ey.com/us/globalstudents for details.

ERNST & YOUNG
Quality In Everything We Do

MATTHEW HOSKIN/DAILY COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Mark Dangleis brings the ball up during yesterday's win against Colgate. The Minutemen have won three straight games dating back to their first win on Sept. 19 against Northeastern.

Koch praises starter's poise

FRESHMAN from page 10

and Andrew Henshaw make up a consistent backfield that has shut out opponents in its past four contests, and with goalkeepers Chris Piekos and Shane Curran-Hays forming a sturdy tandem, the Minutemen are continuing to get better both offensively and defensively.

Part of that comes with Skrajewski's maturity and knack for the game, as he was named to the Delaware first team all-state while attending the Salesianum School.

In Tuesdays 3-0 win over Colgate, he scored his first collegiate goal against the Raiders, playing a major impact on both the offensive and defensive fronts.

"It feels awesome [to score my first career goal], because there was really no pressure to score," Skrajewski said. "I am a defender. I go in for corners, but I just cleaned up the box, so it felt good."

Skrajewski scored when forward Mark DeSantis laced a corner kick that was deflected by the Raiders goalkeeper, and went right to Andrew Henshaw. Henshaw collected the ball, drifting it to Skrajewski for the one-time score.

"He's done a great job in the back for us, to come in as a freshman and start is not an easy thing to do, especially in the back," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "It hasn't fazed him, he has handled it very well, and when it's a 50-50 ball, he's going to win it, and he does it as well as anybody."

Skrajewski had two shots against Northeastern back on Sept. 19, but it was midfielder Ben Arikian who scored the lone goal in the 1-0 victory. Since that game, the Minutemen have outscored opponents, 8-0, which shows how UMass has been developing its offensive game.

The win against Colgate was Koch's 200th career win as the coach of the Minutemen, while UMass is currently riding a five-game unbeaten streak.

David Brinch can be reached at dbrinch@student.umass.edu

Potts improving with move to backfield

F. HOCKEY from page 10

Alongside Kelly, Powers and Cher King, she brings speed to an already quick forward line. The four of them account for 13 of the Minutewomen's 23 goals this season.

POTTS' GAME OPENING UP

The move from midfield to backfield could've been the key to opening up the true potential of the scoring threat that is Makaela Potts.

Midway through the season, Potts' four goals tie a career high for the Sydney, Australia native.

Not only has she doubled her previous career-goal total, but she's done the same to her career assists total with six this season and nine as a Minutewoman.

Potts took over the game against the Huskies with two assists in addition to her goal. She again had a multi-assist game when the Minutewomen attacked Quinnipiac for seven goals. Potts fed three different players for scores.

Her six assists lead the team and ties her with La Salle's Beth Carey for most in the A-10.

As a team, UMass and West Chester both lead the A-10 with 19 assists but the Minutewomen have a slight edge in assists per-game with just over two.

STEADILY RISING

With two wins this past weekend, the Minutewomen earned a single-digit ranking for the first time since 2000 when UMass climbed as high as No. 7 in the rankings.

The Minutewomen have yet to face their hardest test of the regular season – Syracuse and No. 5 Connecticut await UMass on consecutive weekends.

In four of its nine games this season, the Huskies (9-0) beat opponents by four goals or more.

Both Orange and UConn feature a player with eight or more goals this season. The Huskies and Syracuse have 39 and 29 goals this season, respectively, compared to UMass' 23.

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu

Temple's Witmer takes A-10 honors

By Herb Scribner
Collegian Correspondent

On Sept. 21, sophomore Tyler Witmer of the Temple men's soccer team was named Atlantic 10 Player of the Week. The Owls star J.T. Noone was later given the Philadelphia Soccer Six Co-Player of the Week award, giving Temple two honors in a span of a week.

The award was attained by Witmer last weekend, where he was on an offensive tear. He scored two goals in the Owl's 3-2 loss to Navy, as well as another goal in the Sept. 20 matches against Albany. Witmer leads Temple with four goals scored and also leads the team with shots taken (18).

Noone notched his first goal of the season on Sept. 28 against Penn, on a cross by Witmer. The goal scored by Noone was the first for the Owls in the game and helped Temple on its way to a 2-1 double overtime victory. Scoring is not everything for senior Noone, as he leads Temple and the A-10 in assists (5) and assists per game (.62).

DUKES BLANK BUFFALO

Duquesne answered back from its shutout loss to Maryland by downing Buffalo 5-0 on Saturday.

The Dukes (4-3-1) had powerful offensive tactics from sophomore Tyler Tompkins – the A-10 Player of the Week for the week ending Sept. 27 – who had two goals and an assist in the match against the Bulls.

Tompkins, who is tied for the team lead in goals (3), fired his first shot in the second minute of the contest. The shot was blocked, but freshman Joshua Patterson capitalized on the rebound to score the first goal for the Dukes.

The goals that Tompkins would go on to score, however, were only eight minutes apart from each other (25', 33'). In the 55th minute, sophomore Dave Cassanelli put the final ball into the back of the net for Duquesne.

This was the first time since October 2003 that the Dukes scored five goals in a contest.

Last week, the Dukes were shutout by then-No. 4 Maryland, 5-0. Duquesne had only one shot on goal during this match, taken by freshman Joshua Patterson, who leads the league in game-winning goals (2).

REX LEADING 49ERS

Charlotte was able to win the Charlotte Nike Invitational tournament, after two wins over the weekend. Its first was a 4-0 shutout to Cal State Bakersfield, and a 4-2 pounding on Winthrop.

Jenning Rex scored his first two career goals on Sept. 18 in Charlotte's 4-0 victory over Winthrop. The two goals were enough for Rex to earn Rookie of the Week honors, and an assignment to the all-tournament team.

Rex's two goals were a quarter of the goals (8) scored by Charlotte (4-1-1) during the tournament and he also recorded an assist.

The future is looking bright for Rex, as he is already on the leader boards in the A-10. Rex ranks seventh in goals per game, with two.

Sophomore Evan James scored a goal in each of the tournament games. This display of offensive tenacity led to James being named the tournament's MVP.

James leads Charlotte in goals scored (4) and tied for assists (3) with forwards Luke Exley and Andres Cuero.

Not only is James showing dominance in the 49ers lineup, but also throughout the entire league. James is tied for third in goals scored through out the league with three.

Herb Scribner can be reached at hscribne@student.umass.edu

Raiders finish with 13 fouls

M. SOCCER from page 10

the 18-yard box, you're going to get in trouble."

Goalkeeper Chris Piekos (three saves) didn't have a whole lot of work to do on defense as the Maroon and White limited shots on goal for the Raiders. The shutout gives Piekos his third of the season dating back to the Sept. 11 draw against New Hampshire.

The Raiders, however, faced pressure the entire game, even when certain possessions seemed to be going their way.

With 17 minutes, 22 seconds left in the first half, midfielder Stuart Amick dribbled past a Colgate defender but found himself cornered between the defender and the end line. Amick took a shot that was deflected by a defender that appeared to be going out of bounds.

The junior rebounded the shot while keeping the ball inbounds, and found DeSantis on a cross, who headed the ball in from the left side. The goal gave DeSantis his third of the season and is now the team leader in goals scored.

Colgate switched goalkeepers at the half to Colin Prather, who helped his team hold UMass to one shot on goal, but the defense stayed intact with Piekos having his only save opportunity of the half come with nine minutes left in the game.

Although the Raiders could only get the ball towards Piekos's general direction a limited number of times, they found a few opportunities that forced the Minutemen to stay alert.

"At the end of the game, we gave them opportunities, which I didn't really feel like we should've [done]," Koch said.

UMass plays its first conference opponent of the season against Fordham at home on Saturday, although the game doesn't count as part of the Atlantic 10 schedule.

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill0@student.umass.edu

Do you have time to answer just one question?

IT ONLY TAKES A MINUTE TO BE A
MINUTEman Mentor

Exchange an email
I can't decide between two majors. What field would provide me the foundation to work in your industry?

Provide advice on job search approaches
Should I send a thank you note after my interview?

Chat over the phone
I am currently looking to transition to a career in your field. What skills and experience would be of value?

Offer suggestions on relevant coursework
These are my courses this semester. would you make any suggestions?

Review or critique resumes
Where should I put my internships experience?

Conduct informational interviews
Can I meet with someone in your research department?

Register now on MaroonCentral at UMassAlumni.com.

ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
UMassAlumni.com
800-456-UMASS
You were. You are. UMASS.

Come visit us at the Isenberg School of Mgmt. Career Fair

September 30
12 p.m. - 5 p.m.
Mullins Center

Your portfolio is on the rise.

No matter how bad the market gets, we're always investing in you. Because we're only as good as our next generation of innovators, GE invests $1 billion annually in our people and leadership development. Add to that our great benefits and tuition reimbursement, and you can see how much we'll value your personal development and contributions. So invest yourself in one of our opportunities in engineering, finance, manufacturing, marketing and sales, human resources or information technology – you'll build a personal brand that will see great returns in any economy.

imagination at work

ge.com/careers

UMass Amherst

ISENBERG

SCHOOL OF MANAGEMENT

Isenberg School of Management's Chase Career Center Presents

All Students Are Cordially Invited to Attend!!

[redacted]

Arena Floor:

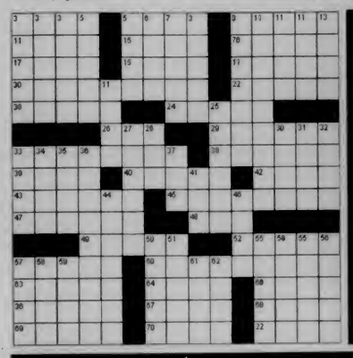
Acosta Sales and Marketing
AG Salesworks
Aldi
ARAMARK Corporation
Avery Dennison
Bank of New York Mellon
Berkshire Bank
Black & Decker
BlumShapiro
Buckeye International, Inc.
C&S Wholesale Grocers, Inc.
Caturano and Company, PC
Deloitte & Touche
DiCicco Gulman & Co.
Edelstein & Company LLP
Enterprise Rent-A-Car
Ercolini & Company, LLP
Eze Castle Software, LLC
FDIC
First Investors Corporation
FTI Consulting
Huron Consulting Group
Internal Revenue Service
John Hancock Financial Network-Boston Partners
KPMG LLP
LarsonAllen LLP
Lowe's Companies, Inc.
McGladrey & Pullen/RSM McGladrey
Medical Information Technology, Inc. (MEDITECH)
Millipore Corporation
Morris & Morris, P.C.
Northwestern Mutual Financial Network
Novogradac & Company LLP
O'Connor & Drew, P.C.
Parent, McLaughlin & Nangle
PeoplesBank
Pepsi Bottling Group
Rogers Corporation
Rucci, Bardaro & Barrett, PC
Ryder Systems, Inc.
Sherwin-Williams Company
SS&C Technologies, Inc.
State Street Corporation
Target Stores
The Hartford Financial Services Company
TJX Companies, Inc.
TTI Floorcare
Walgreens
Walter & Shuffain, PC
Wolf & Company, P.C.

Concourse Level:

Aerotek, Inc
Alexander, Aronson Finning & Co,. P.C.
Blinds To Go
CVS
EMC Corporation
Ernst & Young
General Electric
Goldman Sachs
Hanover Insurance Group
Kohl's Department Stores
Liberty Mutual
Macy's, Inc
MassMutual Financial Group
Naval Sea Systems Command
PricewaterhouseCoopers
Raytheon Company
Samet & Company, PC
TechTarget
UHY, LLP
United States Marine Corps
United Technologies Corp.

Helpful Hints:

1. Bring a supply of resumes with you to leave with the company representatives you meet.
2. Dress appropriately. This means tie and jacket for men, dress or blouse, skirt or pantsuit for women.
3. Speak with corporate representatives of interest to you and ask for a business card, if available.



For your convenience, there will be a van leaving Haigus Mall to the Mullins Center every 20 minutes from 11:45pm to 5:00pm.

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!
Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

CROSSWORD

ACROSS
1. Historical periods
5. Stone
9. Colorful parrot
14. A girl's toy
15. Wheel shaft
16. Make amends
17. Bright thought
18. A gas found in some lights
19. A simple seat
20. Sure thing
22. Floral leaf
23. ___ pole
24. Safe place
26. Before
29. Writer
33. Exist in a changeless situation
38. Mourn
39. A unit of pressure
40. A very light wood
42. Medicine bottle
43. Bury
45. At one time
47. Peyote
48. Coloring agent
49. Bowel cleasing
52. Increase
57. Reject
60. A baseman in baseball
63. Any habitation at a high altitude
64. State of mind
65. Mélange
66. A type of beer
67. False god
68. Manage
69. Lock of hair
70. Formally surrender
71. Tall woody plant

DOWN
1. Decree
2. Cowboy sport
3. Warming
4. Formerly, a writing tablet
5. Hindu princess
6. Beasts of burden
7. Fabric
8. Country in Africa
9. Massager
10. Heedful
11. Henhouse
12. Dwarf buffalo
13. Water source 21. Ends a prayer
25. Whim
27. Mob
28. Estimated time of arrival
30. Inheritor
31. Elliptical
32. Count upon
33. Flower stalk
34. Sound
35. Products of human creativity
36. Foodstuffs
37. Imp
41. Turf 44. Social deportment
46. No more than
50. Imitate
51. An electrode
53. In the air
54. Do-nothing
55. Parisian river
56. Chip away at
57. Sodium chloride
58. Brandy flavor
59. Encourage
61. What we eat
62. Doing nothing

"I can stand brute force, but brute reason is quite unbearable. There is something unfair about its use. It is hitting below the intellect."
-Oscar Wilde

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You should ask questions if your roommate's side of the room looks like Michael Jackson's inner sanctum.

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Keep your cell phone off when Hugh Jackman is in character, or else he'll turn all "Snikt! Bub" on you.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
The gap between the rich and the poor is filled with tattered Payless shoes.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
Looking for volunteer work? Collect funds for the "Lazy Assistant Comix Editor wants a Segway" foundation.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Sexile-ing your roommate doesn't require that you degrade them on the way out. Sicko.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
"Wait till you see my OH" is not a reliable pick up line.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Fight fall allergies Schwarzenegger-style!

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Taco Bell is like the cheap hooker pleasure for the soul. Be careful – you might catch something.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Some things never change, which is why Britney Spears is still singing about threesomes.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
If news travels through the grapevine, then gossip must travel through a thornbush.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Help your stressed out sweetie by giving them a stress ball made to look like your dome-piece.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
If HGTV causes you heart palpatations, then pastels could cause you seizures.

SUDOKU

1	4			8	9		5
				6	1	9
		6		3		1
			9	4	3
		3						7
6		2			8
						7
7				9			6	8
	5							3

EVERY WEDNESDAY:
Poker Night
EVERY THURSDAY:
Promo & Trivia Night
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 1ST:
Lazer 99.3 ThirstyThursday
Sponsored by New Castle
EVERYDAY:
$1.00 Drafts!
Hampshire Mall
Across from Cinemark
413-549-0077
FREE Delivery
ARIZONA PIZZA

CLASSIFIEDS

EMPLOYMENT

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162.

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

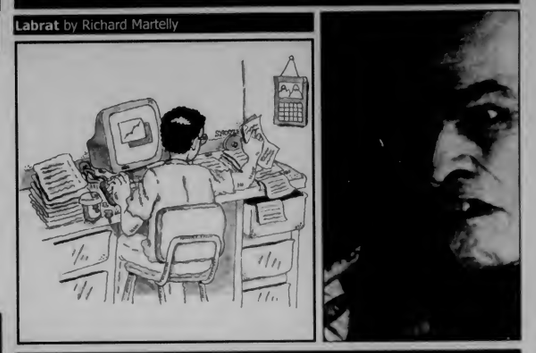
RESEARCH STUDY

Join a Research study conducted through the UMass Communication Department! Watch 80 mins of T.V. News, answer survey questions, and earn up to $10 for your time! Contact Lisa Wortman at Lisadenice@gmail.com to sign up!

SPRING BREAK 2010

Spring Break 2010 sell trips, earn cash, and go free! Call for group discounts. Best prices guaranteed! Info/reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

ANNOUNCEMENTS

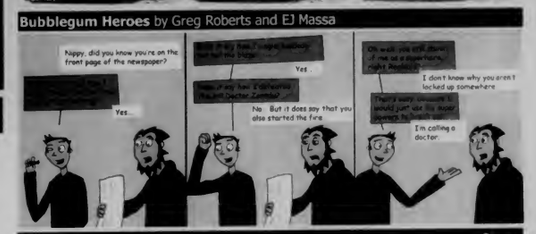


Montreal Party Weekends From $99 Includes Hotel, Bus, and Clubs montre-alexpress.net (781)979-9001

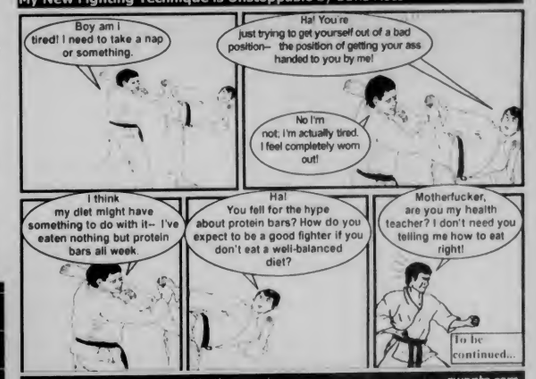
GUITAR TEACHER

Professional Electric Guitar Teacher & Performer; Specializing in Jazz, Improv. Music Theory & Technique. Call (413)665-8794

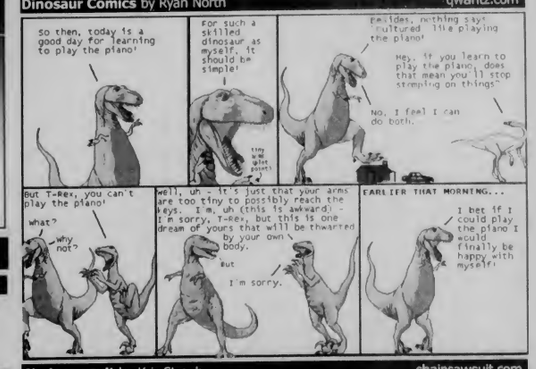
COMICS



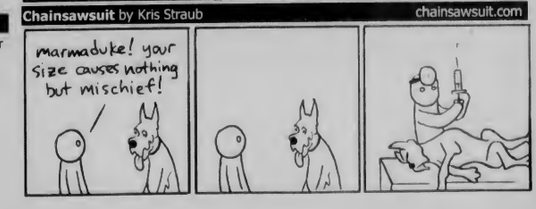
Labrat by Richard Martelly



Wondermark by David Malki! wondermark.com



Bubblegum Heroes by Greg Roberts and EJ Massa



My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees mnftiu.cc

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North qwantz.com

Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub chainsawsuit.com

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 2009 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

MATTHEW HARRISON — COLLEGIAN

Forward Mark DeSantis records the Minutemen's third goal and tallies his third of the season. The Minutemen defeated Colgate, 3–0, and will face conference opponent Fordham on Saturday.

UMass defeats Colgate, 3–0

Forward DeSantis scores third goal of season in UM victory

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's soccer team scored all it needed to secure the victory in the first 15 minutes of play.

Just in case that wasn't enough, the Minutemen (3-1-3) scored two more just in the first half on their way to a 3-0 victory over Colgate on Tuesday. The win gave UMass a three-game winning streak, all of which have been shutouts, with one game left on the non-conference schedule.

UMass	3
Colgate	0

Freshman Dominic Skrajewski scored the first goal after forward Mark DeSantis took a corner kick that bent towards the left. Goalkeeper Max Krasilovsky-Revell deflected the ball into the possession of defender Andrew Henshaw.

The sophomore then tapped the ball over to the left and Skrajewski got a shot off the left post inside the goal box.

The Minutemen didn't have to wait much later for their second goal of the game. Five minutes later, the Raiders (4-4-0) fouled DeSantis inside the box, allowing left-footed Bryant Craft to drain a penalty kick to give them a 2-0 lead.

"We put the ball away in the first half well," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "They weren't great goals, but they were goals."

Fouls proved costly for Colgate as they gave the Minutemen several opportunities in the goal and kept the pressure on the defense throughout the game. The Raiders finished with 13 fouls, seven of those coming in the first half.

On one of the fouls, midfielder Mike Garzi tripped midfielder Tyler Brown after he stole the ball away just outside of the box, which caused Garzi to pick up the game's only yellow card.

Playing physical teams is nothing new for UMass. Three of the Minutemen's previous opponents (Boston University, Hartford and Vermont) fouled more times than the Raiders.

But this time, UMass made the most of the penalties.

"[The penalty kick] was a nice momentum builder for us because we've been having those stops," Koch said. "If you foul us around

See M. SOCCER on page 7

Freshman makes early impact

Skrajewski starts for crowded defense, helping on offense

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For most freshmen, playing collegiate soccer is an adjustment that takes time and energy in order for a player to develop. A lot of rookies hardly see the field their first year, sitting behind more experienced players in order to learn the system.

But for freshman Dominic Skrajewski of the Massachusetts soccer team, this is not the case, as the defender has been beneficial for the Minutemen on both sides of the ball in his first year in Amherst.

"It feels great, I mean, I came in here, not really expecting this, but I have been working hard, and glad to get the chance, and to take advantage of it," Skrajewski said.

Skrajewski played in all seven games in 2009, starting in six, and has made his presence known even in a crowded backfield that is loaded with talent.

A little more than half of the Minutemen roster is filled with returning players, with eight, including Skrajewski, freshmen members. Four sophomores play defense, with three starting and one who contributes regularly.

The backfield is filled with loads of underclassmen talent that has put the Minutemen on their backs, especially when the team was not producing offensively earlier in the season.

Through its first four games, the Minutemen generated just two goals, while tying Boston University, New Hampshire and Vermont in double overtime.

UMass fell to Hartford, 2-0, on Sept. 5.

David Key, Mark Dangleis

See FRESHMAN on page 7

Back Makaela Potts tries to get past a defender in a game last year. She was last week's Player of the Week.

Kelly, Charochak earn honors in conference

Forwards combine for 6 goals in last 4 games

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Forwards Katie Kelly and Kara Charochak earned Atlantic 10 Conference honors for their play this past weekend. Kelly earned A-10 Player of the Week honors and Charochak earned Rookie of the Week honors.

UM Field Hockey

In their last four games, the No. 9 Minutewomen (7-2) scored 14 goals (3.5 per game), with Kelly and Charochak combining for six of them.

Kelly is the third University of Massachusetts player in as many weeks to earn A-10 Player of the Week. Goalkeeper Alesha Widdall earned the distinction on Sept. 14 and defender Makaela Potts received the honor last week.

The junior captain scored three goals this past weekend against Vermont (1-8) and Quinnipiac (1-6), including the game-winner in the 52nd minute against the Catamounts. She leads the Minutewomen with six goals including two game-winners. Kelly is a dynamic scorer who scored 11 goals (three game-winners) with five assists last season, despite missing three games due to injury.

Kelly's strong play against non-conference opponents in 2008 (seven goals, four assists) bodes well for a UMass team that still has four non-conference games to play, including three on the road. The Minutewomen are 4-0 away from Garber Field this season and a tough Syracuse team awaits them in New York this Saturday.

The No. 6 Orange's (9-1) only loss came at home to No. 7 Princeton, and UMass looks to capitalize on that this weekend.

Charochak leads all rookies with three goals this season. Charochak's elevated play of late prompted UMass coach Justine Sowry to insert her into the starting lineup for both of UMass' last two games. Freshman Nicole Cordero and senior Jill Powers each played reserve roles in one game this weekend to make room for Charochak in the starting lineup.

See F. HOCKEY on page 7

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

Junior and Player of the Week Katie Kelly battles for possession of the ball during a game last year.

Spiders nearing .500 before A-10 schedule

Forward Peterson leading UR with 5 goals in last 3 games

BY DANIEL GIGLIOTTI
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Richmond field hockey team is making strides in the right direction as they inch closer to .500 to start the season in non-conference play. The team started the season alternating two-game winning and losing streaks, playing top-tier opponents, and now looks to have gotten some rhythm and momentum as they move into conference play.

The Spiders (4-5) were the victims of a difficult schedule during their first six games, suffering four losses at the hands of teams once ranked in the polls. They never seemed to play poorly, either, as they managed to score goals in each of their losses and only lost one game during that span by more than one goal.

A-10 Field Hockey

Richmond won its only game this past week, taking care of William & Mary, 3-1, last Wednesday, and Spider's coach Gina Lucido was pleased with their production. In an interview after last week's win, she said how the strong performance was well-needed in order to prove something to themselves. She said that it was a huge day and made note of their relaxed play, something that the Spiders have been lacking.

"They all were enjoying themselves, playing loose and not thinking about [the game]," Lucido said to Richmondspiders.com.

Forward Katelin Peterson has been the key to their success offensively, scoring five goals in the past three games including three in a (7-0) rout over Monmouth on Sept. 19 and two last Wednesday against the Tribe. Peterson has been especially accurate in her shooting this season, scoring on 43 percent of her shots. She is tied for third in the A-10 in goals scored (6).

ST. LOUIS TO REMATCH BEARS

Everyone likes to see a familiar face, except for Saint Louis (1-7) who faces an opponent tomorrow that typified their season woes during their last match on Sept. 7.

Missouri State (3-7) enjoyed a one-sided affair the last time they took the field with the Billikens at home. They rattled in seven unanswered goals on their opponents, outshooting them by 20 in the process (26-6).

The Billikens have been a model of futility this season, scoring in only two of their eight games including a total of six goals on the season (.75 goals per game). When Saint Louis has managed to get shots on goal, they have been accurate (70 percent shots on goal), however, they have failed to make enough passes at the net, finding themselves outshot 178-49.

Of course, any offensive push begins with defensive stops, and the Billikens have had a tough time stopping anyone this season. They give up 6.38 goals per game (51 total goals).

One bright spot has been goalie Alex LaBarge, who has played solid since relieving goalkeeper Katherine Deem six games into the season. LaBarge has saved 64 percent of the shots put on goal, including a total of 32 saves in her three games.

The game will be played at the Anheuser-Busch Center in St. Louis, Mo., which could bode well for the home team. The Billikens have spent a lot of time away from home, playing six of their eight games this season on the road and a little home-cooking could do them well. They almost mustered a win in their last home game registering three goals, coming up just short in an overtime loss against Bellarmine, 4-3.

In its five games on the road, Missouri State has yet to pull out one win on the road thus far, being outscored 21-8.

COURTESY OF RICHMOND MEDIA RELATIONS

Back Sarah Blythe-Wood tries to regain posession of the ball in a game against Monmouth. The Spiders (4–5) defeated the Hawks, 7–0, on Sept. 19 and recently defeated William & Mary, 3–1.

OWLS, RAMS SKIDDING

After promising starts to the season, West Chester and Temple are on five-game skids with conference play quickly approaching.

The Golden Rams (5-5) have fallen to a .500 record after losing the 29th annual Eleanor Snell Cup to their rival Ursinus on Sunday. After starting the season 5-0 and scoring five goals per game, West Chester has been outscored 21-2 on the losing streak, including three shutouts. Against tough opponents in No. 2 North Carolina and Rider University (8-0), they could barely muster a shot, managing only five in the two games. In a game against Penn State on Sept. 20, they were outshot 29-1. Over the five-game span, they have been outshot by a total of 73, a discrepancy of 14.6 shots per game.

West Chester could use the help of its leading scorer, freshman Melissa LeNoir, who stands second in the A-10 in both points scored (17) and goals scored (7). The forward has been unable to get anything going in the past five games (0 goals, 0 assists, 9 shots).

The Owls have faced similar adversity lately, dropping three games in the past week. Since their losing streak started on Sept. 18, they have scored two goals, one in each of their past two games. On the season, they have scored 1.18 goals per game.

They have run into an unfavorable schedule as their foes this week shared a combined record of 19-7. Temple's three losses earlier in the season were no easier, as they faced No. 5 Connecticut, No. 19 Michigan and an undefeated Rider team. Four of their last five games were played on the road, where the Owls are 1-5.

Temple hopes to get off the snide at home on Friday against Stanford. West Chester will have its last non-conference game at home against Lock Haven on Sunday.

Daniel Gigliotti can be reached at dgigliot@student.umass.edu.

OCTOBER

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

HIGH: 58 LOW: 39 | www.DailyCollegian.com | THURSDAY, OCTOBER 1, 2009

SGA announces election winners

Does not ratify results, will meet tomorrow

By Sam Butterfield
Collegian Staff

While the Student Government Association (SGA) announced its 2009 general election results Wednesday, welcoming its senator-elects to its first meeting Wednesday night at campus center, several lingering issues kept the results from being ratified. Both referenda on the ballot passed heavily, with question two, concerning moving SGA elections voting online, sponsored by Derek Khanna, receiving 1176 "yes" votes and 270 "no" votes. However, due to poor wording of the question, SGA speaker Modesto Montero told the Daily Collegian commuter senator-elect Khanna will withdraw the referendum Thursday, before the election results are ratified, which Montero said he strongly suspects will happen.

"If it's being taken out completely is something we'll decide as we meet in the next couple weeks," Montero said of the referendum.

The SGA's Coordinating Council will meet tomorrow to ratify the results, which they were unable to do today because of one tie, which Montero said they hoped the two candidates involved would resolve through one stepping down. The Council will also debate how to address the online elections question, as Montero said the SGA supports moving elections online but decided this referendum would not be how that issue is handled.

Khanna says he did not feel the language of the referendum was misleading and only agreed to withdraw it when he was told the entire election would be thrown out.

"I did not agree with Modesto," Khanna said.

"After being informed that the entire election would be thrown out, I decided I could not in good conscience be the reason behind this clear partisan political move by the Coordinating Council," he said.

Referendum question one, which would create a waive-able $1 fee per student per semester to support the UMass Independent Film Production Club, an RSO which writes and produces student made films, also easily passed, receiving 975 votes of "yes" and 425 "no" votes.

In the senate elections, Southwest South saw the largest turnout. Ben Johnson won the most votes of any individual candidate, receiving 204. Daniel Stratford was a close second, at 203. From there, Catie Warren took third, getting 195 votes. Following her were Elie Feinstein, with 161 votes, Kimberly Garber, at 151, and Matthew Carr, who received 136.

Southwest North also saw solid participation, as Stephanie Rocha led the field with 172 votes. Erica Nyer was second, at 166, with Brandon Tower third at 162 and Leanne Brown taking 150 votes.

The Central senate will include Patrick Watson, who led all Central candidates with 154 votes, Kyle Howard, who was second, with 141, Andrew C. Prowten, with 123, and close runner up Michelle Sudan, who got 122 votes.

Orchard Hill's three representatives will be Jared

See SGA on page 3

SGA General Election Winners

Central Senate

Kyle Howard
Patrick Watson
Andrew C. Prowten
Michelle Sudan

Commuter Senate

Benjamin Levine
Melissa Sandefur
William Cody
Amanda Justino
Charlie Felder
Chelsea Aquino
Josh Davidson
Tikaan Galbreath
Rudy Mabonetre
Tyler Langlais
Eric Magazu
Scott Aldrich Holmes
Andrew Berg
Azeen Khanmalek
Derek Khanna
Jeremy Rumeld

Northeast Senate

Melissa Urban
Rafael Medina
Chantel James

North Senate

Andrew Dawson
Prateek Katti

Orchard Hill Senate

Misbah Anwar
Nicholas Barton
Jared Rose

Southwest South Senate

Catie Warren
Ben Johnson
Matthew Carr
Daniel Stratford
Elie Feinstein
Kimberly Garber

Southwest North Senate

Leanne Brown
Stephanie Rocha
Brandon Tower
Erica Nyer

Sylvan Senate

Ron Aylward
Danilo Sena

Sylvan Lt. Governor

Michael O'Conner

Ballot Initiatives

Question #1: New $1 fee for an independent student film RSO
yes (975) / no (425)

Question #2: Allow SGA voting to move online
yes (1126)* / no (270)

*Question #2 is not yet ratified by the SGA

Gone in 60 seconds: Two students arrested in theft of UM vehicle

By Michelle Williams
Collegian Staff

On Tuesday, September 22, 2009, two University of Massachusetts students were arrested on numerous charges including larceny of university property.

Matthew Cody Burgess, 19 of Cohasset, Mass., was arrested for the larceny of a vehicle and disorderly conduct, and Edward F. Wolfersdorf, 20, East Quogue, NY was arrested for the larceny of a vehicle, disorderly conduct, destruction of over $250 dollars worth of property, leaving the scene of property damage, and leaving the scene of personal injury.

The two students stole a yellow 2002 Global Electric Motorcar from the Physical Plant at 360 Campus Center Way.

According to Deputy Chief Patrick Archibald, there is minimal security placed on the Global Electric Motorcars which are only a little over eight feet in length and about four-and-a-half feet in width, and when the emergency brake is not in place, the motorcars are easily pushed up the ramp of the Physical Plant.

The car was driven down Orchard Hill into the metal guardrail along the New Africa House at 180 Infirmary Way.

The yellow GE Motorcar was totaled and the damaged guardrail was repaired Tuesday. Though damage estimates were not released by press time, the cost of a new GEM car is approximately $8,400. Both have been charged with larceny of a vehicle, and as the driver, Wolfersdorf was charged with destruction of over $250 worth of property.

After crashing the car, both students fled the scene bruised and bleeding. Both went back to their rooms. When found by the UMass Police Department, both refused medical treatment for their minor injuries.

The Global Electric Motorcar was towed by Ernie's Towing in Amherst.

Ernie's Towing's driver was perplexed as to why the students would steal what is essentially a high-powered golf cart.

"It was hard to imagine why the boys would believe it was a good idea to steal that car. It smashed like a soda can when it hit the railing," he said.

On Burgess' Facebook page, he set his status to "Matthew Burgess is [expletive deleted]..."

See BUSTED on page 3

COURTESY WIKIMEDIA COMMONS

An example of an Global Electric Motorcar that was stolen from Physical Plant and crashed. Two University of Massachusetts students were arrested stemming from the case.

Unequal on the easel?

Everywoman's Club screens documentary

By Andres Moral
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Everywoman's Center and the Women of Color Leadership Network presented the documentary, "Who Does She Think She Is?" in the Augusta Savage Gallery of the New Africa House last night. The film, which was produced by Academy Award-winning filmmakers Pamela Tanner Bonner and Nancy C. Kennedy, tackles the issue of gender inequality in the art world. The film takes examples from the lives of five very different women living as artists in an art market that still favors men over women in overwhelming measures.

A discussion followed the conclusion of the film, drawing on many of the viewpoints from the predominantly female audience that numbered over 60. Prior to the showing of the film, much of the audience had claimed to identify as artists – a fact that became more important as the post screening-talks began.

"The statistics are still pretty grim," said Sandy Mandel of the Everywoman's Center prior to the screening. Mandel pointed out that while the percentage of women in art school as opposed to men is 58% to 42%, "98% of the people that are in the art galleries are men and the vast majority of them are white."

Following the screening, Anne LaPrade Seuthe, director of Hamden and Central Art Galleries on campus, opened up a discussion for the audience members to share their thoughts on the ideas presented by the film.

"I'm probably the worst person who identifies as an artist to lead this discussion or to open this, because I've always felt that being labeled a woman artist was unnecessary," said LaPrade Seuthe. "It was a way of ghettoizing an artist. I feel the same way about calling an artist a black artist or a Puerto Rican artist or an African artist or a Chinese artist."

"As a gallery director, I think it's difficult for any artist to get a show," continued LaPrade Seuthe. "For any artist; male, female, transgender, what have you, to make money from their artwork, regardless of the degree of professionalism that they bring to it. Whether they are in the studio every single day, whether they have no other commitments, whether they have family support, financial support. It's a very challenging field so there are different ways of looking at rewards."

Cynthia Constantina, introduced as someone "considered a very successful artist" by her peers, responded to the audience's discussion.

"I remember my epiphany in realizing there was a problem when I was in art school at UMass in the 80's," said Constantina. "People said that women had just as much influence. It's shocking that there has been so little progress since the 80's."

"I do come out of here knowing a little bit more and I enjoyed seeing some of that work that I had not known about," continued Constantina, "but it's such a complex issue that my head is in a muddle."

"I thought it had some interesting things to say about creativity and the link between place and nature I liked that aspect," said visiting scholar Janet Worthkrushan. "I think it helps to show some of the issues common to women in a lot of different endeavors just by virtue of their position in the culture. And I teach sociology in women's studies. I would use it in my classroom. I think it would be a good film to help students understand."

Hind Mari of the Women of Color Leadership Network was there in part to also promote her group's event, "Body Politics."

The program, according to Mari, is "a whole year process where women of color get together to talk about their stories, have discussions, write, do theater work and then in the spring we have a production that's free and open to the public." Following an impressive series of performances last spring, Mari plans to exhibit an "abbreviated show," which "will be seen tomorrow in Hampshire college, the next week in Smith, the week after in Amherst, and the week after in Mount Holyoke."

As to the future accessibility to the movie shown last night, Mandel noted that the Everywoman's Center now owns the film, and if someone were interested in having access to the film they can contact her directly.

"It's unusual for women to have an opportunity to also talk about these issues," Mandel added, "which is why you could hear the hunger here and just now there was like this cacophony of people."

"There are not a lot of outlets and to have your reality validated is very uplifting," continued Mandel. "It's very inspiring and it's also one of the reasons why we have these kinds of events because a lot of women artists – as you can see from the content of the film operate in isolation. All of the women were in the film, but they weren't talking to each other. We want to start conversations that need to be happening."

"Who Does She Think She Is?" won numerous accolades at film festivals around the world and will be screened throughout the country in during the fall and winter.

Andres Moral can be reached at amoral@student.umass.edu.

ARTS & LIVING
"Taking Back Campus"
UMass junior, Rosie Walunas will screen her documentary, "Taking Back Campus" tonight in the Cape Cod Lounge. The film portrays the November 2007 student strike.
SEE PAGE 5

SPORTS
UMass looks to make it four straight
After a 3-0 victory over Colgate on Tuesday, the Minutemen will take on Fordham this Saturday at Rudd Field as they look to win their fourth consecutive game.
SEE PAGE 10

EDITORIAL & OPINION
Columnist Nick Milano explores whether students really benefit from their general education requirements.
SEE PAGE 4

DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM
Daily Collegian photographer Matthew Harrison gets an exclusive first look at the abounding amenities found at the luxurious new recreation center.

Papa Gino's pronto
FREE SLICE DAY AT PRONTO!
Saturday, October 3rd
11:00AM - 3:00PM
413.253.8950
Papa Gino's Pronto
48 N Pleasant Street • Amherst

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
CXVIX
ISSUE 18

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF William McGuinness
MANAGING EDITOR S.P. Sullivan
BUSINESS MANAGER Daniel Jette
PRODUCTION MANAGER Michael Surkes
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Kirsten Swenson
ADVERTISING MANAGER Michael Tortorici
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Max Dermer
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Shayna Murphy
COPY EDITOR Annie Krehbiel
EDITORIAL EDITOR Nick O'Malley
NEWS EDITOR Nick Bush
SPORTS EDITOR Jeffrey R. Larnard
WEB EDITOR Brian Wood
PHOTO EDITOR Matthew Harrison
IT MANAGER Victor Jacob
ASST. BUSINESS MANAGER Matt Zolnierz
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Nicole Jacinto
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Norman Provost
CLASSIFIED MANAGER Katelyn Tamilio
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Justin Gagnon
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Elyse Horowitz
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Cal Scannell
ASSISTANT COPIES Andrew Witte
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Michael Phillis
ASSISTANT EDITORIAL Hannah Nelson
ASSISTANT NEWS Samuel Butterfield
ASSISTANT NEWS Alyssa Creamer
ASSISTANT NEWS Jenn Heshion
ASSISTANT SPORTS David Brinch
ASSISTANT SPORTS Mike Gillmeister
ASSISTANT SPORTS Adam Malley
ASSISTANT PHOTO Maxwell Sparr
ASSISTANT PHOTO Samantha Webber
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA Sara Cody
ASSISTANT MULTIMEDIA Chris Shores

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS ALMA LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SPECIAL IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Nick Bush

COPY EDITOR
Chelsea Dugan

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Guarino

Flu nixes kiss-off at Stanford

By Bruce Newman
San José Mercury News

SAN JOSE, Calif.- Stanford University's century-old hiplocka-palooza called Full Moon on the Quad has survived mono, cold sores, bad breath, regular flu and even fears that HIV could be spread by kissing.

But it couldn't survive swine flu.

Stanford cancelled the tradition that dates back to the 19th century, when a senior would give a freshman - or dozens of freshmen - a kiss in the sandstone quad during the first full moon of the school year.

But H1N1 - a swinish strain of flu that sounds like a geometry proof, but in which H1+N1=0 kisses - has brought the Full Moon crashing down.

And because it's Stanford, this decision was only arrived at following an extensive epidemiological review. Vice Provost for Student Affairs Greg Boardman issued the death knell Tuesday, denouncing frivolous quadrangular kissing on the California campus as "unconscionable" under the circumstances.

Ira Friedman, director of the school's Vaden Health Center, said the university's administrators weren't any happier about shutting the event down than students were. "We're disappointed," Friedman said. "It's a longstanding, valued tradition that's looked forward to by a lot of people. But it doesn't make sense to have an event that involves a lot of kissing, the exact opposite of our isolation and social distancing strategies this year H1N1 is not to be taken lightly."

Friedman also called Full Moon, originally scheduled for Oct. 4, "a recipe for disaster."

Among the affected undergraduate population milling around the Main Quad on Thursday, opinion seemed decidedly mixed.

"I was disappointed to hear that it had been cancelled," said Ben Cohn, a freshman from San Diego.

"My cousins went to school here, and they said it was the highlight of your orientation to Stanford. They can ban it officially, but I think just as many people will be kissing in other situations."

The kisses were chaste in the late 1800s when students lined up to give each other a nice peck. Over the decades, it evolved - or devolved - with some students showing up drunk or naked while groups handed out mints and condoms.

Cohn reluctantly acknowledged that the scope of the event could create a problem.

"The mass kissing might be bad," he said. "One person could possibly kiss 50 people in one night. When it multiplies like that, it gets dangerous."

Senior Kate Powell said she had attended previous Full Moons, but she didn't kiss anybody, she just watched. She wasn't so sure the Moon going down would change anything. "You can still catch swine flu sitting next to somebody in class who has it," Powell said.

"People are still going to make out at parties. They'll do it wherever."

A student at Stanford University walks across campus. The school has banned a traditional event where seniors kiss freshmen due to fears over H1N1.

UMass seeks funding

Holub says campus must find new sources

By Bobby Hitt
Collegian Staff

In a meeting with the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, Chancellor Robert Holub outlined steps he plans to take to address future gaps in the budget.

According to the Chancellor's budget update on June 18, the University of Massachusetts faces a deficit of approximately $30 million dollars in fiscal year 2011, and these difficulties will continue in fiscal year 2012.

If new sources of revenue are not found, this budget deficit will result in layoffs and the elimination of programs. In order to prevent this from happening, the administration has formed a budget task force made up of faculty and specialists, whom are currently developing a plan for the best course of action. The budget task force will have working meetings with vice chancellors in order to get their perspectives. The Chancellor promised more detailed explanations for creating new sources of revenue in mid-to-late spring.

Though there are few concrete plans announced at the moment, the Chancellor and his associates have offered glimpses of what they will do in the near future.

Ed Blaguszewski, executive director of news and media relations, said that UMass will need to offer more graduate programs and increase its out of state presence.

"UMass needs to raise revenue to close the budget gap, two ways we could do this are increasing professional education and raising the amount of out-of-state students," he said.

Also, Holub will be seeking to further the admissions presence in New Jersey, New York, and Pennsylvania, according to recent press releases. Raising the proportion of out-of-state students would allow the university to collect more revenue from tuition.

The amount of money received in donations has also taken a hit due to the state of the economy, so the Chancellor wants to see a greater focus on fundraising. Other ideas for increasing revenue include a larger focus on summer session, continuing education, enrollment management, and research grants.

As of right now, stimulus money is preventing any layoffs and program cuts. UMass has received $33 million dollars in stimulus money to date.

Most recently UMass was awarded $7 million dollars in federal stimulus money from the National Institute of Health for upgrades at the Lederle Graduate Research Center on campus, according to UMass News Office. The stimulus money will stop coming in fiscal year 2011 and UMass must rely on its own creation of revenue and support from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

In order to stem unnecessary spending, UMass has implemented a 'zero-based' budget. This means all departments must justify each line item of their expenditures after each semester. The 'zero-based' budget was implemented following the economic downturn of a year ago; normally faculty and staff are only required to produce a 'zero-based' budget every few years.

Bobby Hitt can be reached at rhitt@student.umass.edu.

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

Chancellor Robert Holub says the University of Massachusetts must find new sources of revenue to cover an anticipated budget deficit next year.

Fall changes the shades on Orchard Hill

ASHLEY LESPERANCE/COLLEGIAN

A view of Central up Orchard Hill shows fall convering on Amherst, as leaves turn and the sun cools on a picturesque Wednesday.

LOCAL Guest Chef Week

MONDAY, SEPT 28
FRANKLIN DC
CHEF PAUL HATHAWAY
CHEF ALBERT

TUESDAY, SEPT 29
WORCESTER DC
CHEF JAKE PERKINS
EASTSIDE GRILL

WEDNESDAY, SEPT 30
BERKSHIRE DC
CHEF CHRIS RAMIREZ
PERSONAL CHEF

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 1
HAMPSHIRE DC
CHEF PETER LAGLOIS
THE SMITHSONIAN

SIGNATURE DISHES WITH LOCAL FLAVOR 5-9PM

LOCAL HERO
RESTAURANTS A LA INSTITUTIONAL
ivy
UMASS DINING
UMassAmherst
umassdining.com

perfect DRESS
ZANNA
downtown Amherst www.zanna.com be our friend on facebook!

Senate introduces new bill on climate change

By Renee Schoof
McClatchy Newspapers

WASHINGTON - Backed by a giant American flag and rows of young veterans and business executives, a group of Democratic senators unveiled an energy and climate bill Wednesday that they say will increase jobs and cut the billions spent on foreign oil.

The bill's framework is similar to one that squeaked through the House of Representatives in June. It would require reductions of heat-trapping gases, set up protections from higher energy prices for consumers and energy-intensive industries, and provide investment and incentives for clean energy.

It also would increase support for the continued use of coal but with the emissions greatly reduced, and for nuclear energy and natural gas. Those provisions are intended to win over many senators who are ambivalent or who oppose climate legislation.

Supporters face an uphill fight getting enough votes to clear the Senate's 60-vote requirement. Their opening move stressed that the new Clean Energy Jobs and American Power Act puts American economic and security interests first.

"We know clean energy is the ticket to strong economic growth," said Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., the chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, who cited a recent University of California study that found that the House version of the bill would create 1.9 million jobs and increase household income.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., the main author of the legislation, said a transition to cleaner energy would reduce the billions of dollars spent on foreign oil, some of which ended up supporting terrorists.

"Our security and our economy will both be strengthened, and we cannot afford not to act," Kerry said.

Republican leaders said the measure was the equivalent of a new tax.

"The last thing American families need right now is to be hit with a new energy tax every time they flip on a light switch or fill up their car, but that's exactly what this bill would do," Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky said in a statement Wednesday.

No Republicans declared support for the bill. Kerry said that "there are a number of Republicans who want to get this over the finish line, and we're going to work with them." He didn't identify them.

President Barack Obama said the draft put the country a step closer to being "in control of our energy future." He said his administration was "deeply committed to passing a bill that creates new American jobs and the clean energy incentives that foster innovation."

Kerry said the bill supported all forms of energy in ways that made them clean and efficient, including coal.

Coal today is the largest source of heat-trapping gas emissions.

The bill sets up a program to support capturing carbon dioxide from coal combustion and storing it underground, instead of letting it accumulate in the atmosphere.

"We've gone further with respect to some of the coal needs," Kerry said. "I'm convinced we're going to pull this together."

Kerry said that cleaner energy would create jobs in all regions of the country "that stay here in America."

Emissions reductions would be required only by large companies that emit 25,000 tons of carbon or more per year. Farms, homes and small businesses are exempted, Kerry said.

Even so, the bill would cover three-quarters of the nation's emissions of heat-trapping gases. The required reductions would cut global warming pollution by 20 percent from 2005 levels by 2020, slightly more than the 17 percent in the House bill, and 83 percent by 2050, the level consistent with what scientific studies say will be necessary to prevent destructive warming that brings coastal inundation, more frequent heat waves, extinction of species and other results of a climate shift.

Like the House version, the Senate bill uses some funds from the sales of emissions allowances to protect consumers from electricity, natural gas and heating oil price increases.

The draft doesn't spell out how the value of these allowances, which will total in the billions of dollars, would be distributed among consumers, industries, energy research and other programs. Boxer said her committee would fill in those details soon.

The Senate version also puts a ceiling on the price of emission allowances and stronger oversight of the market for buying and selling them.

Another cost-containment provision is the use of offsets, which allow companies to make up for some of their pollution by reducing it elsewhere. Since carbon can be taken up by plants and stored in the soil, for example, the bill includes provisions to pay farmers and forest owners for offsets.

and funding for other measures in the bill. Boxer said it wouldn't increase the federal deficit.

Boxer said she expected her committee to pass the bill within weeks. Five other committees also have a say in the legislation.

UNCITED

Sen. John Kerry (D-MA) is one of the primary backers of a new bill aiming to restrict greenhouse gases and provide incentives for green development.

Two UMass students arrested

Pair allegedly stole, crashed campus car

BUSTED from page 1

on September 23, the afternoon after he was arrested, to which one individual asked "WTF happened man" and another replied "Gin."

Two days after the incident, on Wolfersdorf's birthday, Burgess posted on his Facebook wall: "yo ted happy bday killer. This [expletive] will work itself out we just gotta stay in contact and figure it out. in the mean time take it easy brotha."

Wolfersdorf and Burgess were required to leave the campus and have returned home. As both face disorderly conduct and larceny of a vehicle, Burgess and Wolfersdorf could face up to 36 months in Massachusetts prison, depending on their prior records.

On November 3, the two men have an arraignment trial in the Eastern Hampshire District Court in Belchertown, Mass. It is unknown how they plan to plea.

Due to the students facing felony charges, Burgess and Wolfersdorf will stand before the Disciplinary Hearing Board.

Executive Director of News and Media Relations of UMass Ed Blaguszewski said that students arrested for serious crimes are usually put on interim suspension.

"When Students are arrested, they are put on temporary suspension until the date of their trial," he said. "From the outcome of the trial, the students will learn whether or not they are expelled," said Blaguszewski.

Michelle Williams can be reached at mnwilliat@student.umass.edu

The Tibetan Freedom Movement - Post 2008
Thursday, October 1st, 7 pm
UMass Campus Center Auditorium

An internationally acclaimed writer and activist, Tenzin Tsundue has been wearing a red band around his head for the past nine years. He says it is the mark of his pledge to work for the freedom of his country, and he will never take it off until Tibet is free.

Tenzin Tsundue

Sponsored by UMass Students For A Free Tibet

Elections uncertain SGA to debate results Question 2 contested

SGA from page 1

Rose, who handily won the most votes, with 171, Misbah Anwar, who got 121, and Nicholas Barton, who received 105 votes.

Northeast will send Melissa Urban, who easily won her area, with 124 votes, as well as Rafael Medina, with 67. North saw limited turnout, electing Andrew Dawson, with six votes, and Prateek Katti, with five to its two seats.

Sylvan also saw meager turnout, picking Ron Aylward with 23 votes, and Danillo Sena, with 20, as its two representatives. Michael O'Connor won Sylvan's Lieutenant Governor spot unopposed.

Commuter students picked 17 commuter students, with a tie for seventeenth that will be resolved either by one student conceding or the SGA's Coordinating Council breaking the tie, if necessary. The 17 commuter senators are Benjamin Levine, Melissa Sandefur, William Cody, Amanda Jusino, Charlie Felder, Chelsea Aquino, Josh Davidson, Tikaan Galbreath, Rudy Mahotierre, Tyler Langlais, Eric Magazu, Scott Aldrich-Holmes, Andrew Berg, Azeen Khanmalek, Derek Khanna and Jeremy Rumeld. Mohamed El-Ounsi and Kurt Kaschora tied as write-in candidates. One will have to concede and give the spot to the other, or the Coordinating Council will have to break the tie at Thursday's meeting.

In addition to the voting, commuter senator elect Derek Khanna also filed a formal complaint against Sylvan senate candidate Brad DeFlumeri regarding campaigning e-mails he distributed which were not registered with the Chancellor of Elections. The complaint was heard, according to an SGA release, on September 29, before the ballots were counted. Two pieces of information were incorrect in the e-mails, the date of the elections, which the e-mail mislabeled as October 28 and 29, and the number of Sylvan senate seats. There are two, the e-mail erroneously claimed there were three. DeFlumeri told the Elections Committee the mistakes were errors and unintentional. Given that the elections were over, the Committee decided to take no action, stating that while the complaint was valid, it was not grievous enough to warrant action.

Sam Butterfield can be reached at sbutterfield@dailycollegian.com.

University Health Services • Mental Health Services
Support and Therapy Group Meetings • Fall, 2009

RELAXATION SKILLS TRAINING
Mondays, 3:30 – 5 p.m.
beginning Oct. 19
A three-session workshop to learn and practice relaxation techniques in a group setting. Attendance at all sessions expected.

MANAGING DEPRESSION
Tuesdays, 4 – 5:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 13
A three-session workshop on managing depression symptoms and developing healthy coping skills.

EXPERIENTIAL PSYCHOTHERAPY GROUP FOR GRADUATE STUDENTS
Tuesdays, 7 – 8:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 6
Focusing on self-exploration in a safe atmosphere.

LIVING WITH LOSS
Wednesdays, 4:30 – 5:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 7
A support group for undergraduate and graduate students dealing with the loss of someone close to them.

MINDFULNESS-BASED STRESS REDUCTION (MBSR)
Mondays, 5 – 6:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 5
An experiential ten-session workshop aimed at improving self-awareness, lowering stress and enhancing health and wellbeing. Open enrollment throughout the semester.

EXPERIENTIAL PSYCHOTHERAPY GROUP FOR UNDERGRADUATE STUDENTS
Thursdays, 3:30 – 5 p.m.
beginning Oct. 8
Focusing on self-exploration in a safe atmosphere.

Pre-registration is required for all groups. To register, or for more information, call (413) 545-2337 or come to Mental Health Services, 127 Hills North, Monday – Friday, 8 a.m. – 5 p.m.

UMassAmherst

At a university where 7 colleges,
173 academic programs, 913 professors, and 14,117 students come together on a beautiful seaside campus, we'd like to count you in.

UMass Boston Open House 2009
Saturday, October 17, 8:30am

Sign up at www.umb.edu/openhouse or by calling 617.287.6000.

UMASS BOSTON

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 1, 2009

"Free speech is the whole thing, the whole ball game. Free speech is life itself."
- Sir Salman Rushdie

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Gen Eds have to go

Nick Milano

For almost four years now, my search to find an interesting and easy preferably easy physical science (PS) general education class has been a dismal failure. I tried Astronomy 101, but it was inexplicably boring and much harder than it should be. I gave Geology 101 a shot, but that too had nothing to do with me. More recently, I went with Chemistry 102, but the class material was so outside of anything I cared about, I decided to roll the dice and deal with the PS requirement in my last semester.

Two weeks ago, the UMass Faculty Senate revealed changes to the General Education Requirements that will affect freshmen entering next fall. Unfortunately, the Gen Ed changes do extend far enough to ensure that students have as much opportunity to explore various fields as they might desire.

My personal approach to college has been to take whatever classes catch my eye. With this philosophy I have taken such varied classes as Middle East History, African History, Irish Experience, a class at Amherst college, random political science classes that appeal to me and some public health classes for good measure. In doing so, I have been entirely satisfied by UMass's varied class offerings because I ditched my requirements list and did whatever I wanted.

Thanks to UMass's strict rules on how many Gen Ed classes one has to take and the exact headings they have to fall under, however, I was forced into a corner and have been scrambling to cover all the necessary bases. What the Faculty Senate should have done was create an opportunity for more choice and experimentation. It did well to abolish a third science requirement and the superfluous "social world" requirement, but it did not go far enough.

Why should students have to take a biological science and a physical science? Instead students could have two biological and physical world requirements, but be given free reign to take anything under those guidelines. Why should students have to take a literature class, a history class and a social and behavioral science class? Instead, require students to take four classes in the Social World while allowing the students to choose which. This approach will guarantee that students have to take some basic introductory classes in specific fields, but will not limit choices so strictly, forcing students to take classes that inspire the least of interest.

> Letting students learn about things they might be interested in is the only way to expand their horizons and keep them involved.

It is much easier to wake up in the morning to take a class that is half interesting than to wake up to go to an introductory chemistry class that is just a repeat of basic high school level chemistry. How does this add to a college experience? It just is a waste of time and takes time away from possible opportunities to apply yourself in something that appeals to you.

Personally, ever since the Middle East History class, I have understood the contentious sparks between Shia'a and Sunni sides. Since the History of Africa class, the historical dimensions of colonialism make much more sense. This knowledge might not help me with my career, but is much more appealing to me than how two molecules of oxygen make water – if that is even how chemistry works. Rock formations, the solar system and ocean depths shed little, if any light, on anything for many students – give us a chance to opt out.

It is obviously difficult to design a general education system that keeps everyone happy and excited about class. What civil engineer would want to take a literature or philosophy course? In the same breath, what political science or management major would be interested in a basic physical or biological science? Maybe this means the Gen Ed system needs to be more complex. Instead of forcing science majors into lit and classes like it, cut those requirements and vice versa for social science majors. It is not as if students will no longer be taking classes – they will still have a minimum credit requirement to reach. But letting students learn about things they might be interested in is the only way to expand their horizons and keep them involved. When I eventually invest in a silly PS class, I am not likely going to be one of those sitting at the front of class, participating excitedly and doing the readings.

There are incredible classes offered here at UMass and in the entire Five College system. A History of Western Medicine class at Amherst College was probably the most intriguing class I have ever taken even with the bland subject matter. Opportunities to take that class and other classes like it here at UMass, or at any of the Five Colleges, are severely limited because of the extensive amount of Gen Ed classes that UMass requires. The new system, as apparently designed, is a step in the right direction, but still leaves students with few options. College is supposed to be about choice; a time of finding out what one is destined to do. Introductory classes are certainly necessary, but at what cost?

Nick Milano is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at nmilano@student.umass.edu

UMass 'netiquette' and you

As someone who has daily contact with undergraduates, I often hear from frustrated students that they were not aware of certain academic regulations, or that they were never informed about an upcoming event or a change of policy. In almost every case, this frustration could have been avoided if all students regularly checked their University of Massachusetts Amherst e-mail account. Here are some key reasons why you should use and read your UMass e-mail.

Official Communication: In this day of paperless communication, the University no longer sends grades or other important notices to a student's home or campus address. In fact, according to the University's February 2004 E-mail Communications Policy, the University's primary means of communicating official information is e-mail. Further, the University will send official communications only to e-mail addresses distributed by OIT (now known as UMass Amherst e-mail addresses), and expects that such communications will be received and read in a timely fashion. Students are, therefore, responsible for checking their University e-mail on a frequent and consistent basis to ensure that they remain current with all official communications. In other words, even if you ignore it, you will be held accountable for the information that has been sent.

E-mail "Problems:" You might be surprised to read that students regularly report problems with their UMass Amherst e-mail account, which sometimes comes down to the fact that it is not as fun or as easy to use as an e-mail vendor like Google or Yahoo. I am not sure if it's because using the familiar e-mail account is more interesting or because UMass messages about serious issues are not as enjoyable, but some students choose to ignore their UMass e-mail or have it redirected ("forwarded") to their more familiar, personal e-mail address. As a result, they miss crucial University information because their familiar account treats the forwarded messages as Spam or, even worse, does not forward them at all. To avoid missing deadlines or even opportunities, I recommend that you stop having your UMass Amherst e-mail address forwarded. Instead, either use your UMass Amherst e-mail as your only account, or better yet, use two accounts and check your UMass Amherst e-mail daily for university-related business. I also suggest not using your UMass e-mail account for social networking or other web adventures. Keep it simple: Use your UMass e-mail address for your academic life at the University and a different personal account for all else.

Privacy: Every message you send from your UMass Amherst e-mail address to another UMass Amherst e-mail address is automatically encrypted, and this is extremely helpful in protecting your privacy. Commercial e-mail service providers (e.g. Google and Yahoo) may not be using encryption and this leaves your information vulnerable to being intercepted in transit. You should never use a commercial e-mail address to discuss confidential information such as grades, dealings with University agencies, or financial concerns.

By the way, the upcoming opportunity for undergraduate students to choose Google Apps through their UMass Amherst account will continue to provide students with privacy, as it's a UMass account via Google Apps for Education, and not a personally obtained Gmail account. These new accounts with still take the same form as NetID@student.umass.edu, but benefit students with more storage space and the Gmail interface. Remember, choosing a UMass Google Apps account is voluntary, and undergraduate students will need to carefully weigh the pros and cons of both UMail and a Google Apps. Two of the most substantial concerns regarding Google include what they may do with your content upon studying it, and that there is no backup of your information. UMail has a much lower quota. There are also positives on both sides. I encourage everyone to read Google's Terms of Service (www.google.com/accounts/TOS) as well as the University's Google Apps page (www.umass.edu/googleapps) which includes a link to the UMass Google Apps Project Blog and copies of recent e-mails to students and staff.

A Permanent Record of Your Civility, or Not: Although it is "informal," as long as e-mail is the University's "official" mode of communication, students need to remember that when writing to members of the campus community, a certain e-mail etiquette is expected. Always indicate your full name, not just Doug or Maria, include your SPIRE ID as a courtesy, and start with a salutation such as "Dear Professor Quinn." Believe it or not, I receive several messages per week that begin "hey," and are not signed at all. This is not the best way to make a positive impression. One last point: When writing e-mails regarding University business avoid abbreviations that might be more appropriate when texting (TMOT – trust me on this). These are habits that will serve you well when you leave campus and enter the professional world. Believe me, a little civility goes a long way.

Take your future into your own hands: Using your UMass e-mail account only for University-related business is a great way to stay organized. Checking and reading your UMass e-mail on a daily basis is a great way to avoid missing withdrawal deadlines, for example, which may result in a lower grade point average recorded permanently on your transcript. Using your UMass e-mail to deal with issues in an informal way could also come back to haunt you. What if these e-mails end up in the hands of a potential employer looking for an employee with a more professional demeanor? E-mail is a permanent record and what you don't know about it, either way, could hurt you.

Kregg Strehorn is a UMass Associate Dean. He can be reached at strehorn@acad.umass.edu.

Setting the record straight: Not all Muslims are Arabs

Subhan Tariq

What's the first thing you think of when you think of Muslims? Perhaps more importantly what do you picture? Anyone picture someone from the desert wearing a turban, speaking Arabic and probably condemning the United States?

I recently went around to a number of college students on campus and did a non-scientific, realistic poll of what people thought of and what they pictured when they thought of the word Muslim.

Of the few people I asked, many gave me the response above, of an Arab who doesn't speak English and who hates the United States. Others said they thought of terrorism and more specifically September 11. Of the people I asked, a majority said their knowledge of the basic tenants of Islam was based off television and the way in which the media has portrayed Muslims. When asked about their limited knowledge of Islam, some said that they thought that Allah was a man that Muslims worshipped.

To help clear some confusion and set the record straight, I wanted to change up how I offer editorials for the next few weeks and use my column as an educational piece, as well as to clear up common misconceptions.

Let's begin by starting with the word Islam itself. The root letters of the word Islam are the Arabic letters seen, laam, meem – when they are put together it literally means peace. This peace can be defined in different ways, both inner and outer peace. There are five basic tenants or pillars of Islam: faith, prayer, charity, fasting and pilgrimage. We'll get into the others later on, but, for the time being, let's take a closer look at the testament of faith.

To make things clear, let's set the record straight about Muslims being only Arabs, from the desert and condemning the United States. First of all, not all Muslims are Arab, and not all Arabs are Muslims. Of the top five most-populated countries, none are Arab countries (top five in order are Indonesia, Pakistan, India, Bangladesh and Turkey). Even within Arab countries, there are a lot of countries that don't have a desert in them.

> Islam is the fastest growing religion and it continues to spread, peacefully.

Lastly, Islam and Muslims do not condemn the United States or the West. No matter how much someone would have you believe that we hate this country, that notion is simply false. I am a proud citizen of the United States and exercise my rights, just as others do. I am proud of the United States. Though I don't always agree with its foreign policy, I in no way hate the United States.

Islam is the fastest growing religion and it continues to spread, peacefully. The Vatican released a story a few months ago which stated that Islam is now the largest religion in the world. People try to make the claim that Islam was spread via the sword, but example after example shows that it wasn't. When Muslims conquered an area, the people of the area had the ability to keep their religion and their customs and everything they wanted. Those who have seen the movie "Kingdom of Heaven" saw a true depiction about the crusades, about how Salahuddin conquered Jerusalem and did not shed a drop of blood afterwards.

The Islamic testament of faith, which is usually taken in Arabic, translates in English as "I bear witness that there is no God worthy of worship except Allah, and Muhammad is his servant and messenger." Similar to the other monotheistic religions, Muslims pray to one God, who is considered to be all-knowing and all wise. The word Allah is defined as "the God" and essentially is just the Arabic word for God.

Similar to how the Christians have the Bible and the Jews have the Torah, Muslims also have a holy book, the Quran. There is only one version of the Quran. The Quran in its original form is in Arabic. There are translations available but they don't do justice to the real text.

Education is not only what you learn in a classroom. Through our interactions with others, we have the ability to learn a lot about ourselves. I urge you all to go and do just a little bit of research about Islam before you make a judgment by watching a news piece. Be informed of reality and truth, rather than the sensationalism that we see on TV. There are several means for you to gain knowledge.

You can Wikipedia or Google your questions; you can go and talk to someone in the office of the Muslim Students Association (located in room 321 of the Student Union, next to the bike co-op). In this ever growing and more globalized world, you stand to gain by learning about others. Who knows, you might just learn something about yourself.

Subhan Tariq is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at stariq@student.umass.edu.

LETTERS to the EDITOR

Editorial@DailyCollegian.com

WANT TO WRITE TO US?

Letters to the editor should be no longer than 550 words and can be sent to editorial@dailycollegian.com or submitted online at dailycollegian.com. We regret that, due to space constraints, not all letters will be printed, but can be found online.

NOT BUYING IT

RE: "Scantily-clad interns give working girls a bad name," Jessica Starling Jones, Sept. 28

Dear Editor,

I think the assertion that women who dress scantily are less apt to advance in their careers is kind of absurd. They are, after all, hired in the first place, and I should think that if they work for heterosexual male CEOs, dressing revealingly should actually help them to advance; after all, attractive women tend to advance more often than non-attractive women, particularly when their superiors are heterosexual men. Therefore I think these "skinterns" are operating in their best interests, sadly, under the assumption that "it's a man's world," and I think it's this belief (or fact) that needs to be held accountable for "unrespectable" scantily clad women in the workplace; it's just as much the fault of the males, if not more so. Sure, women need not be complicit in this by meeting the fantastical expectations of men who want you to show your cleavage, but I think the problem lies more in the sometimes flawed male psyche combined with perceived male dominance in the work place. There's a reason these women reveal themselves; there is a perceived advantage, and this is the problem.

Hope this makes sense.

Hilary Gardiner
UMass Student

IT'S TIME TO SEE BOTH SIDES

RE: "The desecration of Gaza," Waqas Mirza, Sept. 23

Dear Editor,

It was hard (but not impossible) for me to enjoy Student Alliance for Israel's opening event last night. While it was successful, I could not stop thinking about the incredibly invective, one-sided, and inflammatory article against Israel published in The Collegian that day.

In an attempt to proactively deal with these issues this semester, we have reached out to many seemingly incompatible Registered Student Organizations (RSO). Our hopes are to co-sponsor cultural events and engage in mediated discussions in a safe, non-threatening environment.

Articles like this send a clear message: we are not interested in peaceful dialogues or co-existence on campus, rather, in polarizing the community against Israel by fostering hatred and intimidation. However, we will not be intimidated. My chief concern with this article, disregarding the extreme bias and erroneous facts, is how completely unproductive it is. I don't have a problem with raising awareness of issue, but there is an appropriate way to do this.

The tone of this article starts off mocking Israel's right to self-defense. First and foremost, Israel has the right to exist and to defend its people. The author fails to acknowledge the cause of the operation, which was, for Israel, to defend its people. It was the constant barrage of attacks and the infliction of extreme psychological warfare on Israeli citizens from 2000 to 2008 to which Israel responded. Mortar shelling and rocket attacks have been on-going since 2000, endangering 950,000 Israeli citizens. The situation reached an unbearable climax in 2008 with 1,730 qassam rockets and 1,528 mortars striking Southern Israel. These attacks were aimed directly at civilian populations with the sole purpose of inflicting terror and death. The dire situation of incessant attacks necessitated the implementation of a warning system, giving citizens 15 seconds to seek shelter.

With more than 3,000 attacks in one year, how can one possibly live a normal life? I cannot even begin to imagine coping with life in constant fear. In spite of this frightening situation, kids had to attempt to pay attention in class, while their mothers had to agonize over their children walking home from school, or their husbands' taking a shower. Sderot Media reports that 45 percent of toddlers are suffering from post traumatic stress disorder, while one third of their parents are also afflicted.

Aside from only portraying one embellished half of the story, much of the content was false. In the cited article by Amira Hass, she herself states, "Gaza merchants are forbidden to import canned goods, plastic sheeting, toys and books, although the United Nations Relief and Works Agency and other aid organizations are permitted to bring them into the strip." In an effort to free imprisoned Israeli Soldier, Gilad Shalit, (today is his 1188th day in captivity), Israel has employed a tactic used by the United Nations itself. Israel restricts the inflow of goods to Gaza merchants, while still allowing these goods to enter under the auspices of humanitarian aid.

Presenting half-truths through vindictive language obstructs the healthy dialogue we could and should be encouraging at UMass. Please don't deny students the opportunity for a truly liberal education by encouraging conflict and hatred. This is not the solution and will never result in what I hope we all really want: peace.

Andrew Horwitz
President, Student Alliance for Israel

NOT QUITE ZOOMASS

Dear Editor,

As a Smith College student, I first visited the UMass campus armed with cynicism and what I thought was a healthy supply of snobbism. My college produced more Fulbright winners than any other small liberal arts college; UMass produced more binge drinkers than any school in the area. Smith was home to women who strove for academic excellence; UMass students strove for the weekend. Etc, etc.

As my education went on, I developed close friendships with students from the various Five Colleges, including UMass. During my first overnight stay at UMass, my friend suggested we make our way to the dining hall to eat dinner. I braced myself for the worst. While I had revised my theory that all UMass students were brain dead party animals, I could not imagine that the dining hall would compare to those at Smith, where we can choose nightly from vegan, Kosher, Mediterranean and other dining options.

Following my friend into the dining hall, I was pleasantly surprised to see a far wider variety of food than we at Smith are afforded. Vegetarian, "healthy" and various other options greeted me. My friend, a self-professed picky eater, helped herself to some rosemary chicken and potatoes, while I crafted a large and somewhat unwieldy salad from the expansive salad bar. Grabbing a whole-wheat roll, I scooted over to the beverages, where I was forced to pick from the many choices offered.

We have all heard that America is the fattest nation on the planet. No one is looking to refute this statement. Yet, I think that the answer to this so-called "obesity epidemic" is not to do away with the soft drink industry, or to ban desserts from the menu. Rather, I think the nation would do well to emulate the dining halls at UMass, where the sheer variety of foods allows students to have whatever they want in moderation.

How does a large dining hall with choices upon choices of appetizers, main courses and desserts promote healthy eating? By simulating real life. Realistically, the McDonalds and Dunkin Donuts that can be found in all 50 states are not going to disappear anytime soon. And while a student who eats nothing but salads during college may emerge several pounds lighter, they are not likely to stick to such a diet once reacquainted with the oasis of calories and sugar that await them on the other side.

Nor should they. A balanced diet is one that blends a mixture of carbohydrates, fats and proteins, a plan that even the fattiest item can fit into. Life should be about taking advantage of nature (and man's) bounty, and one should not have to forgo the occasional coffee and donut breakfast in order to be "healthy."

The dining environment at UMass encourages students to have their greens and lean proteins. But it also encourages students to remember that life is too short to forgo those delicious double-fudge brownies that appear on occasion. If Americans as a population were to survey their food supply as a UMass student does the dining hall offerings, then we would undoubtedly be far healthier people. Everything in moderation, they say. And that is a truism at which UMass dining excels.

Go UMass!

Sarah Billian
Smith College Student

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 1, 2009

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Find inspiration in do-it-yourself wedding decoration

By Ellie Rulon-Miller
Collegian Staff

Last weekend, I had the privilege of being involved in the most important day of my oldest brother's life: his wedding.

I was a bridesmaid in Patrick and Angie's ceremony. I wore the pretty dress, held the pretty flowers, and walked down the aisle in my pretty silver shoes. I stood in a line with the other bridesmaids, tears streaming down my smiling cheeks, and watched my new sister-in-law appear through the double-doors in the most gorgeous dress any of us had ever seen.

Unfortunately, I missed out on most of the bridesmaid's usual duties. Because Angie is from western Pennsylvania and I from just north of Boston, it was hard to be involved with the process from such a distance. When I saw the decorations at both the bridal shower in July and the wedding this past weekend, I got even more upset – almost all of it was done in the spirit of DIY.

At the shower, Angie's sister was responsible for most of the décor. Each place setting included a booklet she had made, which was full of shower-related games that we played after the meal. My favorite part of the place settings, though, was the candle. In front of each seat there was a candle – either blue or orange, the colors of the bridesmaid's dresses and their flowers, respectively – and on top of each candle, a small photo of the happy couple, snipped down to size and placed in a small frame, with a magnet glued on its back. The magnet stuck to the top of the candle for easy removal. I got so excited about the little photos that I decided, against my earlier decision, to bring my mini-fridge to school this year, just so I could put that magnet on it.

Instead of having the event catered, they had a couple of Angie's aunts and cousins bring large containers of homemade food. What made the food even more unique was that each of the esteemed chefs seemed to have a dish for which they were famous among the family. My favorite was a divine-tasting Polish dish called Haluski.

The family also used realistic fake flowers at the wedding as an alternative to dropping an unnecessary amount of money on one-time-use real ones. This also meant that the bridesmaids got to keep the ones they carried down the aisle as souvenirs. The flower girls' flowers were pushed into a small block of heavy foam to weigh it down, which was then placed in a small, silver basket.

When we got to the reception, I noticed that most of the décor was handmade as well. The family must have put a tremendous amount of time and effort into it all; in front of each place setting at the reception was a small white box containing a little tissue paper and a few Hershey's Kisses. They were each labeled with each guest's name and the table at which they were to sit. Just thinking about the tediousness involved in making one of these

See WEDDING on page 6

Martin Provost's sleeper hit, 'Séraphine' garners praise

COURTESY SERAPHINEMOVIE.COM

"Séraphine," directed by Martin Provost and starring Yolande Moreau, has earned seven César Awards including Best Picture and Best actress. The film draws viewers in with the sensitive portrayal of the little known "primitive modernist" painter, Séraphine de Senlis.

By Cal Scannell
Collegian Staff

With vivid visuals and the stunning performance of Yolande Moreau, "Séraphine," now showing at the Pleasant Street Theater, will capture viewers with a sensitive portrayal of the little know painter Séraphine de Senlis. Director Martin Provost's French sleeper hit has earned seven César Awards, similar to the Academy Awards in France, including Best Actress and Best Picture. The film focuses on the life and work of Séraphine, who worked odd-jobs by day and painted by night to create decorative and well-order floral designs that at the same time pulse with an other-worldly energy.

The story goes that while living and working as a maid in a convent, Séraphine received instruction from her guardian angel to paint. Obeying her divine calling, Séraphine worked odd jobs and scuttled around town collecting wood panels and ingredients to blend her own paints, with which she created crude and colorful floral designs. The film opens when she takes a job keeping house for a German art collector, M. Wilhelm Uhde, who discovers her talent. As a collector of amateur painters he was one of the first to deal works by Picasso, Braque and Le Douanier Rousseau and in Seraphine's work too, he recognizes shreds of artistic genius and nurtures her talent. The approach of World War II however soon separates the two. In his absence Séraphine continues to work with religious devotion, all the while remaining in conversation with her muse from above.

Years later, Wilhelm returns to France and comes across Séraphine's more recent work at a local artists' show in Senlis. There he discovers the incredible progress Séraphine has made, and after tracking her down, becomes her patron. But the dramatic change in situation that his patronage brings to Séraphine proves too much for her, and though already a bit odd, Séraphine quickly loses her mind. Her mental deterioration comes to a head in one of the final scenes when Séraphine rises early one morning and dressed in a fine silk wedding gown (made upon the instruction of her guardian angel) parades through town distributing silver ladles and candlesticks to the townsfolk.

Though overall a strong film, the film does a particularly wonderful job depicting Séraphine's art practice, which she viewed as a religious activity with her hand guided by her guardian angel.

See SÉRAPHINE on page 6

Student documentary re-lives the November 2007 student strike and march on Whitmore

By Chelsea Whitton
Collegian Correspondent

BRIAN TRUSCOTT/COLLEGIAN

UMass junior, Rosie Walunas will premire her documentary, "Taking Back Campus" tonight in the Cape Cod Lounge. The film allows audiences to re-live the 2007 student strike and the demonstrations that took place outside of Whitmore Administarion Building, pictured here.

The student strike in the fall of 2007 may not have been long-lived, but after two years of production, a University of Massachusetts student is ready to premiere "Taking Back Campus", a documentary on the strike.

Directed by Rosie Walunas, a junior at UMass majoring in journalism with double minors in film studies and international relations, the documentary chronicles the two days of the student run strike that took place in November 2007. Walunas described the process as one that began her freshman year, while learning and working at UVC-19 television. The documentary will premiere Thursday night and is Walunas' first documentary. She is currently producing her second film.

For about two months in early fall 2007, Walunas started to become skilled with basic filmmaking equipment. At the time, Walunas said she didn't set out looking to start a documentary, but the opportunity presented itself as a group of students fighting for a set of rights. "I started filming the strike events not knowing I was filming for a documentary in the making," said Walunas. Walunas described the process as quite a trial at times, sorting through over 20 hours of footage. As for the actual shooting, Walunas said, "shooting it was easy, all I had to do was show up."

The strike organizers saw rises in support when student government members and other students decided to strike against the UMass administration for what Walunas described as "four significant reasons."

The first desired action and motivation for the striking students was the removal of UMass police from dorms. Undercover police dressed in casual student wear, as well as officers dressed in uniform, made their presence known in some form in dorms all across campus. The participating students felt as if the police and UMass authority were over-stepping their limits and power.

Secondly, the increasing fees included on student bursar bills have been rising steadily in recent years, and with that came increased attention to the issue and cause for concern. Also on the strikers' agenda was the invasion of space in administrative measures. They felt the student body was being imposed upon by administration officers and organizations. Private vendors and private events were taking spaces like the Cape Cod Lounge the striking students believed that the Cape Cod Lounge and other places should be used for student run functions.

Lastly, Walunas described that the striking students brought up issues with the fundamentals of diversity in the University system. The students in the documentary describe that student groups were not being evenly funded, and that certain ethnicities were not being reached out to, when others were.

After the two-day strike the students, "expressed feelings that the administrative response was zero, and they didn't care about the issues at hand," Walunas said.

Walunas explained that though she filmed the documentary through the eyes of a student, she did not participate in the student strike, and didn't take a stance on administrative standards or student views. Instead, Walunas saw the filming process and documentary as an opportunity to portray a movement for change on the UMass campus, and as a way to depict the demand for student reform.

"Overall, the film has turned into a model to feature the impact mass movements may or may not have," Walunas said, "I hope that it comes as an inspiration to the students, administrators, and educators."

"Taking Back Campus" is a compilation of footage of the strike featuring the concern of the students, the response of the administration, and in some cases fear by the administration. Walunas described former Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life, Michael Gargano, as avoiding contact with the striking students, hiding from the masses and from the camera, as well as refusing to address students' wide-spread concern.

The premiere will conclude with a question and answer session with Director Rosie Walunas, and also students involved with the strike.

Acting interim Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life, Jean Kim will be in attendance. This is the first screening of the documentary. "Taking Back Campus" will be shown tonight, Oct. 1, 2009 in the Cape Cod Lounge at 7 p.m. The event is free and open to the public.

Chelsea Whitton can be reached at cwhitton@student.umass.edu

Provost portrays the outsider artist in sleeper hit 'Séraphine'

The film depicts the religious fervor that guided Séraphine's art practice. Though she worked as a maid and went undiscovered for much of her live, Séraphine devoted her every free moment to her painting.

SÉRAPHINE from page 5

She paints in the confines of her small one-room apartment in the dim light of tens of candles placed in an alter-like arrangement surrounding her canvas. Emphasizing the spiritual dimension of her practice, Séraphine sings in a high choral voice that trembles with religious fervor that, at the same time, borders on insanity.

When describing her work to a viewer, Séraphine explains, "my inspiration comes from above." True to her word, the paintings seem energized by some divine dimension, with flowers that seem to crawl up the canvases. One awestruck viewer in the film remarks, "it moves, like eyes, like scarred flesh." Séraphine responds, explaining that she herself doesn't fully understand the images she creates when possessed by the artistic spirit. "It scares me, what I've done," she confesses.

Yolande Moreau, who earned the prestigious César Award for Best Actress flawlessly portrays the eccentric, apple-shaped Séraphine with gnarly hands and a glassy look in her eyes. The award is well deserved as her performance draws viewers in with her total lack of vanity and effortless detachment from her surroundings. She also does an incredible job communicating the kind of alienation that characterizes many artists, while at the same time fueling their artistic pursuits. Though Séraphine's closeness to nature and detachment from people ultimately manifests itself as insanity, her unique and profound understanding of the world pervades her work. Her paintings possess a passionate, unrestrained quality and vividness of color while at the same time they convey the underlying order and balance of the universe.

The film also offers an interesting look into the mind of avant-garde collector Wilhelm Udhe, shedding light on the obsession that drives the art world, but is poorly understood by those outside of it. "A collection interprets a person's spiritual education," Wilhelm explains. By featuring a collector who recognized the power of artworks produced by, at the time, unrecognized artists (including Picasso), the film provides insight into the motives for collecting works from amateur artists on the sole basis of the spiritual force of the works, as opposed to the monetary value.

Provost's careful treatment of themes of alienation, spirituality and the true value of art make "Séraphine" a thought-provoking feature. Though the film drags a bit at times, it redeems itself with the sensitivity of the story, the subjects it illuminates and the incredible acting. "Séraphine" is playing at the Pleasant Street Theater until Thursday, October 8. Tickets are $8.50 for adults, $7.50 for students.

Cal Scannell can be reached at cscannell@dailycollegian.com.

'The Invention of Lying' good for chuckles

By Roger Moore
Orlando Sentinel

Brit-comic Ricky Gervais stakes a serious claim to the title "the British Albert Brooks" with "The Invention of Lying," his droll, witty and thoughtful comedy about the thing that really makes the world go round.

On an Earth in which "the human race has never evolved the ability to tell a lie," Gervais plays the guy who discovers fibs, fiction, exaggerations, little white lies, whoppers to get what you want and the biggest lie of all. And that discovery may (or may not) change the world and make it a better place.

As Mark, he's a screenwriter on this alternate Earth. He's failing at the simple task of turning history (there is no fiction) into something a reader can recite to an audience on TV or in theaters. There are no actors. Pretending to be someone you're not would be a lie, wouldn't it?

Mark's a "loser," as his secretary (Tina Fey) can't help but blurt out and his fellow dapper writer (Rob Lowe) loves saying to one and all.

And that doesn't escape the notice of his beautiful but shallow blind date, Anna (Jennifer Garner, radiant). Things get off to a swinging start when she admits to masturbating just before their date and adds "I'm not really looking forward to tonight in general." She judges him by his appearance and financial state, spilling the beans about what (some) women really want.

Mark is pretty downtrodden until that day — 20 minutes into the film — when he figures out he can tell the bank clerk he has more money coming to him than his account balance suggests. The floodgates are opened, and suddenly he can lie his way back into the screenwriting job he just lost, can fake his way to confidence, wealth and success, and even find ways to convince his loner neighbor (Jonah Hill, playing it clean for once) that he's not a lumpy loser.

This might have been a 10-minute sketch stretched out to movie length. But then the movie gets to the biggest lie of all, that favorite British bugaboo, religion. "The Invention of Lying" morphs into a different movie, a high-minded comedy, intellectual, even. The characters explore just what that one lie can do to help the human race, or limit it. And how would the human race react to the fellow telling that whopper about "The Man in the Sky?" They'd made him a prophet, of course. "Lying" then takes on the comically skeptical and yet uplifting tone of the 1991 Albert Brooks comedy "Defending Your Life."

But Gervais and his co-writer director Matthew Robinson seem to confuse "truth" with "superficiality" and "tactlessness." It's not "truth" that makes people blurt out their every thought — "Your baby is so ugly!" "I don't find you attractive." Simple tact isn't "lying," it's not saying anything.

The filmmakers take tired short cuts — a having-a-good-day montage is underscored with "Mister Blue Sky," love triumphs to the tune of Supertramp's "Give a Little Bit," tunes that ought to have been retired from romantic comedies by 1985.

"Lying" is funny rather than hilarious, thought-provoking rather than prat-falling. Like the first Gervais film comedy, "Ghost Town," it takes a thin concept and hurls the acrid, sarcastic and slow-burning Gervais at it until the humor gives way to a measure of understanding and sweetness we'd never expect.

The honest truth? This "Invention" is worth seeing more for the discussion on the ride home than the many laughs.

Ricky Gervais' latest project, a feature film, "The Invention of Lying" imagines a world where he alone can lie.

FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
BUY 6 BOTTLES OF WINE WITH YOUR REUSABLE FOUR SEASON WINE BAG AND RECEIVE 10% OFF
LIQUOR SPECIALS

Johnnie Walker Blue Label 750ml	$209.99	Chopin Polish Vodka 750 ml	$32.99
Hennessy Cognac X.O. 750 ml	$129.99	Hennessy Cognac V.S. 750 ml	$30.99
Grand Marnier 100yr Centenaire 750 ml	$120.99	J&B Scotch 1.75 liter	$29.99
Ardbeg Airigh Nambeist 750 ml	$99.99	Ciroc Snap Frost Vodka 750 ml	$29.99
Bushmills 1608 Anniversary 750 ml	$99.99	Belvedere Pure Vodka 750 ml	$28.99
Johnnie Walker Gold Label 750ml	$74.99	Captain Morgan Spiced Rum 1.75 liter	$27.99
Oronoco Reserva Rum 1.75 liter	$59.99	Nuvo L'Esprit de Paris 750 ml	$27.99
Tierras 100% Organic Tequila Reposado 750 ml	$39.99	10 Cane Rum 750 ml	$26.99
Hennessy Black Cognac 750 ml	$38.99	Bailey's Irish Cream* 750 ml	$22.99
Grand Marnier Cordon Rouge 750 ml	$34.99	*Including Orioginal Caramel Coffee, Mint Chocolate
Tanqueray Gin 1.75 liter	$34.99	Jose Cuervo Tequila* 1.0 liter	$21.99
Bushmills BlackBush 750ml	$34.99	*Including Gold, Citrico, Tropina, Oranjo
Glenmorangie 10yr 750 ml	$34.99	Ketel One Vodka 750 ml	$20.99
		Ketel One Citreon Vodka 750 ml	$20.99
		Myer's Platinum Rum 1.75 liter	$19.99
		Smirnoff RTS Cocktails 1.75 liter	$18.99
		Jeremiah Weed RTS Half & Half 1.75 liter	$18.99
		Jeremiah Weed Sweet Tea Vodka* 750 ml	$16.99
		*Including Original Peach and Bourbon
		Parrot Bay Key Lime Rum 750 ml	$15.99
		Captain Morgan Parrot Bay Rum* 750 ml	$15.99
		*Including Coconut Mango, Pineapple Passion Fruit
		Smirnoff Twist Flavored Vodka* 750 ml	$12.99
		*Including Strawberry, Watermelon, Raspberry, Black Cherry
		Smirnoff Pear Flavored Vodka 750 ml	$12.99
		Smirnoff Pinapple Flavored Vodka 750 ml	$12.99

SALE 10/1 - 10/14 333 Russell St., Rte. 9, Hadley, MA
584-8174 • Mon.-Sat. 9AM-11PM • Sun. Noon-11PM
3100074

Say 'I do' to wedding do-it-yourself tips for any occassion boxes for each of the over 200 guests was enough to boggle the mind.

WEDDING from page 5

I may not have had much to do with the DIY ethic behind my brother's wedding, but I did have my fair share of do-it-yourself almost-emergencies. In preparing for the rehearsal dinner, I found that the pair of pants I had packed – my "good pants" – suddenly didn't fit properly. I managed to get a hold of a pair of pinstripe pants which already fit me properly around the waist and through the leg; the only problem was that they were about six or seven inches too long.

In the practice of making clothes, some corner-cutters like to use a sort of hem tape: you stick the double-sided tape between folds of your clothes and iron it to make it stick more permanently.

I didn't have the money to buy any, nor did I know of a place in Latrobe, Pennsylvania that sold it (though there must have been a store selling it; Latrobe consists primarily of malls), so I resorted to rolling a few pieces of masking tape (I had packed it just in case one of these situations arose) and used it in the same fashion, just without the ironing.

It took about five minutes to get the makeshift hem completely even and nobody noticed what I had done to the pants. I thought I was on the verge of a style crisis and would have to resort to looking terrible in those ill-fitting pants, but with just a little bit of tape and a couple of minutes I was saved.

Seeing what was done in preparation for Patrick and Angie's wedding without spending very much was incredibly inspiring. They must have saved hundreds of dollars by doing a few things themselves using inexpensive alternatives to traditional decorations.

So, next time you're decorating for any kind of shindig, try doing things on the cheap. It will give your event a sort of kitschy aesthetic and your guests will appreciate the time you took.

Ellie Rulon-Miller can be reached at erulonmi@student.umass.edu.

Editor's Note: Due to an editing error, the article, "Scantily-clad interns give working girls a bad name" in Tuesday's September 29 edition was incorrectly attributed to Jessica Starling Jones. The authors are Sahyna Murphy and Cal Scannell. We apologize for this error.

UM finds success on the road

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

Winning games at home is only half the battle, road games are what can make or break a team's season.

As the No. 9 ranked team in the Kookaburra/NEHCA Division I National Coaches Poll, the Massachusetts field hockey team has proven just how well it can perform away from home this season.

Through the first nine games, the Minutewomen have played five in Amherst, one in a neutral setting, and three on the road. While holding a 7-2 overall record, they are undefeated with three wins away from home so far.

Despite their success, coach Justine Sowry explained that playing well on the road has not been a voiced point of emphasis for the team.

"Whether we play home or away, we try not to consider it a factor," Sowry said. "We set our goals for the game and try to achieve them as a team."

The Minutewomen have recently played better on the road beginning last year when the team went 6-2 in the regular season. The season prior to that, the team only won five of its eleven road games.

UMass will need to continue to play well when it travels with six of the next eight games all being away from home. To begin the road stretch, the Minutewomen will have another challenging opponent this weekend when they head to New York to face No. 6 Syracuse (9-1).

While UMass has played and done well against ranked opponents this season, it has yet to face one on the road. The Minutewomen were fortunate to have played previously top 20 ranked teams Providence (3-6) and Iowa (3-5) at home where both the crowd and field were to their advantage.

"It's great playing at home because of the support and certainly on this surface, we play some really nice hockey," Sowry said. "When we go away, we have to make some adjustments with the surface we play on. We haven't had any trouble with various surfaces we've played on though."

In their three wins on the road, the Minutewomen have shown the ability to flex the muscles of their strong defense as well as strike quickly on offense.

Sophomore goalkeeper Alesha Widdall, who's performed well all season, has been able to stop opposing teams' attacks on the road. She recorded a shutout in a 1-0 win against Albany and has allowed no more than a single goal in each of the other two victories against Vermont and Quinnipiac.

On the other side of the ball, junior captain Katie Kelly has been the sparkplug for the offense, leading the team in scoring on the road and for the season. Four of Kelly's six goals have come away from home with two being the eventual game-winning scores.

The veterans have expectedly played well but it's the younger players who have surprised and been unfazed by playing on opposing fields. Freshman Kara Charochak has come into a prominent role as of late, scoring two of her three goals in the last two road games. In its last game, UMass had three freshman players contribute with scores in a 7-1 smashing of Quinnipiac. Along with Charochak, Kate Heineman and Nicole Cordero tallied a score, their first and second career goals, respectively.

"We're coming together at the right time and overall, I'm pleased with how the experienced players have played and how the incoming freshmen have contributed."

The ability to bring your best game on an oppositions' field is valuable, and that's what the Minutewomen have been able to do so far. With the schedule showing more away games, UMass will look to continue its success on the road as it delves into Atlantic 10 Conference play in the next few weeks.

Jay Asser can be reached at jasser@student.umass.edu.

Minutewomen take on rival Saturday circle we need to step up and be more aggressive," Widdall said.

F. HOCKEY from page 10

The Bulldogs (5-3) aren't necessarily as aggressive as Syracuse or even UMass but they score an average of two goals per game on the road this season; led by forward Ashley McCauley's eight goals and midfielder Ashley Cantor's 10 assists. Midfielder/backs Erin Carter and Marissa Waldemore each have three goals this season.

To stop someone who sees the field as well as Cantor means stopping a player who makes everyone around them play better. She has an assist in all but one of Yale's eight games this season, including three games in which the Bulldogs won by two goals or less.

While it makes it difficult to stop a team when one player is so effective yet unselfish, Cantor does have glaring tendencies.

Four of McCauley's goals came by way of an assist from Cantor. Naturally, McCauley needs a body on her at all times during the game because she is the Bulldog's most obvious scoring threat, but even more so does Cantor. Taking McCauley out of the game only allows Cantor to find more teammates for scores, but making Cantor a non-factor forces other players to outlet the ball and only Julia Weiser has more than three assists on the season.

Yale's goals-against total on the road is two as well and Katie Bolling and Charlotte Goins split time in goal with Bolling spending more time between the pipes than Goins.

The two goalies account for 21 saves on the road. The Bulldogs featured the freshman Bolling as the primary goalie in their previous two games so she should see more time over Goins this weekend if not the entire game.

Mike Gillmeister can be reached at mgillmei@student.umass.edu.

UMass hopes for more goals

SOCCER from page 10

the second half, and so we talk about each week, trying to get better, and I felt in the second half, we didn't get better," Koch said. "So, we look at the game Saturday as another opportunity to move the ball better then we did today, to work a little bit better off the ball better than we did today, and continue to defend better."

The Rams (2-5-1) have won just two games this season, against Marist and Manhattan, and recently tied Columbia Tuesday, 1-1. Fordham leads the A-10 in offsides calls, registering a 2.71 average per game, and are third to last in the conference overall standings.

"They're a team that just makes it difficult for you to play, and they're not going to make glaring mistakes or give you goals," Koch said. "You have to beat them, and the longer they stay in the game, the more they believe they can beat you, and if you make a mistake and give them an opportunity, they're pretty good at pouncing on you."

Much like the Minutemen, the Rams have had freshmen make an impact, as forward Veer Lakhan-Joseph has two goals on four shots so far this season. Along with Lakhan-Joseph, Tim Richardson and Marcus Axelsson have helped offensively, but the Rams have been outscored 13-4 in 2009.

"They're a good team to play because it's a good test," Koch said. "They're tough to play because they aren't going to give you anything, so we need to come out and play a little bit better to beat them."

Last season, in the midst of a six game unbeaten streak, UMass defeated the Rams on the road, 2-1, as redshirt sophomore Sam DeNormandie scored the game winning goal and his first career goal as a member of the Minutemen. DeNormandie has played in five games so far this season, scoring one goal while helping a defense that is in the A-10. After its two game homestand, UMass will head to Ohio to open its conference schedule against Xavier on Oct. 9 before taking on Dayton Oct. 11.

David Brinch can be reached at dbrinch@student.umass.edu.

Goalkeeper Piekos among nations best

KOCH from page 10

the Minutemen is no easy task. Asking a former third-string keeper to be among collegiate soccer's best is even more of a stretch.

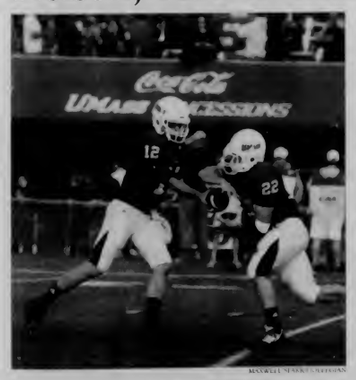
Enter Chris Piekos, who after sitting behind Simmons as a freshman is now among the best keepers in the NCAA with the top save percentage (.955) and has one of the best goals-against averages (0.22) in college soccer. He has also helped the Minutemen (3-1-3) to three of their four shutouts this season.

In the A-10, Piekos is No. 1 in both goals-against average and save percentage, all while maintaining an undefeated record. Piekos's three shutouts are second in the A-10, to Duquesne's Colin Thorp (four).

Piekos's first and only goal allowed of the season was on Sept. 1 against then-No. 24 Boston University, who tied UMass, 1-1.

Amick move paying off

Since the beginning of the year, Koch wanted to play junior Stuart Amick at his natural position in the midfield, but wasn't sure if he had enough depth on defense to make the move.



But with the way the defense has been performing, the Minutemen aren't in need of much help in the back with a 0.52 goals-against average. Putting Amick at midfield has created several advantages for UMass with the game against the Raiders being his best example of what he brings to the team.

Amick got his first assist of the season to put the Minutemen up 3-0 after he dribbled past a defender only to be cornered between the goal line and the defender. After having his first shot deflected, he found forward Mark DeSantis on a cross.

"He's probably one of our best attacking midfielders and being able to put him in the midfield only makes him more dangerous," Koch said on moving Amick to midfield. "He goes forward as well as anyone we have and what he does even better is get on the end of crosses from the off-ball side. He gets the balls that not too many people can get to."

Adam Miller can be reached at ajmill@student.umass.edu.

Nelson, Havens leading CAA

Junior Kyle Havens hands off to tailback Jonathan Hernandez in last weekend's game against Stony Brook.

FOOTBALL from page 10

took the defensive coordinator's job at Maryland, it was expected that the defense, which finished eighth in the conference last year, would drop off even further.

The defense, however, has returned to its old form. After letting up 17 points against Stony Brook, UMass is currently second in the conference in scoring defense, letting up 13.8 points per game.

The Minutemen's success on defense has been due in large part to the team's success in forcing turnovers. So far this season, UMass has picked off seven passes, forced and recovered four fumbles and the special teams have a blocked punt.

After the Minutemen trounced Albany 44-7 in their home opener, senior defensive tackle Brandon Collier said that "UMass defense is back." While they have not yet entered the maw of the CAA schedule, the numbers the Minutemen have put up back such a claim.

Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu.

Crazy about Sports?
Then come write for the Collegian
Contact Jeffrey R. Larn
Sports@DailyCollegian.c

If You've Got a Plan We've Got a Van!
POTTER'S
AUTO & TRUCK RENTAL
Insurance Replacement Rates
FREE PICK-UP
• Direct Billing to Insurance Company
• Locally Owned & Operated
• 7 & 15 Passenger Vans
• UMass Purchase Orders, MHEC Rates
North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair & Glass Replacement
78 Sunderland Rd., North Amherst, MA
(413) 549-RENT (7368)
www.pottersauto.com
(One mile North of UMass - on bus route)

Rolling Green
All Rents Include: heat, hot water, and electricity!
Move-in Special:
$99 security deposit.
NO application fees.
NO non-refundable move-in fee.
1 bedroom: $980*
2 bedroom: $1135*
2 bedroom townhouse: $1275*
3 bedroom townhouse: $1500*
4 bedroom townhouse: $1995*
Contact us:
(413) 253-3000
rollinggreenamherst@eqr.com
*Pricing fluctuates. All pricing listed is based on a 12 month lease. Shorter term leases are available. Please contact us for availability.

555 deal
Three Medium One-Topping Pizzas
$5.55 Each!
Domino's Pizza
413 - 256 - 8911
OPEN LATE NIGHT TILL 4 AM!

THE ONLY THING GROWING FASTER THAN OUR GRADUATE PROGRAMS IS OUR REPUTATION.
Biomedical Sciences
Cardiovascular Perfusion
Computer Information Systems
Education – Elementary Education – Secondary
Educational Leadership
Interactive Communications
Journalism
Law
MBA-CFA® Track (Chartered Financial Analyst)
MBA/HCM (Health Care Management)
MBA/SCM (Supply Chain Management)
MBA/JD (joint degree in business and law)
Molecular & Cell Biology
Nurse Practitioner
Pathologists' Assistant
Physician Assistant
Public Relations
Radiologist Assistant
Graduate Online Programs
Interactive Communications
MBA
Occupational Therapy (post-professional)
Organizational Leadership
Learn more: www.quinnipiac.edu/gradstudies
Graduate Programs: graduate@quinnipiac.edu
Graduate Online Programs: quonlineadmissions@quinnipiac.edu
Law School: ladm@quinnipiac.edu
QUINNIPIAC UNIVERSITY
1-800-462-1944 | Hamden, Connecticut

WE WANT YOUR COMICS!
Put your comics in front of thousands of readers.
Questions? Comments? E-mail us: comics@dailycollegian.com
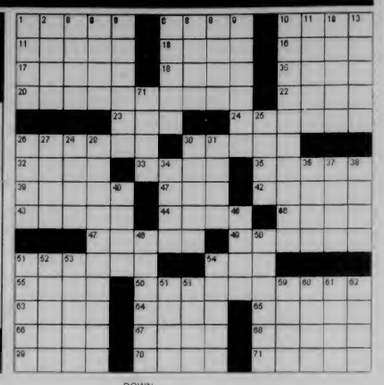
Friend us on Facebook: "Collegian Comix"

COMICS



CROSSWORD

amherst cinema
Fri Oct 2 - Thu Oct 8
CAPITALISM: A LOVE STORY 2:15 4:45 7:30 10:00 +11:30am Sat & Sun
AMREEKA 1:45 4:15* 7:15 9:30 +11:45am Sat & Sun *NO 4:15 Tue & Wed
THE SEPTEMBER ISSUE 2:00* 5:00 7:00* 9:15 (10:15 Thu) *NO 2:00 Sat & Sun *NO 7:00 Tue & Thu
28 Amity St. Downtown Amherst www.amherstcinema.org (413) 253-2547

PLEASANT STREET THEATER
Fri Oct 2 - Thu Oct 8
Bright Star 5:00 7:30 10:00 +2:30 Sat & Sun +10:30am 2:30 Wed
SERAPHINE 4:45 7:15 +2:15 Sat & Sun +10:00am 2:15 Wed
TAKING WOODSTOCK 9:45
27 Pleasant St. Downtown Northampton www.pleasantstheater.org (413) 584-5848

LA PIAZZA
pizza • and more
• specialty pizza
• wings
• calzones
• pasta
• salads
• desserts
OCMP Free Delivery
(413) 253-6444
www.lapiazzarestorante.us
2 lbs. boneless chicken wings with 1 order of mozzarella sticks $23.99
Pickup or delivery only. Expires 10/9/09

"Club Nights" at the MONKEY BAR
10/1 DJ Biggz, Spinning Top 40 Dance, Hip Hop, Techno
Doors open at 10:30 pm
10/2 The Alchemystics
A live Hip Hop, Duh, Soul Reggae Sound with DJ Construc in the Front
Doors open at 10:30 pm
10/3 $5 Special Guest DJ
Doors open at 11 pm
10/6 Alize' Academy Night
Alize' flavored snowcones
Alize' tour bus with free giveaway
Video Shout-Outs, Open Alize' shot bar
MTV featured DJ Izza Kizza
Doors open at 10:30 pm
413-259-1600
63 North Pleasant Street
Amherst, MA 01002
www.mymonkeybar.com
21+

MIX TAPE THURSDAYS
HOSTED BY DJ VID KID
HIPHOP DANCE R&B MORE
EVERY WEEK DOWNSTAIRS AT AMHERST BREWING CO.
NO COVER - DRINK SPECIALS
BEST DANCE PARTY IN TOWN
21 PLUS

Rocket Loaf by Travis Dandro travisdandro.com

ACROSS
1. Pore
6. Inner surface of the hand
10. Historical periods
14. Fortuneteller's card
15. Chocolate cookie
16. A type of clamp
17. Glorify
18. Utilizer
19. Basilica area
20. Woodland
22. Require
23. Gesture of assent
24. Things that happen
26. Order of business
30. Collection of maps
32. Exploded star
33. 5280 feet
35. British biscuit
39. A yellow-green color
41. Cacophony
42. Male singing range
43. Improvise
44. Pledge
46. Religious sisters
47. Objectives
49. Beginning
51. Decrease in size
54. Donkey
55. Partially carbonized vegetable matter
56. Unable to read
63. Hindu princess
64. State of mind
65. Unit of capacitance
66. Therefore
67. A military installation
68. Flip over
69. Biblical garden
70. Lyric poems
71. Porous

DOWN
1. Ragout
2. Cab
3. Verbal
4. Cast
5. Go to
6. 16 ounces
7. Backside
8. Bottom of the barrel
9. Choice bit
10. Tending to vanish like vapor
11. Mature
12. A useful or valuable quality
13. Beginnings of plants
21. Wander
25. Gigantic
26. Dwarf buffalo
27. A valuable metal
28. Wickedness
29. Pilotage
30. Assumed name
31. Canvas dwelling
34. False god
36. Burden
37. Not a single one
38. At one time (archaic)
40. Black, in poetry
45. Party thrower
48. With hands on hips
50. Beneficial
51. Binge
52. Took heed
53. Cooktop
54. Assistants
57. Burden
58. Fail to win
59. Sexual assault
60. Territory
61. Armored vehicle
62. Swirl

HVZ by Mike Siipola

Hits Now 94.3 FM
The Valley's Hit Music Now in HD on 99.3 HD2
www.hits943.com

SUDOKU

4	8					5		6
				8				3
3		2					9
2					7
		9						1
			6			4		7
	9				5		1	8
		5	1
6			3

T Shirts & Sweatshirts in 1-3 Days!
sunraise printing
Custom Printed Tees
Student Discounts
586-7133
sunraiseprinting.com
Hadley, MA 01035

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Just because you use soap bars doesn't mean you need to mourn the whale from "Free Willy."

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
"Kiss the rings" is not a great welcoming statement.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Warm up during the cold nights with Little-Foot and the Land Before Time.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
I've seen your future. You are one crazy, decrepit monkey skeleton.

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Summon John Conor to defeat the newest Terminator model: H1N1.

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Super powers aren't always fun. Superman "doing the dirty" results in homicide.

leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Explore disappointment by pretending each building you're about to enter has a moonbounce.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Close your eyes. Picture a cancerous lung. Your day is now ruined.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
God is cheating on your prayers with Chester Cheeto.

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
English majors are in such constant pain because they're always being "struck" by something.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Glaceau didn't make "Smart Water" as a solution to your GPA.

capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Einstein was half right. "E" = pizza, as well.

CLASSIFIEDS

EMPLOYMENT
Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 162.

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

Movie Extras, Actors, Models Wanted - Up to $300/day! All Looks Needed! Call NOW 1-800-458-9303.

RESEARCH STUDY
Join a Research study conducted through the UMass Communication Department! Watch 80 mins of T.V. News, answer survey questions, and earn up to $10 for your time! Contact Lisa Wortman at Lisadenice@gmail.com to sign up!

WANTED
Volunteers needed for online-study of college students and antidepressant medication. paselton@nursing.umass.edu

ANNOUNCEMENTS
Montreal Party Weekends From $99 Includes Hotel, Bus, and Clubs montrealexpress.net (781)979-9001

GUITAR TEACHER
Professional Electric Guitar Teacher & Performer; Specializing in Jazz, Improv. Music Theory & Technique. Call (413)665-8794

MIKESMAZE DARWIN!
FOOD, FUN, SPUDZOOKAS!
Weekends & Holidays 10am-5pm thru Nov 1
S. Main Street Rt. 47 Sunderland
www.mikesmaze.com
413-665-8331

Big Y WORLD CLASS MARKET
Only The Best..:
SCORE BIG!
UNIVERSITY DRIVE, AMHERST, MA • 253-0416
WE ACCEPT OCMP! VISIT US AT WWW.BIGY.COM

Blue Plate special
From Our Kitchen
$4.95
AVAILABLE 11:30AM - 1:30PM AND 4:30PM - 6:30PM DAILY
Not Available In All Stores. For A Limited Time Only.
Monday Only Salisbury Steak With Gravy
Tuesday Only 3 Piece Fried Chicken Dark Meat
Wednesday Only Tender Roast Turkey With Gravy
Thursday Only Roast Beef With Gravy
Friday Only Homestyle Meatloaf With Gravy
Available All Week Chicken Tenders* With Fries *Does Not Include Two Sides
Served with your choice of TWO of the following sides:
Buttered Corn, Macaroni & Cheese, Mashed Potatoes

APPETITE STIMULUS PLAN
FROM OUR KITCHEN
Bigger Bird Rotisserie Chicken
All Natural, Cooked Weight, 2.5 lb
Serves 3 to 4
6.98
Large Grinder
12 inch, Assorted Varieties
On a White or Wheat Roll
Made To Order
4.85
Large Pizza
Cheese or Pepperoni, 18 Inch
Made To Order
7.95
8 Piece Fried Chicken
2 Drumsticks, 2 Thighs, 2 Wings
7.95
For A Limited Time Only.

FEED THE WHOLE TEAM!
FRIDAYS ONLY!
FAMILY SIZE CHEESE PIZZA
40 Pieces
$12
SATURDAYS & SUNDAYS ONLY!
30" GRINDER
YOUR CHOICE OF HAM, TURKEY OR ROAST BEEF
$9
Cannot Be Combined With Any Other Offer.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 1, 2009

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutemen go for fourth in a row

MAXWELL SPARK/COLLEGIAN

Junior Ben Arikian changes direction to get past a defender in UMass' 3-0 victory over Colgate on Tuesday. The Minutemen have outscored opponents 6-0 in its past three games, all of which have been victories.

JACOB FELDER/COLLEGIAN

UMass men's soccer coach Sam Koch has led the Minutemen to three NCAA Tournament appearences and earned a spot in the 2007 NCAA national semifinals. Koch will look for his 201st victory this Saturday.

Arikian and Co. playing strong offense, defense

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachsuetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch is arguably one of the most successful coaches in program history.

On Tuesday, Koch got his 200th win at the helm of the Minutemen, and riding a three game winning streak, UMass will face a familiar opponent in unfamiliar circumstances.

The Minutemen (3-1-3) face Fordham Saturday at 1 p.m., a usual Atlantic 10 opponent, but because of scheduling, the game doesn't count as a conference match-up for UMass.

"They're very organized," Koch said. "They will get players behind the ball, they will defend very well as a group, their goalkeeping is good, and their back four is pretty good."

The Minutemen have been impressive as of late, outscoring opponents 6-0 in its past four games, while holding opponents to the A-10 best goals against average (0.60).

UMass defeated Colgate 3-0, Tuesday afternoon, as the offense scored all three tallies in the first half alone, and the defense allowed just eight total shots and three corner kicks. Goalkeeper Chris Pickos was not really challenged in the match, but holds the nation's best save percentage with .955. He and redshirt sophomore Shane Curran-Hays have been impressive, alternating games, as Curran-Hays will likely face the Rams on Saturday.

Regardless of the outcome on Tuesday, Koch was not impressed by how his team came out in the second half against the Raiders on Tuesday.

"We were upset we didn't do some things better in

See SOCCER on page 7

Koch gets 200th win at UMass, Amick to midfield works out

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The win over Colgate on Tuesday signified more than an arrival of an offense waiting to break out. It also meant Massachusetts men's soccer coach Sam Koch's 200th victory in his 19th season with UMass.

His 200th career win was on October 3, 2003 in a 3-0 win over George Washington and Koch continues to produce winning seasons on a regular basis. Out of 19 years as head coach, 14 have been winning seasons while coaching two All-Americans at UMass in Jeff Deren (2001, 2002) and Zack Simmons (2007).

Koch recently established himself as one of the best coaches in collegiate soccer as a back-to-back NSCAA National Coach of the Year Finalist with a lifetime coaching record of 258-186-51. He has also coached three teams to NCAA Tournaments including a College Cup in 2007, where the Minutemen pulled off an upset over No. 1 seeded Boston College.

His success at Rudd Field has given his team a distinct advantage at home, earning the name "Fort Rudd" as UMass boasts a 65-21-9 home record in the past 10 years.

Koch's teams have made the Atlantic 10 tournament 11 times, with four regular season championships and two tournament championships.

His success has come from preaching a defensive-minded style of play, which has been the biggest strength for the Minutemen. They have currently allowed the fewest goals (four) of any team in the A-10 with one game left in the non-conference schedule.

Pickos among nation's best

Asking anyone to follow former goalkeeper Simmon's career with

See KOCH on page 7

McIntyre earns CAA ROW

BY NICK O'MALLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Freshman linebacker Perry McIntyre became the second member of the Massachusetts football team to earn Colonial Athletic Association Rookie of the Week honors this year with his performance in UMass' 44-17 win over Stony Brook.

McIntyre did not start the game, but finished it with a team-high eight tackles after senior linebacker Kurt Filler left with an injury. Freshman linebacker D.J. Adeoba won the honor in the team's season opener against Kansas State after he returned a blocked punt for a touchdown in the 21-17 loss.

The freshman fit in perfectly with rest of the linebacking corps that is short on experience with sophomore Tyler Holmes and former defensive back Eric Dickson. But, like the rest of the defense, McIntyre's success didn't come as a surprise.

"Perry's been with us from the beginning in terms of, being a true freshman, being ready to step up and step in and has been in the rotation at linebacker and has played as a starter from our special teams right from the get-go, and did a great job the past week, and got, I think, the correct recognition for his efforts," UMass coach Kevin Morris said.

The ability for players like McIntyre to step in and have such success is something that Morris sees as a major strength for his team. With injuries popping up across the roster, many younger players on the team were asked to step up. For the most part, UMass hasn't skipped a beat.

"It means that you've got a team that's got some foundation to it," Morris said. "And when you have holes and then [you have] the young guys to plug up those holes and they actually perform at a really high level. And that's the difference between a team that can compete for a championship or not.

"At this point in time, when we have all the makings of being able to compete and we'll see if we can continue how we've been playing if those young guys continue to step up and do a great job."

Maroon and white-hot offense

Whether it's because of injury or depth, the Minutemen have spread around the ball on offense in 2009. So far this season, three receivers have 10 or more receptions, running backs Tony Nelson and Jon Hernandez both have over 250 yards rushing and quarterback Kyle Havens has completed at least one pass to 11 different receivers.

It's worked so far this season, as UMass is currently tied for second in the conference in scoring offense (33.8 points per game).

The Minutemen have been the most prolific offense in the conference in terms of yards (419 yards per game) but have struggled at times to put the ball in the endzone. With 10 field goals off the foot of kicker Armando Cuko, UMass has made the most in the conference.

Running back Tony Nelson currently leads the conference in yards per game on the ground (114) while quarterback Kyle Havens is averaging the most yards per game in the air (243.5)

Defense exceeding expectations

When former coach Don Brown

See FOOTBALL on page 7

MAXWELL SPARK/COLLEGIAN

UMass' defense has been one of the best so far this year in the CAA. It ranks second this season in points allowed per game (13.8).

Minutewomen off to face Holy Cross

BY BEN LAMBERT
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Massachusetts women's tennis team visits Holy Cross today, the first time that the Minutewomen have visited the Crusaders since the spring of 2008 when they shutout the Crusaders 7-0.

The Crusaders are coming off a 5-2 victory over Hartford this past Tuesday. They won five-of-six singles matches to cruise to the victory. With the win, Holy Cross improved to 1-2 on the season.

UMass sophomore Magdalena Ploch will match up with senior Kirsten Meahl at No. 1 singles. Meahl is currently 1-2 on the season, while Ploch stands at 2-1 with her work at the Eastern Collegiate Invitational. Meahl became only the second Holy Cross player to ever earn All-Patriot League honors last season, as she was named to the second team. She is also the team captain for the Crusaders and went 14-12 overall last year.

At No. 2 singles, UMass freshman Julia Comas will square off with sophomore Carolyn Chandley. Chandley holds a 1-2 record, with her lone victory coming last match against Hartford. She went 14-12 last season in singles play, which was tied for the team lead.

The No. 3 singles match will pit UMass junior Kaitlyn Carpenter against sophomore Emily Marr. Marr stands at 2-1 on the season with victories over Siena and Hartford. She went 14-8 last year overall, with her .636 singles winning percentage ranking second on the team.

All three singles competitors for Holy Cross are members of the Patriot League Academic Honor Roll.

Several players have combined to play No. 4 and No. 5 singles this year for Holy Cross in their three matches, including senior Ivette Konopka, senior Kathryn Wilkie, sophomore Jen Daffron and senior Hailee Lange. The Crusaders currently have a 2-4 record between the No. 4 and No. 5 singles this season.

Sophomore Gabriella Jannotta and freshman Chantal Swissaz will be their opponents for UMass.

Fresh off a No. 1 doubles title at the Eastern Collegiate Invitational, junior Candyce Boney and senior Maude Lechuyse will team up to face Meahl and Chandley. Meahl was 10-14 last year in doubles action, while Chandley was 14-12. The Holy Cross duo has gone 0-3 on the season thus far.

UMass will send junior Tanisha Hodgson and freshman Jocelyn Providence out to face the Crusaders' team of Marr and sophomore Emma Rodnik. Marr went 10-12 last year overall at doubles, while Rodnik was able to muster a 10-15 record. This combination of players currently holds a 1-1 record on the season.

Hodgson and Providence won the consolation bracket at the Eastern Collegiate Invitational on Sunday after falling in a competitive first-round match.

This upcoming match will be the first time that the Minutewomen have played on the new tennis courts at Holy Cross, which opened for the season. The match is set to begin at 1 p.m.

Ben Lambert can be reached at wblambert@gmail.com

See TENNIS on page 7

UM gets rematch with 'Cuse

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

Jill Powers controls the ball in a contest last fall. The forward will be depended on this weekend as UMass travels to No. 6 Syracuse.

BY MIKE GILLMEISTER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The goalkeeper position personifies the heart of a defense. Not only is the goalie the last line of defense on the field but also the one directing other defenders on the field.

The Massachusetts field hockey team faces two opponents this weekend in No. 6 Syracuse and Yale whose goalies are among the nation's best, but UMass goalie Alesha Widdall can't be forgotten, either.

Widdall ranks eighth in the nation with a .809 save percentage, allowing nine goals in 608 minutes this season. Leann Stiver of the Orange (9-1) has a .800 save percentage after giving up six goals in almost 250 minutes, fewer than Widdall.

Stiver's goals-against average in six games at home is .666 but Widdall is even better on the road. In four games away from Garber Field this season, she gave up one goal and made 10 saves.

The last time the Minutewomen (7-2) faced Syracuse at J.S. Coyne Stadium, the Orange beat UMass in the opening round of the 2008 NCAA tournament, 3-2 and Syracuse won prior to that at Garber Field, 5-4.

In the game at Garber Field, Shannon Taylor got the best of Widdall, scoring two goals on the then-freshman. However, Taylor graduated last spring. Minutewoman forwards Jill Powers (2) and Cher King (1) each had goals in that game and both expect to see significant time against Syracuse. So far this season, the duo account for four goals and six assists.

"I don't think we were mentally prepared for the first game," said UMass coach Justine Sowry. "In terms of getting motivated for Syracuse, it'll all comes from within. I don't think we need any exterior motivation from me at all. The girls are really looking forward to playing them again."

Junior Katie Kelly and Makaela Potts are two leaders on the team who should play important roles this weekend as well. Kelly leads UMass with six goals and Potts has a team-leading six assists to go along with her four goals.

Twelve on-field warnings for excessively physical play this season show that the Orange are a physical team and that they will try and force their way into the circle to get their shots and potentially force penalty corners, an area where Syracuse excels.

SU has 85 corners so far this season, compared to the Minutewomen's 58. Seven of UMass' 23 goals came from penalty corners.

Widdall believes that UMass' finesse style of play can combat the Orange.

"We can outlet the ball very well and when they're in the

See F. HOCKEY on page 7

the daily collegian

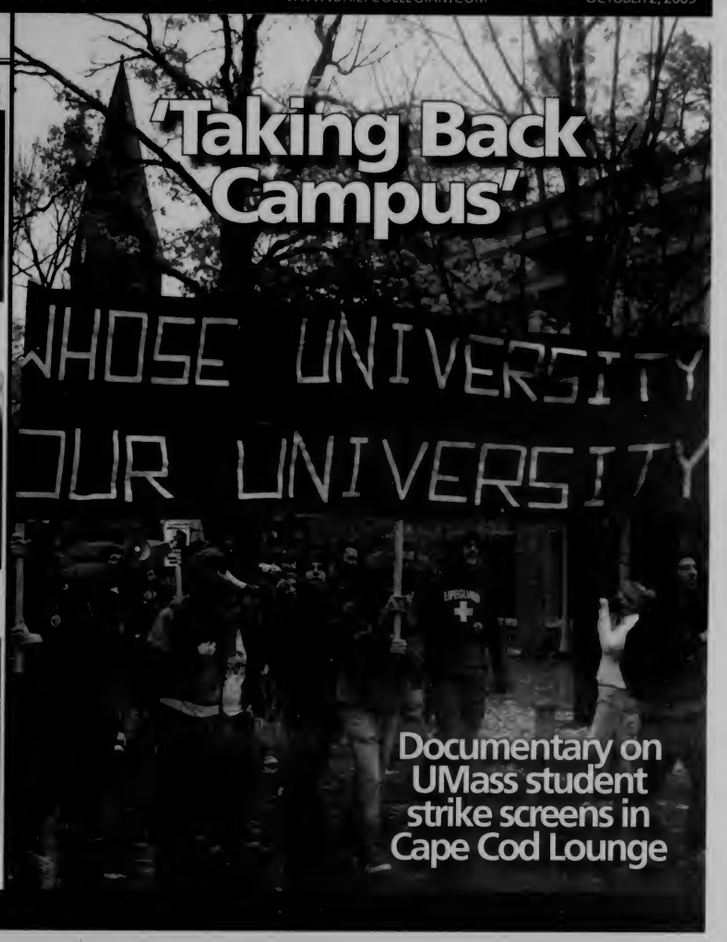
THE COMMONWEALTH'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM OCTOBER 2, 2009

inside this issue:

Soccer faces A-10 foes

SEE PAGE 12

Where will you be?



SEE PAGE 8

Elections in limbo

SEE PAGE 4

THE MASSACHUSETTS
DAILY COLLEGIAN

CXVIX
ISSUE 19

113 Campus Center University of Massachusetts Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief William McGuinness
Managing Editor S P Sullivan
Business Manager Daniel Jette
Production Manager Michael Sarkes
Night Supervisor Kirsten Swenson
Advertising Manager Michael Tortorici
Advertising Production Max Detmer
Arts & Living Editor Shayna Murphy
Comics Editor Annie Keithline
Editorial Editor Nick O'Malley
News Editor Nick Bush
Sports Editor Jeffrey R. Larnard
Web Editor Brian Wood
Photo Editor Matthew Harrison
IT Manager Victor Jacek
Asst. Business Manager Matt Zolneirz
Assistant Advertising Nicole Jacinto
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Distribution Manager Norman Provost
Classified Manager Katelyn Tamiho
Asst. Arts & Living Justin Gagnon
Asst. Arts & Living Elyse Horowitz
Asst. Arts & Living Cal Scannell
Assistant Comics Andrew Witts
Assistant Editorial Michael Phillis
Assistant Editorial Hannah Nelson
Assistant News Samuel Butterfield
Assistant News Alyssa Creamer
Assistant News Jenn Heshion
Assistant Sports David Brinch
Assistant Sports Mike Gillmeister
Assistant Sports Adam Miller
Assistant Photo Maxwell Sparr
Assistant Multimedia Sara Cody
Assistant Multimedia Chris Shores

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE SIGNAL IN 1907, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1956. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL WEEKDAYS BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 3:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
ON STAFF TODAY

NIGHT EDITOR
NICK O'MALLEY

COPY EDITOR
HANNAH MCGOLDRICK

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
MICHAEL SARKES

Documentary strikes campus

Student-made film screens at Cape Cod Lounge

By Michelle Williams
Collegian Staff

As the lights dimmed, over 50 University of Massachusetts students watched hundreds of current and former students storm the Whitmore Administration Building.

UMass junior Rosie Walunas, 20, of Sunderland, Mass. has been working on-and-off on the production of this film for about two years. After deciding this summer to make the over 20 hours of footage she had from the march into a documentary, Walunas sought out interviews with current and former students, administrators and activists who were involved in the march. Though she was a student while filming, Walunas said she is non-biased, hoping to show both sides of the protest and allow viewers to take their own stance on the issues.

Students had four issues they were fighting for: removing undercover police from the dorms, pushing the university to decrease student fees, increasing funding for diversity and student control over student housing.

Though filming starts with the march, students, including former Student Government Association (SGA) President Malcolm Chu, an organizer of the march, explained the years of student unrest over issues. Leading hundreds in the chant, "Ain't no power like the power of the students, because the power of the students don't stop," Chu spoke of how the administration has ignored the students for years and how the students needed to create a movement that could not be brushed aside.

Students within the documentary tell stories of UMass Police dressing as delivery personnel, knocking on dorms portraying themselves as students. Only after they found incriminating evidence would they announce themselves, and state that they could be in the dorms as state property. When faced with this issue, Joyce Hatch, then interim Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance and Budget Director said that the police were not allowed to enter the dorms as students were saying. Barbara O'Connor, then UMass Police Department Chief, denied that police were ever misrepresenting themselves as students or non-university personnel.

MATTHEW HARRISON/COLLEGIAN

UMass junior Rosie Walunas aired her new documentary on the November 2007 student strike Thursday in the Cape Cod Lounge.

Citing Daily Collegian articles, the documentary shows how the rate of increasing fees was more than 300 percent higher than the rate of inflation each year. Administration explained that they were receiving less funding from the state, Massachusetts being the state with the lowest funding per capita for higher education in the 2007-2008 school year. Students felt this forced them to take extra jobs and work extra hours, rather than focus on their studies as they wished to.

An African American student

See STRIKE on page 4

University Health Services • Mental Health Services
Support and Therapy Group Meetings • Fall, 2009

RELAXATION SKILLS TRAINING
Mondays, 3:30 – 5 p.m.
beginning Oct. 19
A three-session workshop to learn and practice relaxation techniques in a group setting. Attendance at all sessions expected.

MANAGING DEPRESSION
Tuesdays, 4 – 5:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 13
A three-session workshop on managing depression symptoms and developing healthy coping skills.

EXPERIENTIAL PSYCHOTHERAPY GROUP FOR GRADUATE STUDENTS
Tuesdays, 7 – 8:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 6
Focusing on self-exploration in a safe atmosphere.

LIVING WITH LOSS
Wednesdays, 4:30 – 5:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 7
A support group for undergraduate and graduate students dealing with the loss of someone close to them.

MINDFULNESS-BASED STRESS REDUCTION (MBSR)
Mondays, 5 – 6:30 p.m.
beginning Oct. 5
An experiential ten-session workshop aimed at improving self-awareness, lowering stress and enhancing health and wellbeing. Open enrollment throughout the semester.

EXPERIENTIAL PSYCHOTHERAPY GROUP FOR UNDERGRADUATE STUDENTS
Thursdays, 3:30 – 5 p.m.
beginning Oct. 8
Focusing on self-exploration in a safe atmosphere.

Pre-registration is required for all groups. To register, or for more information, call (413) 545-2337 or come to Mental Health Services, 127 Hills North, Monday – Friday, 8 a.m. – 5 p.m.

UMassAmherst

UMass increases aid despite budget issues

By Niina Heikkinen
Collegian Staff

Faced with substantial budget cuts and falling endowments, colleges and universities around the country are scrambling to find the funds to accommodate the growing need for financial aid from college students and their families.

According to a recent survey by The National Association for College Admissions Counseling (NACAC), 90 percent of colleges had seen an increase in applications for financial aid, and 74 percent said more of their students were receiving federal grant aid.

Within the Five College system, the University of Massachusetts, Smith College, Amherst College, Mount Holyoke College and Hampshire College, commitment to meeting the increased demand for financial aid has forced the schools to cut costs or find new sources of revenue.

This fall, UMass increased its need-based financial aid to students through a new grant called the Family Grant Program, said Executive Director of News and Media Relations, Ed Blaguszewski.

"This was done originally to help mitigate the larger fee increase but is still in place. For families with incomes up to $90,000, the student is awarded grant aid equal to tuition plus fees, now minus rebates," Blaguszewski said.

Last year, the university provided $198 million in federal state, corporate and institutionally financed aid to about 20,000 undergraduate and graduate students, according to the campus website. According to Blaguszewski, that figure is likely to increase this year.

The university is currently receiving a flood of federal funding as part of a state-wide effort to jump-start the economy. However, Chancellor Robert C. Holub warned in a message to the campus in June that the funding is only meant for this fiscal year, and long-term financing strategies were needed to eliminate UMass' $29 million base budget deficit.

"We must also remember that covering a base budget deficit with one-time funding causes the deficit to be carried to the next fiscal year; it does not eliminate budget reductions, it simply postpones them," Holub said.

At Mount Holyoke, the percentage of students receiving need-based financial aid shot up 10 percent from last year, said Director of Student Financial Services, Kathy Blaisdell. Even with a larger freshman class, the average amount of aid received per student has also gone up. Currently, close to 70 percent of students receive some form of need-based financial aid, according to the Mount Holyoke College website.

Blaisdell attributed the increasing demand for aid to a number of factors including a decline in personal assets and home equity, which affected students' ability to pay for college.

"There has been concern for the incoming class, unprecedented financial concern," said Blaisdell.

The NACAC survey found that nationwide, increasing class size was by far the most popular method used by colleges and universities for generating much needed revenue. Of the schools surveyed, 62.2 percent of public universities, and 68.7 percent of private col-

See BUDGET on page 5

JAMES WELVER/COLLEGIAN

UMass Chancellor Robert Holub addresses faculty last spring, explaining the administration's plans for fixing the budget. UMass has expanded need-based aid funding, but at the same time has increased student fees.

AMANDA JOHNSON/COLLEGIAN

Co-founder of anti-sex slave group Love146 Rob Morris speaks Wednesday to a group of UMass students about the modern sex slavery industry.

Anti-slavery group hosts discussion

By Jil Paniecnik
Collegian Staff

On Sept. 30 the University of Massachusetts hosted Rob Morris, guest-lecturer and leading member of Love146, a human rights advocacy group against the illegal practice of the sex slave trade.

Officially co-founded as a part of "Justice for Children International" by Rob Morris and three friends, the concept of Love146 began two years ago. Love146 is an organization devoted to hindering the sex slave trade and to healing rescued child-slaves and nurturing them for healthy lives.

According to Morris, the sex slave trade is the second most lucrative illegal business today, with an estimated 27 million enslaved people worldwide. This is more than twice as many enslaved people than when slavery was legal in the 19th century. Sex slavery is the abduction, coercion, or force of people to unwillingly participate in illegal prostitution and sexual exploitation. Many organizations and charities contribute to the abolition of sex slavery, the end of the exploitation of women and children, and the restoration of surviving victims. Love 146 is an organization active in these goals.

"Our organization has a very bold mission statement," said Morris, "the abolition of child sex slavery and exploitation and nothing less."

In 2002, Morris travelled to Southeast Asia with three friends to try and combat sex slavery, and to configure an organization to help former slaves recover from their abused history. The name Love146 derives from an experience Morris had while undercover at a sex slave brothel. He said that he had witnessed nameless, numbered children in red dresses being sold, auctioned and negotiated over, while children, wearing matching red dresses, sat watching cartoons on a small television.

"If anyone should have a sparkle in their eye, it's a kid," Morris said, but one little girl stood out amongst the others. She looked passed the television and stared at Morris with a strength and a fight in her eyes that inspired the name of his organization. Her number was 146.

Love146 concentrates on two areas of ending sex slavery: after-care and prevention. Dr. Gundelina Velazco is the director of the aftercare program of Love146. She has developed the idea of "safehomes," which exist throughout the world, that create a physically and psychologically

See LOVE on page 5

Elections results still in doubt: Complaint stalls ratification

By Sam Butterfield and Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

Another semester, another Student Government Association (SGA) election mired in controversy.

Because of a judicial complaint filed Thursday by Sylvan senatorial candidate Brad DeFlumeri, University of Massachusetts students will have to wait at least another week before the results of the 2009 SGA general election are ratified.

The complaint alleges that the election results are invalid because there was only one elections commissioner on site at Worcester Dining Commons between 5 p.m. and 6:27 p.m. on Tuesday, which would be a violation of the bylaws of the University.

DeFlumeri's complaint alleges that the lack of elections commissioners "represented harmful error" and "may have dissuaded potential voters from participating in the election process and therefore materially altered the outcome and nature of the voting."

Phone calls to DeFlumeri regarding the complaint were unreturned.

The complaint will be handled by the SGA's judiciary which, according to speaker Modesto Montero, cannot convene to rule on the complaint for a week.

"They can't meet until seven days after the official complaint has been filed," he said. "So they will not meet or vote until next Thursday, so the election cannot be ratified until then."

Despite the complaint, SGA Chancellor of Elections Chris Faulkner said the instance does not constitute harmful error.

"I was told there was no line, no one was prevented from voting," he said. "The reason it is not harmful error is because it couldn't have changed the nature of the vote," said Faulkner.

Faulkner said he had been assured that having one commissioner on for a brief period would not invalidate the election.

"I discussed the idea of having one commissioner for a short time period with Student Legal Services before the election, and it is not an issue because voting was not interrupted. It is up to those filing the grievance to prove harmful error," he said.

DeFlumeri's complaint means the results of the election, which had yet to be ratified by the SGA's Coordinating Council, which met Wednesday, will not be certified for at least a week, meaning the fate of ballot question two, which concerned moving elections voting online, will also remain undecided for the present.

Question two passed with over 80 percent of the vote Monday and Tuesday, but questions within the SGA about its wording kept them from ratifying the election Wednesday.

Several SGA members attempted to clarify what the problem with the language on the referendum was.

"It wasn't just a question of, 'was the wording misleading,' that actually was not the real question," said outreach and education coordinator Sam Dreyfus. "The real question was that the wording that Derek [Khanna] submitted to the elections commission was different than the wording that was on the petition that people had circulated last year, so that was the reason the Coordinating Council couldn't accept it," he said.

SAMANTHA WEBBER/COLLEGIAN

University of Massachusetts student Lyndsay Walls votes in the Student Government Association general election inside Franklin Dining Commons on Tuesday afternoon.

Chancellor of Elections Faulkner said that, when the Coordinating Council met Wednesday, members broached concerns about the referendum's wording.

"There were concerns about the wording, how it related to last year's petition," Faulkner said. "[The petition] included the same stuff, it was just worded differently, the wording had changed."

The problem therein, according to Faulkner, is that because the wording of this year's referendum does not match that of the petition signed last year by approximately 2,000 students, is that in changing the wording, the meaning of the petition changes, so it is as though the students had not signed the same petition as the one that was appearing on the ballot.

This prompted several high ranking SGA members to hold off on ratifying the election until they had time to examine the referendum's wording.

Commuter senator-elect Derek Khanna, who introduced the referendum, said that he has not yet withdrawn the referendum, and plans to schedule a meeting with the Coordinating Council to present his case for why the referendum should be implemented.

"I still haven't been given the opportunity as of yet to present the referendum from my perspective to the Coordinating Council," he said. "I'm going to be scheduling a meeting with the Coordinating Council, because I want to settle the questions they may have about the referendum in the next few days so once [DeFlumeri's] complaint is settled, the Coordinating Council can ratify the entire election."

Khanna said he wants to invite all SGA members to the meeting he hopes to broker so they can all have a more informed perspective on the referendum and its implications.

"I want to be able to take on any questions that people might have about the referendum," he said. "I want to be able to explain it and I want people to be able to ask questions so they can do the research they need to vote on it," Khanna said.

Khanna also noted that the Coordinating Council can only ratify an election or decide to throw it out; it cannot nullify a result it disagrees with.

"They only have the ability to ratify the election, they cannot veto it," he said. "Throwing out the election is not the same as a veto, you throw out the whole election because there was a procedural problem, not because you disagree with the result," he said.

Speaker Montero said he believes that, despite the holdups, UMass will see online elections within the next year.

"I have a very strong feeling that by the end of the year, if not early next year, we will have voted on moving forward with online elections," he said.

"It's just a matter of working out some of the technical stuff, where the money's going to come from, how we're going to implement this new procedure and being confident that it is secure and that people are not going to break the bylaws," said Montero.

Even if referendum question two is ultimately not ratified by the SGA, the possibility remains that online voting could again be brought forward as a standard resoluton. Even though resolutions to move voting online have failed in the past, the recent success of the Students for a Democratic Voice coalition in the general elections could mean there are enough votes to pass one in the near future. It would be hard for the university's student government to move on to other issues, considering the overwhelming support that the referendum received.

Sam Butterfield can be reached at sbutterfield@dailycollegian.com. Nick Bush can be reached at nbush@student.umass.edu.

Campus is taken aback by screening spoke during the protest saying that he no longer wished to be a "token" student, elaborating that "I am one of the only minorities here. Not of only African Americans, but of all ethnicities."

STRIKE from page 2

Statistics on the numbers of minorities in attendance at UMass revealed that in fact the percentages had been decreasing, as had students from low-income families.

With university plans to create rn increasing number of freshman-only dorms, students had many concerns. They felt they were no longer guaranteed university housing, forcing them to live off-campus and to commute. They were also worried for incoming freshmen, saying that they didn't learn from their peer advisors, but rather from the seniors down the hall.

With their demands unmet, SGA Senate members and President, the Student Board Trustees and other student activists spent weeks organizing a protest and march, notifying the administration of their wishes while they planned. The film shows students marching into the Whitmore Building to find then-Interim Chancellor Thomas W. Cole Jr. away on business. Acting in his place was Interim Vice Chancellor Joyce Hatch, who told students that the chancellor would have to set up a meeting upon his return and that the chancellor "isn't familiar with all the issues on campus."

You have to give him a break," she said. Students disagreed.

Towards the end of the film members of the SGA met with the chancellor and discussed the 27-page list of student wishes and needs. The university replied with a counter-offer. Eventually an agreement was reached.

"There is a need for on-going communication with students," Hatch said on Thursday after the film. "Students shouldn't walk away from this film believing that this is the only path to change."

When asked what she hopes this film will accomplish, Walunas said she hopes it will rouse student activism.

"I hope that the passion of the students inspires not only students at UMass but all those who view the documentary," she said, laughing as she told the audience of students in Canada who heard of her film and requested a copy.

Samantha Lyon, a 23-year-old graduate student, spoke of how this taught her about the history of campus and that, "students graduate, new ones come in, leaving the administration as the ones who are around the longest, allowing them to shift the attention from these issues. Yet with film, there is documentation, preventing this from happening."

Michelle Williams can be reached at mnwillia@student.umass.edu

'Love146' talks about sex trade

LOVE from page 3

safe environment to both protect the children and encourage growth, love and healing. When Morris asked Velazco, one time, what a "safe-home" was, she said that it was just that, a safe home.

The aftercare program is intended to help rescued children realize their potential, and acquire the skills necessary to live as that person, while surrounded by safety and care.

Love146 works closely with many other organizations in the prevention of sex slavery and human trafficking. All across Asia - India, Sri Lanka, Thailand, Cambodia and the Philippines - Love146 is spreading awareness and knowledge of the sexual exploitations of children in these countries. Through networking, training and education, Love146 is able to produce a heightened awareness of the crimes occurring in the country, and in that, working towards an end to it.

"We choose to define love as defending and protecting," Morris said of the organization.

Love146 expands prevention into the U.S., also, through speaking commitments, organizations, donations, various projects and acknowledging the country's own struggles with the issue.

"This is not just an issue that happens in Southeast Asia," Morris said.

By working on a global level, reaching out to members of every social background, advocacy against slavery becomes more present, and the end comes ever closer.

UNICEF estimates that 1.2 million children are trafficked annually, while other estimations evaluate the sex slave trade market value at $32 billion.

The vision of Love146 is to eliminate the sex slave trade in its entirety, one child at a time, if that's what it takes, according to Morris.

"It's perspective," Morris said of efficient ways to end modern slavery. "It's audacity … it's going to take repentance."

Jil Pasiecnik can be reached at jmpasiec@student.umass.edu

AMANDA JOHNSON/COLLEGIAN

Love146 co-founder Rob Morris addresses students Wednesday on his group's mission to curtail the sex trade and help and rehabilitate former child sex workers.

Demand for aid on the increase

BUDGET from page 3

leges accepted more students this past spring in order to close budget gaps. This strategy can only be used to limited affect at the Five Colleges, where small campus sizes and existing housing shortages make significant expansion difficult, if not impossible.

Although Mount Holyoke increased its class size somewhat this year, Blaisdell said the college's ability to accept more students is limited because the campus is in a residential area.

At Amherst College, demand for financial aid has also increased noticeably, leading to a three percent expansion of this year's financial aid budget, said Amherst College Dean and Director of Financial Aid, Joe Paul Case.

Following a significant 20 percent drop in the school's endowment, Amherst College established a temporary Advisory Budget Committee to review possible changes to the financial aid budget. Some of those proposals addressed last year's adjustments to Amherst's financial aid program, one of which included eliminating the requirement for students to take out loans as part of their financial aid package. The other change extended need-blind admission to international students. Both of these policies are now under review by college officials, said Case.

"A lot depends on how rapidly the college's resources rebound," Case said, referring to the decreased endowment. "Performance investments have improved .. but it's still an ongoing issue."

At Smith, decreasing class sizes, higher demand for financial aid and falling endowment and budget gap has forced the college to make dramatic budget cuts to meet expenses.

In part to cover this year's increased demand for aid, Smith will be eliminating 44 staff positions over the next two years, said Carol T. Christ in a campus-wide message.

"Increasing the financial aid offered to our students was not an easy decision. All those involved understood that increasing this budget item meant decreasing assistance in other areas," said Director of Student Financial Services David Belanger, in an email.

With these and other cuts, Smith was able to increase the total grant aid awarded by 7.5 percent to just over $52,000,000, Belanger said.

Hampshire has also seen higher demand for financial aid, and has increased its financial aid budget by over $1 million this year, said Director of Financial Aid Kathy Methot.

"The majority of those funds come from the college's own resources, though some students do bring in outside federal aid," she said.

Methot said she was not in a position to provide details about how Hampshire was funding the increase; however, she did note that the increase had put a strain on the college resources.

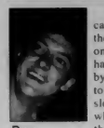
"Senior administrators are working on a plan to cut expenses, it's being implemented as we speak," Methot said.

The college provides a total of $24 million in grants and scholarships to its students, while the average need-based grant is $27,700, according to the Hampshire website.

One strategy local colleges have adopted for cutting costs has been to increase collaboration and resource sharing within the Five College Consortium. In July, Smith, Mount Holyoke and Hampshire combined their campus safety programs into one public safety department. Each campus has its own dispatch and office, but officers are responsible for responding as back-up at all three campuses, said Christ.

She added that the Five College libraries are also reviewing the possibility of centralizing and consolidating common services such as materials processing and technical services.

Niina Heikkinen can be reached at nheikkin@student.umass.edu



CINEMARK
For advance tickets & showtimes visit
cinemark.com
or call 1-900-FANDANGO + Exp Code 1118#
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL
FIRST MATINEE SHOWTIME (7 DAYS A WEEK) $5.00
ADULT MATINEE BEFORE 6PM $6.25 • STUDENT $7.00 (WITH ID)
◆ TOY STORY - DOUBLE FEATURE - REAL D 3D (S2.75 SURCHARGE) [G] 100 500 900
◆ TOY STORY 2 - DOUBLE FEATURE - REAL D 3D (S2.75 SURCHARGE) [G] 255 655 1055
◆ DEAD ALIVE [R] ⓘ1201AM
◆ THE INVENTION OF LYING [PG13] 130 410 720 955
◆ WHIP IT [PG13] 110 400 700 1005
◆ ZOMBIELAND [R] ⓘ 205 445 740 1025
◆ FAME [PG] 120 435 715 950
◆ PANDORUM [R] ⓘ 440 1030
◆ SURROGATES [PG13] 150 415 750 1010
CLOUDY WITH A CHANCE OF MEATBALLS - 2D [PG] 250 510 730 945
JENNIFER'S BODY [R] ⓘ 140 735
JULIE & JULIA [PG13] 455PM
LOVE HAPPENS [PG13] 115 430 705 945
THE INFORMANT! [R] ⓘ 125 420 710 1000
CinéArts
9 [PG13] 100 310 520 745 955
INGLOURIOUS BASTERDS [R] ⓘ 135 800
◆ NO PASSES-NO CLASSIC SUPERSAVERS

editorial&opinion

"FREE SPEECH IS THE WHOLE THING, THE WHOLE BALL GAME. FREE SPEECH IS LIFE ITSELF" - SIR SALMAN RUSHDIE

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Elephant in the top bunk causing a ruckus

Ben Moriarty

While I have lived off-campus for two years now, the first two years, while on campus, my roommate had a lot to deal with. And by that, I meant he had to be present and pretend-sleeping in his top bunk while I knocked boots on the bottom bunk, taunting him in the middle of it because I knew he wasn't actually sleeping and could hear every little thing and was envisioning it in his mind yet still pretended to be asleep. And he never complained. Because he feared the consequences.

Just kidding, I've never even encountered a girl who wanted to sleep with me, never mind actually finding a girl at the University of Massachusetts to do it with out of the 10,000 or so that are here, roughly. My roommate can attest to that sad truth.

But, sex is a well known part of college, an important part for many people – after classes and alcohol. And with this casual and not casual sex comes sexless, awkward hall passes, and the spread of STDs.

Ha ha! Take that suckers. Who's laughing now?

Maybe that's why, this year, Tufts University added a new policy regarding guests and dorm habituation. Specifically: "You may not engage in sexual activity while your roommate is present in the room. Any sexual activity within your assigned room should not ever deprive your roommate(s) of privacy, study, or sleep time."

Sex is a well known part of college, an important part for many people – after classes and alcohol.

This begs the question of, what if you aren't disturbing them of either study, sleep time or privacy? If your roommate is watching TV, you are obviously not depriving them of either sleep or study, and if anything, the roommate is the one who is depriving you of privacy.

Jerk roommates. Sometimes people can be so inconsiderate.

And to some level, this matter is inconsiderate. Which is probably why Tufts imposed this rule. There are several aspects to this.

First, is the "Come home with someone, your roommate is apparently sleeping, should you get it on or not?"

Second is the "Oh, what a splendidly fine evening this was. I had such a fine time drinking wine and eating cheese. I am opening the door into my room now at 3 a.m. Oh, my roommate is having sexual intercourse with another human being, whatever shall I do now at this rather morning hour?"

Third is the, "Roommates who beat the system because they are gay and can room together unlike other couples." Wait, what happens in those situations?

In two of three of those situations, you are either inconveniencing your roommate, or living dangerously and rolling the dice. And, using the general law of common courtesy and that mighty fine Golden Rule, you know you shouldn't be doing it (don't you hate people that point out puns?).

Despite writing this column, I am – in my opinion - fairly conservative regarding sex. Last year, when I wrote a negative column about girl's fashion during Halloween, I was bombarded with comments and e-mails saying I was just mad I couldn't get any.

But, even being conservative in relation to this topic, I muster up about enough bother regarding sex with roommates in the room as I do about when people share what they think of my writing. And that is none.

While college may be about learning, or something, or finding who you are, or whatever enlightening crap that is, a lot of it is showing that you can deal with what life gives you, and then actually dealing with it. And most of the time, it's not fun or convenient.

What I'm not doing is advocating that one should feel free in having sex with your roommate present, or not care if they know they should be arriving soon, or even at all. But, if your roommate doesn't have the courtesy to not do it (or, more likely, has the will for thrill), then deal with it.

And if it really bothers you, then pay them back. Cold, baby. Ice cold.

Ben Moriarty is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at bmoriart@student.umass.edu.

Amherst's capitalist legacy alive and well

Evan Haddad

There is no finer, more profitable monopoly in a college town than the one on mistakes. Each morning reminds me of this as my car crawls along in traffic past the illustrious Route 9 residence, the College Inn.

It's an "economical" apartment building, mass produced in every sense, with thick, crusty grey paint and an overall greasy appearance; its roadside location refreshes it daily with an endless fluttering wind of McDonald's bags and empty beer bottles. Each night, the air swells with the warm, cheesy smell of Pioneer Valley Pizza and the clacking billiard balls from the bar next door.

Kamins Real Estate offers all this and more for, yes – only a one-time, all-inclusive contractual obligation. But in this monopoly, this is only one cash trap of many set to lure in naïve people.

The symbiosis between students and the actual town of Amherst has evolved into an overly-dependent, warped relationship. Young minds and sumptuous wallets led Amherst and neighboring whistle-stop towns to become dwarf theaters for an on-going game of financial Risk; small armies of businessmen-to-be clash, struggling over dibs on every profitable industry in this college town.

How and when a simple thing like education became so lucrative, I don't know.

But history shows that these zealots of fast food and real estate colonialism aren't the first of their kind. It seems Amherst, including much of America, emerged in history by this very same venture capitalism.

According to Edward Carpenter's book, "The History of the Town of Amherst, Massachusetts," a smooth talking John Pynchon from Springfield procured the first deeds to Amherst. In 1658, he got himself a choice piece of land from the local Norwottuck tribes in exchange for some 200 Wampam – rare shells used by those natives.

Years later, Jeffery Amherst, a French and Indian War hero, concocted a brilliant, cost-effective ruse to oust those tribes once and for all and enlarge his town: give them all blankets infected with smallpox. Fortunately, this wasn't carried out. But fate was inevitable, and those tribes have long since vanished.

What was a quiet New England town with a college then, hosts countless vendors of weird goods and strange services now.

While the Civil War ravaged the Mid-Atlantic, Amherst still prospered. By 1863, Amherst had grown considerably, with some 3,500 residents and a new university, created from the progressive Federal Morrill Land-Grant Colleges Act. For all intents and purposes, the goal of the university was to instruct citizens in military tactics, mechanics and agriculture.

So you see, the tradition of venture capitalism, as it were, suffering but minor alterations, has stayed the test of time. But what was a quiet New England town with a college then, hosts countless vendors of weird goods and strange services now.

A Google Maps search reveals that Amherst boasts six gas stations, ten chiropractors, eight gyms and twenty pizza shops, add that to several low income housing units shared jointly by college students and actual low income families, and you have a jumbled communal identity.

What sort of picture can be painted from these colors: people who crave pizza, but are self-conscience about their weight; who drive, but have back problems; who are rich, but live with poor.

A town like Hadley, which recently celebrated its 350th birthday, hardly boasts a historical, or cultural monument other than a Home Depot and a Staples which can be seen from the moon; most distinguished businesses on the Route 9 strip peddle fast food, booze and cubic zirconia earrings.

While Amherst seems more or less like your average town, capricious consumerism pumps tainted blood into healthy limbs of the community.

Goods and services are popping up which don't contribute to any long term communal goals. Capital harvested from a town's McDonald's and Sunoco Stations goes immediately into a private pocket. These are all excessive and impulsive buys; I don't think a couple extra gallons of gas or a Big Mac are, or ever will be, good, necessary ideas.

If Amherst could be wrung out like a sponge, it would leak drops of every element within an average size city. An optimist perhaps could see the positive side of this: the entertainment, restaurants and free transit. But try as I may, I just see a little old town too big for its mini-skirts and Dickies britches, a town which has grown too large to hold and foster its permanent population, and its youth.

And for those who do love this town for its natural charm and character, hopefully in the end it will not have garnished false hopes in you, in leading you to believe that any town could, in fact, outlast the ever sweeping arm of time.

Evan Haddad is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at ehaddad@student.umass.edu.

POINT-COUNTER-POINT

"Freedom rings where opinions clash." - Adlai E. Stevenson

UMass: Green friendly or CO2-burning?

A eco-impersonator

Ashley Lesperance

"UMass is now a green campus!"

You must have seen it, the picture of our shiny new and environmentally friendly central heating plant on the main University of Massachusetts webpage with that text over it. It was there for months. But, what constitutes being a green campus and does UMass really fit that definition?

The Sierra Club, an influential grassroots environmental organization that has been around since 1892, this year published its third annual list of the top 10 eco-friendly universities in the U.S. (of which UMass was not on). Being an eco-friendly campus consists of properly integrating eight categories: efficiency, energy, food, academics, purchasing, transportation, waste and administration.

So how green is UMass? Does our administration care more about building a green campus or building a reputation of being a green campus? I would argue for the latter.

Our new Central Heating Plant, according to the University of Massachusetts Amherst New Construction Green Building Initiative, will be emitting up to seven times less greenhouse emissions than the old plant. This is great news, both for our environment and for our campus' reputation. Aside from the heating plant, how many of UMass' claims to being green are happening, and how many claims are empty?

Remember that spiffy UMass drawstring bag you got at the DC's at the beginning of the semester? It was chock full of goodies, like 100 calorie Oreo packs, peanuts, a razor and a folder full of DC material that almost certainly went right into your (I hope) recycling bins.

In this folder was a 2009/2010 UMass Dining Directory of Services and in that was a full spread devoted to our campus' social responsibility and a bulleted list of the many things our campus does to be green. The third bullet states that UMass Dining, "Serves sustainable seafood in accordance with the Monterey Bay Aquarium's Seafood Watch guidelines." Fortunately for us, dining services provided these guidelines in said folder.

The guidelines are separated into three categories: best choices, good alternatives and avoid. Under the avoid section is "Cod: Atlantic."

Since reading this pamphlet during the first week of the semester, I have seen Worcester Dining Commons serve atlantic cod on three different nights. Why was the "good alternative" to Atlantic cod, bluefish or even better the "best choices" alternative of barramundi not served instead of the Atlantic cod that's clearly under the harsh red "avoid" section of the list?

Then there are the little things. How often do you walk past the new studio arts building? Every night the lights in the main lobby, the colorful lights at the very top, are kept on. Every night, all night. The library keeps its lights on at all times as well. Is there really someone on the 22nd floor of the library at 4 a.m.? These lights should be shut off to save energy.

According to a study done by the Princeton Review, two-thirds of university applicants now say that a school's environmental report card would influence whether or not they would enroll. With such a high percentage of prospective students concerning themselves with how green our campus is, I am convinced that our administration is more worried about building a reputation of being green rather than building a green campus.

Think about it. If you have a campus meal plan, I'm sure you've seen the effect that "UMass Family Weekend" has had on our DC's. Suddenly Worcester, Franklin, and every other DC is filled with fancy, locally grown food cooked and displayed in a way you will never see again until the next family weekend. Our campus is run like a business.

It's not my argument that our campus isn't trying to become environmentally friendly. However, I have been attending school here for four years and I have become accustomed to the administration's propaganda. I can see that in certain ways, such as the DC's' eradication of trays and paper cups, our campus is attempting to be greener. However, the Atlantic cod entrées at dinner is enough for me to wonder what other fishy green claims are occurring.

Ashley Lesperance is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at alespera@student.umass.edu.

...This is a gray box
...Let it serve you well
Write funny stuff
Send letters to the editor to:
editorial@dailycollegian.com

Getting the job done

Matt Sullivan

The September and October editions of Sierra Magazine failed to include the University of Massachusetts, one of the leading research institutions of green economics, on their listing of 135 schools across the nation. To leave a school which has one of the only professional master's programs in green building design off New England's list is a serious misjudgment by the Sierra Club. However, the statistics used in ranking come from the 2008-2009 academic year and don't fully represent the current green utilizations of UMass Amherst.

Three major building projects have been introduced within the last three years that all take the environment into consideration. In 2006, the North Residential Area became the first new housing complex on campus since 1971, using a large portion of recycled steel framing material in its construction. Additionally, the apartment's air conditioning system uses chlorofluorocarbon (CFC) free refrigerant for less ozone depletion into the Earth's atmosphere.

The newly built Integrated Sciences Building, which contains a roof garden, also consists of a 20,000 gallon rain water drainage system. Senior Architect Jeffrey Quakenbush of Facilities Planning verified that this water will then be pumped to the chiller plant cooling towers to remove the heat from warmed water that returns to the chiller plant from buildings being cooled. Other high tech innovations are carbon dioxide sensors that shut lights off in unoccupied rooms for the Studio Arts Building.

Although the facilities are undoubtedly green, in recent months, Dining Services has come under fire over their waste management practices. After a few weeks since going tray-less, all four dining commons are seeing drastic results in the amount of waste saved. The policy also encourages students to make more trips and be mindful of how much they are actually wasting. According to Berkshire Assistant Manager Ryan Pipczynski, it was "disheartening to work in the dish room and see how much food just goes down the tubes."

Rather than going down those drains, food waste, cardboard and plastics are being recycled down to the last Heinz Ketchup bottle. Poorly designed originally, Berkshire DC, has a new system in place using smaller size compost bins. Plus, a can crusher allows added space for aluminum recyclables as well. Pipczynski assured that every single crumb is being collected by the physical plant daily, and not going down the garbage disposal. And if you compare Berkshire's compost to last year's, it's going to skyrocket. Why? They are doing their job the green way, and the right way.

Not wanting to subtract the value of student's meal plans in the process of going green, Dining Services gave back pretty fresh aluminum water bottles, in exchange for disposing the paper cups and plastic lids. Take a look at what the earth logo reads on the carry-out bags next time after stopping by the grab and go. Even the plastic materials have become more environmentally friendly compared to the thick Wal-Mart type bags used a few years back.

"We're not going to be perfect." Pipczynski says. "But we're continuously trying to take it to the next level and correct problems."

The DCs are recycling, but what about the food being served? It seems that every other night some kind of fish is being served as part of the main course. Whether it is beer-battered cod or dill buttered salmon, many wild life conscious students are concerned over the declining reproduction of overfished Atlantic cod. UMass however, is the first public university to form a partnership with Seafood Watch, eliminating Atlantic cod from the menu. Pacific cod, which is farmed at Monterey Bay Aquarium, is being served instead. Guides on supporting ocean-friendly seafood are available at the front of every UMass DC. In addition to the Watch campaign, UMass Dining purchases all produce from local farmers.

The school's cleaning services passed challenging audits based on 250 factors to receive an OSI green certificate, making UMass the first passing organization in Massachusetts. St. Paul-based food safety and sanitation company Ecolab has committed tremendous changes to not just the dining commons, but the rest of campus as well. All janitorial and chemical cleaning supplements are eco-approved. The cleaning agents now have 96 percent less packaging due to new cellophane wrapping. Rather than tossing out 25 empty pales a week, all that needs to be disposed of are wrappers.

What about the electric bill? Surely with 6,000 some odd students living in the densely populated Southwest area of campus, electricity must be through the roof. Or is it? The physical plant decreases water consumption by a whopping 36 percent through the use of low flow toilets. Alongside this, fossil fuel emissions have been cut down 24 percent.

To realize how green the University of Massachusetts truly is requires looking at the issue from a proportional standpoint. Obviously UMass is going to use more resources than the number one New England listed Middlebury College because we have 18,000 more undergrads. The truth is the campus is in the elite for green institutions when factoring in its actual needs.

Matt Sullivan is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at mdsull@student.umass.edu.

COURTESY BADFISH.COM

COURTESY COMMONS ARTS MEDIA ORG. MIKEL LAUBER

COURTESY MYSPACE .COM

Where will you be this Saturday night?

A. Badfish

By Emily Jenkins
Collegian Correspondent

Some of the most recognizable music from the 90's will be pouring from the speakers at the Pearl Street Ballroom in Northampton tomorrow night. Badfish: A Tribute to Sublime, has been attracting diverse audiences since their formation in 2001 with their unmistakable covers; 20 and 30-somethings with their eyes closed, taking in the verses they've known by heart since childhood, and the younger crowd who have fallen in love with Sublime's music via YouTube and Pandora.

Badfish, named for one of the tracks on Sublime's 1992 record "40 oz. to Freedom," started out as a group of computer science majors from the University of Rhode Island playing in local clubs, bringing back to the stage the blend of ska, punk, reggae and hip hop that made Sublime one of the most successful alternative rock acts of all time. Sublime disbanded after the death of lead singer Bradley Nowell in 1996, but for the past eight years Badfish has kept their sound alive onstage.

After gaining notoriety on college campuses, Badfish has done numerous national tours, capitalizing on a success that Sublime never saw as a band. Their major label debut was released two months after Nowell's death, propelling their Long Beach harmonies to a worldwide audience. The self-titled album has gone platinum five times, making it no surprise that Badfish has gained quite a following. Tomorrow night, the Pearl Street crowd can expect to hear fan favorites like "What I Got," "Santeria," "Rivers of Babylon," and "Wrong Way."

After touring as a cover band for about five years, the guys decided to start playing two sets per show; one as Badfish, and one highlighting the four-piece's original talent. Scotty Don't is

See BADFISH on page 9

B. Ben Folds

By Ellie Rulon-Miller
Collegian Staff

Singer-songwriter-pianist Ben Folds is performing in Northampton tomorrow night at the Calvin Theater.

Folds, who has been writing and performing for over two decades, will be joined by Australian performer Kate Miller-Heidke. She will be the show's opening act. This is the first major U.S. Tour for Miller-Heidke, who is best known for her Internet hit "Are You F*cking Kidding Me? (The Facebook Song)."

Miller-Heidke released an EP in the United States last Tuesday that will be available at all of her stops on the tour.

Her sound is not unlike Folds.' She too plays piano and sings alternative pop music. Visually, she is the Lady Gaga of female piano pop, with a bleached, almost white hair and a unique sense of style.

Miller-Heidke is releasing her album "Curiouser," which is already popular in her home country, in January. The album is the first time that she has worked with her partner, Keir Nuttall. She has said that "songwriting was always too personal and I felt too self-conscious" to work on her music with someone else. She says that she and Nuttall "bring out the best of each other."

Her songs range from slow and soft to edgy and dance-infused. Her Australian accent adds more uniqueness to her sound.

Folds has been in several bands since the late 1980s but is best known for his solo endeavors and the trio Ben Folds Five, his group from 1993 to 2000. He has been releasing full-length albums and EPs since 2001.

See BEN FOLDS on page 10

C. Man Man

By Garth Brody
Collegian Correspondent

Philadelphia-based experimental rock group Man Man will perform in Northampton this Saturday, Oct. 3 at 9 p.m. at the Pearl Street Nightclub. Tickets can be purchased on the Pearl Street website for $12.50 or at the door for $15.

Man Man's current lineup is currently comprised of a fluctuating number of multi-instrumentalists with pseudonyms, fronted by vocalist/keyboardist Ryan Kattner (or "Honus Honus"). The other core members go by "Sergei Sogay" on bass, "Chang Wang" on saxophone, "Pow Pow" on drums and "Critter Crat" on guitar/trumpet.

They have released three albums since their formation in 2003. The most recent, "Rabbit Habits," was released in April of last year to generally positive reviews and the band's greatest commercial success yet (despite a fairly negligible sales impact).

Musically, Man Man's style is a blend of gypsy jazz, honky-tonk vaudeville and frenetic rock. Their startling arrangements hide forgotten treats like the clavinet, sousaphone and euphonium alongside the electric bass, synthesizer and in a jam fire extinguisher. The antique mischief in their instrumentation, anchored by Honus Honus's piano, brings their sound into the realm of mythic Americana.

In their notoriously raucous live shows, Man Man has been known to perform theatrical stage antics, from jarring light displays, jumping and kicking in time to already jerky rhythms. In preparation for these performances, each member dresses in all white and wears war paint, giving the group a collective character like that of a feral tribe of ten-

See MAN MAN on page 10

Jay-Z has Blueprint for longevity in new album

By Jeffrey C. Larnard
Collegian Correspondent

Calling his new album "The Blueprint 3" was probably not a decision taken lightly by Jay-Z. The name "Blueprint" conjures up images both of one of the most beloved rap albums of all time, "The Blueprint," and one of the disappointing follow-ups in music history with the over-ambitious, sprawling "The Blueprint II: The Gift and The Curse." Not surprisingly, "The Blueprint 3" falls between these two extremes, a very good rap album with a couple missteps. In a time where listenable rap albums are few and far between, Jay-Z's latest still stands out like the Empire State Building against the other hip hop offerings in the New York City skyline.

Jay-Z's strengths have always been his lyrical prowess and smooth delivery and first single "D.O.A. (Death of Auto-Tune)" finds Jay-Z in fine form. It combines razor sharp flows and a gritty beat provided by producer No I.D. Unless you've been living under a rock for the last two months, you've heard the ubiquitous second single "Run This Town," which takes the album in a more mainstream direction, adding a Kanye West verse and a Rihanna chorus. The rest of the album plays more like the latter than the former, with futuristic sounding beats, catchy choruses, and more guest appearances than The Ellen DeGeneres Show.

Kanye West, No I.D. and Timbaland provide the production work for most of the album, and for the most part, succeed in providing effective backdrops for Jay-Z to rap over. Old-school Jay-Z fans will likely argue that he sounds best over old-school boom-bap-type beats instead of newer, synthesizer-soaked ones. Jay-Z even says in "On To The Next One," "Want my old sh*t, buy my old album." If you were someone who has not liked anything Jay-Z has done since his first album "Reasonable Doubt," then "The Blueprint 3" will likely not impress you. However, if you are like most people, and found yourself helplessly bobbing your head to "Izzo (H.O.V.A.)," "Big Pimpin,'" or "99 Problems," "The Blueprint 3" has a lot to offer.

Whatever type of hip-hop you like, "The Blueprint 3" probably has you covered. You've probably heard "Run This Town" at the last party you were at, while last track "Young Forever" unlikely covers the Alphaville hit "Forever Young" which has been featured in both The O.C. and One Tree Hill. "Off That" features rapper-of-the-moment Drake and a swift beat provided by Timbaland, and "D.O.A. (Death of Auto-Tune)" will satisfy hip-hop purists with its sparse beat and aggressive lyrics. "Already Home" and "Empire State of Mind" are also standout tracks for very different reasons; the former has arguably the best production and verses on the album, and the latter has the fantastic Alicia Keys chorus that overshadows Jay-Z himself. That being said, a couple of tracks like "Hate" and "Thank You" do not work as well as they should due to subpar production that just does not mesh with Jay-Z's flow.

Although "The Blueprint 3" is certainly not the undeniable classic that "The Blueprint" is, it is undoubtedly one of the best rap albums released in 2009. People who are going to see Jay-Z at the Mullins Center in October should be just as excited about hearing his newest material as they are to hear his classics. Thirteen years after he broke on the scene, Jay-Z is still churning out quality music, displaying a longevity that few hip-hop artists could even come close to matching. If the man has not found a fountain of youth, he has certainly found something close.

Jeffrey C Larnard can be reached at jclarnard@student.umass.edu.

COURTESY MYSPACE .COM

Jay-Z's latest album, which he will be promoting on his tour that stops at UMass on Oct. 25, should appeal to fans of his old as well as newer hits.

Local Sublime fans to get a taste of some Badfish comprised of all the members of Badfish, and has been receiving an immense response from audiences across the U.S. After releasing a self-titled EP in 2006, Scotty Don't released "Songs from the Back Porch," produced by Paul Leary, Sublime producer and guitarist for the band Butthole Surfers.

BADFISH from page 8

Also on the bill is some fresh local flavor hand picked from the Pioneer Valley. Danny Pease and the Regulators is a seven-piece band from Hadley that describes itself as "dirty punk reggae." The band's musical influences range from Rancid to Bob Dylan, Bad Religion to Toots and the Maytals. They started out in 2005, jamming in a basement, moved on to clubs and house parties and are now flourishing in the local scene.

Lastly, UMass' own Orange Television is coming out for their largest show to date. This jam band-style threesome has accelerated at a surprising rate, having just formed in February 2009.

Opening for Badfish will likely be a jumping off point for these funky up-and-comers, who already have a fan base both in the UMass community and in the alternative music scene in the Valley. They released a five-song demo in September entitled "One Old Fashioned Doughnut," and with their dedication and quick success, this is sure to not be the last that Western Mass. hears of Orange Television.

It all adds up to a must-see show, with great tunes from local musicians and the veteran rockers of Badfish and Scotty Don't. The show is expected to fill up fast, so get there early and bring your dancing shoes.

Badfish: A Tribute to Sublime, Scotty Don't, Danny Pease and the Regulators, and Orange Television will be performing at Pearl Street Ballroom Saturday, Oct. 3 at 7 p.m. Tickets are $16 in advance or $19 at the door.

Emily Jenkins can be reached at ejenkins@student.umass.edu.

Rolling Green

All Rents Include: heat, hot water, and electricity!

Move-in Special:
$99 security deposit.
NO application fees.
NO non-refundable move-in fee.

1 bedroom: $980*
2 bedroom: $1135*
2 bedroom townhouse: $1275*
3 bedroom townhouse: $1500*
4 bedroom townhouse: $1995*

Contact us:
(413) 253-3000
rollinggreenamherst@eqr.com

*Pricing fluctuates. All pricing listed is based on a 12 month lease. Shorter term leases are available. Please contact us for availability.

Be sure to get a mint for the 'festival that stinks'

By Cal Scannell
Collegian Staff

Be sure to bring along a tin of Altoids to this weekend's Garlic and Arts Festival which has been described as "the festival that stinks." The event, currently in itsits tenth year, is a quaint country gathering of local farmers, craftsmen, vendors and vampire haters.

The festival is the brainchild of Ricky Baruc, a farmer from Orange, Mass. While harvesting garlic one day and lamenting the lack of retail outlets for the fantastic fruit of the earth, he came up with the idea of holding an event to celebrate the marvelous cloves and provide farmers with an opportunity to sell their stinky crop. He soon broadened his vision to include all the local farmers, artists and craftspeople who had to travel long distances to markets and galleries in order to sell their goods. With the help of neighboring farmers, he hosted the event in its first year at his Seeds of Solidarity farm in 1999.

Though the event has moved down the road to a bigger space capable of accommodating the large volume of garlic-lovers in the area, Baruc and other founding farmers are still closely involved in the festival. Currently supported by the Seeds of Solidarity Center for Education, a non-profit organization, the event draws volunteers of all ages from the community.

Their combined efforts have helped to preserve the original spirit of the festival. According to the Garlic and Arts mission statement, the event aims to celebrate "the artistic, agricultural and cultural bounty of the region and unite North Quabbin people whose livelihoods are connected to the land and the arts." The festival invites people "to experience the richness of an area that is often overlooked" and "emphasizes what is homegrown and high quality, as well as what helps preserve and support the environment."

Festival goers can expect to find local and often organic produce from area farms. You can also look forward to many garlic-infused offerings from nearby restaurants including Bueno y Sano's roasted garlic burritos and the North Quabbin Men for Missions' garlic cheese fries.

While munching on their stinky dishes, visitors can watch local musicians on the main stage performing anything from jazz to folk to soul and funk. Garlic lovers can also check out the renewable energy tent and various sustainable energy exhibits from local organizations. Other local groups will be putting on healing arts, cooking and agricultural demonstrations.

Artist booths will feature a range of goods, including silver work, hand-woven cloths, jewelry, reproduced antique maps, glass work, paintings, woodwork, dolls, knit-items and homemade soaps, just to name a few.

The Festival will take place this weekend, Oct. 3 and 4 at Forsters Farm, 60 Chestnut Hill Road in Orange, Mass. from 10 a.m to 5 p.m. Admission is $5 for guests over 12 years old, or adults may purchase a weekend pass for $8.

Cal Scannell can be reached at cscannell@student.umass.edu.

COURTESY GARLIC AND ARTS FEST

The 10th annual Nothern Quabbin Garlic and Arts Festival will take place on Oct. 3 and 4 at Forsters Farm in Orange, Mass. from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

'Rockin' the Suburbs' in Noho

BEN FOLDS from page 8

For his latest release, University A Capella, Folds recorded different student a capella groups singing 16 of his songs. It came out in April.

Folds also contributed to the soundtrack for the film Over The Hedge in 2006. He recorded three original songs, a Clash cover, and a new version of his first single, "Rockin' the Suburbs," with lyrics that went with the film.

His sound is catchy, and contains equal parts of both pop and alternative. Folds is an artist who is easy to appreciate. He has a natural ability to write catchy songs and has some serious skills on a piano.

Folds also teamed up with English novelist Nick Hornby to write a song about Levi Johnston called "Levi Johnston Blues." The song has a legitimate modern-blues sound with hilarious lyrics mocking Johnston. The chorus alone is enough to tickle your humor: "I'm a f*cking redneck, I like to hang out with the boys, play some hockey, do some fishin' and kill some moose. I like to shoot the sh*t, do some chillin' I guess."

Concertgoers can expect Folds to play a couple of his singles as well as a few fan favorites. Recent setlists from previous stops on this tour show that he has regularly been playing songs such as "Zak and Sara" and "Effington." Because he is touring with Miller-Heidke, he has been playing "You Don't Know Me," a single from his 2008 solo release Way to Normal, which features a female guest vocalist (on the album, Regina Spektor).

The performance is tomorrow night at the Calvin Theater at 8 p.m. Tickets range from $25 to $45 on the Calvin Theater website.

Ellie Rulon-Miller can be reached at erulonmi@student.umass.edu.

COURTESY MYSPACE.COM

Eclectic band Man Man will be playing at the Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton, Mass. this weekend.

Party like a Man Man

MAN MAN from page 8

nis players.

Their oddball instrumentation, absurdist sensibilities and over-the-top theatrics belly a certain melancholy that covers all of their music in a Gothic shade (that's Poe's "Gothic," not your little sister's "gothic"). Man Man's bombastic sadness recalls Tom Waits at his best and P.T. Barnum at his worst.

It's that damp, back-alley street music dynamic – at once exciting and gloomy – that has endeared Man Man to their fans and confused and repulsed everyone else. In spite of the predictably low record sales that come with independent releases and (arguably) inaccessible music, they have garnered a good deal of media attention. Their music has been featured in a line of Nike ads starring Rainn Wilson and an episode of Weeds.

Less unwarranted is their wide exposure on the indie scene. They achieved relative prominence during their 2007 tour with Modest Mouse, where their wild-eyed stage capers wowed audiences and, by many accounts, upstaged the aforementioned headliners. Then, in 2008, they played at the Voodoo Experience music festival.

But on Saturday night, they will be playing to a club crowd – albeit in a club with a capacity of 1200. So all those strange, swampy, sad-clown stage surprises that have made Man Man such an intriguing act will feel right up close and personal, such that one might almost be able to reach up and stroke Honus Honus's mustache or flip a silver dollar into the bell of Chang Wang's sax. In fact, if you are at the show Saturday night, you should definitely throw some change at the stage – the band would doubtless incorporate it into their unholy percussive chorus.

Garth Brody can be reached at gbrody@student.umass.edu

Villanova runs wild on FCS Connecticut

By Andrew Morrison
Collegian Correspondent

The running game of No. 2 Villanova was too much for the Connecticut defense to handle Saturday night in Virginia as the Wildcats won 56-7.

Led by junior running back Aaron Ball, who had over 100 yards rushing in the first quarter, the Wildcats running game compiled 410 rushing yards as a team and had six different players score a touchdown.

Senior wide receiver Brandyn Harvey and Ball both eclipsed 100 yards on the night. Ball ended the night with 109 yards rushing and a touchdown on seven carries. Harvey had 102 yards receiving on seven catches with a touchdown.

FCS Top 25 Football

The scoring started on the third play of the game as Ball ran the ball 31 yards down the middle of the field for the score. After a Huskies punt, the Wildcats went on a four minute, 28 second drive consisting of 13 plays that culminated in a one-yard touchdown run by junior running back Angelo Babbaro. Villanova took a 28-0 lead into the half.

The Huskies got on the board for their only score of the day in the third quarter with a 48-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Alex Dulski to wide receiver Jordan Batts. Dulski went 16-of-32 for 138 yards, and threw a touchdown and three interceptions on the day. Batts was his most prolific receiver, catching seven passes for 92 yards.

Huskies mark 1000th game

Lead by the arm of redshirt sophomore quarterback Cody Endres and the legs of sophomore running back Jordan Todman, UConn won 52-10 over URI in the varsity football program's 1000th game on Saturday.

Endres attained career highs in both passing yards and completions by completing 23-of-30 passes for 289 yards and two touchdowns on the day. Todman, who rushed for 70 yards on 15 carries with a career-high three rushing touchdowns and redshirt senior tailback Andre Dixon, who rushed for 98 yards on 17 carries led the running game.

The Huskies started the game off strong, as they scored on both of their first two possessions, jumping out to a 14-0 lead four minutes, 37 seconds into the game. The first came on an 18-yard touchdown pass from Endres to Dixon, while the next came on an eight-yard run into the end zone by Todman after the UConn defense got an interception.

The Rams scored their first and only touchdown of the day near the end of the first quarter when junior quarterback Chris Paul-Etienne hit sophomore wide receiver Ty Bynum for a 66-yard score. However, 14-7 is the closest the Rams would get to the Huskies all day.

After going into the half enjoying a 24-7 lead, UConn dominated the second half to seal the 52-10 victory.

Wildcats down Big Green

No. 6 New Hampshire kept the Granite Bowl Trophy at home in Durham this year with a 44-14 win over in-state rival Dartmouth on Saturday. UNH now holds the edge in the all time series between the schools 18-17-2.

It was a close game going into the third quarter with the Wildcats holding onto a 20-14 lead when starting junior quarterback R. J. Toman had to leave the game with a toe injury. After a Big Green fumble, sophomore quarterback Kevin Decker drove the wildcat's offense down the field and capped off an 88-yard drive with a 15-yard touchdown pass to senior wide receiver J.T. Wright. With a successful 2-point conversion, UNH took a 28-14 lead.

After taking over for Toman, Decker finished the day 9-of-14 for 76 yards and a touchdown pass. The running game of the Wildcats was lead by senior running back Chad Kackert who had 12 carries for 71 yards and two touchdowns. Senior tight end Scott Sicko led all UNH receivers with five catches for 53 yards.

Senior quarterback Alex Jenny had a solid performance in the losing effort, going 20-of-29 for 166 yards and two touchdowns. Junior wide receiver Tanner Scott was his favorite target of the day, catching six passes for 48 yards.

Andrew Morrison can be reached at ajmorris@student.umass.edu.

MATTHEW HARRISON/COLLEGIAN

URI quarterback Chris Paul-Etienne evades a UConn defender in the Rams' 52-10 loss on Saturday. Paul-Etienne threw for 108 yards and one touchdown in the game.

COURTESY ST. BONAVENTURE ATHLETICS

St. Bonaventure goalkeeper Nicole Markert earned Atlantic 10 co-Player of the Week this past week. She earned two shutouts this past weekend and recorded nine saves.

Bonnies, Spiders boast honorees

First players of week for each

By Geena Lombardi
Collegian Correspondent

Nicole Markert of St. Bonaventure and Whitney Weinraub of Charlotte share the first Atlantic 10 co-Players of the Week honors during conference play for 2009-10.

Markert's goal-keeping skills produced the second win in a row for the Bonnie's in a 1-0 win over Saint Louis. This game follows their 2-0 victory over Rhode Island on Sept. 25, which marked St. Bonaventure's first win in an A-10 opener in the past 10 years.

Markert clinched this co-Player of the Week spot by saving six goals in the game versus the Rams (3-5-1, 1-1-0 A-10). Two days later, Markert earned another shutout against Saint Louis by saving three goals. La Salle (6-3-2, 0-1-1) had a chance to tie up the game in the 76th minute; however Markert came through for the team and kept the opponent's goals at zero. These two shutouts helped the Bonnies' record to 2-0 in the A-10 conference.

A-10 Soccer

Whitney Weinraub contributed to the offensive play of Charlotte by scoring three goals and assisting on another1 this past weekend. Weinraub started off strong by scoring a goal in the 5-3 win over Duquesne Friday night.

She continued her scoring streak in Sunday's game against Fordham with two goals and one assist as the 49ers beat the Rams, 4-0. These impressive stats not only gave Weinraub the co-player of the week title, but also boosted her to the top of the conference in scoring, with eight goals and 18 points. Charlotte is 2-0 in conference play.

Dayton dominates

This past weekend, Dayton (6-0, 2-0) continued their undefeated winning streak with wins over Temple and George Washington. Along with these wins, freshman Colleen Williams was also named Co-Rookie of the Week.

Friday night, the Flyers shut out the Owls in a 4-0 victory. Four different players scored for Dayton, including Lauren MacCormick and Emily Kenyon during the first 30 minutes of play and Cara Cornacchia and Josie Grant, who notched scores in the second half. On the defensive side, freshman Katherine Boone saved three goals to ensure the shutout. Colleen Williams also contributed to this win with an assist for the goal by Grant.

Two days later, Dayton executed another 4-0 shutout against George Washington. The Flyers wasted no time getting down to business when MacCormick scored again in the first 31 seconds of the game. Mandi Back and Cornacchia also scored in the second half. Co-rookie of the week Colleen Williams not only scored the final goal for Dayton, but also assisted on Back's goal. Dayton now has an overall record of 6-0-4, along with a 2-0 record for the A-10 conference.

STAR SAVER

Junior Melissa Sanger has stepped up as the star goalkeeper for La Salle (6-3-2, 0-1-1). As the Explorers battled the Billiken's this past Friday, Sanger had an impressive 10 saves to keep the game scoreless.

This tie served as Sanger's 10th career shutout and moved her number of saves up to 188. She has four shutouts this season, with the past two being back-to-back. This past weekend of play also improved Sanger's goals-saved percentage to 92.9 percent, ranking her eighth in the country.

Five total shots made La Salle's scoring troubles throughout the game apparent. Three of those five were by senior Melanie Gamble.

Sanger couldn't continue her shutout streak on Sunday, when the Explorers lost to the Spiders, 2-1.

Richmond led the game with two goals for the entire first half and majority of the second half. Sophomore Erin Brennan scored on a header in the 70th minute, however La Salle couldn't score anymore goals to pull off the win.

Geena Lombardi can be reached at glombard@student.umass.edu.

Team dynamic key to UM offense

By Steve Levine
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team has more question than it does answers.

Although it's currently on a five-game unbeaten streak and playing much better as of late, UMass coach Angela Napoli's squad still has some obvious kinks it needs to work out.

The absence of a go-to scorer and a general lack of offense is forcing the team to grind out tough ties and victories through its current streak.

"Coming into the season, we knew we didn't have a go-to scorer. That's why we've been working hard on being more creative and setting up chances," Napoli said. "No one on the team can consistently strike a great shot 30 yards out. Recently we've been getting breaks on flanks and finishing on some scoring opportunities."

Redshirt junior Sydney Stoll has been a consistent offensive leader so far this year for UMass, logging two goals and an assist.

"Syd is permanent and she's been the main scorer for us," Napoli said. "She's not scoring as many goals as she did her freshman and sophomore years because in those years she was a primary forward. Now, even in the midfield, she's still able to get forward and find the back of the net."

Stoll leads the Minutewomen with five points and eight shots on goal. Napoli believes junior forward Therese Smith has also played a key role for the offense.

"A lot of goals start with Therese Smith as she starts a lot of our opportunities," she said.

Smith also has two goals on the season along with seven shots on goal, good for second on the team. Considering the top two scorers have two goals apiece in nine games this year, the Minutewomen will gladly take their 2-0 start in the A-10 schedule. But if UMass wants to achieve its goal of making the A-10 tournament, it needs more players to step up offensively.

"It really can be anyone on any day. Christina Adams and Lauren Yelinik are both improving and are capable of converting in the right situation," Napoli said. "Lindsey DiOrio, though, when given some time and space, she can crack the ball. Out of everyone on the team, she strikes the ball the hardest."

Until more players can consistently add to the attack, UMass will continue to count on its supreme defense and goaltending to win games. Napoli isn't sure where her team would be right now without its defensive efforts.

"It would probably be a very long season," she said, chuckling. "Emily and Lauren have been working their tails off all year in net and they're a key reason to where we are right now."

Napoli knows what the goalies have meant to the team's 2-0 A-10 record, but she has seen consistent improvement from its main core of defenders as well.

"[Katie] Ruggles, [Jess] Howe, [Meghan] Gould, [Meghan] Collins, and [Kelsey] Anderson have been on defense for most games," Napoli said. "They're improving defensively and now getting forward as well. We've gotten a few shutouts this year, and not allowing the other team to score will increase our chances of winning twenty times."

Opponents have averaged one goal per game against UMass thus far in the season. In addition to its statistical success, Napoli believes the defense affects more aspects of the game.

"The consistency of the defense also allows our forwards to relax a little bit," she added. "We know we're not going to need two or three goals to win a game."

Perhaps the biggest part of the defense this year is the goalie position, where the UMass keepers have done a stellar job. Currently, freshman goalie Emily Cota ranks first on the depth chart, recently replacing senior Lauren Luckey.

"Right now Emily's the starter because she can distribute the ball on her own," Napoli said. "That allows us to have more players up field to win the ball. It's a nice problem to have to have three goalies, including Katie Muller, that we can put in and not have to worry about goalkeeping."

UMass looks to continue its five-game unbeaten streak today, when it travels to St. Louis to face the Billikens at 8 p.m.

"Saint Louis just came off a very tough loss against St. Bonaventure. With them returning home down 0-2 in the A-10, I think they're going to come out and come out hard," Napoli said. "Just like any other game, I like our chances, it just comes down to us."

Steve Levine can be reached at slevine@student.umass.edu

BRIAN TEDESCO/COLLEGIAN

Senior Katie Ruggles fights for possession with a New Hampshire player in a game earlier this season. Riggles (1) is one of four Minutewomen with a goal-scored this season.

Tough test awaits UMass

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team carries a five-game unbeaten streak into a tough weekend as it travels south to take on Atlantic 10 foes Saint Louis and Charlotte.

The Minutewomen (3-4-2, 2-0-0 A-10) currently sit atop the A-10 in a four-way tie with Charlotte (8-2-0, 2-0-0), Dayton (6-0-4, 2-0-0), and St. Bonaventure (5-6-0, 2-0-0) and are riding high after defeating Duquesne (3-6-0, 0-2-0) for their third consecutive victory on Sunday.

UMass has not lost since dropping a heartbreaker in double-overtime to Albany on Sept. 9. Things are finally starting to come together for the Minutewomen, who could not score in their first five games.

"What we have talked about is clicking," UMass coach Angela Napoli said. "More and more of what we ask for on the field is showing. We wanted to change how the team plays. Their old habits seem to be broken and they are consistently doing what they are supposed to do."

Freshman Emily Cota continued her impressive play in goal by earning a shutout in her first collegiate start. Two days after shutting out Saint Joseph's (4-4-2, 1-1-0) in the second half of a come-from-behind victory, the Pennsylvania-native played all 90 minutes against Duquesne and saved all eight of the Dukes' shots-on-goal.

After picking up the win in both of those games, Cota earned UMass Athlete of the Week and A-10 Rookie of the Week honors on Monday. She leads the A-10 with a 0.909 save percentage and her 30 saves are tied for eighth.

On the offensive end, Sydney Stoll is starting to return to pre-injury form. The redshirt junior has two scores in two of the team's last three games, including the game-winner against St. Joe's. Junior Therese Smith has also been a major part of the UMass attack as of late. Like Stoll, she had goals in two of the team's last three games and put in a game-winner against St. Peter's. They are tied for the team lead with two goals apiece, with Stoll also contributing an assist.

Tonight, UMass will take on a Saint Louis team that has two wins in its last eight games. The Billikens' leading scorer this season is senior Susan Frederickson. The midfielder has three goals, two assists, and eight points on the season. Sophomore Andrea Barklage is second on the team with two goals, while the senior duo of Kelly Waeckerle and Ashley Hayes tally a goal and two assists each.

On Sunday, the team travels to Charlotte to face possibly their toughest conference opponent. The 49ers are nearly unstoppable on the offensive end and feature arguably the best duo in the conference. Junior Whitney Weinraub leads the A-10 with eight goals and 19 points while senior Hailey Beam is third in points (15), tied for third in assists (5), and tied for fifth in goals (5).

Junior Kirby Stenard, sophomore Jenna McKeon, and freshman Carrie Dail are also having strong seasons for the 49ers. Stenard has five scores and 10 points, while McKeon and Dail have three goals apiece. Junior Sam Huecker leads the team with five assists.

"We have an extremely difficult weekend ahead of us," said Napoli. "We have a difficult travel schedule with early flights. It will be a hard weekend mentally as much as physically."

The Minutewomen are in action tonight at 8 p.m. against Saint Louis at Hermann Stadium in St. Louis, Mo. They then have Saturday off before returning to action in Charlotte on Sunday at 1 p.m.

Mike Mastone can be reached at mmastone@student.umass.edu.

COURTESY: UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

UMass coach Judy Dixon said senior captain Maude Lecluyse set the tone for the Minutewomen's win against the Crusaders yesterday. Lecluyse won both of her matches.

UMass sweeps opener

Minutewomen sweep doubles

By Chris Shores
Collegian Staff

It was a clean sweep for the Massachusetts tennis team as they began their season with a commanding 7-0 win at Holy Cross yesterday.

UMass coach Judy Dixon said the match was good in some spots and shaky in others. She said the weather conditions, especially temperatures under 50 degrees, were less than ideal for tennis.

"I'm glad this one is behind us," she said. "I feel we have some work to do, but we're certainly up to the task."

Dixon pointed to her captain, senior Maude Lecluyse, as being the driving force behind the team's victory.

"She led the gang through this first meet," said Dixon. "In general, I have to give the nod to her. She set the tone for the team."

The score in yesterday's match was identical to a match in March 2008 in which the Minutewomen crushed the Crusaders (1-3) in both doubles and singles. In yesterday's match, like the last time these two teams faced off, UMass (1-0) gained their victory without losing a single set.

Unlike last year's dominance, the Minutewomen double teams had to dig deep yesterday to come up with three quality wins.

Lecluyse and Candynce Boney, who recently won the No. 1 doubles championship at the Eastern Collegiate Invitational, defeated Kristen Meahl and Carolyn Chandley 8-6 in a hard-fought match.

The No. 2 doubles team, Magdalena Ploch and Julia Comas, had no trouble defeating Emily Marr and Emma Rudnik 8-0.

Another competitive match came from the No. 3 doubles team, as Tanisha Hodgson and Chantal Swiszcz beat Crusaders Kathryn Wilkie and Jen Daffron, 8-4.

Dixon was pleased to see Swiszcz, who recently returned from injury, contribute to a doubles victory.

"She did a fine job in her first match," said the coach.

In No. 1 singles play, Ploch, last year's Atlantic-10 Rookie of the Year, started her season off with a commanding win over Meahl, 6-1, 6-0.

Already achieving an 8-0 doubles win earlier in the afternoon, the freshman Comas put on a show in her first official singles match. In the No. 2 singles match, she shut out the opposing Chandley, 6-0, 6-0.

"I was extremely impressed with Julia," Dixon said. "It's clear she'll provide a lot of strength for our lineup at the top."

The No. 3 singles pitted Boney against Marr, and the UMass junior came up with the victory, 6-4, 6-2.

Lecluyse defeated her opponent in two straight sets, defeating Ivette Konopka in the No. 4 singles, 6-0, 6-3.

In the No. 5 singles match, junior Kaitlyn Carpenter beat Wilkie, 6-1, 6-0.

Already having faced off in a doubles match, Hodgson defeated Daffron for the second time, in the No. 6 singles match.

Before the season, Dixon said her team's depth impressed her. This was evident in the first match as six players contributed to set victories.

The Minutewomen play their first home match of the season next Wednesday against Connecticut. In Sept. 2007, the Minutewomen defeated the Huskies in a competitive 4-3 match.

Chris Shores can be reached at cshores@dailycollegian.com.

XC teams to run invitational

By Jeffrey Engmann
Collegian Staff

In some ways, this Friday's 36th annual Paul Short Invitational represents a transition in both the Massachusetts men's and women's cross country season. Coming two weeks after their only home meet of the season, the invitational will transport the teams out of New England and into Bethlehem, Pa. to compete against some of the strongest cross country programs in the country.

The field is composed exclusively of Division 1 programs, including Iona College, a team that has been the National runner up for consecutive seasons in the NCAA championships. Perhaps more importantly for UMass men's coach Ken O'Brien's team, is that the race also features five of the top seven teams in the Atlantic 10 conference, in which the Minutemen will look to defend their title, their first since 1995.

Last season UMass turned in a strong performance and finished sixth in the invitational. Coach O' Brien described it as the most successful race that the team raced until that point. This year he is looking for similar results, but knows it won't be easy considering the depth of this year's field.

"This year's field is a little bigger and the quality of teams is a little deeper. Any type of a finish in that area would actually represent a type of improvement," O'Brien said.

Not only is O'Brien aware that this will be his team's first time competing against such a strong field this season, but he is also conscious of other elements that his team will have to adjust to on the run, literally.

"The reason [the size] is important is because it's the first time we're going to see about 40 colleges on the starting line," he said. "It's the first time we will put a large number of people at the starting line and that has all types of implications that are a lot different from the last races we have run. It's [approximately] 10 times as many people, who are better."

The Minutemen had a week off after their victorious home meet. Coach O'Brien described it as "relaxing," as it allowed his team to train without the thought of a race on their mind.

The Minutewomen are also coming off a week of rest, and will head to Pennsylvania to compete on the women's side of Paul Short Invitational. The race features 41 teams and, similarly to the men's field, includes five A-10 teams.

The Minutewomen finished 27th out of 43 teams in last year's race, and received a lot of strong contributions from several runners. Karen Roa, ran the 6k in a time of 22:40, and Shiyi Zan lead the team by finishing 58th out of 296 runners, with a time of 21:43. Both runners are integral parts of the team this year, and look to lead the way again. Another runner who looks to continue her success this weekend is sophomore Claire Petit, who in the Minutewomen's finished in the top 20 in team's last meet.

The men's race will kick off at 11:00 a.m on Friday, and the women's race will kick off shortly after at 11:45 a.m.

Jeffrey Engmann can be reached at jengmann@student.umass.edu

555 deal
Domino's Pizza
Three Medium One-Topping Pizzas
$5.55 Each!
Domino's Pizza
413 - 256 - 8911
OPEN LATE NIGHT TILL 4 AM!

comics

JORNALISM AT ITS FINEST

HOROSCOPES

aquarius Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Your day could end in eight different digital dreamscapes. At least it sounds cool right?

pisces Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Take things literally and be the one who brings home the bacon. mmmhmmm...bacon.

aries Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Sniffing puppies must be added to the U.S' War on Drugs.

taurus Apr. 20-May 20
If someone doubts you then respond by saying, "I find your lack of faith disturbing"

gemini May 21-Jun. 21
Ever think of chewing on a car freshener? You know you have!

cancer Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Do not read the guide book "How to Sleep Around for Free" by Tara Reid.

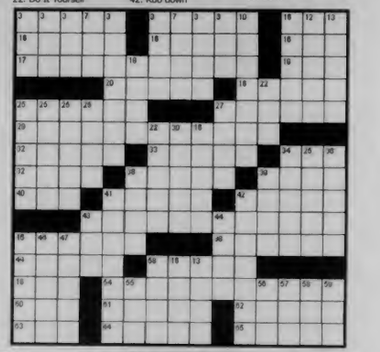
leo Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Lucifer will materialize as your Xbox 360's red ring of death.

virgo Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Perhaps "the Green Monster" is not such a great name for your child.

libra Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Running with scissors causes euphoria. Everyone's doing it!

scorpio Oct. 23-Nov. 21
50 Cent has been silently praying that you teach him the beauty of plural nouns.

sagittarius Nov. 22-Dec. 21
The lyrics to your new watermelon song are "googily moogily that thang is juicy!"



capricorn Dec. 22-Jan. 19
The Progressive Direct Insurance Girl is not selling people's tears on the black market.

I had plenty of pimples as a kid. One day I fell asleep in the library. When I woke up, a blind man was reading my face.
-Rodney Dangerfield

CROSSWORD

ACROSS
1. Storage area
6. Kind
11. One circuit around a track
14. Spear
15. Android
16. Outrage
17. Question
19. Negation of a word
20. Cassettes
21. Swelling under the skin
23. Dried grape
27. Pertaining to the backbone
28. For an unlimited time
32. Passionate
33. Overact
34. Estimated time of arrival
37. A unit of bread
38. Drips
39. Smile radiantly
40. N N N N
41. Any shape that is triangular in cross section
42. Blackbird
43. Demonstration
45. Hydrophoba
48. Agreement
49. Long periods of geologic time
50. Blabs
53. To and ___
54. A catastrophic event
60. "____ the season ..."
61. Young sheep
62. American actor Clark
63. Collection
64. Discharge
65. Part of a lync poem

DOWN
1. Famous boxer
2. A browning of the skin
3. Explosive letters
4. Frozen water
5. Endorse
6. Harvest
7. Balcony section
8. Fabrics made from goat hair
9. Booze
10. Spire
11. Cloth from flax
12. Scent
13. Flower feature
18. Hindu princess
22. Do It Yourself
23. A shoulder firearm
24. Negatively charged particle
25. Notions
26. Lowly worker
27. Collections
29. Requires
30. Picture
31. Arcade coin
34. Strange
35. Claw
36. Catkin
38. Bottom of the barrel
39. Wagers
41. Grapple
42. Rub down
43. Brooch
44. Not short
45. Improvised flat floats
46. Any habitation at a high altitude
47. Increase
50. An indefinite period
51. Wanes
52. Craving
55. Tattered cloth
56. Faucet
57. Nigerian tribesman
58. Not young
59. Born

COLLEGIAN CLASSIFIEDS

EMPLOYMENT

Volunteers needed for online-study of college students and antidepressant medication. paselton@nursing.umass.edu

Bartending $300/Day potential. NO experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 ext. 1

Rent us your ears! $10/hr to participate in a listening experiment. Write to phonetics_lab@linguist.umass.edu. English must be your first language.

Movie Extras, Actors, Models Wanted - Up to $300/day! All Looks Needed! Call NOW 1-800-458-9303.

RESEARCH STUDY

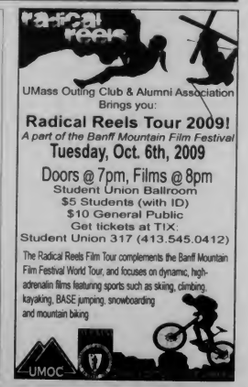
Join a Research study-conducted through the UMass Communication Department! Watch 80 mins of T.V. News, answer survey questions, and earn up to $10 for your time! Contact Lisa Wortman at Lisadenice@gmail.com to sign up!

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Montreal Party Weekends. From $99 Includes Hotel, Bus, and Clubs montrealexpress.net (781)979-9001

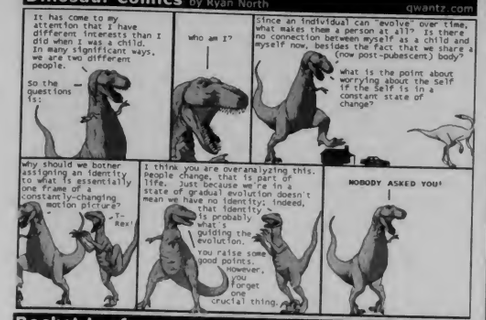
GUITAR TEACHER

Professional Electric Guitar Teacher & Performer; Specializing in Jazz, Improv. Music Theory & Technique. Call (413)665-8794



SPRING BREAK 2010

Spring Break 2010 sell trips, earn cash, and go free! Call for group discounts. Best prices guranteed! Info/reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com



WANTED

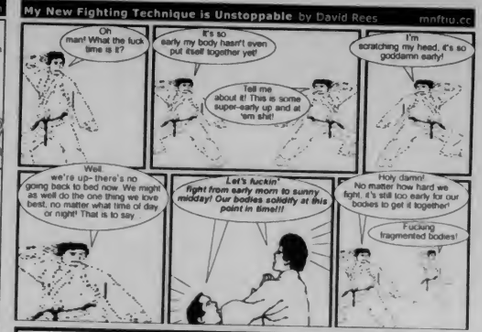
WIN $500 with www.tradeyacity.com contest!! Please search www.youtube.com (TM) for www.tradeyacity.com contest for all the details!

UMASS AMHERST
New Schedule for Winter Session
Earn credits during break!
Online classes begin: December 21, 2009
On campus classes begin: January 4, 2010
Sneak peek of class offerings based at

Dinosaur Comics by Ryan North — qwantz.com

Rocket Loaf by Travis Dandro — travisdandro.com

Chainsawsuit by Kris Straub — chainsawsuit.com



Bubblegum Heroes by Greg Roberts and EJ Massa

Wondermark by David Malki! — wondermark.com

My New Fighting Technique is Unstoppable by David Rees — mnftiu.cc

SUDOKU

			9	7
	2		8		3	5
			6
	9						1
7			9		4	3	5
4			2		9	1
		5	4				2
	8					6

WE WANT YOUR COMICS

Put your comics in front of thousands of readers!

EMAIL:
comics@dailycollegian.com

Labrat by Richard Martelly

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY | INDEPENDENTLY SERVING THE UMASS COMMUNITY SINCE 1890

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY
COLLEGIAN

HIGH: 64 LOW: 45 | www.DailyCollegian.com | MONDAY, OCTOBER 5, 2009

Four UMass football players arrested

Police allege cocaine possession

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

Four members of the University of Massachusetts football team were arrested Thursday night for possession of a Class B substance (cocaine), according to The Daily Hampshire Gazette, which broke the story Friday.

Defensive back James Carven, defensive linemen Bob McLaughlin, linebacker Mike Mele and defensive back Shane Viveiros all pleaded innocent to the charges on Friday and were subsequently suspended from the program for an unspecified length of time.

According to a statement from UMass Athletics, the four players were suspended for violation of athletic department and team rules.

"In terms of the length, it will become more defined next week," department spokesman Jason Yellin said. "There are legal ramifications surrounding this issue."

UMass coach Kevin Morris and athletic director John McCutcheon declined comment on the matter.

Mele and Viveiros were also charged with using false identification, with both pleading innocent to the charges. All four players were released on their own recognizance and have a pretrial hearing scheduled for Nov. 16.

